What interests are at stake on this subject! A few weeks of wet and cold, or dry and warm weather, may determine whether trade shall flourish and the people be fed, or whether bankruptcy, disease, and death, shall be the portion of thousands. Yet there are TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY MEN, calling themselves representatives of the people, who are striving by the most desperate means, and under the guidance of the most reckless and ignorant leadership, to make the nation stake all on the issue of our own harvest. To speak in language the new monopolist leader may comprehend, we ask, what would a Newmarket leg say to backing an ill-trained horse without being allowed to "hedge?" Yet this is what Lord George Bentinck and his monopolist faction would have the people do; to stake all on the result of the year's produce of one half-cultivated island, and that when failure will inevitably end in national distress.

THE VALUE OF LAND IS RISING.

The following needs no comment. It is a striking proof of the fallacious character of monopolist assertions:

Sale of the North Cove Hall Estates, in the Large Room, at the Norfolk Hotel, Norwich, on Thursday evening. The attendance was exceedingly numerous, and to a great extent represented the individual and collective respectability, as well as opulence of the sister counties. Mr. Simpson, previous to opening the sales, ventured to address his audience at some length on the all-absorbing subject of the contemplated (and he opined certain) abolition of the Corn Laws. He acknowledged that till within the last year he had been a thorough going protectionist. A three years' test however of Sir Robert Peel's measures, added to his extensive experience up to the present period in the letting and sales of landed property, he was now free, and proud to confess that sliding and other scales have fallen from his eyes, the result of which was, that he was now a thorough-going anti-protectionist. Mr. Simpson observed, from an honest and firm conviction, that rents which had been set on fair and liberal principles, within the last seven years, of "Live and let live," would be permanent, and he fearlessly stated that the years' purchase on such rentals has risen within the last six months, and in all probability will continue to rise on the settlement of the great question in respect of Free Trade in corn, &c. For the truthfulness of these statements, Mr. Simpson referred to recent lettings and sales which have been published, not only by himself, but by other auctioneers and land agents of greater eminence. Consumption and demand of an increasing population (in the ratio of about 1000 a day), the capital, skill, industry, and enterprise, in addition to the easy and inexpensive transit of the produce to the first markets in Europe, will form such a counterpoise as will enable us to compete successfully with the miserably uncultivated lands and minds of exotic origin and worth. Instead therefore of the motto of "agitate, agitate," let us substitute that of "cultivate, cultivate," and let landlords assist improving tenants by making advances (in the nature of improvements in drainage, &c.) of the additional capital which may be required, charging for the same at the rate of 4 per cent. on that expenditure which shall be judiciously laid out. Hence the tenant farmer will reap an additional benefit of at least 10 per cent., and a permanent improvement of the value of the farm (quasi landlord) will supervene. Mr. Simpson stated that in his humble opinion Sir Robert Peel is, at least, one of the greatest, most talented, and fearlessly honest ministers that has ever "lived in the tide of times."

The following is an account of the sales:

Lot 1. The mansion called North Cove Hall, with 516 acres of arable, pasture, marsh, and wood land, was bought in at	£19,000
Sold the next day by private contract to Wm. Everitt, Esq. of Yarmouth.
Lot 2. A freehold farm of 122 acres, sold to John Slipper, Esq., of Ashley, for	4640
Lot 3. A freehold farm, of 75 acres, producing (including the land in hand) 125f. 7s. 9d. per annum, was bought in at	3160
An offer of 3100l. was made for this lot on the following day; the selling price is now 3250l.
Lot 4. An estate, principally freehold, comprising 180 acres of land, of first-rate quality, a gentlemanly residence and buildings, the rental amounting to 322l. 7s. 3d. per annum, bought in at	8200
An offer of 8000l. has been made by private contract, but the price now is 8500l.
Lot 5. A small farm-house, and 17 acres of land (freehold), producing 37l. 19s. per annum, bought in at	900
850l. was offered.
Lot 6. A freehold cottage, and 2a. 3r. 34p. of land, sold to the Rev. Charles Clarke, for	245
Lot 7. Two freehold tenements, with gardens, &c., containing together 1a. 9p. bought in at	220
Sold to Wm. Everitt, Esq., by private contract, after the sale, at 280l.
Lot 8. Two freehold tenements, altogether containing 1a. 1r. 25p., sold to Benjamin Andrews, Esq.	305
Lot 9. Four inclosures of land, principally freehold, containing 3a. 3r. 29p., producing 13l. 6s. 2d. per annum, bought in at	300
	£36,560

The advowson of the rectory of Woodton, situate about five miles from Bungay, was offered on the same day. 3000l. were bid, but the reserve price being 3350l. it was bought in. Mr. Simpson is instructed to treat for the disposal of those lots bought in at the sale, since which he has received several applications to purchase. The proprietor, however, who is a gentleman of large landed and other property, is not at all disposed to retain those portions of the lands which form the cream of the estate.—Norwich Mercury.

A "FARMER'S FRIEND!"

Farmers and labourers should judge of men who profess to be their "friends" by their acts rather than their professions. Here we find the record of the acts of one, who, if his own account of his love for farmers and labourers were believed, would be thought the ne plus ultra friend of the industrious agricultural classes. What a pity it is that so much beneficence is purely ideal.

"RICHMOND IN SCOTLAND.—We understand that upwards of 20 individuals, small farmers and cottars, on his grace the Duke of Richmond's lands in the district of Strathogie and neighbouring parishes, have been served with summonses to remove themselves, with their families, at the first term of Whitsunday."—Elgin Courier.

THE LAW OF DISTRESS.

The following report brings home to the mind the injustice of the law of distress, which enables a landlord to sweep away all the effects of an insolvent tenant, to the utter exclusion of all the other creditors:

"Tuesday, April 28th.
(Before Mr. Commissioner Shepherd.)
"RE VINCENT, INSOLVENT."

"TILNEY, NORFOLK.—The Insolvent, Robert Vincent, of Tilney St. Lawrence, in the county of Norfolk, farmer, applied for his interim order and protection.

"Mr. Thomas S. Wright, Solicitor, Bond Court, City, appeared on behalf of the insolvent, whose debts are 175l. 2s. 6d. and credits but 2l. 14s. He has no property beyond his excepted articles, which are valued at 16l. 3s. On the 4th of October last he was possessed of household furniture, implements in trade, &c., of the value of 150l., and his stock in trade and goodwill as a farmer were then valued by Mr. Goddard, an appraiser, at 50l. more. On the 13th of March, in the present year, the insolvent was sold up by his landlord, Mr. Wright, for the arrears of rent which he owed. His receipts from the 25th of November to March were about 460l. for the sale of sheep, potatoes, &c. His principal local creditors are the Commissioners of the Eau Brink Estate, in the county of Norfolk, to whom Mr. Thomas Archer, solicitor, of Ely, is agent, 93l. for balance of rent; Edward Durrant, Esq., King's Lynn, Norfolk, 12l. 16s. for potatoes; Mr. Reed, basket-maker, King's Lynn, 11l. 16s.; Mr. Wm. Wright, farmer, Fring, Norfolk, 31l.; Mr. John Sutterbee, farmer, Tilney St. Lawrence, 8l.; and Mr. Wm. Wright, farmer, of Clenchwarton, Norfolk, 6l. No creditor attended to oppose."

FLAX CULTURE.

We observe that the Royal Agricultural Society has resolved to offer a prize for essays on the growth of flax. Now a full and complete account of the culture of flax, and the use of its seed, has just been published by Mr. Warnes, of Trimmingham, which should be in the hands of every enterprising farmer. The calls upon our attention since we have received the volume have prevented our noticing it in detail, which we hope to be able to do next week.

GAME AND THE GAME LAWS.

THE RURAL LEAGUE-SPOT.

It will be our duty ere long to comment with some frequency and severity upon the conduct of those who for their own selfish and puerile amusement, uphold a system of law which demoralises and disorganises the society of our agricultural districts. We need scarcely say we allude to the practice of game preserving and the Game Laws. For the present we content ourselves with placing before our readers a few illustrations of the Game Laws which have recently occurred. The first case is extracted from the Worcestershire Chronicle, and relates to an instance which happened on the estate of Mr. Berkeley, of Spetchley, near Droitwich, a most notorious game preserver. The form of the complaint was for an assault violence and bloodshed; being the usual and ordinary consequences of game preserving:

"At the county Petty Sessions on Tuesday, April 28th, William Allen, an assistant gamekeeper to Mr. Berkeley, was charged by William Worrell, of Droitwich, with assaulting him on the 9th instant. Before this case was entered into, Mr. Hyde, who appeared for the defendant, applied to the Bench for permission to bring before them two charges for offences against the Game Laws which he was prepared to prefer against Mr. Worrell, but as it appeared that the summonses for the assault was dated prior to the game cases, it was first entertained."

Mr. Worrell, who is clerk at the Spetchley station on the Birmingham and Gloucester railway, then deposed to the circumstances of the assault, which were as follows:

"Mr. Worrell, who lives near the station and rents land of Mr. Berkeley, is my relative. As I am in the habit of often going to his house, he has given me permission to take a near cut to the station through his fields. On the 8th instant I went to Mr. Worrell's and remained there all night. Next morning, about half-past six o'clock, I was returning to my employment, accompanied by two sons of Mr. W.; when I had got about fifty or sixty yards from the railway, Allen jumped out of a hedge, and, exclaiming, 'I have caught you at last,' knocked me down twice, and rifled my pockets, from which he took a piece of twine; after I had got up the second time I ran off towards the station, and was pursued by the defendant, who would have again struck me with a thick stick, if he had not been prevented by one of the railway servants. I afterwards went to Mr. Hiscock, head gamekeeper to Mr. Berkeley, and told him I had been grossly assaulted by one of his assistants, and if an apology was not made I should take out a summons. By Mr. Hyde: There was no person with me but Mr. Worrell's two sons. I had nothing in my pocket but a piece of twine.

"(Mr. H. here produced a piece of twine and a wire as the articles that had been taken from the prosecutor.)

"I distinctly swear I never had a wire in my possession in my life, nor did I ever set one. The wire was never taken from me. I was in the same field on the evening previous with Mr. Worrell's sons. Mr. Worrell asked me to go and look at some ewes which were shortly expected to year. It was about half-past nine o'clock. I was not there at any other time of the day."

Now, if in fact Mr. Worrell had been catching game upon his relation's farm, which he was not, could such a savage assault be justified? But when we see the master, who should have felt some of the civilising influences of education, so absorbed by a pernicious passion for game, is it surprising that his ignorant game-watcher becomes a ferocious ruffian? The report then states that

"John Worrell corroborated the evidence of the prosecutor, both as to the assault, and his being in company with him on the previous evening.—Joseph Howell, foreman at the railway station, stated that he saw the assault committed, and that he wrenched a stick from Allen's hand while in the act of striking Worrell. This witness also stated that Allen had told him and other parties that he gets 1l. from Mr. Berkeley, and 1l. from the head-keeper, upon every conviction. A porter at the station, named Jelf, also stated that he saw the assault committed, and saw Allen rifle the complainant's pockets. This closed the case for the prosecution, and Mr. Hyde found that the assault had been proved, but urged in mitigation that the defendant had acted under an erroneous opinion, that he had the power, being an assistant-keeper, to search parties suspected of having gins and other snares in their possession."

What will law-respecting people of England say to this phase of the Game Laws? To meet Mr. Worrell's statement, the game-preserver's agent called his head keeper, who was not present:

"Charles Hiscock, the head keeper to Mr. Berkeley, deposed, I saw William Worrell in a field in the occupation of Mr. Worrell, about 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 8th instant. He was walking by the side of the hedge. I saw him twice go down into a ditch, and stoop down as if he was setting wires. I desired Allen to watch him."

This, let it be remembered, was on the land in the occupation of Mr. Worrell's relation!!! The head-gamekeeper proceeds thus:

"About two hours afterwards I went into the same field and found two gins set, and a dead hare in one of them. I was about 150 yards from the complainant. Worrell came to my house on the morning of the 9th and said, 'I've been so foolish as to set some wires, I wish you could get me out of the scrape, as it will be very injurious to my character.' I said, 'My good fellow, I can't do it, it is more than my place is worth.'—By Mr. Pullen: I never had any dispute with Allen when Mr. Brown, the contractor was present; I cannot recollect that Allen accused me of giving him dead hares to put in gins for the purpose of procuring convictions.—Mr. Pullen: Did you ever give him a dead hare to put in a gin for that purpose?—Witness: I have given him a hare, but I cannot tell what he did with it.—Mr. Pullen: Tell the truth, yes or no, did he ever put a hare in a gin by your directions?—Witness (after a long pause): WELL, HE DID.—Mr. Pullen: Do you swear you saw William Worrell in the field at two o'clock on the 8th inst.—Witness: I do."

The plot thickens reader. Recollect this Mr. Berkeley, the game preserver, gives his servants money, much money, for every Game Law conviction they obtain; and take with that fact the keeper's admission about the dead hare. Now, mark the conclusion of the case:

"Jelf, the railway porter, recalled, and examined by Mr. Pullen.—About two o'clock in the afternoon of the 8th inst., Wm. Worrell was engaged in looking over the invoices of a luggage train which had just arrived; after that he was employed in checking goods which were to go off; it is the complainant's duty to remain at the station all day, and I distinctly state that he was not absent from his business one minute during the whole of that afternoon. The Bench said that a more extraordinary and scandalous case had never been brought before them; indeed, they considered that not one word of truth had been told except by the prosecution; and Mr. Foley, in stating the decision, characterised the transaction as one which warranted their inflicting the full penalty. Allen was therefore fined 4l. 3s. 6d., and 10s. 6d. costs, or two months' imprisonment. Mr. Hyde said, that from what had transpired, he would withdraw the charges against Worrell."

Now, had Mr. Hyde's request been acceded to, the head keeper's information against Mr. Worrell for poaching, supported by the testimony of the pure and disinterested witness, Allen, would have been heard first, and the prosecutor might have been convicted of an offence against the Game Laws. But suppose the person so charged had been a mere working man, who might not have been able to prove so distinctly that he was elsewhere at the time of the alleged offence, what would have been the result? Truly this was a "scandalous" case; but our knowledge of game preserved districts compels us to say with regret, that we believe it to be by no means an "extraordinary" one.

As a pendant to the above, we extract two other game cases, reported in the Leicestershire Mercury.

At Loughborough Petty Sessions, on the 30th of April:

"Before the Rev. J. Dudley, and J. G. D. B. Danvers, Esq. "GAME LAWS.—Henry George and George Wilkins, of Long Whetton, were charged with trespassing in pursuit of game on land in the occupation of George Jarman, farmer, where the right to the game belonged to E. Dawson, Esq. Neither of the defendants appeared, and the parish constable proving the service of the summons, George Monk was sworn, and deposed that on Wednesday night he was 'on the look out,' and saw defendants in a field sown with dills. George had a gun. They were looking about as if in search of game; he had no doubt they were in search of game.—Mr. Dudley: 'For hares probably?'—Witness: 'They might be.'—Mr. Dudley: 'It was a place where hares might be found, I suppose?'—Witness: 'Yes, Sir.' Defendants were fined 10s. each, and costs (9s. 9d. each); in default, two months' hard labour."

Note the illegal and leading questions of the justice.

In the other case:

"William Wright, of Long Whetton, was charged with using certain engines for the purpose of taking game on the 24th of April, where the right belonged to C. M. Philipps, Esq. The information was laid by Alcroft, the head game-keeper, and George Handley, an assistant, was sworn in support of it. He said that on Tuesday morning he was in Oakley Wood, about six o'clock, and saw some snares standing. One had a hare, and another a rabbit in it. Wright came and took them up. Defendant denied the charge, and said he was collared by Handley when on the Fenner land, and taken by him down to the Hall, at Garendon, when Mr. Philipps' instructions were that a summons be taken out against him. A warrant, however, had been taken out, and he was apprehended, and kept in custody, so that he had not an opportunity of procuring witnesses. Handley, he also said, put a rabbit into his (defendant's) pocket. 'The dog worrying is the foundation of it.' Handley said the reason a warrant was taken out, was that he was afraid Wright would run away.—Defendant was fined 5l., including costs; and, in default, sentenced to two months' hard labour."

"The defendant in this case is the man who was very seriously injured by a dog being set upon him some months ago, and Handley is the person who was found guilty of setting it on him; which explains Wright's remark, 'The dog worrying is the foundation of it.'"

Now is there not a strong probability that this charge was a trumped up one? Poor Wright had not the opportunity of rebutting the charge, which Mr. Worrell was fortunate enough to possess. But when two such illustrations of the Game Laws are offered in one week in different parts of the country, is it not proof decisive of something wrong in the system?

GOOD NEWS FOR THE FARMERS.

The grievous injury inflicted upon the community by the Game Laws has at length attracted the attention of the intelligent members of the Common Council of the city of London, who on the 23rd of April last, passed a resolution to petition Parliament for the repeal of the Game Laws. The following are the remarks of the mover and seconder on the occasion.

"Mr. W. S. Hale, the chairman of the London School Committee, rose to move that the court should petition Parliament for the repeal of the Game Laws. He said it was impossible to read the details of the terrible consequences of the infamous Game Laws in the newspapers without being impressed with the opinion that the sooner they were wholly abolished the better. He rejoiced that Parliament was engaged in an investigation of the injurious effects of the system which was adopted for the amusement of a few at the fatal expense of the many. Was it to be for a moment supposed that a man whose family were almost starving could see a hare cross his path without making an effort to supply his wife and children with food by possessing himself of what he considered as much his property as it was the property of the man of fortune, who pursued it with impunity? Some people argued that the individuals who were tried for transgression of the Game Laws were not the most moral in any part of their conduct. But what rendered them loose of morals but the existence of those cruel laws which deprived them of their liberty and dismissed their families to the workhouse for an offence which, though criminal in the eye of the law, could not be made, by any ingenuity, other than venial, regarded in a moral point of view."

"Mr. R. Taylor supported the motion, and pointed at the prisons all over the country as evidence of the demoralising tendency of the Game Laws. The chaplains who attended the gaols in which are deposited the individuals who had violated these laws, stated that they found no other kind of depravity amongst them, and that it was quite impossible to induce them to believe that they had committed any crime. Neither morality nor religion intimated to them that they had not as good a right to possess themselves of game as those who were out of the reach of necessity. It was seen in what multitudes labouring men came to town to the unions. Was it to be wondered at that the want which drove these multitudes to London should drive them to the adoption of those unlawful practices which often led to the commission of more awful offences? Let the court look at those dreadful conflicts which involved murders and terminated in executions. It was a remarkable fact, that men who are executed for the fatal consequences of those conflicts were objects of commiseration, and not of abhorrence and detestation, which marked the departure of a criminal found guilty of murder under other circumstances. The legislature were in fact, by continuing the Game Laws, manufacturing poor people into criminals."

A slight opposition was offered, and an amendment was proposed to petition for the "alteration," instead of the "repeal" of the Game Laws, but the original motion was carried by a large majority. This is as it should be. The Game Laws constitute an "injustice," with which there can be no compromise; it MUST BE ABATED.

POPULATION.—It is a cruel joke to talk about the evils of an increasing population, when that population is cut off by law from the power of selling the produce of its labour for the interest of a robber caste, who tell us plainly, that like the French noblesse, they will pay no taxes, unless they may have liberty to take the amount again from other people, and who, if speedily change of mind be not vouchsafed them, will come to the same rough end.

HOW THE MONOTHEISTS BEHAVED NINE YEARS AGO.—"On Thursday (18th March 1837) Mr. Clay brought on his motion for an alteration in the Corn Laws. As soon as Mr. Clay had finished speaking, an agricultural member (Mr. Cayley) rose with the seconder, and endeavoured to stop proceedings by counting out the House. The number was found above forty, and the seconder went on. Their first movement having thus failed, the landowners mustered kin and clan, and finally came down to the number of above two hundred. The ordinary routine of a thousand-times-repeated fallacies was put forward, and received as might be expected in an assembly where every man had made oath that he had a pecuniary interest in the question before him. At the instance of friends about me, I made repeated attempts to offer reply, as also to explain my reasons for not voting upon the actual question; but was unable to gain a hearing. Thank God, I have many better places! If I had been a jobber in a railroad or a dabbler in some monopoly, wishing to make a similar explanation, I should have been heard with reverential sympathy, to the extent that human organs could supply. Sir W. Molesworth entered upon a demonstration of the mode of operation of the competition generated by the limitation of food, which was perfect in its way, but confined to a portion of the field. Mr. Hume was received with groans and hideous laughs when he attempted to open the case of that part of the community who have not three hundred pounds a year in land; and when he proceeded to connect the question with the New Poor Law, the sounds that issued from the landed benches had a touch of the New Zealander."—Letters of a Representative, by Col. Thompson.

Letters from Iceland, received at Copenhagen, state that a great misfortune has befallen that country in consequence of the present eruption of Hecla: a fatal malady having attacked the cattle, from eating herbage which had been covered by the volcanic ashes. As high winds had prevailed for some time, the ashes were scattered throughout the island; and a great number of cattle, especially oxen, cows, and sheep, had perished. If the eruption of Hecla is prolonged for two months more, all the rural proprietors who have not enough hay to keep their herds—and the majority are in this condition—will be obliged either to slaughter their cattle, or to abandon them to certain death on the pastures thus poisoned by the volcanic ashes. The eruption of Mount Hecla was extremely violent. The flames which issued from the three great craters attained a height of 14,000 feet; and their breadth exceeded the greatest breadth of the river Piversen, the most considerable river in Iceland. The lava had already formed lofty mountains; and amongst the masses of pumice stone vomited by the volcano, and which have been found at a distance of three-fourths of a mile, there were some which weighed half a ton. By the eruption of Hecla, the enormous quantities of snow and ice which had accumulated for several years on the sides of that mountain have melted, and partly fallen into the river Rangen, which has overflowed its banks several times. The waters of that river, which runs almost at the foot of Mount Hecla, and which receives a large portion of the burning lava, were so hot that every day they cast upon the banks numbers of dead trout almost half-baked. Every night vivid streaks of the aurora borealis illumined the sky.

APPLICATION OF LEECHES.—The following method of facilitating the application of leeches is recommended by Dr. Reim. Let the leeches be put into a bottle filled with good beer, leaving them there until they seem to become lively. After they have been allowed to remain in this state for a few seconds, withdraw them from the liquid and immediately apply them. The process is almost infallible; even very feeble leeches, and which have lately been used, fasten as well as if they were employed for the first time.—Gazette Médicale de Paris.

THE DORSETSHIRE POOR.

To the Editor of THE TIMES.

SIR,—I beg most earnestly to call your attention to the accompanying correspondence which has just taken place between the Poor Law Commissioners and myself.

My letter will explain the grounds on which I made a claim for exception on behalf of the applicant, W. Soper; and the extract appended to it from the "Application and Report Book" of one of the relieving officers of the Dorchester Union, will inform you of the nature of the application.

I also beg leave to enclose two letters, one anonymous; the name of the writer of the other I desire to conceal for the reason he has given. In consequence of the representations made to me in these letters, and the melancholy announcement that the failure of the potato crop had increased the distress of the writer and his companions, I determined to take the first opportunity that offered of putting to the test the declaration made by the Poor Law Commissioners in their general order of August 2, 1841, and December 21, 1841, that out-door relief should be granted to the able-bodied in cases of "urgent necessity" with what success I leave you to judge from their reply.

Although much good has been effected in the county of Dorset, by the disclosures which have appeared from time to time in the public prints, with reference to the abject condition of the agricultural poor in that county, still the practice (it might almost be called an agreement) continues amongst labourers generally, of keeping the unfortunate labourers at a rate of wages shamefully disproportionate to his services, and barely sufficient in many instances, to save him from starvation.

Immediately on receipt of the anonymous letter above referred to, I visited the dwellings of these unfortunate persons, which are situated about 16 miles from my residence, and I found their condition to be even worse than they had represented. In two instances the family consisted of six persons—the labourer, his wife, and four children. The cottages were commodious, and in good condition; but the terms on which these men were working for their employers were as follows:—7s. per week each. Out of this pittance they were compelled to pay to the tenant, as rent for the landlord's cottage, 1s. 6d. per week; "gristing," as it is called, or wheat unfit for the markets, at 6s. 6d. per bushel; it had been as dear as 7s. 3d. for six weeks during the six months previous, which was the price, if not higher than the market price, of the best wheat sold in the county. They had fuel for the labour of cutting the furze growing on the farm, which amounts, in my opinion, to the same thing as paying for it; and potato ground at the rate of 9d. per acre. It is true that, in the year 1845, in consequence of the failure of the potato crop, they only paid 1l. 15s. as rent for a quarter of an acre; but in 1844, 2l. 5s. was demanded and paid for land to that extent.

My visit to the dwelling of these poor people chanced to be at their dinner hour, when I found that the meal they were about to partake of consisted merely of a small quantity of horse-beans and turnip tops boiled in water. I asked the wife of one of the men what she intended to prepare for her husband's supper when he returned home from his hard day's work, and her answer was, in the most cheerful tone, "Why, bless you, Sir, horse-beans and turnip tops."

I believe this to be the condition of the agricultural labourers, generally, in the west part of the county of Dorset—I know it to be so in the parish of Brettecombe and the adjoining parishes, and the case of William Soper is by no means an unusual one in any part of the county.

I do not shrink from the thousand reflections which may be passed upon me from these cases, herein exposed, having occurred on my own property. I do not profess to be a bit less culpable for the existence of such cases of misery and privation than any other landlord in the county. I have endeavoured to remedy these evils by calling attention to the injustice of the course pursued towards the labourer, and by setting an example of paying for work done in money instead of in kind, or by a species of truck. It matters not, I am convinced, whatever the rent of a farm may be, or whether a lease is granted or not; whether the price of wheat may be 30l. or 14l. per load; whether the demand for labour is abundant or not, the average amount of wages in the county of Dorset remains always the same, at 7s. per week. They appear to be fixed by custom, combination, and a tyrannical use made of the New Poor Law.

I am well aware of the odium and sneers which will be cast upon me for again thrusting these cases before the public. I am perfectly indifferent to the result. I feel convinced by bringing the aid of the press to bear upon all these instances of hardship and injustice, much good will be effected, as there has been already, and the labourer will, I am in hopes, reap the benefit.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, 18, Spring gardens, May 3.

R. B. SHELDON.

THE GOVERNMENT PROVISION.—HOARDING SYSTEM.—We have been favoured in Galway with a cargo of Indian meal, which has been duly lodged in the stores of Mr. Fynn, a gentleman by whom we are assured that, so strongly built is the concern, it is impregnable to any attacks that may be made upon it, in the event of a popular outbreak.—Galway Mercury.

The people of Sligo are now suffering want. On Tuesday a large body of labourers walked in procession through the town, carrying two leaves on poles, and proceeded to the workhouse to ascertain from the Poor Law Guardians then assembled what relief would be afforded them. They got promises, we believe, in plenty, but unless they can live like the camelion, "their promise cramm'd," we think their case is hopeless. The guardians will do nothing for them. They can do nothing, and it is absurd to let a contrary impression go abroad. Why should the people be permitted to be "fool'd to the top of their bent?" Why should they be allowed to labour under the delusion that a board of guardians can assist them, when that board has no power to give out-door relief? and if they had, could the ratepayers bear it? We must look for aid in other quarters. Food and employment are what the people want. Cheap food can be procured by throwing open the Government granaries and distributing, at a low price, the Indian meal. Then as to employment, there is a grant of £50,000 at the disposal of the Board of Works for the relief of ALL Ireland!—Sligo Champion.

THE AGRICULTURAL INTEREST.—Within the last fortnight a farm at Collingbourne, Wilts, consisting of about 500 acres, the property of the Marquis of Aylesbury, became vacant. During that brief period the noble marquis has received no less than 18 applications for it from unexceptionable tenants. So much for the anticipated effects of the repeal of the Corn Laws.

REVIEW.

FALLACIES OF PROTECTION.—(Sophismes Economiques, par F. Bastiat, &c.) Paris: Guillaumin; London: Dulau. Third Notice.

We resume our notice of M. Bastiat's work by quoting his exposure of the fallacy of Reciprocity, which was revived by Mr. D'Israeli on Monday night, in a style that shows the worthy member for Shrewsbury to be one of the babes and sucklings of political economy, from whose mouth nothing but a miracle could "perfect praise."

"We have just seen that whatever renders transport costly in the course of the interchange of commodities is virtually a protection; or, if another form of expression be preferred, protection is in its operation identified with whatever renders transport costly."

"It is then correct to say that protection is a marsh, a slaking bog, a lagoon, a stony acclivity,—in a word, an obstacle, the effect of which is to augment the difference between the price of consumption and the price of production. It is at the same time indisputable that impassable roads and iron-bound coasts are genuine protecting tariffs."

"There are people—a small number, it is true, but still there are people—who begin to comprehend that obstacles are not the less obstacles for being artificial; and that our prosperity has more to gain from freedom than protection, precisely for the same reason that canals and railroads are more favourable to it than bridle-paths and bullock-tracks."

"But they say, this freedom must be reciprocal. If we throw down the barriers before Spain, while Spain does not throw them down before us, we should evidently be dupes. Let us, then, make commercial treaties on the basis of just reciprocity; let us concede to procure concession; let us make the sacrifice of buying to obtain the advantage of selling."

"Persons who reason thus are, I am sorry to say, virtually protectionists; only they happen to be more illogical than the protectionists, just as the latter are more illogical than the prohibitionists."

"I shall demonstrate this by an apologue."

"STULTA AND PUERA."

"There was once upon a time, no matter where, two towns, named Stulta and Puera. They constructed, at great expense, a road which connected them together. When this was completed, Stulta said, 'Here is Puera inundating me with her products; the matter must be taken into consideration.' In consequence, Stulta levied and paid a corps of enrayeurs (men employed to lock the wheels of carriages), so named because it was their duty to impede all the conveyances which came from Puera. Soon after, Puera had her corps of enrayeurs."

"After the lapse of some centuries, intelligence having made considerable progress, the mind of Puera was sufficiently enlightened to discover that these mutual obstacles might be mutually injurious. She sent an envoy to Stulta, who (omitting diplomatic forms) spoke to this effect: 'We have constructed a road, and now we block it up; that is absurd. It would have been better to leave things as they were. We should not then have had to pay, first for the road, and then for the blockade. On the part of Puera, I come to propose to you, not at all at once to renounce the opposition of our mutual obstacles—that would be to act upon principle, and we despise principles as much as you do—but to diminish these obstacles gradually, taking care equitably to balance our respective sacrifices.' Thus spoke the envoy. Stulta demanded time for reflection; she consulted her manufacturers and her agriculturists. Finally, after the lapse of some years, she declared that the negotiations were broken off."

"At this news, the inhabitants of Puera held a council. An old man (it was always believed that he had been secretly bribed by Stulta) rose and said: 'The obstacles created by Stulta injure our sales; that is a misfortune. Those which we have created ourselves injure our purchases; that is another misfortune. We can do nothing with the first, but the second depends on ourselves. Let us, at all events, get rid of one, since we cannot of both. Let us suppress our enrayeurs without asking Stulta to do the same. One day or other she will learn how to manage her affairs better.'

"A second councillor, a practical, matter-of-fact man, free from principles, and thoroughly imbued with the antiquated wisdom of his ancestors, replied: 'Listen not to that dreamer, theorist, innovator, Utopian, economist, and stultomaniac. We should be ruined if the impediments of the road were not equalised. There would then be more difficulty in going than in coming, in exporting than in importing. We should be, in respect to Stulta, under the same disadvantageous circumstances that Havre, Nantes, Bordeaux, Lisbon, London, Hamburg, and New Orleans, are in reference to towns placed at the sources of the Seine, the Loire, the Garonne, the Tagus, the Thames, the Elbe, and the Mississippi; for it is more difficult to ascend than to descend the stream—(A Voice: 'Cities at the mouth of rivers are more prosperous than those at the sources').—That is not possible. (The same voice: 'But it is the fact'). Well, they have prospered contrary to rule.'

"Such conclusive reasoning made the assembly waver. The orator completed his convictions by speaking of national independence, national honour, national dignity, national industry, influx of produce, ruinous competition; in short, he carried the continuance of the obstacles; and if you are curious in the matter, I can bring you to a certain country where you will find road-makers and road breakers working together on the best terms—by the decrees of the same legislative assembly, and at the expense of the same tax payers, the one at clearing and the other at blockading the roads."

The Life and Speeches of Daniel O'Connell, M.P. Edited by his Son, John O'Connell, M.P. Dublin, Duffy; London, Dolman.

There is always a difficulty in reviewing the life of a statesman who still lives and acts amongst us, for there is at least a chance that his destined work is unaccomplished and his mission incomplete. It has, however, been the fortune of Daniel O'Connell to achieve a success which has taken its place in history, and to survive to hear what is virtually the judgment of posterity on a course of policy, commenced in sincerity, conducted with consistency, and finally brought in all honour to a triumphant issue. We should gladly hear from himself an account of the difficulties he had to encounter, the prejudices he had to conciliate, and the misapprehensions he had to explain. Such a revelation would be a valuable lesson in mental discipline for all who may hereafter devote themselves to the service of mankind. It would tell of many errors incident to humanity; it would confess many misapprehensions, and acknowledge many mistakes, but it would show that confidence in the rectitude of a cause will eventually triumph, not only over the opposition of adversaries, but over the failings of self.

O'Connell was educated in France, during the period when the first ebullition of popular rage, set loose after centuries of oppression, threatened to render the popular cause odious to every lover of social order. Trained from his infancy in strict religious principles, witnessing the perils to which his beloved instructors of St. Omers were exposed by revolutionary violence, insulted, in company with his brother students, by the fanatics of the National Guards—for there is a fanaticism in irreligion, as well as in religion—it is not surprising that O'Connell came to Ireland a thorough enemy of democracy, and of most of the principles now bearing the name of liberal. A singular circumstance contributed to strengthen his anti-revolutionary opinions. Among those who had come over with him and his brother in the packet-boat, were John and Henry Sheares, who had not only witnessed the execution of Louis XVI., but displayed to their fellow-passengers a handkerchief which they had dipped in the blood of that monarch, as a trophy of the triumph of freedom.

The profession of the law had been recently opened to Catholics. O'Connell embraced it, and became, in 1794, a student of Lincoln's Inn. He ascribes to his witnessing the trials of Horne Tooke, Hardy, Thelwall, and their associates, his reconciliation with the principles of democracy; and he was not the only person whom the excessive spirit of persecution, displayed on that occasion, brought back to the advocacy of liberty.

O'Connell returned to Ireland on the eve of the insurrection of 1798. Friends and enemies have equally assailed him for his want of sympathy with the united Irishmen at that period; but, as Lord Plunket justly remarked, it was a Protestant, not a Catholic conspiracy. Its original leaders were as hostile to the altar as they were to the throne. The Catholic part of the insurrection, originally designed to be the episode, but rendered by circumstances the principal, was much more of an agrarian or servile revolt, than either a religious or a republican movement. The conduct of the Irish Parliament during this crisis, destroyed for ever its character as a legislature. It had become a nuisance which required to be abated; and when it committed suicide at the Union there were those who said, with equal bitterness and truth, that it had cheated the hangman.

O'Connell entered public life as an opponent of the Union. In his maiden speech he made a remarkable declaration:

"Let us," said he, 'show to Ireland, that we have nothing in view but her good; nothing in our hearts but the desire of mutual forgiveness, mutual toleration, and mutual affection; in fine, let every man who feels with me proclaim, that if the alternative were offered him of union, or the re-enactment of the penal code in all its pristine horrors, that he would prefer without hesitation the latter, as the lesser and more sufferable evil; that he would rather confide in the justice of his brethren, the Protestants of Ireland, who have already liberated him, than lay his country at the feet of foreigners.'"

There is a grave historical error in this passage. The penal laws were not imposed by the English Government; nor was their relaxation owing to the Irish Protestants. Sir Robert Walpole found it no easy task to check the rage for persecution manifested by the ascendancy in the Irish Parliament; and that ascendancy never voluntarily relaxed a single article of the penal code. Every concession made to the Catholics previous to the Union was purchased or extorted from the Irish Parliament by the interference of the English Government.

We have reason to know that many of the great men who resisted the Union to the last regretted that they did not submit to the measure when they found it inevitable, and stipulate with the Minister for a fair representation of Ireland in the Imperial Parliament. So far as numbers went, Ireland obtained better terms than she offered when her Parliament petitioned for a Union in 1707; but the representatives of the boroughs were mere nominees of patrons; indeed, there was hardly a borough in Ireland which possessed anything like a constituency. The sale of seats was perfectly notorious. Cashel was frequently set up to auction; and Talbot was actually introduced into a settlement for younger children. This abuse was the chief ground of the argument for repeal urged by Mr. O'Connell in 1810:

"Out of the one hundred, such as they are, that sit for this country, more than one-fifth know nothing of us, and are unknown to us. What, for example, do we know about Andrew Strahan, printer to the king? What can Henry Martin, barrister at law, care for the rights or liberties of Irishmen? Some of us may, perhaps, for our misfortunes, have been compelled to read a verbose pamphlet of James Stevens; but who knows anything of one Gills, one Hughan, one Cackin, or of a dozen more whose names I could mention, only because I have discovered them for the purpose of speaking to you about them; what sympathy can we, in our sufferings, expect from those men? What solicitude for our interests? What are they to Ireland, or Ireland to them? No, Mr. Sheriff, we are not represented—we have no effectual share in the legislation—the thing is a mere mockery."

It was not until 1811 that Mr. O'Connell began to attract notice as an active leader in the Catholic committee. He, like many others, was duped by the belief that the bigoted obstinacy of George III. was the principal impediment to emancipation; and that the Prince of Wales only waited for an opportunity to declare himself the friend of the Catholics. He exonerated the Prince from all share in the perverse but ludicrous efforts to suppress the meetings of the Catholic committee; and laid the blame on the Lord Lieutenant and his secretary, who merely acted under orders from England. In discussing the failure of the efforts to form a Liberal administration after the death of Perceval, Mr. O'Connell stated the grounds of his confidence in the Prince Regent, who, as he stated, had given solemn pledges to the Catholics of Ireland:

"The first in rank, though not in order of time, is that communicated to the Catholics of Ireland, by his Grace the Duke of Bedford. He lives—my witness lives: what is said here will probably reach him through the public papers; and I call upon him, publicly to contradict anything I advance, which is not literally warranted by the fact. Thus, then, do I state, that in 1805, about the commencement of the Fox administration, when the Catholics, flushed with hope at seeing their late advocates in power, were about to prepare petitions to Parliament, the ministry used many means to postpone that measure. At that period, and as one of those means, his Grace the Duke of Bedford, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, did communicate to the Catholics of Ireland, the wish of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, that the question should not then be agitated; and at the same time, his decided conviction of the justice of our claims, and his decided resolution to admit them whenever he should have power to do so."

"Perhaps I can state this pledge; but I see persons before me to whom this language was held; and I am quite sure that the Duke of Bedford would never, never have conveyed one idea on the subject, if he had not his authority directly from the Prince."

"Secondly, my lord, we have had in the same year, the same pledge repeated to many Catholics, by the Chancellor of Ireland, George Ponsonby."

"The keeper of his Majesty's Irish conscience must be supposed to have had a kind of reverential solicitude for that of his Royal Highness, the heir apparent. Mr. Ponsonby does, I understand, distinctly avow the authority under which he communicated to the Irish Catholics the promise of emancipation—when, in the fulness of time, he, whom we then cherished as the early friend of Ireland, and the proudest hope, should have it in his power to rouse the enthusiasm of an electric people round his throne."

"Good God! what a prodigal waste has since been committed—not of wealth, for that, comparatively, is no more than trash—but of the cheerful and best defence of the monarch, the Irish people's love."

"The third pledge is a written one, and is in the possession of a Catholic peer, not now present. I have not the honour to be sufficiently known to the Earl of Kermarthen to have applied to him for it; but I entertained hopes of being able to procure it through a friend of mine, and of his lordship. It is sufficient to say of that pledge, that it afforded for years consolation to the Irish Catholics; and the discretion with which it was communicated, enhanced its value. I believe, my lord, I need not state to you how little doubt it could leave of the firm decision of the Prince's mind upon our question."

"The fourth and last pledge, which, for the present, I shall mention, was that given by his Royal Highness to a noble lord now present. At the conversation I allude to, that noble lord was accompanied by the late Lord Petre, and the present Lord Clifden. After retiring from the presence of his Royal Highness, the declarations which he was so graciously pleased to make, were from a loyal and affectionate impulse of gratitude, committed to writing, and signed by the three noble lords."

It was, indeed, for many years the general belief in Ireland, that the Prince Regent's violation of these pledges, and his hostility to the Catholic claims arose from female influence. The Hertford ascendancy was identified with the Protestant ascendancy; and, as was said of another royal sensualist, "new policy could not be expected at court until the advent of a new petticoat."

The year 1813 was one of deep interest in the history of the struggle for emancipation; a measure of concession received a second reading in the House of Commons, but unfortunately it was accompanied by certain "securities," of no great value in themselves, but which seemed to authorise the interference of Government in the ecclesiastical discipline of the Irish Catholic church. In the discussion of these clauses at the Catholic committee unhappy dissensions arose. There were many who thought themselves bound to abide by the decision of the Catholic prelates, there were others who claimed for the laity the privilege of free action, and these Mr. John O'Connell flippantly denounces as schismatics. It may be schism for laymen to resist prelates in matters relating to spiritual jurisdiction, but certainly laymen have some right in distinguishing between what are and what are not the legitimate objects of episcopal function; and the Court of Rome has recognised this right in wars, treaties, and negotiations with the most eminent Catholic princes not less than with Protestant potentates. Those paragons of piety Charles V. and his son Philip of Spain, waged war against the popes without ever being suspected of the sin of schism.

The unhappy dissensions in the Catholic body tended greatly to strengthen the patrons of Protestant ascendancy in both Houses of Parliament. The Catholic aristocracy of England, aided by the amiable and learned Charles Butler, were anxious to make terms with the Government, and were probably led farther than they at first intended in the way of concession, by the intemperate zeal of the Rev. Dr. Milner, who asserted the claims of his church in terms that would have been deemed strong before the Reformation. Still, as this controversy was only a mischievous episode in the history of emancipation, we regret to see that it has been revived by Mr. John O'Connell, and revived for so mischievous a purpose as to misrepresent the new colleges in Ireland. He assumes that the education of the laity is as great an interference with the ecclesiastical discipline of his church as a share in the appointment of the clergy, and he claims the authority of the prelates against these institutions. Into controversies of opinion we need not enter, but a misrepresentation of fact is a very different matter. No one knows better than Mr. John O'Connell that the Irish colleges are not more tolerated but supported by no inconsiderable minority of the Catholic prelates.

The year 1813 closed with a manifestation of increased hostility to the claims on the part of the Irish Government, then administered by the Duke of Richmond and Mr. (now Sir Robert) Peel. Ostentatious patronage and favour were displayed to the leaders of the Orange party; juries were packed, and the purity of the bench exposed to suspicion. The trial and conviction of Magee, the editor of the Evening Post, for a libel, seemed intended to silence the press; but it was at this crisis that O'Connell matured a new and efficient system of agitation, destined to prove to his countrymen the truth of their own proverb, "the darkest hour in the twenty-four is the hour preceding day." Here the volume abruptly closes, but with an intimation that a continuation may be shortly expected.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF INDUSTRY.

At a crisis like this, when the downfall of that gigantic monstrosity, the Corn Laws, amid the firm phalanx of the corn-lords, who made so protracted a struggle to uphold it, shows the people what they can do—when the long-tried have been triumphant, let them not abandon the arms that have gained them the battle. Let them all work; but, above all, work together. There is no being (unless ill or idiotic), but has power to take part in the business of removing misery, and creating happiness; there are none who, under any other plea, can claim exemption from the bond due to the universal brotherhood to which he belongs. It is ground on which there is no neutral track—no pausing point; he who will not go forward must go back—humanity never stands still; he who will not assist at the work of regeneration, must expect to be regarded as a renegade; he who will not aid the apostles of the people, to be deemed an apostate. To gain an advantage is not all—there is much in the subsequent use of it. Public integrity must be based upon private worth; those who have stood together in the field of strife must carry their confederate strength into the field of social exertion, and strive with the same heart and zeal that they did in the battle:

Man, poor and feeble when alone,
The sport of every passing wind,
In war—in trade—in battle shown,
He's all resistance when combined.
If then, when fears or interests plead,
Combining crowds together press,
Why cannot social feeling lead
Men to unite for happiness?

A very humble home may become a beacon-light to its immediate neighbourhood. Good, like all the elements of nature, is indestructible: it may be scattered, it may be obscured, but it is never utterly lost. That so much good has been so often unavailing to its originator, is the fault of the disjointed framework of society, amid which the unworthy monopolist often wins the reward that another has earned. Many remain inert because their supposed ability, and apparent field of action, is small; but all merit has an expansive quality, and grows in capacity and skill according to the exercise it receives. But even granting that the power be small, as the most modest of these willing defaulters may allege, yet the combined power of even such workers must do much. Let them turn their attention one moment to the coral-insect. How little can each of those atoms effect! yet, by combined and persevering action, behold the coral-reefs they raise amid the mighty waters of the ocean! Happy are those spirits—and, measured by the highest standard, as great as they are happy—who give unobtrusive ministry in the cause of human improvement; who rejoice in its advancement, whether their share in the work be known and acknowledged, or not. Many such, happily, there are. The most eminent, yet most modest—or rather, considering the consequences they produce, the most considerable, yet the most unconscious—are to be found among the women of the working classes—the mothers of the rising sons and daughters of industry. Much will society owe to these patient workers, however little it may acknowledge. Men of industry—England's best and bravest men—do to them the justice you desire to have done unto yourselves. Turn to the bosom friend, the friend of your heart and health, and recompense, by your intelligent aid and devotion, the disadvantages that the present social system surrounds her with. Give to your sons and daughters equal education; endow colleges for both; your united efforts may do this, and much more. Let your watchword be education. Educate the heart; educate the reasoning and reflective faculties, not your children's only, but your own, also. It is a common error to regard education as the business of only a portion of life, when it is, in fact, a work that must be going on throughout life. Let this great business, then, not be neglected, as it regards either the infant or the adult—man or woman. The world is by this time too wise to let one half of its mental capital lie dormant, or die, for want of cultivation and exercise; or, which is far worse, and more likely, if no high direction be given it—take a pernicious and perverse course, infecting the atmosphere it might purify, refine, and illuminate; and, instead of creating for you coadjutors in the work of happiness and improvement, plant your path with impediments to your own felicity and advancement.—People's Journal.

NURSERY TALE.

THE STORY OF THE REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS, "SUITED TO THE MEANEST CAPACITY."

There was a little lady who had 21,000,000 babies, and she wanted to get cheap bread for them, but she could not, because of the Corn Law. So she went to the Lords, and she said—

"Lords, Lords, repeal this law, or I cannot get cheap bread for my babies."

Then the Lords said to her, "Pooh! we are the landed interest; what do we care for your babies? The Tories to a man will stand by us." She went to the Tories, and she said—

"Tories, Tories, desert the Lords; the Lords won't repeal the law; and I cannot get cheap bread for my babies."

Then the Tories said to her, "Madam, we have no objection to eat dirt; we do it every day; but at present we are under the orders of the Duke." So she went to the Duke, and she said—

"Duke, duke, order the Tories; the Tories won't desert the Lords; the Lords won't repeal the law; and I cannot get cheap bread for my babies."

Then the Duke said to her, "F. M. the Duke of Wellington is Commander-in-Chief of the Army, but he is neither a maltster nor a miller. All communication to his Grace must be made through Sir Robert Peel." So she went to Sir Robert Peel, and she said—

"Peel, Peel, speak to the Duke; the Duke won't order the Tories; the Tories won't desert the Lords; the Lords won't repeal the law; and I cannot get cheap food for my babies."

Then Peel said, "the Tories brought me in, I know, but I should like to rat and cut the snobs. However, as yet there is no pressure from without, there's no great fact to frighten me."

So she went to look for a great fact; and she heard a voice saying to her, "I am ready to come to your help, if you will only get somebody to form a League, and call me into notice. There's Richard Cobden." So she went to Cobden, and she said—

"Cobden, Cobden, form a League; the League will soon become a fact; but there's no fact yet to frighten Peel, and Peel won't speak to the Duke; the Duke won't order the Tories; the Tories won't desert the Lords; the Lords won't repeal the law; and I cannot get cheap bread for my babies."

Then Cobden began to form the League; the League began to become a fact; the fact began to frighten Peel; Peel began to speak to the Duke; the Duke began to order the Tories; the Tories began to desert the Lords; the Lords set to repeal the law; and so the little lady got cheap bread for her babies.—Punch.

LOSS OF THE FALCO.—Letters have been received containing the announcement of the total loss of the brig Falco, on the coast of New Zealand, and an attack made on her unfortunate crew and the plundering the cargo by the natives. The Falco sailed from Boston in the early part of last year, on a trading voyage to the islands of the Pacific, having on board the new American consul for New Zealand. She touched, on her way to Swan River, King George's Sound and Adelaide, and then proceeded, after a prosperous voyage, to New Zealand. She arrived at Port Nicholson in the month of June, and sailed thence, with the Government mails on board, for Auckland, via Table Cape. On the 27th of the following month the vessel reached the Cape, and she was brought to anchor at a place called Wangawai, where, in the course of a few hours afterwards, it came on a violent storm. During the succeeding night she rode with both anchors down until about two o'clock, when the windlass broke in two by the excessive strain. Immediately she drifted through the breakers over a reef a mile in extent, and struck on a shell of rocks and sands on a steep shore. For a time the situation of those belonging to her was perilous in the extreme; every sea making a complete breach over the decks, and nearly washing them off; as the tide receded, however, the wreck was left high and dry, enabling the crew to walk ashore. Finding the vessel not much injured they returned, and were preparing to get her again afloat, when a large number of natives, in concert with the Europeans living on the island, rushed on board and committed the most disgraceful outrages. Having hemmed in the captain and officers on the quarter-deck, and threatened them with violence if they offered any resistance, they broke open the hatches, and getting into the hold commenced plundering everything that was valuable. They opened the mail bags and boxes, and scattering their contents in the hold, obtained all the Government despatches, which they tore up and destroyed. They afterwards began to strip the vessel tearing off the copper sheathing, and destroying the hull in every part with pole axes. It was evident that the work of destruction was a preconcerted plot between the whites and the natives, and that unquestionably the chief blame was to be attributed to the former, who seemed to vie with each other in their outrages. The American consul contrived at the onset of the attack to escape with a large amount of specie and papers of great value, which he had charge of, and obtain shelter in a gentleman's house, some distance along the beach. Some few days afterwards an attack was threatened by the natives to possess themselves of the treasure, but their nefarious plans were frustrated by a number of armed gentlemen, who guarded the place night and day until the arrival of a vessel to take the consul and the officers and crew of the Falco to their destination. The wreck was subsequently burnt.

THE CORN LAWS.—The Dukes of Buccleuch, Devonshire, Sutherland, Norfolk, Hamilton, and Bedford, the Marquises of Lansdowne, Breckinridge, Anglesey, and Ailsa, Earl Fitzwilliam, the Earls of Carlisle, Chesham, Fortescue, Essex, Fitzhardinge (we believe), and several others that might be pointed out, are all against the continuance of the present law, and will vote for the measure of Sir Robert Peel.—Sun.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL TRADE.

The Liverpool Standard of yesterday, in replying to our remarks on Wednesday last, says:

"It is a corollary recognised by every Free Trader, that when we cease to purchase from any particular country we diminish its ability to purchase from ourselves in return. The colonist of British America takes from us in manufactures the full amount of the produce—grain or timber—which we import from him. Transfer our demand for such grain or timber to the foreigner, and we by no means receive from him the equivalent amount of purchases from us in return. Thus we handed over to the markets of the Baltic, in 1842, the supply of this country with its timber."

We are glad to find that the Standard recognises the truth of what he calls the corollary, but what we should rather call the maxim of the Free Traders, "that when we cease to purchase from any particular country, we diminish its ability to purchase from us in return." It is, we believe, perfectly irrefragable, and forms the main foundation of the doctrine of Free Trade. It is not, however, true that British America takes from us in manufactures the whole amount of the produce we import from it. A part of that amount is taken in colonial and other produce purchased in other countries by exports of British manufactures; and, therefore, in that respect, the trade of British America is precisely like our trade with the rest of the world. The main point, however, to which we feel it necessary to advert, is the assertion, that "we handed over to the markets of the Baltic, in 1842, the supply of this country with its timber." Now, if this assertion means anything at all, it means that the measure of 1842 has destroyed the Canadian timber trade. Does the Liverpool Standard mean to make any such assertion? Has the Canadian timber trade been destroyed? Has it been diminished? No. The import of timber from British America is now not only larger than at any former period, but is evidently increasing with great rapidity, as the following statement of the quantities of Canadian timber imported into the United Kingdom, for the last three years, will abundantly show:

1843.....	922,047 loads,
1845.....	1,290,341 "

Surely if, by the measure of 1842, we had handed over the timber trade to the markets of the Baltic, we should not find this rapid increase in the import of Canadian timber occurring just at the time when that measure might be said to come fairly into operation.—Manchester Guardian.

THE SUPPLY OF SUGAR.

(From the Liverpool Times.)

Great anxiety now prevails with regard to the supply of sugar. Serious fears are entertained that the importation of colonial and other admissible growths will fall short of the consumption, so as to leave little or none at the end of the year to meet the spring demand. The Government have been disappointed in their expectations; our colonies have not increased their production in the ratio that was anticipated, and the arrivals of foreign free-labour sugar have been comparatively insignificant—nor does the future present a more flattering prospect. A drought, of unusual severity, has visited the West India colonies, and well-informed parties calculate that it will cause a deficiency in the crop to the extent of many thousand tons. The lowest estimate of the deficiency is 15,000 tons, the highest 40,000 to 45,000—it may be safely assumed to be 30,000, or a full eighth of the usual importation from all the colonies. This misfortune will not exercise so injurious an effect on the British public, as it must have done before the admission of free-labour foreign sugar. It cannot, however, fail to raise prices, and that very considerably, because the quantity of Java and Manila, or other free-labour sugar, that can arrive for several months, is so small, as to go but a short way to compensate for the deficiency in the West India importation. There were only about 8,000 tons of free-labour sugar imported last year. Even supposing this to be doubled in the course of the present year (a result not unlikely to be attained by the close of the season), parties versant with the sugar trade, reckon upon the supplies, taken as a whole, proving quite insufficient for the now enlarged consumption. Three estimates of the probable importation of all admissible descriptions for the current year, have been shown, amounting, respectively, to 220,240, and 255,000 tons. The average of these three estimates is 238,000 tons. Last year, the consumption reached 240,000. This year, it can hardly be so low as 260,000, and may possibly be 270,000—even at present prices, with the probability of reaching 280,000, if, by any means, prices fall materially. It thus appears, that the supply is likely to prove 22,000 tons, or about eight per cent. short of the smallest estimate of consumption. In consequence of this state of the trade, prices have advanced materially during the last year, particularly for sorts adapted to the wants of the country which have become scarce, so much so, that the stock in London of West India sugar is less than what it was at the corresponding period of last year, in first hands, at this great emporium—not a single cask at Bristol, and only 98 in the ports of Clyde. The bulk of stocks now held are East India, a growth, most of which enjoys no favour with consumers.

The article of molasses is in a still more striking position, the stocks in the country being less than two months' deliveries, and the import for the year not likely to reach three-fourths of what would be required for the year's consumption, even at the present rates of delivery! The prices, as might be expected have advanced greatly, not less than 40 to 50 per cent. on the currency of the corresponding month of last year—indeed, they are higher than before the reduction of duty, which took effect on the 14th of March, 1845.

The following figures exhibit the present value, in bond, of West India and foreign sugar:

Good brown for refining.....	38s. 6d.	Fine yellow for grocery.....	42s.
Colonial.....	28s. 6d.	Free-labour.....	none.
Other foreign.....	18s. 6d.		21s.

A PROTECTED LABOURER.—VERNHAM.—A farmer here is giving only five shillings per week to his shepherd, with a wife and children. This week one died from absolute starvation; and such is their utter destitution, that the poor man had to apply to the Board of Guardians, last summer, for money to buy a coffin, in which to bury his child. He has one shilling a week to pay for the rent of his cottage out of the five shillings!—Leamington Advertiser, Tory and protectionist paper.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE DEBATE ON THE THIRD READING.

In another part of this paper we shall probably be able to announce that the House of Commons has passed its LAST CORN BILL—has done, once for all, with laws for “regulating the supply of food to the people”—has shaken itself free, for ever, of a responsibility beyond the power of human legislation to sustain. After a discussion of almost unexampled length, broken by intervals, which have given Parliament and the country superabundant opportunity for consideration and reconsideration, we are on the point of seeing it finally ruled, by a majority that no power of political accident can reverse, that everything which landlordism has been doing these 30 years past has been done wrong, and must be undone, and that entire Free Trade in the first necessities of life is henceforth to be the policy of Great Britain.

It only remains for our hereditary and ecclesiastical legislators to say which they prefer—Sir R. Peel's Bill now, or Sir R. Peel and the League's Bill, some three months hence. We await their lordships' decision on this issue with a calm reliance on the will and the power of the Government and the country—with a reliance which would border on indifference, but for our sense of the calamitous consequences that must ensue to the industrious classes from even a three months' delay. Sir James Graham, it will be seen, has “a very strong opinion that the measure under consideration will in a very short time become the law of the land.” It is pleasant to hear this from a quarter so likely to be well informed. We are glad to know that this is expected, and shall be delighted to find the ministerial anticipation verified by the result. For our own part, we can say nothing. It is agreeable, of course, to hope for the best—but prudent people will hold themselves ready for the worst, and believe nothing till they see it.

Our readers will excuse us—perhaps will rather feel obliged to us—if we decline troubling ourselves or them with any sort of detailed review of the discussion of the past week. The dying words of Protection are too insufferably tedious and feeble to be capable of deriving interest even from the dignity of the subject-matter and the greatness of the occasion. The last of the Commons' Corn Law debates is doomed, we fear, as a whole, to remain eternally unread. Nothing can save it. One misses even the droll and dashing absurdity that sometimes redeems nonsense itself from oblivion. Of sheer silliness and stupidity, there is nothing to be said. The element of the absurd is not altogether absent, but it does not exist in sufficient proportions. The coruscations are too few and far between. Mr. Cayley's recitations about the “British oak,” and Mr. Miles's curious and agreeable calculations about what wheat is likely to fetch, and Mr. Newdegate's pleasantry about “the spirits of Pitt and Canning speaking” by the Cayley lips—all are insufficient to animate that ponderous mass of insipidities and platitudes.

Although the debate, as a debate, has been of a flatness and dead-level dullness that precludes comment and disavows criticism, the occasion will ever be memorable for those emphatic utterances, by our first-class statesmen, of great and fruitful truths in political ethics, for which we have so often of late had to thank her Majesty's Ministers. Both on the policy and on the morality of economical legislation, the voice of official authority is clear, full-toned, and uncompromising. The Home Secretary's exposition of the deep interest which the industrious classes—agricultural and manufacturing, capitalist and operative—have in the low and steady prices naturally consequent on a Free Trade in food, was, as usual, masterly and decisive in its logic, and pervaded by a spirit of generous sympathy with the rights and well-being of the great mass of the community. As regards the agriculturists, he showed, on evidence which landlordism dare not gainsay—the evidence collected and published by one of landlordism's own select committees—that that much-deceived and abused member of British society, the “working farmer,” has nothing to fear, but everything to hope, from the abrogation of a system which has only lured him to his ruin with tempting promises of impossible performance. And he crushed, with becoming scorn, the impudent and hypocritical pretence that the agricultural labourer has, or can have, any beneficial interest in laws that doom him to pay artificially high and fluctuating prices, out of wages which remain unvarying, or at about starvation point.

Nothing could be more overwhelmingly complete than Sir James Graham's demonstration of the action of high prices of food on wages—on the wages both of the agricultural and the manufacturing labourer, whose “interests,” as he most lucidly shows, are at all points “identical.” High prices of the necessities of life, and increased cost of living, injure the manufacturer's home market by absorbing that surplus national income which constitutes the national fund for the purchase of manufactured goods; the more we have to spend on the article of first necessity, the less remains for comforts and luxuries. The “paralysis of the home market,” thus consequent on abridged consumption, compels the over-stocked manufacturer to resort to the costly and losing expedient of “forced exportation to the foreign market.” Capital wastes away under the thriftless process, and the dwindling wages-fund ceases to yield the same remuneration as before to the labourer. The narrowed and narrowing margin of profit calls for an exacter and more rigid economy. The weaker capitalists shut up. The operatives are not so much in request as they were. Many men are looking out for one master, and competition brings down wages to their minimum. The agricultural districts, meanwhile, must keep their own poor at home; manufacturers want no supernumeraries. The peasant lingers hopeless in his parish—doomed to idleness and parish pay, or to work on wages which are not wages, but only parish pay, under another name. Thus close and inseparable is the sympathy, the identity, of interest which unites the artisan with the peasant, and both with the capitalist employer of labour. For, as our Home

Secretary so forcibly tells us, in words that call forth “ironical cheers from the protectionist benches,” and impose instant conviction on every man of sense and honesty—

“This country can no longer be regarded as an agricultural country. I repeat that if we act and legislate as if this country were purely agricultural, error lies at the very root of the argument. Whether it be for weal or for woe we have become a manufacturing and a commercial country; and we must legislate for the great commercial and manufacturing interests. I admit this, and I say that the connection between the commercial, the manufacturing, and agricultural interests, is intimate and palpable. There cannot be commercial and manufacturing prosperity without creating a demand for labour in the agricultural districts. We find a proof of this in the progress of docks, of railways and canals, and whenever the demand for labour in the seats of wealth and in the manufacturing districts is strong, labour is attracted from the most distant rural districts; and even in the rural districts, when there is a state of manufacturing prosperity, and when the price of food is low, wages rise.”

We cannot sufficiently express our delight at the manful and generous pertinacity with which, throughout his admirable speech of last Monday night, Sir James Graham keeps close to the one vital, central, and all-inclusive question—“WHAT IMPROVES THE CONDITION OF THE LABOURER?” “The question is indeed narrowed to this point. What we are to consider is not whether the interests of the landlords are maintained by the protective system—the question for deliberation, and which waits our decision, is THIS—Are laws restricting the importation of corn into this country conducive to the happiness, comfort, and welfare of the tillers of the soil—of THE MULTITUDE? That is THE WHOLE QUESTION. That is the issue we are to decide on.” It is a question of the work and wages, the comforts, happiness, and improvement, the rights of the working and bread-eating people. “This is not a measure for the producer. I mean it is not a measure for the producer alone. The great body of consumers—THE MILLION—are deeply interested in this matter, and surely it is evident that in this legislative assembly THEIR WELFARE OUGHT TO BE THE PRIMARY CONSIDERATION.”

Utterances such as these from the lips of the statesmen who wield the power and guide the destinies of the first commercial country of the world, are indeed—like the great and beneficent measure which they vindicate—fated to be “memorable in history;”—memorable, long after their immediate occasion shall have passed away, as marking the ascendancy of new ideas and principles of public policy—heralding the advent of a new era of government and legislation, in which “the prosperity, contentment, peace, and happiness of the great body of the people, WITHOUT REFERENCE TO THE INTERESTS OF ANY PARTICULAR CLASS,” shall be the only recognised spirit of statesmanship. Revolutions have been made on the principle of “the people, the only source of legitimate power.” The bloodless revolution with which her Majesty's Ministers have now identified their fame and fortunes as public men, has as broad a programme of truth and principle—“THE PEOPLE, THE MULTITUDE, THE MILLIONS, THE ONLY LEGITIMATE USUFRUCTUARIES OF POWER.”

MR. NEWDEGATE'S COMMITTEE.—Mr. Wilson, president of the Council of the League, has been three days under examination before this committee. From what we have learned, we have no doubt he has succeeded in overturning the whole case which the monopolists have been endeavouring to get up against the League. The facts stated by Mr. Wilson excited much interest, and his evidence has had a great effect upon the members of the committee.

GOOD GOVERNMENT.—What is the object of all government? The object of all government is roast mutton, potatoes, a stout constable, an honest justice, a clear highway, a free school. What trash to be bawling in the streets about the Green Isle, the Isle of the Ocean! The bold anthem of Erin go Bragh! A better anthem would be Erin go bread and cheese, Erin go cabins that keep out the rain, Erin go pantaloons without holes in them.—Sydney Smith.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE
SESSION OF 1846.

Seventeenth Week, ending Saturday, May 16.

One of the greatest events in modern history is passing through the House of Commons with far less interest than a common turnpike bill. So thoroughly has the debate been exhausted, that even the House of Commons refused to receive any more; and the last reading of a most important measure has passed with an indifference scarcely credible. On Friday the discussion was a sham one. On Monday, the third reading of the bill was commenced; but the debate, if debate it can be called, was all on one side.

The Marquis of Granby, the eldest son of the Duke of Rutland, was selected as the leading opponent of the third reading. The most striking part of his speech was the following:

"He thought that even if the right honourable baronet was right in his opinion that the aristocracy would not be injured by the alteration of the Corn Laws, this would be a poor recompense to them for the loss of the yeomanry of England (loud cheers from the members below the gangway).

"And you, good yomen,
Whose limbs were made in England, show us here
The mettle of your pasture; let us swear
That you are worth your breeding, which I doubt not;
For there is none of you so mean and base,
That hath not noble lustre in your eyes.
I see you stand like greyhounds in the slips
Straining upon the start. The game's afoot!
Follow your spirit; and, upon this charge,
Cry—God for the Queen! England! and Lord George!"

(cheers and loud laughter). He did not believe that the measure of the Government would pass the legislature, but if it did, he hoped that his anticipations of the evils which would ensue might prove incorrect, and that the expectations of the right honourable gentleman, however vague and uncertain they might be, would be verified. The right hon. gentleman had told them that he would not consent to remain at the helm, unless that helm were suffered to traverse freely. He (the Marquis of Granby) feared that if the right honourable gentleman should succeed in altering the course of the vessel, from the praiseworthy motive of reaching the port of prosperity and plenty more directly, his fate might be that of many a mariner before him, and that, driven to leeward by tides and currents of which he had not dreamed, he might leave the vessel a helpless and deserted wreck on the barren and inhospitable shores of Free Trade (cheers from the agricultural benches). If that should happen, he would venture to prophesy that the noble lord, the member for Lynn, and his crew, would come forward and endeavour to get her off, but he feared that it would then be too late. The noble marquis concluded by thanking the house for the attention with which he had been heard, and moved as an amendment that the bill should be read a third time that day six months."

Mr. Gaskell (who resigned his appointment as a Lord of the Treasury on the promulgation of Sir Robert Peel's plans), seconded the motion; and Mr. Sheridan, who advocates a Corn Law, made the following statement as to Dorsetshire labourers:

Mr. SHERIDAN rose with great reluctance to address the house on a subject which had something of a personal nature about it, but as the honourable member for Dorsetshire on Friday last, during the discussion upon the report of this bill, had cast some reflections upon the correctness of a statement made by him (Mr. Sheridan), he trusted that he should be allowed to say a few words in his own defence. He was quite aware that he was out of order in alluding to subjects discussed in a former debate, but as a reflection had been made upon his character, and members had been indulged with an opportunity of vindication under similar circumstances, he trusted that the same indulgence would be extended to him (cheers). It would be in the recollection of the house that the noble lord the Secretary for Ireland, in reply to some observations made by the senior member for the county of Dorset (Mr. G. Banks), suggested that the honourable member would be more properly occupied in comparing the agricultural condition of the peasantry in Dorsetshire, than that of the peasantry in Ireland. With all respect to the honourable member, he must say he thought this was very sound and wholesome advice, and he hoped that the honourable member and his colleagues would take it into their consideration (hear, hear, and cheers). An honourable member for Dorset, who was recently elected (Mr. Floyer), said in reply, that as far as regarded his own neighbourhood, and other parts of the county with which he was acquainted, the statement of the noble lord, which was the statement originally made by him (Mr. Sheridan), was at direct variance with the truth. These were strong expressions, but he was sure that the honourable member who used them knew so well what was due to him (Mr. Sheridan) as a personal friend, that he could not have intended to say anything offensive. Now he (Mr. Sheridan) would not make any statement of an opposite character, nor would he say anything which would rest solely on his own responsibility, but he would produce to the house a statement made by gentlemen connected with Dorsetshire, clergymen of the Established Church. Since Friday last he had addressed letters, among other gentlemen, to the Rev. Sidney Godolphin Osborne and the Rev. William Scott, the brother of the member for Roxburghshire. Mr. Scott said in reply: "I do not understand Floyer's saying that he never knew wages so low as 7s. a week, for I have known several instances of the kind, and if you are below the mark in stating 7s. as the average amount of wages, it is only 6d. under the mark." The next document he would read was a letter from the Rev. Sidney Godolphin Osborne, who said, "I have read with much astonishment the speech of Floyer. I send you a statistical return of the Blandford Union, made three years ago, and I believe it to be true in the present year. At the time it was made I was chairman of the Union, and I tested its truth myself. In 1843 something between one-seventh and one-eighth of the whole population were paupers. The average pay of the union—the best, I believe, in the county—did not, I believe, reach 8s. a-week, including carters." His hon. friend the member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) stated that he did not actually know any case in which wages were so low as 7s. a week. Now, in addition to the letters to which he had referred, he (Mr. Sheridan) had taken the trouble to write to the relieving officer of the Dorchester Union, who had sent him a letter in return. He must say that it appeared to him strange that a gentleman like the hon. member, the chairman of a Board of Guardians, should come forward and state that he did not know any case in which wages were so low as 7s. a-week, when day after day, week after week, and year after year, he had signed his name to the relief and application book of the Dorchester Union (hear, hear). Now, the relieving officer of that union said in his letter, "I believe that the average rate of wages in my district does not exceed more than from 7s. to 7s. 6d. per week; and I think that the extract which I send fully bears me out in that opinion." He had inquired whether there was any case in which a man working by the day was paid more than 8s. a-week?—and the relieving officer said, "I cannot point to any such case in my district." So much for the assertion that wages were not so low as 7s. a-week. But to make his (Mr. Sheridan's) case still stronger, for his character was at stake, he would cite the extract which had been sent him from the books of the Dorchester Union for the quarters ending December, 1845, and March, 1846. (The honourable member here read the names of several persons who had been relieved by the union in question, whose wages did not amount to more than seven shillings a-week.) As to the district of the Blandford Union, the wages there were on the average 7s. a week. House rent was high, the cottages dilapidated and unhealthy, and fuel scarce and dear. In the Monkton district wages were 8s.; house rent, 1s. to 1s. 6d.; but for this large gardens were attached to the cottages. About Anderton the wages were 7s. About Hilton, 7s., with low house rent. About Milpont, 7s., with house rent from 1s. 6d. to 2s. About Spetsbury from 7s. to 8s., house rent from 1s. to 1s. 6d. About Howton, 8s., house rent 1s. About Kingston from 7s. to 8s., with high house rent. Here, however, the labourers had potato ground free. Fuel, however, was scarce and dear. About Strickland wages were from 7s. to 8s.; house rent from 1l. to 3l. per annum. About Felton the wages for single men were 6s., for married men 7s.; house rent was high. Under these circumstances his honourable friend was doing him an injustice in saying that the statement which he had made in the newspapers was at variance with the truth. But the hon. gentleman went further. He mentioned that in Dorsetshire he never knew a time when the labouring population were so well off as at present. Now the clerk of the union to which reference had been previously made, stated in answer to questions put by him (Mr. Sheridan), that the number of paupers in the union was 148, while last year it amounted to 120, a statement certainly not tending to prove any increased prosperity of the condition of the labourers for this present year. But his honourable friend had gone on to say, that although there might be particular isolated spots where the wages were as low as had been described, those exceptional cases arose from particular circumstances connected with the labourers; that they were not probably up to their work. Now, in the name of heaven, how could a man be up to his work on horse beans and turnip tops (hear)? He stated, in his place in Parliament, that the labourers' cottages were so small, so dilapidated, and so crowded, that they engendered disease and immorality, that their wages were scandalously low, quite inadequate for the support of the labourer and his family. These were not his opinions alone, they were the opinions of the resident clergy and gentry in the neighbourhood, and they were also the opinions expressed at a public meeting at Sturminster by the noble lord the late member for Dorsetshire, an expression of opinion which, as he (Mr. Sheridan) believed, had cost him his seat in that house (hear). Now, it might be said, how could he, with these opinions—with these details staring him in the face—how could he, after the expression of his desire for the improvement of the labouring classes, have the courage to oppose the measure which the right honourable baronet had brought in? He would reply, that he had yet to learn that the withdrawal of all protection would have the effect of improving the condition of the agricultural labourer (hear, hear, from the protectionists). The noble lord opposite stated that the price of labour depended upon the price of corn. He did not agree with the noble lord in that—indeed, he thought that the question had been for ever set at rest. He maintained that in Dorsetshire wages never varied, whether wheat was 20l. or 10l. per load (hear), and referred to a letter from a Dorsetshire labourer, complaining of the treatment experienced by his class at the hands of the farmers, who would not allow the labourer to earn more than 7s. a week, which "made their lives bitter, and them to wish for the grave." He (Mr. Sheridan) believed, indeed, that the wages were fixed by custom, by combination, and by a tyrannical use of the New Poor Law, and he would state a case proving how the Poor Law was administered so as to affect wages. The labouring poor were often in the habit of applying to him for advice, and in February last a poor woman of the name of Randall came to state the case of her family. She was married and had seven children, the united earnings of the family amounting to 10s. per week, out of which 4l. went to pay house rent. Finding their income quite insufficient for the support of their family, her husband had applied for assistance to the union. The relieving officer, however, refused, as the applicant was an able-bodied man, and in work. He (Mr. Sheridan) wrote to the relieving officer upon the subject, and the reply was, that the case was refused by the board of guardians, Randall having an opportunity of bettering himself, which he refused, because he was unwilling to take a situation out of his own parish. Thus it was that the labourer was forced to receive these scandalously low wages. He would not be received into the union as having work, while the wages he received for that work were quite inadequate to his support. He knew that it would be said upon that side of the house that the price of labour depended upon the demand and supply (hear, hear). He quite agreed with that, and he acknowledged that by the repeal of the Corn Laws a stimulus would be given to trade, and an increased demand would arise for labour. But the change would be confined to the manufacturing districts, and would be one which would not, he conceived, at all benefit the agricultural labourer (hear, hear). He would remind the house that at this moment trade was flourishing, and labour in demand; still he would venture his life that there had not been an increase in the wages of the Dorsetshire labourer; that now, when wheat was from 56s. to 60s. a quarter, the rate of remuneration to the agricultural labourer was the same as it had been last year when wheat was 47s. (hear, hear.)

To prevent all imputation of partiality, we give the speech of Mr. Miles, premising that the entire of the debate was of the dulllest possible character.

Mr. Miles was sorry the debate had been allowed to digress into a discussion of a poor law union. He was really surprised that the Government had attempted no reply to the very able speeches of his noble friend (the Marquis of Granby) and his honourable friend (Mr. Gaskell). He hoped to prove that the preservation of the present protection was essential to the welfare, not only of the landlords, but of the tenants and the labourers. He should consider, first, the working of the law of 1828; next, the present law; and, lastly, their prospects under Free Trade, as the principle was to be worked out in 1849. He wished, in taking this view, he had had the benefit of a report about to be laid on the table of the other house (that of Lord Beaumont's committee), which he ventured to say would prove that the rest of the community would be placed in the most perilous circumstances if the principle of Free Trade was fully carried out. It had been said that the cause of the present proposal was because the sliding scale had not operated, and that there was a famine in Ireland. That was the assertion, but there was no argument to prove this assertion. The year 1844 was one of extraordinary production, whilst in 1845 the corn was put up in a damp state. But what a glorious thing it was, that owing to protection they had such an ample supply in 1844 that there was four months' consumption to spare in 1845. He admitted that wheat sold at 48s. a quarter in 1844, which in the year after brought 70s. or 72s.; but he himself sold wheat in 1844 of such prime quality that it weighed 60lbs. per bushel, and was equal to the finest Dantzic for milling purposes. Nobody could say, then, the bread we were now eating in London was bad bread, and at the same time for the last two or three months very little foreign corn had been brought into consumption. The foreign corn was all waiting to be poured into the market when the 4s. duty was imposed, if it ever was (hear). Now the amount received into the revenue under the existing law, and that of 1828, was an important point, unless all indirect taxation was to be abandoned. He found that for the 13 years, from 1828 to 1842, the average revenue was 255,953l. a-year; but under the law of 1842 the average duty was 11s. 6d. per quarter, and the average price of wheat 53s. 4d. The amount received by the revenue was 69,368l.; so that under the old system the consumer had the advantages of low prices, and the state obtained a greater revenue. The Corn Laws had afforded a fair moderate protection to the producer, had been of advantage to the consumer, and had proved advantageous to the revenues of the state. All that the protectionists sought was to preserve these—all they said was, "Let well alone" (hear, hear). In considering the full effect of the proposed changes in the present system, under which such benefits were derived by the community, it was necessary to look to the results of the total reduction of duty which it was intended to make in 1849. And, first of all, let the house inquire what prices would be likely to prevail in this country when that reduction had been carried into effect (hear, hear). Her Majesty's ministers had wisely declined to prophesy on this point (hear, hear). They had refused to express any opinion on the subject, notwithstanding the information they must necessarily have at their command (hear, hear). However, any individual who took the trouble of making the inquiry could easily come to a conclusion as to the price which would exist should an abolition of all duty be carried into effect (hear, hear). It was not from Europe alone, but from America, Asia, and Africa, that the supply was to be looked for. He would prove that land in this country, under whatever system of agriculture might be adopted, whether the three and six course, or the four and five course system, could not be expected to compete with Russia and America, and that the tenant could not be compensated for the loss of protection were he to be remitted all rent whatsoever (hear, hear). It was of the most absolute necessity that the public should have a clear idea as to the value of the ingredient of rent in the consideration of the price of a quarter loaf. The rental of England was, on an average, 10s. 11d., or say 20s. an acre. Taking the produce of an acre of land under the Lincolnshire mode of cultivation, at four quarters of wheat, and estimating the value of the quarter loaf at 7d., it would be found that the ingredient in that price to be placed to the account of rent would amount to one halfpenny. That was his statement, and he should be glad if any one could show he was wrong, or contradict him. Let them now see what they had to expect from the opening of the ports. From authentic returns, it appeared that the price of wheat at Odessa in February, 1845, was from 16s. to 17s. a quarter, if to that were added 7s. 9d. for freight, the total cost of a quarter of wheat landed in London at that time would have been but 24s. 9d. In June the price rose to 20s. and 21s., the freight being still the same. In March the price of wheat at Stettin and Rostock was from 25s. to 26s., the freight being only 5s.; so that from all these parts wheat could have been sent into London at an average of 30s. a quarter (hear, hear). In summer the prices rose considerably, but never amounted to more than 34s. 9d. The quantity of wheat sent to other countries from those ports was very considerable. Mr. P. Taylor, who had extensive information on subjects connected with the corn trade, stated that three-fourths of all the wheat ground at Marseilles came from the Black Sea, and similar evidence had been given by Mr. Freyne. It would be found that the average price of wheat at Odessa, for 10 years commencing 1833 and terminating in 1843, was about 24s. 10d., the freight was 7s. 9d., which gave the whole cost of a quarter of wheat for that period as 32s. 7d. It was a curious fact that the rise and fall in prices in England and Odessa did not correspond. Thus the highest price in this country, during the year 1839, was 70s. 8d., whilst at Odessa it had not exceeded 27s. 8d. How would it be possible for England to compete with foreign countries under such average prices as those (cries of "hear")? But the competition of America was to be taken in addition to that of Europe. It must not be forgotten, in drawing the comparison between this country and America, that the latter did not as yet grow wheat for exportation, and that any of her grain which reached our market was nothing more than the surplus of her own demands. It had been shown that America could compete successfully with our farmers; that had been proved by Mr. Commissioner Halesworth (as we understood the hon. member). If the prices of Illinois and New Orleans wheat and freightage were to be taken, it would be found that eight bushels of American wheat could be landed in this country, free of all duty, at 29s. 4d., and that in the shape of flour it could be imported for 34s., which would prove more injurious to the milling interest. Although her Majesty's Government had refused to name any price under the Free Trade plan, his noble friend the Secretary for Ireland (the Earl of Lincoln), at a recent election, had ventured to predict that wheat would not exceed 48s. Unfortunately, however, the noble lord made that prediction in the presence of Mr. Barrow, who had had most extensive experience in the corn trade. That gentleman wrote a letter, in which he made the most sporting offer

(a laugh) he (Mr. Miles) had ever heard of on the part of an old corn merchant. He said he would contract to deliver 50,000 quarters of wheat at 40s. per quarter in London, as soon as the ports had been opened. If it cost but 32s., said he, then I shall make 20,000*l.* If at 48s., the loss is mine—but he offered to stake all he had in the country on the result (hear, hear). In fact, as none of the foreign averages exceed 36s., he (Mr. Miles) was inclined to assert that the future price in this country would be about 40s. That was his price (hear, hear). And now he would consider the effects of such prices on this country. He would examine its effects upon farms under the different systems of agriculture. He would not take the cases of poor lands; but would examine the result as applied to farms in the richest position, just on the borders of the fens of Lincolnshire. Let them first take a farm in Nottinghamshire under the four-course system. It was a farm of 400 acres, let at a rent of 1*l.* per acre. 100 acres were under wheat, 100 under barley, 100 under turnips and green crops, and the rest went to the support of sheep and hoggets. At the price of 52s. 5*d.* a qr., the wheat would yield 95*l.*, the barley 67*l.*, 400 hoggets, ewes, &c., 720*l.*, making a total of 2355*l.* a year. With the prices which might be expected to exist under the new system, the wheat at 40s. would produce 700*l.*, the barley at 25s. would yield 562*l.*, and the 400 hoggets and ewes 570*l.*, making a total of 1832*l.* Or, in other words, there would be a loss on 400 acres of 523*l.* a year, or of 1*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* an acre. So that here would be a loss on the farm, under the Free Trade system, of one fifth, if he were not wrong in his calculations. Suppose the rent were reduced a quarter, or 100*l.*, there would remain to the tenant, to be divided between the profits of capital and the wages of labour, a loss of 432*l.* 10*s.*, on the farm, or a reduction of 1*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* per acre. He would take another farm in Lincolnshire, under the five-course system, producing 1855*l.* The total produce, under a Free Trade system, would be 1456*l.*; so that there would be a difference to the farmer of 399*l.* Deduct a quarter of the rent, and the loss to the farmer would be 299*l.*, or 1*l.* 10*s.* per acre. The lower the quality of the soil, the higher the amount of capital required, and of labour employed on the land. If, under a system of protection, cultivation had ascended from the valleys to the tops of the hills, would it not at once commence a retrograde course under an opposite system? Take 1000*l.* as the capital of the farmer, for every hundred acres, and they would see that they were at once playing with a capital of 250,000,000*l.* How much had England benefited by the cultivation practised by the farmers under the present system? This would be seen from a return he held in his hand of the quantity of coombs sold in Norwich for the last thirty-seven years, from 1805 to 1843. In 1805 the number was 50,844, and the price 92*s.*; in 1843 the number was 241,644, and the price 48*s.*, so that the produce had tripled, while the price had fallen one-half. He had another return, showing the wages of labour employed on land in quinquennial periods. From 1785 to 1790 they amounted to 7*s.* 2*d.*, from 1835 to 1840 they were 1*l.* 6*s.* 7*d.* He admitted that in some parts of the country wages were too little; but if they went into purely agricultural districts, and not into those which had been the ancient seats of manufactures, they would find that though the price of wheat might not have gone with the price of labour, pari passu, yet it had notwithstanding had an effect. He had obtained another return from a Lincolnshire farmer of the rate of wages and the price of wheat for septennial periods. From 1818 to 1825 the price of wheat was 3*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.*, and the wages of labour 13*s.* 5*d.*; from 1837 to 1844 the average price of wheat was 3*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, and the rate of wages 12*s.* 8*d.* He would ask gentlemen to compare the average taxation paid by the British with that paid by the foreign farmer. Look at the average taxation per head in this country, and the average of general and state taxation in America. However they might cheapen bread, the rate of taxation would not be lowered essentially. He would take the state of Ohio, one of the largest western states of the union. In that territory the general taxation was 6*s.* 9*d.* per head, the state or local taxation 5*s.* 8*d.* In our own country the amount of taxation was 1*l.* 18*s.* per head, which showed at once a difference of 1*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* in the weight of imposts (hear, hear). In America, the largest part of the revenue was derived from the sale of land, the price of which had been 5*s.* per acre for some years past. This, at thirty years' purchase, would give you the splendid rental of 2*d.* an acre. In England we had an average rental of 1*l.* per acre; the poor rates and local rates were 4*s.* 6*d.* an acre, the great tithe was 5*s.* an acre, and the small tithe 1*s.* 6*d.* an acre. The whole of these charges came to 1*l.* 11*s.*, so that this left a difference in the amount of rental and of local charges, payable by the American and British farmer of 1*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* The Englishman paid in taxation an annual sum of 1*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* in addition to the local charges. With such burdens, he did not see how they could maintain any competition with their foreign rivals; it seemed to him perfectly impossible (hear, hear). It appeared by the Prussian statistics, that in the period from 1828 to 1835, the amount of grain remaining over after the internal consumption was provided for, and also after the quantity required for seed in the next year had been set apart, was 28,000,000 qrs. He need not say what they had to look for from America; in Virginia corn had been raised from the same land for a hundred years together, and he believed the same thing had occurred in other districts. But should we be enabled to send more of our manufactures to America, for unless they showed that we could do that, they went entirely on fallacious grounds, and sacrificed the hopes of the agriculturists to a delusion? About 1825 the cotton manufacture was generally commenced in America. Mr. Elsworth said: "Had the Corn Laws been absolutely repealed in 1825, the establishment of manufactures in the United States might have been prevented for many years, but no change in those laws can now materially change the interests of protection, and any alteration made would not be considered as a boon to an agricultural nation, but as a measure forced on the Government by the wants of a population increasing more rapidly than a system of agricultural protection, with a limited extent of land, can supply." He asked them, when they talked of free competition of English agricultural produce with almost untaxed America, only to apply the same maxims of political economy that they had applied in the case of English manufactures; and if they did this, they would find that the labourers would be the class most injured. To the labour fund they must go, and the class the least able to bear would be the first to suffer (hear, hear). He would next advert to another topic, which had been touched upon already by the honourable member for Oxford, whose remarks had not, he believed, yet elicited any reply; but, nevertheless, he thought it necessary that the great injury that would be done to the clerical tithe-owners (hear) should be pressed upon the consideration of the house. The noble lord, when he brought forward a measure upon the subject of tithes, had conferred one of the greatest boons upon the landed interest they could have received; not so much as regarded the saving of money which it effected, but as the total destruction of that jarring which had so much prevailed, and the bad feeling which had existed between the clergyman and his parishioners. That act passed in 1835, and it happened that in that year the lowest prices prevailed that had been long known in England. Wheat was at 39*s.*, and he would ask honourable gentlemen who recollected that year, whether, if the Tithe Commutation Act had been calculated at 39*s.*, it would have effected its object (hear, hear)? But the tithe system had been founded upon septennial averages, and it was extraordinary to observe the little variety in the price of wheat from that time to the present, being, he believed (but he spoke from memory), about 1*s.* 3*d.* to 1*s.* 4*d.* upon the septennial average. But if the Corn Laws were repealed, the farmer would have to pay his rent charge when the price of wheat was much lower, as he had endeavoured to show it would be, than the average that had been hitherto maintained. He entreated the house to remember the state of the clerical titheowner, living probably in a parish with no country gentlemen around him, looked up to by his parishioners, and obliged to exercise acts of benevolence and charity, with probably a large family of his own dependant, and sons whom he must bring up to fill the same station in society he himself held—that of a gentleman. Take a clergyman so situated with a stipend of 300*l.* a year. If you took away one-fifth of his income, you would reduce it to 240*l.* This he (Mr. Miles) thought was a great hardship (hear, hear)—it was a hardship, first, as regarded the farmer, and afterwards most injurious as regarded the income of the clerical titheowner. There was still another topic he wished to allude to before he sat down. If all the land capable of improvement had been brought into cultivation—if all the improvements in agriculture had been tried and exhausted—and still all had failed, there had been yet a resource to fly to, which every one acquainted with the commercial history of England would see ought to be made available, before the trade in corn was thrown open. What had become of the colonies (hear, hear)? What reward was to be given to them for their honour and fidelity to their engagements? Only in 1843 an Act was passed by which Free Trade with Canada was established. Now he had certainly opposed that bill ("hear, hear" from the Opposition benches). He had opposed it conscientiously; but he was bound to say, although there were reasons against that bill, on account of the contiguity of Canada to the United States, and the difficulty of preventing smuggling, yet these reasons did not exist as regarded Australia, Van Diemen's Land, and other colonies (hear). Therefore, he thought that after those colonies had loaded the table of the house with petitions, they would think it hard to be cast off by the mother country and left to free competition with other nations, who had actually met us with hostile tariffs (cheers). The hon. member here, in allusion to the feeling engendered in Canada, quoted an extract from the speech of Mr. Sherwood, the solicitor-general, to the general effect that the result of a substitution of commercial relations with the United States, in place of those with the mother country, would bring about a change in political relations also, and if the Canadians were forced into a new sphere of political attraction, they would not be culpable for the effect. Those sentiments which were uttered by Mr. Sherwood, at a Free Trade meeting at Montreal, were, he believed, echoed by multitudes more in Canada. The question should also be viewed relatively to the quantity of our manufactures that was taken by these colonies. The hon. member here read a number of extracts from returns, to show that the increase of cotton goods taken by the British American colonies was greater than the increase in the quantity taken by the United States. It was clear that if these colonies were treated properly, and as parts of the United Kingdom, they would be bound nearer to this country, while at the same time more good would be done to the manufacturing population of this country than by throwing open the trade with countries which met your advances by hostile tariffs (hear, hear). Then there was talk about compensation; but every farmer who could do a common arithmetical sum would know how to estimate the value of that compensation, by calculating what it would amount to in his particular locality. He found that the compensation amounted to 396,000*l.*, and a reverend friend of his had taken the trouble to calculate how much it would amount to in Essex, and he asked the agriculturists to take that county as an example, and then thank her Majesty's ministers for their splendid boon. The honourable member proceeded to quote various figures, to show that the relief afforded by the measures of the Government to the agriculturists in highway rates, &c., would amount to 2*d.* per acre, while he observed that he had already shown that the loss entailed by the same measures would, as regarded a farm in Notts, be 1*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* per acre, and as regarded a farm in Lincolnshire, 1*l.* 10*s.* per acre (hear, hear, hear). He then read an extract from a letter of Alderman Copeland to his constituents, expressing the hope that other honourable members who entertained similar views, would endeavour to carry them out by voting against the third reading of this bill. He also read an extract from the pamphlet of Messrs. Morton and Trimmer, and from that, after saying that he would not quote the former speeches of honourable gentlemen near him against themselves, read an extract from an American magazine, in favour of the principles of protection as applied to the productions of the United States (hear). It was for the sake of the humbler classes, for the sake of those who, being without capital, had nothing but their industry to depend on; it was, in a word, for the sake of the labourers of England that they (the protectionists) took so high a ground in respect to this question; and hesitated not to state how resolute and unrelenting would be the opposition which they would feel it their duty to offer to the scheme of the ministry (hear, hear). Let the fate of this measure be what it might, when regard was had to the present position of the protectionist party, it must be admitted that they had discharged their duty conscientiously and with singleness of purpose, and also that they had inculcated a good moral for the guidance of those who might follow them (loud cries of "hear, hear"). Though deserted by their leaders, though forsaken by those to whom it was most natural they would look for support, they had not flinched from their colours ("hear, hear" from the county members). They were actuated by no selfish motives, for they had shown themselves as ready to consult for the interests of the manufacturers and artisans as for those of the agricultural classes (hear, hear). Although calumniated, they were yet undaunted; and although they might be possibly defeated in that house, they were still unshaken amidst the wreck of principle and party (loud cheers from the county members). It had been said that they had delayed this measure, but he should like to know when a question of such paramount importance had ever been brought forward in the House of Commons? It was a question which involved an entire change of the commercial policy of this great country—it was, in fact, a direct and positive transition from a system which had stood the test of years, to new and theoretic principles; and what rendered it most suspicious, and most worthy of careful analysis, was that it was brought forward by one to whom (however sincerely they might admire his immense abilities) they were, unhappily, unable to accord the possession of that political firmness and consistency, which ought to be, and were, the highest attributes of all great statesmen (loud cries of "hear, hear"). He was at a loss to think what could have induced the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government to turn his back on his old friends and on his old principles. It was idle to talk of Ireland. They (the protectionists) were willing to consent to any measure that might be considered essential for meeting the distress in Ireland; and it was foolish, therefore, to throw Ireland in their teeth (a laugh). Victory in that house might not be theirs, but, thank heaven, there was another ordeal through which this bill must pass before it became the law of the land (loud cheers from the county members, and laughter from the Opposition benches). Yes; a tribunal as yet unswayed by popular clamour—as yet unswayed by the maxims of political economy (so we understood the honourable member to say); and at that ordeal the politics of the author of this measure, and the policy on which he and his colleagues came into office, would be thoroughly sifted, and when it would appear that the system which he was now endeavouring to abolish was one of his own creation, which had not only given protection to native industry, but produced revenue and created prosperity, they would, he ventured to predict, pause before they gave their assent to such a proceeding, or at all events they would interpose between the people and that minister who now held office mainly at the pleasure of his former opponents (loud cheers from the protectionist party).

The hon. gentleman was followed by Sir J. Graham, whose speech we shall also give at full length, and we strongly recommend it to the reader's careful perusal.

SIR J. GRAHAM: The house, sir, is evidently weary of this protracted debate (cheers), and the general public longs for the opportunity of finally, as far as we are concerned, deciding that important question which now, for nearly three months, has been hanging in the balance under discussion here (cheers); and, having on several occasions before addressed you on the subject, I am most unwilling needlessly to occupy your attention; but, at the same time, I should be still more unwilling to appear wanting in respect to the noble lord and to the hon. members who have addressed you against the motion for the third reading of this bill, in speeches of considerable ability, in the course of the present evening. Sir, my hon. friend who has just sat down has observed that firmness and consistency are great qualities on the part of a minister; and, avoiding those strong terms of vituperation in which other members have indulged, he has nevertheless censured her Majesty's Ministers for tergiversation, as he terms it, on this most important subject. No member of this house has more warmly advocated the cause of my hon. friend and those below the gangway in former discussions than I have. I feel all the advantage of the qualities which the hon. member described as virtuous in a Minister; but still, sir, charged with heavy responsibility, as a servant of the crown, at a time of public difficulty, and, as I think, of danger, I have not hesitated to give effect to the opinions which I have deliberately formed on this great question which now awaits our decision (loud cheers). Sir, the hon. member has stated that he believes that this question, whatever may be its issue here, will not pass into a law on account of opposition he anticipates in another quarter. I will not venture to indulge in prophecy on that subject; but my own anticipation is, that this question, from the result of discussion both in Parliament and out of Parliament, is virtually settled (loud cheers); and my strong opinion is, that the free import of corn into this country will in a short time become the law of the land (continued cheering). Entertaining that anticipation, and having a deep interest in agriculture and in the welfare of the landed interest, I must own that I differ altogether from the noble lord the member for Lynn; and I cannot think that either the farmer or the landlord will derive the least benefit from these protracted discussions, so far at least as the immediate influx of the foreign corn accumulated into this country has been prevented by the postponement (hear). If I were obliged to put my finger on the point where I think this delay must be injurious, I should certainly say that delay is, in my judgment, calculated to affect most injuriously the farming interest and the landlords of the country (cheers). Observe, there is accumulated now a stock nearly of 1,500,000 qrs. of foreign wheat; that accumulation has been gradual and progressive. My belief is that when we met in January the portion then accumulated might have been admitted into the home market with the greatest benefit to the consumer, and without any detriment whatever to the producer. Three or four months have elapsed, and that accumulation is becoming great; the period of a new harvest is not very distant, and, if my anticipation is correct—if, notwithstanding all this protracted opposition offered, public opinion shall prevail, and this measure becomes law, the effect of long delay, as under the operation of the law which I condemn, pouring in towards the time of harvest large accumulations of grain will be that the influx will be sudden, will be large; and though from circumstances I do not believe that on the present occasion the operation of that influx will be so injurious as on former occasions, yet there is infinite danger of injurious effect being produced, as the inevitable consequence of this protracted debate. Now, Sir, before I proceed to the other topics which have occurred with reference to this measure, I should wish to clear the ground by noticing some of the points adverted to by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. He said, I think, that the present Corn Law was a good financial measure. Now, I know that I may be charged with inconsistency on this subject generally; but, with reference to this point, I submit that I have uniformly expressed an unvarying opinion. I do not think that as a fiscal measure it is expedient to levy upon articles of the first necessity such as wheat, consumed by a population so large as ours, a fixed duty of revenue (hear, hear, hear). I do not think that as a fiscal measure the existing Corn Law is the best. The hon. gentleman then went on to say that the producers were satisfied with the existing Corn Law. I do not believe that the producers, the farmers at least, have any reason to be well satisfied with the well working of that measure. But that, after all, is not a measure to be maintained for the producers only. The great body of consumers, the great body of the public, after all, constitute those whose interests, whose welfare, is to be peculiarly regarded (hear, hear). These forces upon my recollection a topic to which I must refer. The hon. gentleman has said, and with great truth, that gentlemen, adhering to the opinion which I myself heretofore advocated, have under present circumstances of great difficulty, maintained that opinion with great ability and manly purpose. Now, excuse me for saying that under the present circumstances they have fought this battle well; but I recollect debates which have occurred in this house before the last session, when the strong point of argument was against this measure, and I must say that until the present session the cause which these honourable gentlemen now support, not only by their votes, but also by their speeches, had not then the advocacy of their arguments (hear, hear). I will be perfectly frank to hon. gentlemen. It has been my fortune to argue this question now for many years (hear, hear). Yes, and I am about to state to you my experience in that respect. I have seen, from the force of public opinion, arguments which were urged successfully in this house some years ago, one by me, abandoned as no longer tenable by those who used them (hear, hear). I myself am conscious that when we debated this question at a former period, arguments were urged with reference to landlords exclusively—to their position—to their interests, as connected with their political position, which are now abandoned—arguments which no hon. member ventures now to urge upon this house; and which I do not believe even at the meetings in Bond-street any hon. gentleman would venture to propound (hear, hear). I am told that the issue is now narrowed to a small point which it is necessary for us to debate (hear, hear). It could not be put more clearly or explicitly than it was stated by the hon. member for Shrewsbury a few nights ago. He said the real question is, whether this measure is for the interest of the multitude (hear, hear). That, he said, was the question at issue; and the hon. gentlemen said, "If the measures of the Government have not a tendency to occasion a displacement of labour—that kind of labour which is of the most permanent character, and thereby to occasion a great social suffering, and ultimately great political disaster, then the measures are good, and he was not prepared to oppose them" (hear, hear). The question then is narrowed to this,—it is not whether the interests of the landlords are upheld by this measure; but the question as put by the hon. member for Shrewsbury, and repeated by the hon. member for Somersetshire, to-night, is this,—whether the law restricting the importation of corn into this country is conducive to the happiness, the comfort, and the welfare of the labourer and tiller of the soil (hear, hear)? I conceive that that is the only question, and that that is the issue we are now called upon to decide. The honourable gentleman who last addressed you commented, I think, upon a pamphlet by Messrs. Morton and Trimmer, and made this observation, which was very true,—that the data upon which their statements were made not being admitted, the arguments resting upon them were worthless, and he went through a great number of statistical details as to farms in Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire, assuming his own data. He assumed, for instance, that under the existing Corn Law wheat was raised at 52s., forgetting that even under the present restrictive law we have had the price as low as 39s. And again, he assumed, that under the altered state of the law under Free Trade 40s. would be the price, upon which ground he rested his opinion which he has not explained, and in the absence of all fixed ground for admitting any of his data I must be allowed to apply the same observation which he himself applied to Messrs. Morton and Trimmer's pamphlet,—that not admitting the data I cannot admit for one moment the arguments upon which he rested his opinion. But the hon. gentleman indulged not only in prophecy with regard to the fate of this bill—not only in inconclusive arguments resting upon the data which he assumed, but certainly the result of his reasoning was not half so fanciful as was some of the knowledge he has recently collected (hear). He has informed us that in Russia there is an annual accumulation of 28,000,000 quarters of grain over and above the consumption of the Russian people, and available for exportation (hear). Can a more forcible argument be urged in favour of this measure (hear), that year by year there is produced in Russia, over and above the consumption—my hon. friend was most specific—he said not only beyond consumption, but beyond what was required for seed and consumption, nearly 28,000,000 of quarters available for exportation? Again, what was his description of the culture of land in America? He says he has seen somewhere an account of some land in America which has been cultivated year after year for wheat without manure, and that that has been the case for a century (hear, hear, hear). If these statements are true,—if Russia has 28,000,000 quarters of grain ready at all times for exportation, and if in America they can grow wheat year after year or a century without manure, all our Corn Laws must be useless (hear). There is no restriction that can be imposed which would protect us. It is quite clear that any kind of protection would be useless to guard this country against the importation of foreign corn, and the home producer could not compete with such fertility as that, and with such boundless production. Then the hon. gentleman referred to the question of tithes, and he said that my hon. friend the member for the University of Oxford, in his absence, had touched upon this question. That observation was quite true. My hon. friend did so, and I had the honour of following my hon. friend; and I endeavoured to reply to him upon that point in a manner which to my judgment was conclusive. I am unwilling again to repeat the argument; but it is very short. So far from thinking that the present change in the law is injurious to the titheowner, I consider that the opposite is the case, and that it is injurious to the tithepayer, because, observe, the quantity of wheat to be paid to the titheowner is measured by a number of quarters of grain fixed at the time of commutation; and if the apprehensions of my hon. friend and those around him be true, that land will be thrown out of cultivation, the titheowner under that commutation is guarded against all such risk; the quantity paid to him is an immutable quantity, and is only exposed to the danger of a variation in price. But, observe—before the commutation he was liable to all those variations in price—his position was not in the least altered; but it would have been quite altered, if before the commutation the legislature had passed a law of this description. He was bound to submit to the change in price; but, by the antecedent law, he was secured against any change in quantity, and therefore I must say, that so far as relates to the titheowners this bill involves no injustice whatever. The case of the titheowner appears perfectly clear, and he is not exposed to our proposed alteration of the law to the slightest risk. Now, then, as regards the colonies, I am bound to say, that my hon. friend was, as he stated, with respect to Canada, an eager opponent of the proposed alteration in the law which was to place Canada on the same footing as if it were an integral part of Great Britain (hear). Then, when the honourable member for Gateshead (Mr. Hutt) proposed last year a similar measure with respect to the Australian colonies, my hon. friend was found dividing among his opponents; and I must say with frankness, looking back to the past, and to all the discussions on the Corn Laws which have taken place in my time, that if I were to mention the discussion in which the opponents of the proposition of extending the area of our supply of corn were least successful in argument, I should mention that debate in which my hon. friend opposed the hon. member for Gateshead; for although I voted with my hon. friend, yet I am bound to state that that my hon. friend's argument did not seem to me to preponderate. Another point had been referred to by my hon. friend, who spoke of what he called the insignificant sum which had been offered as compensation to the landed interest. Now, on the part of her Majesty's Government, I absolutely disclaim that the term compensation has ever been used by them (cries of "Oh, oh"). I absolutely disclaim it. If this be a measure for the public good, then I should deem it highly disgraceful to the Government to propose, and still more disgraceful to the landed interest to accept, any compensation for the passing of a measure framed for the public good. But though the Government know nothing of any proposition of compensation; it is true that concurrent with this measure there have been brought forward by the Government some measures which are for the public good, at the same time that they are adapted to alleviate the pressure of the burdens on land. I shall refer to another branch of this most important subject—I mean, to what has been said by various members on what they called the Irish case. The noble lord the member for Lynn had said that the Government had acted with bad faith respecting Ireland, and that they had communicated to the house no information respecting the distress there but what sustained their own views, and that they had kept back other information of another kind which various parties had put in their hands, and the noble lord specified instances, and he said that the Commander of the Forces had sent different accounts from those we have laid on the table; he said also that the Poor Law Commissioner had sent us different accounts from those which we have produced; and I think he said the prison inspectors had also sent different accounts from ours. Now I have made every inquiry in the proper quarter, by sending to the Horse Guards, to learn whether any such information had been received there from Sir E. Blakeney, and I am in a condition to give that assertion of the noble lord a most positive denial. Then with respect to the Poor Law Commissioner. In the month of November last, I thought it my duty to advise the Crown to appoint a special officer, to preside in Dublin over the administration of the Poor Law in Ireland. That was in November. Since then I have been in constant communication with that gentleman. He is a member of the Scarcity Committee in Dublin. That committee makes weekly reports to the Lord-Lieutenant, and each week those reports, signed by the Poor Law Commissioner, are transmitted to me, and I think I have laid all of them (with the exception of two, which I am ready to produce) upon the table of the house, and they in the strongest manner corroborate the statements that have been made by the Government respecting the state of Ireland. It is possible that the noble lord may refer to Mr. Gulton's mission to Ireland; but he never was appointed to make any inquiries on this subject; he left Ireland in November; he did not visit any part of Ireland later than the beginning of that month, when the disease in the potatoes had not been completely discovered; he was employed during the months of September and October, he was ordered to investigate another matter, and therefore any information he may have received respecting this matter was of an unofficial character. With respect to the prison inspectors in Ireland, I do not know who were the prison inspectors in Ireland. I have written to Ireland to ascertain who they are, and what information they have furnished to the Lord-Lieutenant; and as soon as I receive it I shall not fail to communicate to the house, and the noble lord, the whole of that information. The noble lord says we have kept back information which would have shown that the distress is far from being universal; but is this a fair mode of putting the matter? For I before said that the distress is not universal, but that it was widely spread, extending over almost every county in Ireland, and that the difficulty of dealing with it arises from the fact of its being scattered, and from its intensity where it exists. That is the statement I have made, and to that statement I adhere in the most deliberate manner. Sir, I do not know whether the hon. and gallant member for the county of Armagh is in his place; but I wish to say with reference to the speech he made the other night, that I have here a letter which I received not very long ago, in which he depicts the distress of his own neighbourhood in the most glowing terms, and declares that it is deserving of Government aid, in the shape of a pecuniary grant (a cry of "Read"). This letter is addressed to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and states that the undersigned, being deeply sensible of the calamity with which Ireland is threatened, by the failure of the potato crop, and considering that in such an emergency it is the duty of every man to do his utmost to avert the frightful evils that might be expected, recommended the outlay of a sum of money in draining Lough Neagh, and the last paragraph is in these terms:—"That a grant of 38,000l. by the Government would be met by 118,000l., raised by the proprietors of the neighbourhood, and others, and that the result would be a mighty improvement to the north of Ireland, and to the health of the district; and that it would afford an opportunity"—let the house mark this—"of employing the labouring population, whose condition it would be frightful to contemplate, unless industrial measures of this kind were applied." This memorial bears the signatures of the Lord Primate, Dr. Crolly, Lord Charleville, Lord Acheson, and, among other names, that of William Verner, M.P. (hear, hear). But though I am afraid that the Irish case is one of unquestionable pressure, as is more apparent from day to day, yet I am bound to say that I never have rested my support of this measure on the Irish case. I have stated before, and I state it again, that the urgency of that case did precipitate the reconsideration of the laws which prohibit or impede the importation of grain into this country; but I say also that, from the moment that the reconsideration shall become necessary, views of general policy, views of the general good of the people of this country did convince me that a change in this respect had become necessary. I am not on this occasion about to trespass on the time of the house by repeating the arguments which brought me to that conclusion, but I will say this much:—The hon. member for Shrewsbury (Mr. D'Israeli), I think it was, who said that the measure would have an injurious effect from the export of the precious metals which must arise from the constant large importation of grain for this use of the country. Now I agree that in the present state of our monetary system large exportations of the precious metals are inconsistent with a sound state of the currency here. But my belief is, that if the ports of this country were kept open regularly, so far from that exportation of the precious metals taking place in ordinary years, that exportation would be prevented by this measure. The corn taken by this country will, when the trade has become an established trade, be mainly paid for by barter; and the result, I think, will be, that trade will be extended, and that the injury which the export of the precious metals to meet distress arising from failure of the home production causes, will be prevented. I shall now, with the permission of the house, state shortly my opinion as to the effects to be apprehended on our foreign trade from this measure. But I cannot separate the question of the home trade from the foreign trade. My opinion is, that the foreign trade and the home trade, in a series of years, will be found to be indissolubly connected. Now the foreign trade can only be maintained by our having the power of consuming the articles taken in exchange; but a high price of provisions disables the consumer from taking those articles. He cannot go into the home market, consequently the home market is paralysed, and what is the result of that? That a stimulus is given for the forced exportation of goods for the foreign market; the foreign market in consequence becomes glutted, the exporter is injured, and the result is, again diminished power of consumption at home; and, therefore, it appears that the foreign trade cannot be injured without the home trade suffering also. Then as to procuring wheat in the foreign market; I conceive wheat is more universally consumed in this country than in any other country in the world, and whatever the price or scarcity is, it is found that the quantity consumed varies less with the price than that of any other article that is consumed in this country. All those who are in easy circumstances, whatever is the price, always consume the same quantity of wheat, and the labouring poor are so much attached to wheat, that they will forego almost all other articles approaching to articles of the first necessity, rather than go without wheaten bread. Consequently, whatever is the price, the quantity of wheat used in this country is never much diminished. Now, if wages do not fall when wheat rises, then the price of wheat rising, and the quantity purchased remaining the same, the sum available for the purchase of all other articles is diminished. What, therefore, is the consequence of a rise of prices?—that the labourer is incapable of purchasing articles of manufacture. The effect on the home market is instantaneous; there is a glut in that market, this reacts upon the foreign market, and there is an immediate derangement, which may be traced to the effect of this increased price of corn (hear, and cheers). And this, sir, brings me to the point, which, after all, is the point of primary importance; what is the effect of this state of affairs upon the condition and the happiness of the labouring classes? Now it has been said, that although the manufacturing labourer may gain by a prosperous state of trade, and by the low price of provisions, that truth is not equally applicable to the case of the agricultural labourer. I admit the number of the agricultural labourers; I admit their importance; I will not say their paramount, but their very great importance; and if you can show, as heretofore I thought I could, that this portion of the community will be injured by an alteration of the Corn Laws, your argument will be conclusive against this change; but having given my most anxious attention, to the best of my understanding, which the noble lord the member for Lynn calls one of sexagenarian imbecility (laughter), I have come to the conclusion that it is not true of the agricultural labourers, that their position is different with reference to the high price of provisions from that of the manufacturing labourers: their position is in this respect identical, and both the agricultural and manufacturing labourers suffer by the high price of provisions. I know not whether my hon. relative the member for Shaftesbury is in the house, but I was surprised, when he had detailed to us the condition of the agricultural labourers in Dorsetshire, and the wages which they habitually received, to find with all his warm-hearted sympathy for them the conclusion at which he has arrived (hear, hear). What is the statement he has made? That these labourers receive only for wages 7s. or 7s. 6d. a week, and as I understand from the hon. member for Dorsetshire, who followed the hon. member for Shaftesbury, and who went further than him in one respect, from this pittance of 7s. or 7s. 6d. a week there is a deduction of 1s. or 2s. for house rent, thus making the whole earnings of a Dorsetshire labourer from 5s. to 5s. 6d. a week; and my hon. relative declares that the rate of wages does not vary with the price of provisions, and that when provisions are high wages do not rise. He thinks that their condition is hopeless, but let him try one experiment; if they could not alter the rate of wages, let him alter the price of wheat (cheers). Other interests may suffer, possibly the farmers may suffer, possibly the landlords may suffer by the change, but I defy you to do any injury to the Dorsetshire labourer (cheers), by lowering the price of an article of the first necessity, on which he lives, and without which he cannot subsist. I understand, also, that this is not only the present condition of these labourers, but that it has been their condition for the last 30 years. Now, we are not debating Magna Charta, or any great principle of the constitution, but we are discussing a law which happens to be about coincident with this condition of the Dorsetshire labourers, and to be about thirty years old (hear, hear). And when my hon. relative despairs of procuring any rise of wages in Dorsetshire, let him try the experiment of lowering the price of food (cheers). And now I am about to state why I think it is quite clear that this change will affect the manufacturing and the agricultural labourer palpably and distinctly. It is easy to consider the condition of the country at the period which the noble marquis reviewed, the close of the reign of Elizabeth, and to carry ourselves back to that period; but what we have to contemplate is the state of affairs which now exist, and with which it is the duty of statesmen and of Parliament to deal. It cannot be denied that this country can no longer be regarded as an agricultural country (ironical cheers from the protectionist benches). I repeat that if we act and legislate as if this country were purely agricultural, error lies at the very root of the argument. Whether it be for weal or for woe, we have become a manufacturing and a commercial country, and we must legislate for the great commercial and manufacturing interests. I admit this, and I say that the connection between the commercial, the manufacturing, and the agricultural interests, is intimate and palpable. There cannot be commercial and manufacturing prosperity without creating a demand for labour in the agricultural districts. We find a proof of this in the progress of docks, of railways and canals, and whenever the demand for labour in the seats of wealth and in the manufacturing districts is strong, labour is attracted from the most distant rural districts, where there is a state of manufacturing prosperity, and when the price of food is low, wages rise. What will be the effect of this change on the condition of the labourer? Now really let us be sincere in this matter (loud cheers from the protectionists). I appeal with confidence to the reason and candour of honourable gentlemen below the gangway; and if I can establish that manufacturing and commercial prosperity will so operate on the price of labour in the agricultural districts as to raise wages when the price of provisions is low, then, if we are sincere in our wish to legislate for the good of the labouring classes, whether agricultural or manufacturing, my reasoning will be conclusive, and you cannot resist the measure we propose. Wages do depend upon a demand and supply; and when a demand for labour operates among the agricultural classes, and raises wages, they obtain the three greatest advantages which a working man can simultaneously enjoy—full employment, high wages, and a low price of provisions (hear, hear, hear). There is a period of oscillation, production is stimulated, the prices are low, the demand is large, and this demand for labour affects the rate of wages in the agricultural districts: the oscillation again comes, the quantity has been unnaturally stimulated, the price of wages is low, with a diminished quantity of food the price is enhanced, the ports are closed, the home market is destroyed, the foreign trade is injured, the exportation of the precious metals caused by the sudden demand for corn operates upon prices, and wages fall (hear, hear). What, then, is the condition of the labouring classes, whether in the agricultural or manufacturing districts? That whereas before they enjoyed the three greatest benefits of full employment, high wages, and low prices, they are now subjected to the evils of deficient employment, low wages, and an artificial high price of food (hear, hear). I am unwilling, Sir, needlessly to prolong this argument, but I state what has carried conviction to my own mind. I am satisfied that the effect of a change will be on the labouring classes, agricultural as well as manufacturing; and if that be the issue we have to try—and the hon. member for Shrewsbury has put it upon that issue, which is most fair, I am satisfied that we have no course to take, but to agree in the passing of this measure (cheers). No sophistry, no ingenuity of argument will satisfy the people of this country that it is to their interest for the price of food to be directly raised, and that indirectly wages should fall; no sophistry, however able, will satisfy the people of this country that you are thereby doing what is really calculated to promote their interest, however generous may be your intentions, and however unequivocal may be the expression of your wishes (hear, hear). I will next glance at one other argument, that it is to the interest of the working farmers that these laws should be maintained. There was, Sir, a committee over which you presided, which sat in 1836, and before which several witnesses of great experience and ability gave evidence upon this point. I am unwilling to detain the house, but there are two witnesses to whose testimony I wish shortly to call the attention of the house. They are statements made by the tenant farmers with reference to their own interest, and as regarded themselves. The first witness to whose testimony I would call attention, is that of Mr. John Ellis, a large tenant farmer, in the neighbourhood of Leicester. The first question was asked him by my right hon. friend the Paymaster of the Forces (Mr. B. Baring). He was asked—

"It is for the advantage of the farmer to raise prices, is it not?—I do not think so; I am not of that opinion. I do not think it is to the advantage of the farmer to have very high prices."

"What do you consider most advantageous to the farmer?—A steady price (cheers); that the farmer, when he goes to take land, should look to some steady price, and not look to adventitious circumstances, to keep him out of a difficulty."

"Do you think the present scale has had the effect of creating greater fluctuations of price than there would have been under a more reduced scale?—That is a question that I cannot answer, not having been in the corn trade, but I am certain that the Corn Laws have raised delusive hopes in the farmers."

Then the hon. member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay) asked, "You are decidedly of opinion that steadiness of price is the circumstance most important to the farmer?—My opinion is not in accordance with that of most people with respect to the interest of landlord and tenant. Up to a certain point, I hold that they go together; that it is the interest of the tenant to keep the land in good condition, as it is of the landlord that he should do so; but his landlord's interest is to have a high price, to enable him to pay a high rent. I do not think it is the tenant's interest to be clamorous about a high price; it makes very little difference to me whether I pay a high price or a low price, and I think the country thrives better all round me if the price is a moderate one; it is better for me not to have a high price, provided my expenses are in proportion."

"The farmer is a capitalist, and is it of importance to him to be able to calculate the returns upon his capital?—Just so. "He would do that better, and feel more certainly, if he were sure of a steady price of wheat?—Yes he would."

"Suppose that the present system, or any system of Corn Laws, tends to produce fluctuations in the price of wheat, that must be minor in its consequences to the farmer?—There is no doubt of it."

Then he was asked by the honourable member for Somerset, (Mr. Miles)—

"Do you think you could do without protection altogether?—Not in the present state of things. I think we must come to that ultimately, but we must go by easy steps."

"But you think that the poorer class of farmers at present look at 59s. as the price at which wheat can be maintained?—Yes."

"Is it your opinion that upon the average of years prices can attain to that height?—It is my opinion that they cannot, and that they will not attain 59s. with fine seasons."

"And the consequence is, that the poorer farmers have fallacious hopes raised?—Yes."

These questions were put in 1836, and recollect that in 1842 the protection was reduced one-half, and under the present measure there is to be a less duty, which is to endure for two years, and so we shall arrive by easy steps (laughter and cheers) at what this tenant farmer, in 1836, forewarned you was inevitable, and which he considered desirable. That is the opinion of an English farmer. I shall now give you the opinion of a Scotch farmer, of a gentleman with whom I have long had the pleasure of being acquainted, and who is one of the most experienced and successful agriculturists in that seat of excellent farming—I mean the Lothians. The following is the testimony of Mr. Howden: The hon. member for the North Riding of Yorkshire asked him, "If you had been sold off in 1820, do you think you would have been better off than you are now?" Now, observe the answer which Mr. Howden gives, after twenty years of protection. He replied:

"I do not know that mine is a fair case to be taken as a general case, because I started very poor in life, and I have had a hard struggle, and other circumstances that contributed to assist me. I am the only remaining farmer in the parish where I was brought up. Except myself, there is not a farmer, nor the son of a farmer, remaining within the parish but myself." This was brought out still more clearly by the next question put by the hon. member for the North Riding of Yorkshire:

"What is the reason of their having all gone away?" Mr. Howden replied, "The money-rents that were exacted of them; they all conceived that they were to have 80s. a quarter, and their calculations were made upon that; it soon appeared that that could not be realised, and they were not converted, and ruin has been the consequence."

"Then there has been a great change of tenantry in your neighbourhood?—There has been."

"And that has been caused by the fall of prices?—Yes, and the want of accommodation on the part of the proprietors."

"The proprietors have not reduced their rents in proportion?—They now have generally done so, but they were later in doing it than the circumstances required, and therefore the tenantry fell."

Now, what does this show? It shows that there was a miscalculation on the part both of the tenant and the landlord. 80s. was said to be the price which the protection law of 1815 would afford. Landlords believed themselves justified in assuming that 80s. would be the price which communibus annis wheat would bring; and, although I know the landlords in that district to be generous and honourable men—for I have known them from my earliest youth—yet, acting with perfect honour and fairness in their calculations in the belief that wheat would bring 80s. per quarter, they postponed the reduction of rent too long, and the fall of their tenants was the consequence (hear, hear). Mr. Howden was next asked—

"In your opinion did the Corn Law that was made in 1815 deceive both the landlord and the tenant?—It did. I believe that the calculation upon which they took at that time was almost universally 4s. a quarter."

"The general impression was that the Corn Laws then made would have the effect of keeping wheat at the price of 80s., and both landlord and tenant were deceived in that?—Yes."

"If the Corn Law had not the effect of keeping up the price, something must have reduced the price?—It did reduce; but as to the cause, I shall not pretend to say."

"The Corn Law having promised a price of 80s., failed to perform it?—Yes."

Now, that is the statement of a tenant farmer. I have shown you the effect of protection upon the labourer, and I have shown you its effect upon the tenant farmer in relation to his landlord. I have shown you, whatever the amount of protection at any given period, the conclusion inevitably resulted which happened in Mr. Howden's case, and in many others in the United Kingdom, not from any want of generosity on the part of the landlords, but from a false conviction of the inevitable effect of the law (hear, hear). I believe that it is as much the interest of the tenant farmer as it is of the landlord, that there should be a greater certainty of price, which can only be obtained by a repeal of your restrictive laws (hear, hear). Let me now glance for a moment at the condition of the landlord. And here I must observe—and I state it without meaning the least offence to the gentlemen below the gangway—that they assume to themselves that they have a monopoly of the land of the country, and that the opinion of all the landed proprietors is in favour of protection (cheers). Now, I know not where you will find a very prosperous large landed property where this happy result may not be traced directly, either mediately or immediately, to the prosperity of trade and commerce (cheers, mingled with cries of "oh, oh"). Allow me, without offence, to try this particular question with reference to the manufacturing districts. Take the county of Lancaster, for instance,—the seat of the cotton trade. Who are the great landed proprietors in that county? There is the Earl of Derby, on whose land the town of Bury is built. Is he opposed to this measure (cheers)? There is also the Earl of Burlington. Is he opposed to this measure (hear)? But it may be said that the Earl of Derby and the Earl of Burlington are not fair examples of the feeling of the landed proprietors in that county. Well, then, take Lord Francis Egerton, who is connected both with commerce and agriculture, and the inevitable effect of whose experience is to render him a strenuous advocate of the proposed alteration (hear). Let us go, in the next place, to the West Riding of Yorkshire, the great seat of the woollen manufacture. There is Lord Fitzwilliam. Is he opposed to this change (hear)? Or let us go to the seat of the cotton manufacture in Scotland. What is the county in Scotland which is most dependent on commerce and manufactures? Why, Lanarkshire. And what is the opinion of the Duke of Hamilton on this question (cheers, answered by ironical cheers)? You may treat this argument with contempt if you please, but it will be impossible for you to hold yourselves forth as the exclusive representatives of the agricultural interest on this question (hear). The hon. member for Somersetshire mentioned an extraordinary fact, that the price of wheat, which averaged 90s. in 1805, had fallen to 48s. in 1845, while the produce of the country had increased. Now it is a curious fact that, coincident with the commercial and manufacturing prosperity of that period, the rent of the land has risen, and not the rent of the land only, but the fee simple of the land has increased, while, as the hon. member has shown, the produce of the soil itself has increased. If you pass this measure, a great fall of price may take place below that which we have known for the last three years; but I am satisfied that the great body of the people will obtain this inestimable advantage—that they will have an ample and perfect security against a sudden rise of price to any great height (hear). Now I may take shame to myself, but I am bound to say that, although late, I have arrived at this conclusion after a more recent and careful consideration of this matter, combined with experience, and I say that the real truth of the matter, as it appears to me, is summed up in a masterly manner by Lord Grenville, in 1815, and I believe that what he says is actually true. I cannot persuade myself that the laws which regulate the importation of corn tend to produce plenty, cheapness, or steadiness of price. As far as they operate at all, my belief is that when carefully examined in practice and tested by experience, they produce the very opposite effects. Lord Grenville lays down the general principle which is the converse of this. He says that monopoly is the parent of scarcity, of dearth, and uncertainty. I believe that this proposition is strictly true (hear, hear). I believe that it is impossible to cut off any of our sources of supply, and not trench upon the means of securing abundance. I believe you cannot show that you can limit the supply of any commodity and not enhance the cost of the article. To reject the advantages which I have pointed out would be to deprive ourselves of the beneficial arrangements that have been made by Providence for the sustentation of man. It is perhaps scarcely necessary for me to add that I am most anxious to see this measure pass unamalgamated; for I entertain a strong conviction that if it becomes the law of the land, it will protect the labourer against the effects of dear prices imposed upon the first necessary of life; that it will prove a security to the farmer in his speculations and his profits, and more than all, that this measure will reconcile the prosperity of the landlords with the interests and the goodwill of the community at large; that it will extend our commerce; increase the prosperity of our manufactures; that it will place our foreign relations upon a safe and stable foundation; I conscientiously believe that it will be memorable in our history (cheers), as securing the prosperity, contentment, peace, and happiness of the great body of the people, without reference to the exclusive interests of any particular class (hear, hear).

A NEW KIND OF MAY FESTIVAL.—Intersected as our land is with railways—covered as our seas are with steamers—we should wish to see our May festival become a grand and instructive pilgrimage time. It is good for man to run among his fellows—to see distant spots—to become acquainted with new and untrodden localities. Travel is a glorious pill for purging nonsense. The lion of the country coterie has the conceit taken out of him by London's cold shoulder. The prejudice-stuffed John Bull, who hates the French for eating frogs and wearing wooden shoes, very soon becomes ashamed of his cherished opinions, if he airs them on the other side of the water. The townsman has much to learn from the countryman—the countryman from the townsman. Let them mingle as often as may be. Whisk your agricultural population amid the chimneys of the regions of iron and cotton. Bring the sooty men of the forge, and the pale men of the loom, amid ploughs and harrows. The change will do both good—will inspire both with new ideas—will kill old prejudices—will make people think less of themselves and more of their neighbours. We have had too much class warfare lately. Now that a peace seems likely to be at hand, we would cement the alliance with personal intercourse. We should like to see the man of Lancashire shake hands with the man of Somersetshire. We would have the ruddy tenant of 500 arable acres conducting the weaver—freed for a space from the roar of the engine and the clatter of the power-loom—around the rustic homestead; and again, it would as much delight us to see a friendly lex talionis practised by the operative of the north in conducting, in his turn, his country acquaintance from engine to furnace—from mill to mechanics' institute. Now, this is much more than mere dreaming. It would have been but idle imaginings were it not for steam; but, thank heaven, we now wield a power which 20 years ago we wot not of—a power which is working a greater revolution than ever was rung in by clang of tocsin, or baptized in the blood of kings. Let May time be celebrated then, not by the monster devices of yore, but by the monster trains of the present day. Our ancestors danced round a pole—let our holiday movements run in a more extended circle. Railway companies can do much in this way; and if employers of labour unite with the rulers of the rails, cheap, very cheap trips might every summer be instituted which would reveal to millions new beauties of creation—open to them fresh fountains of thought—fresh means of enjoyment.—Jerrold's Shilling Magazine for May.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—Dr. S. Ryan, in his chemical lecture during the last week, has taken the opportunity of explaining a patent fire detector, the employment of which, to use the learned doctor's own words, would prevent the possibility of fire occurring in any situation undetected. Its construction depends upon two points that may be easily understood. First, the suspension of a weight by a material which is separated by a moderate heat exceeding the highest temperature of summer; and, secondly, the employing the weight thus disengaged to discharge an alarm by its fall. The weight consists of a metallic box, weighing about six ounces, which is hung on a nail by a ring or staple in its cover, and there are two kinds. In one the union is effected by means of a glass cylinder, hermetically sealed, and completely filled with mercury, at a temperature of about 90 deg., and which is consequently fractured by the expansion of the mercury, on being exposed to a temperature slightly higher; on the other form, the union is effected by a fusible cement, which suddenly liquifies at about 100 deg. The effect of any undue temperature on both is the same; viz., to detach the box from its cover, and cause the box to fall, which discharges the alarm—and the report which follows would be heard throughout the largest building, and is perfectly harmless. We regret that Dr. Ryan was prevented lecturing on Friday last, by sudden indisposition; but we trust that in a few days he will be enabled to resume his duties.

We with much pleasure notice a new envelope, and for which a patent has been obtained by a Mr. Morgan. Its advantages are, that greater dispatch is obtained, as sealing is not required; it having a cemented flap at the end, which incloses the letter with perfect safety; or it may be fastened with the stamped head of her Majesty. The machine by which these envelopes are cut, is in the Polytechnic Institution, and affords great amusement to the visitors by the rapidity with which it performs its operations, cutting many thousands in a minute.

MAINT UNNECESSARY FOR BEER. In the report of Professor Thompson, of Glasgow, to Government, on the qualities of malt as an alimentative, the following curious revelation is made:—"In the year 1805, I was appointed by the Excise Office in Scotland, along with Drs. Hope and Coventry, to make a set of experiments to determine the relative value of Scotch and English barley. Many experiments were made; among others, a quantity of barley was ground, and mixed with a good quantity of oatseed, to prevent it from cohering into a pulp; the mixture was infused, in water of about the temperature of 190 deg., and the infusion drawn off after standing several hours. It became speedily sweet, and the wort drawn off was as sweet as wort from malt. Being fermented it made excellent beer. The brewers who assisted us were much struck with this experiment; they imitated it successfully, and in a few years all the beer in Edinburgh was made from raw grain. The brewers were prosecuted by the Excise; they were prohibited from using raw grain, but no penalty was exacted."

CONDITION OF OUR WEST INDIA COLONIES.

LETTER II.—JAMAICA INTERESTS.

To the Editor of the Economist.

SIR,—I will now endeavour to trace some of the evils which beset Jamaica interests.

The monster evil of Jamaica is absenteeism. We know something of Irish absenteeism and of its effects, but we shall fail to appreciate the evils of Jamaica absenteeism by any comparison with what occurs in Ireland. It is of a different character. In Ireland we have absentee landlords—in Jamaica, absentee cultivators. Just take one moment to imagine the distinction. It will assist you to fancy an English landowner who, instead of letting out his estate in Lincolnshire to one or more tenants, shall decide on keeping the whole in his own hands, and carrying on the cultivation by means of bailiffs and farm servants, while he removes to take up his permanent residence in Rome or Naples. Just take one step further, and imagine his health so delicate that he avows his determination never to hazard a return to the climate of England, and his bailiff knows this. If such a man should tell you that his estate was profitable, I think the most that could be said would be, that he was more lucky than wise; but if, on the contrary, he told you that he got no returns, and cited his individual case as a reason for maintaining the Corn Laws, you would laugh in his face.

Here then you have, mutatis mutandis, an absentee Jamaica proprietor.

Now I have no desire to say anything disrespectful of these gentlemen—I have no quarrel with them for preferring a residence in England to the personal supervision of their estates in Jamaica—I cannot even fairly blame them for having remained so long in the position of farmers instead of landlords, because the institutions of slavery were wholly opposed to the existence of a middle or tenant class. Their position excites neither wonder nor sympathy, and it is only recorded because I desire to point out the evils which have been entailed upon the island by the system.

The first and self-evident evil (and which is common to Irish and Jamaica absenteeism) is, that society is deprived of those influences which would be exercised by a resident proprietor, in raising the tone and tastes of all below them—in begetting and cherishing that interchange of regard and respect between the rich and poor, which forms so strong a link in the social chain, and in dispensing the benefits of their expenditure among the community whence their revenue is derived.

The second evil is peculiar to the case of the absentee farmer. It is the temptation which is held out to the abuse of power and trust on the part of those who are invested with (as it were) irresponsible authority in matters of detailed management and expenditure. I am sure that I shall not be accused of libelling a community, when I assert that the tendency of Jamaica absenteeism has been to foster unfaithful stewardship to a notorious extent. It is unnecessary to enlarge on this subject. Every one who knows anything of the past history of Jamaica will join with me in lamenting that the moral standard has been most grievously debased by the flagrant and unblushing examples of successful knavery. The perquisites of planting attorney have passed into a proverb.

Let us turn to evils of a different character. Let us imagine the absentee proprietor, who 20 years ago was accustomed to receive a large revenue from his Jamaica estate—has seen that revenue year by year diminishing, and at length from less efficient management, unfavourable seasons, want of labour, or any other imaginable cause, finds his income annihilated, or at best precarious. If he has no other resource, he feels the necessity of retrenchment, and he joins the crowd of fellow-sufferers in calling for immigration and protective duties. If he is a man of substance, he holds his Jamaica estate as a sort of lottery in which he is occasionally to draw a prize, but he never thinks of putting it into comparison as a property with his smaller estate in Kent or Sussex. If you converse with these parties, you will find them eloquent in assigning reasons for failure (high duties were the cry once—want of labour is the bugbear now), but you will also find that diligence to examine and apply the remedy bears but small proportion to the earnestness of complaint. Talk to them of going to Jamaica, and giving their personal supervision to their affairs, and there will be no lack of reasons to prevent them. Talk to them of expending capital in either an improved tillage of their land, or in the adoption of implements for the economy of labour, and they will tell you either that they are too poor, or too little confident of the result to try the experiment. In the meantime the estate is worked on a beggarly hand-to-mouth system—nothing is done that can be left undone—the land is badly tilled—the pastures are neglected—the cattle are starved—the buildings fall into decay—apathetic indifference and false economy take the place of energetic exertion and judicious expenditure. Want of labour, and want of rain, are found more palatable excuses than want of industry and capital.

But the evil does not rest here. Colonial society is composed of ever-changing materials. The ranks of the planters are supplied by young men, who, for the most part, leave the mother country before they have acquired any practical acquaintance with true principles of agriculture or rural economy. Many of them have been brought up in towns, with no previous knowledge whatever of their future pursuits. They see the system which I have described in full operation under experienced managers, and they readily enough believe that it is a sound one. They copy the example and extend its operation.

But to follow the absentee a step further. When matters get desperate—when, instead of revenue, he finds a loss as the result of the year's cultivation, he begins to think seriously of abandoning his estate; and the probability is, that the manager who has (at all events if not promoted) been unable to avert the depreciation, offers a rental, and is accepted as a tenant. It is equally possible that, instead of renting, he may purchase the estate. This introduces us to another class of planters. It will be readily understood that the former manager has no large amount of available capital. It will be assuming a better state of things than actually exists to believe that he is able to pay for the estate if a purchaser, or for the cattle if a tenant. The more usual course is to incur a debt for these purposes with some Kingston merchant. Be this as it may, I am sure that the instances are exceedingly rare where, as either purchaser or tenant, he has 500*l.* in the shape of floating capital to carry on the cultivation. Now, when I tell you that this party will attempt to cultivate and manufacture a crop of, say 100 hds of sugar and 30 punchons of rum, of a gross value of some 3000*l.*, in a country exposed to droughts and other drawbacks, upon such slender means, it surely will not require much penetration to understand the causes and chances of failure. You will not be surprised to learn that one-half of the available sugar land upon the estate is uncultivated; that it is impossible for him to anticipate the various processes of cultivation; to substitute machinery, or any but the simplest and least expensive implements for the economy of manual labour, or to expend his scanty means in drainage or irrigation, or in the application of artificial manures. Here, then, we see that the want of capital brings with it imperfect farming. Let us now examine how their combination acts upon labour and wages.

I have elsewhere said that the planter does nothing which he can leave undone; and as it is important that this part of the subject should be well understood, I will endeavour to illustrate it by an instance which fell under our observation, and which will be readily admitted as by no means of unfrequent occurrence. We were visiting an estate on the north side of the island, in a district where the want of continuous labour was most severely felt. The estate was in the hands of a tenant, a most industrious, deserving gentleman. It was one of large capabilities; but a considerable portion of the cane land was uncultivated. Our host had pointed out a certain number of acres, which he intended to put into plants in a few months, and in the course of conversation on the subject of labour, he told us he had that day discharged 50 labourers. We were somewhat startled at this, and ventured to suggest that a portion of these might have been advantageously employed in preparing the cane land for planting; but his immediate reply was—"Oh! I cannot spare the money to do that so long before it is wanted, although I should like to do so, because I should so much more readily get labour now than I shall then." On our endeavouring to explain the effect which these wholesale and sudden changes might have on the question of continuous labour, we were met by the assurance that it could not, in his opinion, make any difference; and he justified his own views by quoting the example of an adjoining estate, where they had discharged 100 labourers on the previous day.

What alternative, then, has the negro, but in self-defence to look to his provision ground as a stand-by for subsistence? and where is the wonder that, when the periodical rains have fallen, he should be more ready to attend to his own cultivation than to that of the planter? What is more natural than that a want of continuous employment should beget a want of continuous labour?

But we must trace the evil of want of capital still further. The planter is insensibly led to identify good management with small expenditure. He thinks rather of making a good money bargain with his labourers than of paying them liberally, and taking care, by personal supervision, that they give him an equivalent. He has not yet learned that quality is as essential a consideration as price, and he would think it the height of extravagance to lend labour-saving tools to men who ought to provide their own. They do provide them, and sadly inefficient they are. From the fact of his employing labour (to any extent) merely after rains or during crop, he is exposed to the competition of his neighbours who are in the same predicament; he therefore soon finds that, if he attempts to superadd strict surveillance to low wages, the negroes will strike and go elsewhere. He thinks to get over this difficulty by employing the labourer on job work. This, if less troublesome, is not less costly. The constant drain upon his small stock of ready money irritates and annoys him. He can look with comparative complacency on the loss of cattle, the dilapidations of his buildings, the failure of a field of canes, or the imperfect working of his mill. These are all contingencies which either require no immediate outlay to remedy, or will at the most only diminish his annual profits; but the wages are a weekly infliction. His want of capital, which prevents his availing himself of labour at other seasons of the year, in like manner prevents his adopting machinery as the means of diminishing his dependence on manual labour at a time when the demand is greater than the supply. He looks upon immigration as the panacea for all his troubles, and he demands it.

Another difficulty which besets West India interests is the want of that subdivision of labour which is at the root of economical production. This is the peculiar legacy of slavery. The planter is at once an agriculturist, a manufacturer, and a carrier; nay, we might go further, and say that he carried on the trades of a cooper, a carpenter, a wheelwright, and a blacksmith, for during the existence of slavery he was obliged to perform all such work upon his own estate; and so stagnant is everything like individual enterprise in Jamaica, that the system still prevails to a most injurious extent. I trust that the introduction of railways will lead to the more general employment of public carriers; and I have no doubt that an enlarged competition in the home market would require that greater attention should be paid to the manufacturing process, for the purpose of securing not only economy of cost, but a great improvement in the quality of the sugar.

The subject of central manufactories has been already mooted, and their establishment is looked forward to with anxiety by the colonists. I am not, however, inclined to think that their adoption can ever become so general as to dispense with the keeping up of works upon the majority of estates. There are comparatively few localities where the canes could be economically removed. For the purposes of centralisation tramways are indispensable, and these could only be applied in particular districts. Immense advantages would, however, be derived by the island from a more complete and scientific manufacture of sugar, as it would not only show the necessity for superior tillage of the lands now under cultivation, but would afford facilities and encouragement for bringing forward all others in the neighbourhood.

I will resume the subject in my next.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,
WILLIAM SMITH.

FALSIFICATION OF ADAM SMITH.—MR. CAYLEY AGAIN!

(From the Daily News.)

The long-wished for deliverance from that wearisome word grinding which the protectionists call "speaking," is now at hand. To-night a division is looked for most confidently. Human nature can bear it no longer. Even the party itself is tired of its own talk. It is difficult to keep 39 members within ear-shot of the one who is on prosiody duty for the passing hour. Machinery is said to tire in time. Steam-engines need some intervals of rest. The mill-wheel of protectionist oratory is coming to a state of exhaustion. The ceaseless humming and droning becomes fainter. The act of dividing will seem, comparatively, an intellectual operation.

No future Dryasdust will ever explore the unhappy volumes of Hansard, sacrificed to the reports of this debate. Wooden volumes will answer every purpose, and keep the numbering of the series unbroken. The wear and tear of type is all in vain. A thought; a new fact; an unexploded sophism; an original illustration; any indication of mentality; where shall we find it, through all this dreary waste of words? "There's no such thing." Not one argument has been set up, the refutation of which had not long ago become tiresome by frequent and needless iteration. As to intellectual combat in reply, as much of that stimulus might be found in beating a feather-bed. There may be mind in pin-making and reason in roasting eggs; no species of occupation, however humble and unskilled, is so utterly mechanical as this protectionist speech-making.

People will go great lengths to save their lives; though few, whose lives are worth saving, could undergo the drudgery which protectionists have sustained, to save, as they believe, their pockets. They have shown themselves alike soulless and sordid. Sometimes, looking only at the pertinacity evinced, we have been disposed to say, what a gallant stand this would have been, if made in defence of some great principle, some public right, some claim of justice! But no such senseless mechanical stand could have been made for a really good cause. The grandeur of the theme would have been inspiration. Stupid mediocrity would have risen into dignity by the truthful aim at a noble object. Integrity, for great purposes, supplies the place of genius. To pry into prisons rather than dwelling-houses, and to be interested about chains and fever rather than intrigues and routes, makes the difference between a busy-body and a Howard; but no gleam of brightness glances over this Serbonian bog. The only semblance of luminousness is in some fitful flashings of sarcasm, coruscations from the foul vapours of revenge and malignity, engendered in its level dreariness. All else is dark and mean.

And on Tuesday night the dark debate had a narrow escape from a mean termination. The unpleasantness of hearing Mr. Newdegate had enforced the members to run, forgetful of possible consequences. And then the voice of Lord G. Bentinck raised a cry to "Divide." This, reader, is British and noble statesmanship! We are greatly disgusted, forsooth, by the ungentelemanly proceedings of Congress. Would a manœuvre, worse than any trick of the turf, have been tolerated there? In this country, anything is reckoned fair in politics and in law; politics and law being, by that argument, the mere conventional description of two kinds of prostitution, by which the privileged replenish their purses and gratify their passions.

Lord George, or St. George, as the Marquis of Granby dubs him by the bit of Shakspeare which formed a portion of his "cram," was disappointed of his honourable and patriotic purpose by the obtuseness of Mr. G. Palmer, who had been enlisted to serve as a speechmaker that night, and was determined to do his duty literally. On he went, regardless of noise or nudging, like the stupid servant in a farce, who is sure to nonplus his master, at the critical moment, by a most rigid adherence to his instructions. So the speech was made; and the time for division, with a protectionist majority, was lost. Leaders like Lord G. Bentinck are well matched with followers like Mr. G. Palmer.

While we are upon this characteristic of pettiness and paltriness in the monopolist opposition, there is one point in the speech of Mr. Cayley on Monday night recommending it to a notice for which it possesses no other claims. Mr. Cayley professed to cite an opinion of Adam Smith's; the citation was a perversion and the opinion a falsification. Even this, however, is not so very remarkable in protectionist speeches as to call for especial comment. But this is not all. Mr. Cayley was Tract writer to the Protectionist Association. Under the sanction of the committee, he put forth a pamphlet on the reasons for the formation of that society, which was largely distributed. In that pamphlet, were sundry demonstrated falsifications both of the opinions and the language of Adam Smith. The demonstration, by Lord Radnor in the House of Peers, and by a writer in THE LEAGUE journal, was so complete, that Mr. Cayley was compelled, for common decency's sake, to make some apology; and he did make a partial and pitiful acknowledgment and apology in the columns of the Morning Herald. The citation in his speech, on Monday night, is one of those very quotations, so garbled, so falsified in meaning and implied opinion, and so partially and pitifully acknowledged and apologised for. At the time, it was justly declared to be "rare to meet with literary dishonesty so glaring." After the exposure, to repeat the trick in his speech is yet more glaring. In any working class club for discussion, as the means of arriving at knowledge and truth, such conduct would have been promptly followed by ignominious expulsion. Occurring in the House of Commons, amongst many instances of disingenuous rhetoric in protectionist speeches, we shall only say that it deserves to be recorded. Let that page of Hansard be read, when all else is disregarded, that monopolist morality in debate may be distinctly understood.

The passage referred to by Mr. Cayley, for the purpose of showing that he has Adam Smith's authority for "instead of making manufactures the foundation of the commercial system to make agriculture its foundation," is in chapter eleven of book 2, of the "Wealth of Nations." Few readers would suspect Adam Smith of making agriculture the foundation of a commercial system. After a picked and perverted phrase, Mr. Cayley suppresses, both in his tract and his speech, the sentences immediately following, and which are remarkably applicable to the present discussion:

"When the public deliberates concerning any regulation of commerce or police, the proprietors of land can never mislead it, with a view to promote the interest of their own particular order; at least, if they have any tolerable knowledge of that interest. They are, indeed, too often defective in this tolerable knowledge. They are the only one of the three orders whose revenue costs them neither labour nor care, but comes to them, as it were, of its own accord, and independent of any plan or project of their own. That indolence, which is the natural effect of the ease and security of their situation, renders them too often, not only ignorant, but incapable of that application of mind which is necessary in order to foresee and understand the consequences of any public regulation."

A HINT.—An American physician announces that he has changed his residence to the neighbourhood of a churchyard, which he hopes may prove a convenience to his numerous patients.

PROTECTIONIST MEETING AT MACCLESFIELD.

TRIUMPH OF FREE TRADE.

(From the Macclesfield Chronicle, May 16.)

A meeting of the silk weavers of Macclesfield was held on Park Green, on Monday evening last, the object of which will be seen from the following placard, by which it was convened:

"FAIR TRADE" VERSUS FREE TRADE.

"He had not received any remuneration against this reduction from the silk trade itself. If Coventry, or Leek, or Macclesfield had been so, they had intelligence and courage enough to resist this reduction."—Sir Robert Peel's speech on the proposed reduction of the silk duties, March 16.

"This is the challenge I offer; show me one relaxation—show me one removal of protective duties that has not contributed to the welfare of the producer."—Sir Robert Peel's speech, February 16.

"Men of Macclesfield.—The above challenge has remained too long unanswered, we have already experienced some of the benefits of this new tariff, we have received what may be called the 'first instalment' in our empty looms and threatened reduction of wages. Let us answer the challenge of Sir Robert Peel, and let us prove that we have 'courage' enough to tell him that we have a right to have a protection for our property—our labour. For this purpose a public meeting will be held on Park Green, Monday, May 11th, 1846, at 7 o'clock in the evening, when Mr. J. West, and Mr. J. Leach, of Manchester, will attend and address the meeting; and a petition against Sir Robert Peel's measures will be submitted for your adoption. Silk manufacturers and weavers are invited to attend, and the Anti-Corn Law League, their friends, or agents, are challenged to public discussion! as every opportunity will be afforded to all parties to express their sentiments on this important question."

The hour of meeting was seven o'clock, and when the business commenced, shortly before half-past seven, there were not less than two or three thousand persons present, and ultimately the crowd around the hustings amounted to nearly double that number. The show of hands being in favour of the motion that Mr. John Stubbs should preside, that gentleman took the chair, and commenced the proceedings by a brief speech.

Mr. WEST opened the discussion by remarking that it might be said the silk weavers of Macclesfield had been somewhat tardy in coming forward to protest against the Government measure, which took away a portion of the protection hitherto enjoyed by their trade. The fault of the delay was not altogether theirs. A correspondence had been opened by some of them with Mr. Brocklehurst, M.P., eight or nine weeks ago, when the advice of that gentleman was given against a public meeting, it being his opinion that any opposition on their part to the proposed silk duties, might stir up the Lancashire manufacturers to a counter agitation, the result of which might be the abolition of all import duties on silk. This, he (Mr. West) thought was very unsatisfactory reasoning, and he considered that the weavers had as good a right to have and express an opinion as Mr. Brocklehurst. They had now begun to feel the bitter effects of the alteration of the duties, in actual or proposed reductions of wages; and, therefore, at the eleventh hour, they had determined to come forward to meet the challenge of Sir Robert Peel, to show that the reduction of protective duties was injurious to their trade. Mr. West asserted that a reduction of wages would be the inevitable effect of the more intense competition with France, which they were now called upon to maintain. In many branches of the silk manufacture the French could manufacture cheaper than the English, and he would adduce satins as an example. He had been shown a piece of French satin by a manufacturer, who told him that the like could not be produced in Macclesfield at less than 3d. or 4d. a yard higher than the price charged for the French article. Our inability to compete with the French, and the consequent reduction of wages to be anticipated from the diminution of protection, were the main points insisted on by Mr. West, though he also dwelt at some length on the general view of the Free Trade question, maintaining that the universal cheapness which Sir Robert Peel's measures were intended to produce, would not benefit the silk-weaver, but the contrary, if, as he firmly believed, they would tend to a great reduction in his wages. He would tell his fellow-workmen that if they did not oppose this measure, they would repent when it was too late; and if they were so foolish, he, for his part, would not feel it his duty to stand forward, as he had done formerly, to defend them from an evil which they had brought upon themselves for want of timely resistance. The effects of the change were already felt in the depression of their trade, and in an actual proposal for the reduction of wages. Mr. West concluded by proposing a resolution condemnatory of the policy of the Government, especially as applied to the silk manufactures. (cheers). The resolution was seconded from the body of the meeting.

Mr. FALVEY, who was received with cheers, said he had been over on a visit to Macclesfield, when the placard called the present meeting, and inviting discussion, had attracted his attention as he passed along the street on Sunday morning, and that was the first intimation of it which he had received. It had been his intention to return to Manchester on Monday (that day), but on seeing the placard, he at once resolved to accept the challenge it contained, and therefore he now stood before them to oppose the resolution now submitted to them by Mr. West. Mr. Falvey commenced by referring to his connection with Macclesfield, and the deep interest he felt in its prosperity. He would not advocate measures which he thought would be injurious to Macclesfield, but he considered that the Government policy, now under discussion, would be advantageous instead of being detrimental to its interests, as had been asserted by Mr. West. He was borne out in this view of the subject by the opinions expressed by many of the silk manufacturers themselves. He had that day met with Mr. Potts, whom they would all admit to be an excellent master, and one who paid as high as in Macclesfield, and he had told him that he would prefer the Government measure of 15 per cent. duty to the present state of things when the nominally high duty was so much evaded by means of smuggling. Mr. Falvey said he would mention that as his opinion at the meeting, when Mr. Potts gave him full authority to do so. Mr. Falvey also mentioned that many other manufacturers in Macclesfield entertained the same view. He advised them to beware of being led away by Mr. West's predictions as to the reduction of wages. Jonathan Martin predicted that York Cathedral would be burned, and that the prediction might not go unfulfilled, he had at last put the torch to it himself (hear, hear). It was a somewhat suspicious circumstance that the present proposal to reduce wages was being made by a protectionist instead of a Free Trade firm, and that Mr. West should have been selected as the negotiator of the matter between them and the operatives (hear, hear). He contradicted Mr. West's assertion that the people of this country were unable to compete with the French in the manufacture of silks, and warned them against the folly of proclaiming their belief in their own inferiority by the vote of that evening. By doing so they were virtually inviting the manufacturers to reduce their wages. Mr. West ought to have produced the cheap French satins with which he had frightened them, and thus enabled them to compare them with those of their own manufacture. He (Mr. Falvey) would tell them that they were not equal in quality to the satins manufactured in Macclesfield, and that in plain heavy goods of every description we could beat the French. In some of the lighter fancy articles, the French, through their superiority in the arts of design, might have the advantage of us. But even in regard to these, the difficulty of competition could not be so very great, seeing that Coventry, which depended principally on the ribbon trade, and other light fancy articles, and which had a very large constituency, embracing a great proportion of the working classes, sent two Free Trade members to Parliament (hear, hear, hear). As to the depression alluded to by Mr. West, and paraded by him as a proof of the alleged ruinous tendency of Sir R. Peel's measures in regard to their trade, they all knew that that depression was not confined to the silk trade. Business of every kind throughout the country was paralysed, in consequence of the suspense in which the country had been so long held through the bigoted and obstinate opposition of the protectionists to the passing of Sir R. Peel's Corn Bill and Tariff. In Manchester several thousands of hand-loom cotton weavers were out of employment in consequence of this stagnation. But it was not from Free Trade, but for the want of it, that the people were now suffering (cheers). He felt confident that, instead of falling off, the trade of Macclesfield, as well as that of other manufacturing towns, would become more flourishing than ever they had seen it, when Sir R. Peel's measure came into full operation. These are only a few of the leading points of Mr. Falvey's speech, which was listened to throughout with deep attention, and frequently cheered, to the great chagrin, we believe, of the protectionist party, who had persuaded themselves that he would meet with a different reception in a direct appeal to the working men of Macclesfield. Mr. Falvey concluded by proposing the following amendment to Mr. West's resolution:

"That we entirely approve of the commercial policy propounded by her Majesty's Government, and especially of the great and comprehensive measure for the total abolition of the Corn Laws."

Mr. LEACH, from Manchester, replied to Mr. Falvey in a rambling speech, which was more declamatory than argumentative, and which appealed to the feelings rather than to the reason of the people. Some idea of the staple of it may be drawn from the fact that Mr. Leach condescended to retell the hundred-times-repeated joke of the Irishman, who boasted that he could buy potatoes for a penny in Ireland which cost him sixpence in this country, but who confessed that the sixpence was easier got in England than the penny was in Ireland! He met the assertion of Mr. Falvey in regard to the hand-loom weavers of Lancashire, who were out of employment, by pointing to the increase of cotton-spinning and weaving factories which had taken place within the last few years. The deplorable condition of Ireland was appealed to, as an illustration of the working of Free Trade. The Irish, in following out the principles of Free Trade, sent over to this country those provisions which ought to be kept at home, for the subsistence of their own miserable people, and the same principle would equally apply to other places. He held that it was wrong to take away the calico from Lancashire, or the woollens from Yorkshire, so long as the inhabitants of these places were in want of a shirt, or a pair of blankets. Mr. Leach also complained bitterly of the suffering inflicted on a race of weavers in India, who had been ruined by the competition of English manufacturers. According to Mr. Leach, one country or province ought not to interfere with another in that way, but he did not explain how the innumerable links, which already connect all countries, and render them dependent on each other, were to be severed in pursuance of his new system. He dilated on the toils and privations endured by the working classes in this country, which none denied; but he did not condescend to propose to the meeting any plan of his own which would be more effectual than Free Trade, as a remedy for the awful state of things produced by a long perseverance in monopoly. Mr. Leach concluded by exhorting the meeting to vote for Mr. West's resolution, and sat down amidst the cheers of a portion of the meeting.

Mr. JOSEPH EDWARDS, a silk weaver, seconded Mr. Falvey's amendment. He said that from the style in which they had been addressed by the speakers on the other side, one would be induced to conclude that the operatives of this country had flourished under what was misnamed protection, but they all knew that the reverse of it was the case, and even Mr. Leach's speech itself proved as much. He considered the question of wages, in its connection with Free Trade, was very simple. The price of labour, like that of everything else, was regulated by the demand for it, and Free Trade, by increasing the demand for labour, had a necessary tendency to raise wages. This was the general view of the question, looking to the trade of the country at large, and this general result could not fail to affect Macclesfield, which depended mainly on the home demand, and was, therefore, deeply interested in the prosperity of the country. After delivering a speech full of sound reasoning, Mr. Edwards concluded by seconding the resolution.

Mr. S. BENTON made a few remarks which, though on the side of protection, were delivered in a very calm and reasonable style. He doubted the correctness of the statements and the arguments that were advanced by the Free Trade party as to the large quantity of French silks smuggled into this country. Were the amount as large as was stated, they would often hear of seizures of silk goods by the custom-house officers. He had heard that remark made by a Member of Parliament to Lord Dalhousie, in an interview held by his lordship with a deputation from the silk trade.

As it was now half-past 9 o'clock, the meeting, which had kept well together, notwithstanding the increasing darkness, began to be impatient for a division. The Chairman, therefore, proceeded to put the question to the vote with great clearness and deliberation, stating that the vote on Mr. Falvey's amendment, approving of the Government measures, would be first taken. Having called on all who approved of that amendment to hold up both hands, the number which were instantly raised, left no doubt as to the issue. The numbers held up for the original motion, according to the statement of parties who had a commanding view of the far-extending crowd, did not amount to more than a third or fourth of those who voted for the amendment. The Chairman declared the amendment carried, which announcement was received with cheers.

THE BUILDING TRADES' STRIKE.

(From the Times.)

BIRMINGHAM, WEDNESDAY EVENING.—The strike of the operatives of the building trade, carpenters and bricklayers, in this town, may, as far as present appearances go, be said to have virtually terminated to-day. The meeting of the masters at Newton-in-the-Willows, on Thursday last, has not been without its effect on the men, although it must be admitted, as subsequent proceedings prove, that the adherence of the masters on that occasion to the declaration required by them to be signed by the men, produced an unfavourable impression against the builders. So soon as it became evident, after the proceedings of the conference at Newton, that the masters were resolved to resist the strike, and were determined, at all hazards of loss and inconvenience, to close business rather than submit to the demands of the operatives, it became manifest that owing partly to the exhausted state of the union funds, and the dissatisfaction of many of the unionists themselves, but more especially to the disagreement which had arisen between the carpenters and bricklayers, that some mode of arrangement must be adopted. Accordingly the mayor of Birmingham (Mr. H. Smith) was requested to interpose his kind offices, and that gentleman, without loss of time, in the most friendly and conciliatory spirit, sought an interview with the heads of the principal building establishments in Birmingham. The result of the mayor's interviews with these gentlemen at first appeared extremely doubtful: but on Monday evening a meeting of the master builders (at which Mr. S. Briggs presided) took place at the Acorn Temple, in Temple-street. A deputation from the men attended, and as a matter of course considerable discussion ensued. Reporters were not present; but it may be stated, upon the best authority, that while the employers expressed themselves upon all occasions inclined to listen to the reasonable claims of those they employed, they were determined to resist the "unreasonable" and "tyrannical authority" of "Unionists," whether for "a diminution of time or a disproportionate rise of wages." Still, as was admitted by many masters present, they could not altogether justify the "declaration" they had required to be signed by the men previously to taking them back to their employ. The declaration referred to, and which received the sanction of the Newton meeting, was as follows:

"We the undersigned do hereby declare that we are not, or will not remain members of any trades' unions, or of other societies under whatever designation they may be known, which have for their objects any interference with the rights of labour, or with the arrangements that may be entered into between employers and workpeople."

"And we further declare that we will not appropriate, and, as far as we are able, will not permit to be appropriated for the purpose of supporting a turn-out here or elsewhere amongst the building branches, or otherwise, any sum or sums of money belonging to any sick, burial, or other society, which has been established for benevolent purposes only."

The Birmingham masters on Monday night, as before intimated, doubted the policy of requiring subscription to the above declaration, and the more especially as it was contended that the press of the country had denounced it as unjust, and likely to injure rather than benefit the cause of free and uncontrolled labour. In fact, according to the opinion of more than one influential builder, it was placing the masters in a wrong position, and so far from enlisting the sympathies of the public in their favour was likely to excite them in favour of the unionist turn-outs. In accordance with this feeling the meeting at the Acorn came to the following resolution, which was placarded through the town this morning:

"It was resolved, that in order to convince the workmen engaged in the building departments, and the public generally, of the disposition of the employers to meet the views of their men, in a fair spirit, that the written declaration lately submitted be withdrawn, and that they may merely be requested to declare that they do not support any branch of the building trade that is at present 'out on strike' for an advance of wages."

"May 11." "JAMES DAVIES, Secretary pro. tem."

After the adoption of these resolutions the masters assembled intimated to the deputation of workmen in attendance (understood to be from the carpenters), that upon such a verbal declaration they were willing to receive them back into their employ at the old rate of wages (4s. per day), leaving for future consideration any addition they might be disposed to make to men whom they deemed entitled to increased remuneration for their labour. There seems to be a prevailing opinion that while some of the journeymen carpenters, in consequence of their superior handicraft are deserving of a higher rate of wages than at present paid, there are others, who, at the present time, are receiving more than their workmanship merit. According to the present scale there is no distinction—skill and industry receive no higher remuneration than the opposite of those qualifications.

The deputation expressed themselves, individually, as satisfied with the terms proposed by the masters, but as they had no authority from their brother workmen to conclude any arrangement, they left the Acorn without expressing any conclusive determination.

It ought, however, to be observed, that as regarded the bricklayers, the masters made no proposals. They caused the strike, requiring an additional 6d. per day, and it is left for them to make what arrangements they best can to resume their work. From the carpenters they will now receive little or no support. A quarrel in Birmingham, at least, has taken place between the two bodies, and the bricklayers will be left to take their own course.

The "strike," however, may, as before observed, be considered as at an end. The unionists had a meeting at the "Odd Fellows' Hall" yesterday, and at many of the large works in the town and neighbourhood work was resumed this morning. At the extensive establishment of Messrs. Branstone and Gwyther, a firm who employ several hundred of workpeople, in London, Crewe, Birmingham, and other parts of the country, 50 out of about 100 carpenters employed in this town returned to the shop and pursued their former avocations, and there is no doubt that many more would have done the same, but anxious not to take an active part in the strike, in fact, altogether inimical to it, many of the workmen had, in prospect of its long continuance, gone to visit their friends at a distance until its termination.

"It should be mentioned that, although the carpenters' 'strike' is thus, at least for a time, at an end, a great portion of the workmen expect an advance of wages, and it is hoped that the masters, many of whom are pursuing a prosperous business, will not forget the deserving."

To Mr. Smith, the mayor, great credit is due for his kind conduct as amicus curiæ.

FALL OF MANNA IN TURKEY.—The Courier de Constantinople communicates the interesting news of a rain of manna having fallen at Yenishbehir, by which the inhabitants of that place have been plentifully supplied with food in the form of a hazel nut, but capable of being ground into meal. A kilo of it is sold there for twelve piastres, while the bread prepared from this mysterious product of heaven is said to be most excellent.

CORRESPONDENCE.

14, Octagon, Plymouth, 11th May, 1846.

MY DEAR SIR,—I was much pleased with Mr. Smith's letter on the cultivation of the cane and manufacture of sugar, inserted in the LEAGUE of the 9th inst., and as a companion to it I send you a letter by a Tobago planter, addressed to the Editor of the Tobago Chronicle, and dated on the 29th of August, 1845, which not only corroborates Mr. Smith's statements but even goes beyond them. It is abundantly clear, from the statements of both writers, that the blacks are as ready to work as any other people when they receive fair wages for their work, and are assured of honest payment. The object of immigration is not to supply any deficiency of labour, but to overstock the labour market, and thus bring down the rate of wages. It is an aggravated form of slavery under the disguise of a new name, and without its legal responsibilities. It is a renewal of the slave trade at the expense of the resident labourers, and for which they have to thank those mistaken friends who imagine they best serve the cause of freedom by giving free-labour (?) produce a preference in the British markets.

I now remain, my dear sir, yours, faithfully,
A. W. PAULTON, Esq. WILLIAM HAMILTON.

PROFITS OF SUGAR CULTIVATION IN THE WEST INDIES.

To the Editor of the Tobago Chronicle and Royal Gazette.

SIR,—Since the period of freedom, almost every planter in this island has bitterly complained of the ruinous returns of his sugar cultivation, and it is seldom I have spoken with any parties on the subject of our prospects but they look to me for sympathy in their want of prosperity; and not a few thought proper to remark that, within six months of the period of my purchase of Arno's Vale Sugar Plantation (it was placed in my possession on the last day of February, 1844), there would not be a cane or labourer on that estate. To show how utterly mistaken my kind friends have been in their prognostications, I beg leave, through your columns, to lay before my neighbours the accompanying debtor and creditor account for the crop just shipped, which I pledge myself to be correct. Up to the 18th October, 1844, I employed a manager, but, I thank God, I find myself capable of managing my own affairs, and can do better without one. I am also my own attorney, and my own book-keeper, all which, in these times, is important to a renter or proprietor, as it saves a few hundred pounds per annum, in one shape or other, and makes a man master of his own business, and prevents his falling into expensive and, it may be, indifferent hands. An experienced planter estimates my ensuing (1846) crop at upwards of 100 hhds.; but I calculate upon 90 hhds.; which (seasons permitting) will be an increase of 10 hhds. upon 1845 crop; and mark! my expenses will be less. I recommend proprietors at home to rent their plantations. An industrious renter on the spot would be, in these difficult times, deeply interested in the soil, and in the welfare of the labouring class; would exert every means to improve the capabilities of the property; and, by being frugal at all ends, might reap a fair remuneration for his hard services. But it is evident to all who dare to speak out, that proprietors resident in Europe, employing multifarious agents both at home and in the colonies, may expect, on poor estates nothing but ruin, and on the very best, but little short of it. The maximum of my wages is 8d. per diem. I have 110 people on my pay list, constantly engaged; and, instead of Arno's Vale being abandoned, I refused, in the past month, the aid of no less than 12 effective labourers. In writing this letter I do not mean anything offensive to any man or set of men, but I think it time to speak the bare truth, and put down the malignant observations that are occasionally hurled at those who are as independent as your most obedient servant.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Birmingham, May 13, 1846.

SIR,—I have read with much interest your remarks on what fell from me at a recent meeting on the subject of abridging the hours of labour, and beg to thank you for the very friendly, as well as candid, spirit by which they are distinguished. I wish, however, to correct what seems to me to be a misapprehension on your part as to the particular aim of my observations. I concur entirely in your views, both as to the ultimate beneficial effects of Free Trade, and as to its certain and early triumph over the mistaken policy of protection. I therefore hail the changes advocated by the present Government as measures of infinite value and importance. But I hold that, even when these are carried, much will still remain to be done before the industrious classes can reap the full advantage of their skill and patient toil, in the attainment of that legitimate share of rest and leisure which all the discoveries of modern science and all the aids of improved art, as applied to agriculture and manufactures, have hitherto failed to secure to them. The laws by which the weight of our heavy taxation may be equitably apportioned—the laws which, under a sound and natural system, regulate the distribution of that wealth which is due to the exertions of the producing classes—are yet, I think, imperfectly understood, or only partially acknowledged. So long as this is the case,—so long as an artificial and erroneous system takes the place of those natural laws, so long, in my opinion, may there be need for artificial restraints and legislative interference to protect those who can so ill protect themselves—the overtaken women and children of this overworked country.

These are the views to which my observations were meant to refer. Whether they be just, or otherwise, is a question, with the discussion of which I have no right to occupy your valuable space. I write to offer an explanation of words which I conceive you to have misunderstood; and to that explanation I wish strictly to confine myself.

I am, Sir, your obliged and faithful servant,
WM. SCHOLEFIELD.

THE SHORT TIME BILL.—A letter addressed by Mr. J. Eccles, a well known cotton spinner and manufacturer of Blackburn, to the editor of the Blackburn Standard, gives an account of the results of an experiment made by him, similar to those made by Messrs. Horrocks, Miller, and Co., and by Mr. Greg:—"I find that the result of my late trial of working 11 in place of 12 hours is exactly the same as that of Messrs. Horrocks, Miller, and Co., of Preston; and also of Messrs. Greg, of Bollington; say a loss of 7½ per cent. of work. Now I am bound to say that this is a much greater loss than I expected, or than I was led to believe would be the result both from past experience (as referred to in my former letter) and from the conviction of those in my employ who were desirous of trying the plan. I may explain to you that my machinery is now all on the self-acting principle, and is, consequently, moved by the steam-engine, and, therefore, is much less dependent on manual labour than the hand mules; and it was to these I had reference in my former address. It is well known that the cost and fixing of self-acting mules is nearly, if not quite, double that of hand-mules; and they dispense with what will be acknowledged by all persons conversant with the matter the most arduous employment in cotton mills. The loss in spinning was greater than in weaving; but in consequence of starting some new looms, and altering others at the time, I could not draw a fair comparison of the difference." The results of Mr. Eccles's experiment are the more important, as he is well known to be decidedly favourable to a diminution of the hours of labour; and because, as may be gathered from his letter, he was of opinion, previously to his experiment, that no material diminution of produce would arise from the abridgment of the time of working.—Manchester Guardian.

FACTS FOR THE MONOPOLISTS.—Facts are continually transpiring which prove the groundlessness of the prediction, that Free Trade will ruin the agriculturist. At all the markets in the north of England, the prices of all kinds of stock have for some time been inconveniently high; and this description applies to the sales by auction which have taken place throughout Northumberland at the May term, just past. Horses, which were last year scarcely saleable at any price, now realise twice the sum then asked; lean cattle are bought with avidity at good prices; and the demand for sheep greatly exceeds the supply. To show that this general account is not exaggerated, we will narrate more particularly the prices given at the sale of Mr. Johnson's stock, at Chillingham Newton, near Wooler, on Thursday last. The short-horned cows averaged about 45l. each, some bringing nearly 70 guineas; bulls ranged from 30 to nearly 90 guineas; the best one fetching 90l. 10s. and a year old bull 51l. 10s. The two year old queys averaged from 41l. to 42l., the one year olds within a trifle of 30l., and the calves between 15l. and 17l. Draught horses averaged 36l., the best selling at 50 guineas. Tups and tup hogs sold for 16 or 17 guineas, and ewes and lambs for four guineas. Surely these are prices high enough to cheer the heart of the most desponding protectionist. We cannot believe that, with these facts before them, the Dukes of Richmond and Cleveland will again venture to talk of the "alarmed agriculturist," still less of "the ruined farmer;" for it is deserving of remark, that though several foreign breeders and dealers were present, they failed, with only one exception, to outbid our native breeders. This proves that our farmers do not mean to abandon stock breeding as a hopeless attempt to compete with foreigners. But Mr. Johnson's farm supplies a still more "telling" fact. The new tenant, we are informed, has taken it at an advance of rent, over that paid by Mr. Johnson, of no less than 300l. a year. And this with a certainty of Free Trade! It is gratifying to know that our agricultural labourers participate in this prosperity. At the hirings held here and at Morpeth, last week, both male and female farm servants were engaged readily at advanced wages. We leave our readers to draw their own conclusions.—Newcastle Advertiser.

At the last meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society, Mr. Fuller, M. P. transmitted from the Rev. James Williams one of the potato-eye scoops used in North Wales, along with a statement of his experience in the improvement in the bulk of the potato as food after the extraction of the eye, around which the development of the vegetative principle being the strongest, the removal of such portion along with the eye removes, in his opinion, the cause of that "strong" flavour found in the potato at this season of the year.

A BROTHERLY COMPLIMENT.—"OCTOBER 10th, 1688.—Up, to walk up and down the garden with my father, to talk of our concerns; about a husband for my sister, whereof there is at present no appearance; but we must endeavour to find her one now, for she grows old and ugly."—Pepys.

PASSAGES FROM THE LIFE OF AN ENGLISH FARMER.

PASSAGE I: Indicating what kind of man he was.

Mr. Hurst took a hammer from his pocket and a nail; and when he had closed the gate of the Wellburn field, he drove the nail into the post above the latch. He then tried to lift the latch, and could not; and then he shook the gate with his arm outstretched, and it was firm. After that, he took the faggots of thorn which old Adam had cut from the hedge with his bill-hook, and warped them into the bars of the gate—the rough heads undermost, to keep out the pigs. When all was finished, he looked across the field, and said the second week of May was late to sow barley; still, if it pleased God, they might have a good crop even yet.

And old Adam said, "Ees, master, an' it please God."

Mr. Hurst then bade Adam go home with him to the farmhouse. Whereat, when they arrived, the other men of the farm who held the ploughs, and the lads who drove the ploughs, and the head carter, and the threshers, and the shepherd, were all seated in the kitchen on the forms around the large table. And Mrs. Hurst had put bread on the table and beer, and the round of beef, and the cold chine of pork, and the cheese; and Mr. Hurst said he was glad to see it all ready, and bade the men begin. It had always been his custom, and the custom of his father and grandfather, in Berryhill farm, to give God thanks and the men their supper at the end of seed-time and harvest; and he would not, he said, let the custom go down, if he could keep it up. Yet this might be the last seed-time they would all see in Berryhill together. The great event which had just happened, and which they were all to be engaged in, the last duties of to-morrow might bring about changes on the Berry estate which none there assembled would like to see.

All of them said they hoped nothing would happen to put Mr. Hurst out of Berryhill farm; or if they did not all say so, they looked as if they would have all said so had it been necessary for all to speak. Even the boys who drove the teams at plough, and scared the birds from the seed corn, seemed as if they would have said they hoped Mr. Hurst would never go out of Berryhill, had not their mouths been so full of bread and meat that they could not speak. Old Adam said he remembered that time one-and-fifty years as if it had been yesterday, when the last event of the kind happened, and that was the year before Mr. Hurst was born, and he was not sure but there was barley in the Wellburn field that very year.

And then he reckoned how many times he had known barley in that field; how many times he had mown it, and how often it had been reaped; and how many bushels an acre he had known on it in the best years; and what was the price of barley in those years, and what the price of wheat; and when wheat was at a certain price, what bread was at a gallon. And Mr. Hurst told what he had made per acre from that field, after paying the rent and all charges, in some years when it was barley, and some years when it was wheat. And the shepherd told of the ewes with two lambs, and these lambs he had seen in that field when it was grass. And the ploughman said they had never turned up soil and harrowed in seed in better order than the soil was that day. And Mr. Hurst said, that to their credit he must say the ridges had never been more neatly finished off, and the water furrows drawn more evenly and expeditiously in any field on Berryhill farm since he had known it as had been done in the Wellburn that day. And the two young men who drew the water furrows in the ridges after they had been sown and harrowed, were so pleased to hear their master speak of their work in such a measure of praise, that tired as they were, they would have gone out on that instant and furrowed up twenty fields if the work had been required, and never have felt the shadow of discontent upon them. They would have done anything to please Mr. Hurst, and one another—run a race, leaped the hurdles, danced a hornpipe, or sung a song; and they were so near the singing point of good fellowship, that Mr. Hurst, perceiving it, said "No, not on this occasion. We have always had a song on such nights as this before; but the solemn and mournful duty we shall be all engaged in to-morrow must forbid singing and jollity to-night."

And then, speaking of what was to be done to-morrow, he said the horses not wanted to go in the procession would be turned into the meadow to grass. Diamond and Dick, the two black nags, would be taken to Crookley Down, to join the procession; and as Adam was old, and not able to walk as he once could, he had better get the second riding saddle and put it on Rosy, and ride. But Adam said he would not ride. Mr. Hurst pressed on him that for his own comfort he should do so. But Adam said no, it would trouble him too much to get on and off; he was too old to ride. Besides, the nobles and the gentry would be all riding, on horses or in coaches; no, he would not ride; he would walk on foot. He had walked on foot on the last occasion of the kind, this time one-and-fifty years, and he would walk now.

Whereupon, Mr. Hurst said they would, in that case, turn Rosy into the meadow, with the other horses. And he soon after bade them all good night, and reminded them that to-morrow would soon be here. Upon which the men departed, and went to their own houses; and agreed as they went that the sky looked as if to-morrow would be a fine day.

PASSAGE II: Foreshadowing a change.

The morning of to-morrow came, and it came early. It had no mountains of clouds to climb over to make it late; no fogs to wade through, to make it ill-humoured and out of countenance. It came overflowing with the joy of the year's youthfulness. It came hand-in-hand with young summer; not the full-grown, full-dressed, blooming June, but with May in her girlhood—fairy-footed, happy, romping young May. On her head were the first of the forest leaves, and sprigs of budding hawthorn, from the hedge-rows. Around her feet were the flowers that childhood loves—the field-daisies, and the cowslips. She tripped along the copse-wood sides, where the cowslips grow, and stood on tiptoe and looked into birds' nests. She found the diligent thrush on her warm eggs, and dried the dew from her back, and bade her mate sit on the next bough and sing to her, and make her happy. She bade the bees, that had not been with her since last year, come with her, and she would show them where blooming gardens were, and orchards. And the cherry blossoms that had slept all night in the darkness, and the dew, woke, and opened their eyes as infants do; and she kissed away their tears; and bade them, and the birds, and the bees, join all together, and bloom, and work, and sing. She found the young Forget-me-not, infant of its race, and she embraced it, welcomed it to the world, and called it pretty. The primroses, then growing old, and the daisies, that are never old, she found on the grassy margin of the farm fields, where horses, and ploughs, and heavy-footed men had trampled and crushed them; and she lifted their bruised heads and healed them, and made them look up and bloom as if they had never been trodden on.

Wherever she set her young foot and breathed her sweet breath, deadness came to life, and age took upon itself a new youth. So frolicsome was she that she would touch the log, felled last winter, that had neither root nor branch, but which lay at the carpenter's shop to be sawn into boards, and even it would put out buds and leaves. Not even the despised turnip, from the farm-fields, which had fallen into the winter ditch, and was there abandoned as too worthless to be recovered, did she despise and think too mean. She touched it; and it felt the hand of life upon it, and put forth its feeble shoot to lay hold of that hand. And it grew in strength, and raised itself higher and higher every day, until it burst forth in bloom, as if in gratitude and praise to the Author of all life, whose summer angel had come upon the earth and had not overlooked even it, the lowliest and the lost.

Early as the morning came, Mr. Hurst and his men came forth from bed as soon. The horses not to be used that day were turned out, for the first time that year, to grass; and the very oldest of them, even old Captain, who could hardly reach a slow trot on other days, snorted and threw up his hind-heels, and lay down and tumbled, and got up again and cantered, so pleased was he with liberty and the first day of summer grass. As for the younger nags, they careered at the gallop to the farthest end of the meadow, below Berry turnpike and up again, and into the river itself. And the ass followed them routing with delight; and the cows, always sober and disposed to graze peacefully at that time of the morning, raised their tails and hobbled after the ass and the slowest of the horses. And the geese with their goslings, and the old drake, waddled to the meadow and cackled and ate grass, though it was ordered they were not to go there; and the sows and the young pigs went too, and gave much trouble to the boys who were sent to bring them back again.

And the boy Adam, grandson of old Adam, was out at the Wellburn field as early as any bird of the morning, to keep the rooks and the wood pigeons from the barley-seed sown yesterday. And never had rooks to contend with a more vigilant watcher of a newly-sown field; for this was young Adam's first day at working for wages. All the work he had done before had been voluntary, and paid for by a hunch of bread and cheese. Now he was hired, and this was his beginning. Not a rook alighted nor came within sight of him, even on wing, but he shouted to it. And he not only walked round and round the field—he sometimes ran; and though he more than once asked himself what he was running for, he ran again, he was so light-spirited, and so pleased to be working for wages. He knew the squire was dead; but if he had been made squire in his stead he could not have been more happy than he was at being advanced to earn fourpence-halfpenny a-day, and to have his dinner in a bag with him, to eat it in the field, at whatever hour he chose. He knew all the people were going to meet the squire's funeral coming from London, at Crookley Down, or that those who did not go to Crookley Down to meet it would go to the top of Morton-hill, to see it coming, and that Morton-hill was three miles away, and that nobody would be left within that space of three miles but himself. Still he was pleased, even to be left alone, because he had been told that the care of everything on the farm had been left to him.

And by the hour before mid-day not a human being but himself was left on three miles of country between Berryhill farm and Morton hill—all had gone to meet the squire's funeral coming from London. But long before that hour, the rooks had discovered that the watcher of the seed corn had nothing more formidable to keep them off than his loud voice and a stone thrown at them if they came near enough, and which stone they could avoid, and still pick up the seed.

And they did pick up the seed, and the solitary watcher could not prevent them; but at last they flew away, one after the other, until only two were left, and everything around him was silent, and he almost wished that those two would not go away. But first one of them, and then the other, flapped its wings, and rose into the air, and circled round him, and went away and left him alone. And the shining sun had also gone, and the south was black. Morton-hill had its darkly-wooded north side towards him, and it was black. Everything was still, not a chirrup of a bird was heard, and he thought he felt the shadow of the dark woodlands of Morton-hill, and of the black clouds above them, falling upon him, and going into him, and taking all the pleasant thoughts that were in his mind, and turning them upside down, and making them horrid and fearful. One of these fearful thoughts was, that this might be the last day; that everybody and everything was perhaps dying or dead, and nobody left in the world but himself; that the whole world was putting on black to go to its own funeral!

There was a tree; he would go up into that tree and look all round, and see if there was any living or moving thing within sight. And he did so, and almost fell from the tree with fear when he saw the white roads in the valley below him covered with a moving black line of people, and horses and coaches more than a mile in length.

It was the squire's funeral; and as it moved on, the darkness of the sky grew deeper, and the air became denser and hotter, and more silent and solemn, until about the time when the coffin was laid in the family vault of the old Abbey; at which time there was not an unweeping eye in or near the Abbey grounds—for he had been a good squire, and many mourned for his death, and those who did not weep for grief wept because others did so—they could not restrain tears upon a sorrowing day, in sorrowing company.

The darkness of the sky grew deeper, the clouds came nearer, and pressed the hot thick air to the earth; and as the people turned from the death vault of the Abbey, and came out of the Abbey doors, the firmament seemed to have come down from its place in the heavens, and to stand upon the earth, and crowd into a heap the hearse and mourning coaches and black horses, and the horsemen and the foot people, as if it would suffocate them, and lay them all where they had been laying the squire's coffin.

Not one of them but expected to see every moment a flash of lightning followed by a burst of thunder. But there was no thunder. Drops of rain—slow, large, and uneven in their slow dropping—came down. Then they ceased. Then they began again, and once more ceased. And gusts of wind, that seemed to rise from the dead, came through the Abbey doors and made the plumes of the hearse flutter, and made weak women, and men weaker than women, think they saw ghosts upon the wing escaping among the trees by the chance of the Abbey vaults being open.

And the wind rose into conflict with the rain, and neither yielded to the other; both came on pouring and blowing, and the heat went as if it had never been a warm day, and left nothing but cold, and people shivering in the cold and the wet for the remainder of that day; or marvelling when they kindled good fires at home to warm and dry themselves, that the weather should have changed so unaccountably; or prophesying when they tried to warm and dry themselves, and could not become comfortable, that, "who could tell but this day was the forerunner of evil days to Berry estate!" The old told the young of such foreshadowing of changing fate, which they had heard of in their young days. And the young did not resist the prophecy.

And evil days to Berry estate did come, and to Berryhill Farm before long. But when we recount, as we may possibly do in a few other passages of Mr. Hurst's life, the causes that brought about those evil days, we shall see that the state of the weather at the old squire's funeral was not one of them, though the death of the squire was.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

THE "MARK LANE EXPRESS" AND FREE TRADE.—We noticed on Wednesday last, the leaning which the Mark Lane Express was beginning to show towards Free Trade opinions. In its number of Monday last, the bias is still more decided; indeed, its principal article would have been quite in character in a journal devoted to Free Trade. The writer says:

"It is passing strange that, despite the serious apprehensions of a considerable number, and the positive conviction of a great proportion of the agricultural body, that the proposed measures of the Government, if passed into law, will most materially affect the profits to be derived from the cultivation of the soil, there seems no lack of disposition to embark capital in the pursuit, that improved appliances are brought in aid with more earnestness than heretofore, and an increased vigour manifested incompatible with the dreary prospects that would seem to await the result of their labours. We are sensibly alive to the indomitable perseverance of our countrymen; we know that there are no men more brave, more resolute, more determined, or who will advance on a forlorn hope with more firmness and determination; but yet, forlorn though it be, there is even in that case a 'hope.' Must we then come to the conclusion that the British farmers are resolved to display in their peaceful occupation that spirit of determination to meet an ordeal which threatens ruin to themselves and families, entertaining still the 'hope' that the result may not be forlorn, but that they may surmount the difficulties and dangers which seem to await them? We conscientiously believe that such is the case with many of those who entertain serious apprehensions for the future. If such be the spirit of the British farmer, that tricked and deceived as he has been, he is prepared to exert his energies in the pursuit of his occupation, and that he is met by his landlord in such a manner as the exigencies of the times require, who can form an estimate of the probable produce of the soil of the United Kingdom?"

If, as the Mark Lane Express anticipates, the farmers are disposed to manifest a spirit of determination, in their struggle with their foreign competitors, we quite agree in the conclusion, that no one can form an idea of the prosperity to which agriculture may attain.

M. GUIZOT ON FREE TRADE.—The discussion on the commercial treaty between France and Belgium was resumed on Monday in the Chamber of Peers, and derived all its interest from a speech delivered by M. Guizot on his commercial policy, and which the honourable member wound up thus:

"Putting aside the legitimate interests of Free Trade, which I am far from disavowing, there are others which call for the attention of the Government. There is always at a given time a defined state in the capital employed in production, and in the same way a defined state of national labour. It is a serious act to cause disorder in a capital thus employed, either as regards its investments, or the use it is turned to: it is a serious act to cause disorder in the labour of production—to change it, or displace it. Numerous interests would suffer from it—interests which have as urgent a claim to protection as any others. The evil consequences would be still greater, as influential and political interests would be compromised."

"This is a question of public interest—one of those state questions which demands the undivided attention of a Government. I do not say this to reject in an absolute manner all change in the economical system; I do not mean to say that greater concessions must not be allowed to Free Trade than have already been conceded; I am far from thinking so; its end is an increase of intercourse between nations, the maintenance of the blessings of peace, and the establishing of that peace on a firm footing; but the first condition of this great work is to proceed generally, and not to strike a sudden blow in the established order of things, which, instead of being salutary, would cause disorder. This is an imperative duty of the Government—a part and parcel of all well-founded legitimate and healthy policy. And in the great example, so often quoted in the Chambers, and which is taking place at our very gates, you may be assured that this principle is much more respected than it seems to a first and superficial glance."

"Gentlemen, our commercial policy has not neglected any one of the great duties imposed upon it; it has acted in a liberal spirit, tending to remove the obstacles that separate nations; to facilitate and extend their commercial relations; to consolidate them by a general harmony so dear to all; such has ever been the aim of our commercial policy. But at the same time, as was its duty, it remained conservative, avoiding to occasion any disorder in the state of things actually established in the investment of capital and of the labour whence riches are derived. This was our duty, and we trust we have fulfilled it. We are convinced that any Government in its senses and any length of time in power, will feel, as we have felt, the imperious necessity of accomplishing it. This was the twofold idea which presided over all our acts of commercial policy, over the treaty now under discussion, as over the other treaties concluded between Sardinia and the kingdom of Naples, as over other commercial negotiations now pending. We do not mean to say that policy in general is a stranger to these transactions; we hold that national industry owes a tribute to national policy; but we at the same time deem it the duty of the Government to restrict this tribute within the smallest limits; to ward off from industry as well as from other great public interests, all disorder, all sudden change, which, being unexpected, might be fatal."

SODA.—When this article was "protected" by a duty its sale was unimportant. A first-rate grocer in a town like Leicester, for instance, would think 2 cwt. a large order to give a traveller at one time. Now, however, that the article is entirely exempted from duty, the same grocer ordered 10 tons' weight instead of 2 cwt. When it was proposed to take the duty off, the manufacturers of the article, like the landed interest with corn, petitioned against its removal, and predicted their own removal in consequence. So great, however, has been the demand for the article, that it is exported to nearly every part of Europe and to America, as well as to our colonies.—Leicester Chronicle.

DEFEND THE LABOURERS FROM PROTECTION.

It seems that the squires of Dorsetshire are determined to keep up their notoriety to the last. Known throughout Europe as the scandal of Britain, they persist in blazoning their shame in the House of Commons. Dorsetshire is the county in which, of all England, landlordism reigns supreme. The squirearchy dispose of the county representation at their will and pleasure. Game preserving is the rule of the county; good farming the exception, if it exists at all. The labouring population is said to be redundant, yet there is less capital, and a smaller number of hands employed to the acreage in farming the cultivated lands in Dorsetshire than in any other English county. What more need be said? Yet it must be added, that there are wide tracts of land, now in waste and woodland, which only require to be cultivated to give full employment to the labouring population. Moreover, if the Dorsetshire vales were to be completely drained, as they ought to be, the county would not produce labourers enough to do the work. Nor would there be any difficulty in finding farmers to farm Dorsetshire as well as Lincolnshire is farmed. But landlordism, surrounded by hosts of obsolete notions and fantastic prejudices, bearing in its heart the direst feelings of tyranny, forbids it; and, meanwhile, how fare the Dorsetshire labourers? Why, it was made a moot point in the House of Commons a few nights ago, by two protectionist Dorsetshire members, whether the average rate of wages for able-bodied men in Dorsetshire is 7s. or 7s. 6d. a week!!

It appears that the senior member for the county, Mr. G. Bankes, made the destitute condition of the Irish peasantry the ground of some attack on the policy of the Government—forgetful of the old proverb about those who live in glass houses—and drew down upon himself the retort that in his own county, and on his own estates, the destitution and degradation of the labouring classes might be stated as a parallel case to that of Ireland.

Mr. R. B. Sheridan, member for Shaftesbury, in Dorsetshire—a gentleman who seems to want the logical faculty of drawing conclusions from premises, who looks one way and goes another, argues against, and votes for, monopoly—had just published, in the Times, a correspondence between himself and the Poor Law Commissioners, with respect to the refusal of a Board of Guardians to give relief to an agricultural labourer, whom Mr. Sheridan thought to be entitled to it. Mr. Sheridan's letter was reprinted in THE LEAGUE of last week. The substance is this,—he was applied to by labourers in full employment to interfere on their behalf, that the men earned but 7s. a-week, out of which they had 1s. 6d. a-week to pay for rent, were compelled by their employers to take inferior grain at full market price, and paid at the rate of 9d. per acre for a bit of potato ground. Mr. Sheridan visited them, and found them at dinner on “boiled horse-beans and turnip-tops.” We do not know that any details can deepen the misery of such a picture, and it is beside our present purpose so to do. But there is one thing mentioned by the complaining labourers which distinctly marks the ordinary rate of Dorsetshire wages, namely that when at job-work, such as threshing, &c., the price is always so set that no more than 7s. a-week can be earned! That is a fact worth more as a guide to the rate of wages than all the assertions, general or particular, of all the landlords of the county.

Nevertheless, Mr. Floyer, one of the new members for Dorsetshire, freshly sent to Parliament to represent the monopolist landocracy of the county, ventured to charge Mr. Sheridan with the publication of falsehoods, and to deny that in Dorsetshire wages are so low as 7s. a week. Upon the third reading of Sir Robert Peel's Corn Bill, and immediately after the monopolist Marquis of Granby had based his defence of monopoly on the assumption that the wages of agricultural labourers vary with, and in proportion to, the price of corn, Mr. Sheridan came forward to correct the imputation on his own veracity. A few passages from that speech conclusively overturn the protectionist fallacies about rural wages, and place the Dorsetshire squires in no very favourable light before the public. Mr. Sheridan said:

“It would be in the recollection of the house that the noble lord the Secretary for Ireland, in reply to some observations made by the senior member for the county of Dorset (Mr. G. Bankes), suggested that the honourable member would be more properly occupied in comparing the agricultural condition of the peasantry in Dorsetshire than that of the peasantry in Ireland. With all respect to the honourable member, he must say he thought this was very sound and wholesome advice, and he hoped that the honourable member and his colleagues would take it into their consideration.”

He then adverted to Mr. Floyer's contradiction of his own statement, as to wages in Dorsetshire, and said that he had in consequence written to several persons in the county, clergymen, guardians of unions, and so forth. The Rev. Sidney Godolphin Osborne, whose full exposure of the destitute condition and miserable abodes of the Dorsetshire poor our readers will remember, in reply said:

“I have read with much astonishment the speech of Floyer. I send you a statistical return of the Blandford Union, made three years ago, and I believe it to be true in the present year. At the time it was made I was chairman of the union, and tested its truth myself. In 1843 something between one-seventh and one-eighth of the whole population were paupers. The average pay of the union—the best, I believe, in the county—did not, I believe, reach eight shillings a week, including carters.”

And the Rev. Mr. Scott, brother of a monopolist member of that name, replied:

“I do not understand Floyer's saying that he never knew wages so low as seven shillings a week, for I have known several instances of the kind, and if you are below the mark in stating seven shillings as the average amount of wages, it is only sixpence under the mark.”

Nor is that all. Mr. Floyer is the Chairman of the Dorchester Board of Guardians; and although he had week after week signed his name to the application book for relief, in which 7s. are constantly named as the ordinary weekly wages, yet he ventured to assert in the House of Commons that he did not know any case in which wages so low had been paid. Thus writes the relieving officer of the Dorchester Union to Mr. Sheridan:

“I believe that the average wages in my district does not exceed more than from 7s. to 7s. 6d. per week; and I think that the extract which I send fully bears me out in that opinion.”

He had been asked whether any labourers had received more than 8s. a week, and his answer was, “I cannot point to any case in my district.” After reading the extract sent by the relieving officer, Mr. Sheridan said:

“As to the district of the Blandford Union, the wages there were on the average 7s. a week. House rent was high, the cottages dilapidated and unhealthy, and fuel scarce and dear. In the Monkton district wages were 8s.; house-rent, 1s. to 1s. 6d., but for this large gardens were attached to the cottages. About Anderton the wages were 7s. About Hilton, 7s., with low house rent. About Milpoint 7s., with house rent from 1s. 6d. to 2s. About Spetsbury from 7s. to 8s., house rent from 1s. to 1s. 6d. About Howton 8s., house rent, 1s. About Kingston from 7s. to 8s., with high house rent. Here, however, the labourers had potato ground free. Fuel, however, was scarce and dear. About Strickland wages were from 7s. to 8s., house rent, from 1l. to 3l. per annum. About Felton the wages for single men were 6s., for married men 7s.; house rent was high.”

He afterwards said these low wages were not exceptional cases, but rather form the rule, and added:

“Now, in the name of heaven, how could a man be up to his work on horse-beans and turnip-tops? He stated, in his place in Parliament, that the labourers' cottages were so small, so dilapidated, and so crowded, that they engendered disease and immorality, that their wages were scandalously low, quite inadequate for the support of the labourer and his family. These were not his opinions alone, they were the opinions of the resident clergy and gentry in the neighbourhood, and they were also the opinions expressed at a public meeting at Stourminster, by the noble lord the late member for Dorsetshire, an expression of opinion which, as he (Mr. Sheridan) believed, had cost him his seat in that house. Now, it might be said, how could he, with these opinions—with these details staring him in the face—how could he, after the expression of his desire for the improvement of the labouring classes, have the courage to oppose the measure which the right honourable baronet had brought in?”

Yet, with singular inconsistency, Mr. Sheridan said he “did not see how the withdrawal of all protection would have the effect of improving the condition of the agricultural labourer.”

Is Mr. Sheridan incapable of reasoning? At all events, on his own showing, they cannot be worse off than at present; and he admits that “the repeal of the Corn Laws will give a stimulus to trade and cause an increased demand for labour.” Does he suppose that such effects will not operate on Dorsetshire? Or, perhaps, he thinks that the prejudices of landlordism in that county are such as to bar every kind of rural improvement? Badly as the Dorsetshire squires stand before the world, we do not believe they will long resist the tide of improvement in husbandry, which will set in with unrestricted trade, and that simply because their own interests will compel them to adopt a wiser course.

Yet, protectionist as he is, Mr. Sheridan completely overturns the plea for protection, founded on the interest it is pretended the labourers have in monopoly. He said:

“The noble lord opposite (Lord G. Bentinck) stated that the price of labour depended upon the price of corn. He did not agree with the noble lord in that—indeed, he thought that the question had been for ever set at rest. He maintained that in Dorsetshire wages never varied, whether wheat was 20l. or 10l. per load, and referred to a letter from a Dorsetshire labourer, complaining of the treatment experienced by his class at the hands of the farmers, who would not allow the labourer to earn more than 7s. a-week, which ‘made their lives bitter, and them to wish for the grave.’”

And again:

“He would remind the house that at this moment trade was flourishing and labour in demand; still he would venture his life that there had not been an increase in the wages of the Dorsetshire labourer; that now, when wheat was from 50s. to 60s. a quarter, the rate of remuneration to the agricultural labourer was the same as it had been last year, when wheat was 47s.”

When the Dorsetshire squires shall enable their tenants to improve their farms, by granting fair leases for long terms of years, without the reservation of game, then, and then only, will wages in Dorsetshire rise.

Mr. Floyer attempted to escape from his position:

“In his neighbourhood the common rate of wages was 7s. at the lowest, with a house free, a garden, some fuel, and a patch of potato ground—advantages which, taking the value of the house to be from 1s. to 2s. per week, might be estimated as raising the rate of wages to about 9s.”

Now, had this been true, the rate is scanty enough; but the truth is, the house-rent is usually, in ninety-nine cases out of every one hundred, paid by the Dorsetshire labourer out of his slender pittance of 7s. a-week. We say this advisedly, and upon the authority of those who have long known the wretched condition of the Dorsetshire peasantry. And we doubt whether the average is so high as 7s. a-week, for there are more able-bodied single men receiving less than that sum than the number of those who get 8s. And it must be remembered that the man who receives 8s. a-week is always carter, shepherd, or something of that sort, and gives extra labour fully equivalent to the additional weekly shilling.

However, refutation takes no effect on the monopolists. Facts seem to make no impression on their minds; for, notwithstanding the correction of a fellow monopolist, Mr. Miles with the utmost stolidity afterwards, during the same evening, asserted, “that protection was a system adapted to benefit the labourers!!!” How has the system of protection benefited the Dorsetshire labourers?

WHERE'S THE OBSTACLE TO GOOD HUSBANDRY?

There is something wrong somewhere in the farming business; else why are farmers alone, of all the industrious of the nation, unable to go alone? Why has it been said they must have “protection?” Why are they belaboured by every squire who gets a smattering of chemistry, and seeks to use it, like an alchemist, to convert his clods into gold, to uphold his rents?

But agricultural chemistry and scientific farming are not what farmers want. They must have something else first. Don't let us be misunderstood; we by no means depreciate the value of science in connection with husbandry. But it is of no use to talk about scientific farming to the yearly tenant, who incurs great hazard in undertaking even the most common improvements. We say advisedly, farmers are ready to farm with science and enterprise as soon as the landowners will let them.

Let the farmers look at the following description of their class, given by Mr. Cayley, the monopolist member for the North Riding of Yorkshire, and which he used as an argument for resisting the Government measure on the importation of corn:

“Mr. Ellis had been alluded to by the right hon. baronet, and portions of his evidence before the committee of 1826 quoted. He (Mr. Cayley) distinctly remembered the examination of Mr. Ellis (being one of the committee); but who was Mr. Ellis? He was a farmer and also a market gardener. Did the farmers of England consist of market gardeners? Were they all large farmers and men of education? Were they all of that class? No, they were not. They had risen from the labouring classes; many of them had been old servants in the employment of large landed proprietors, who looked forward with pleasure to the ultimate possession of a piece of land, and who eventually were enabled to obtain that possession, by investing the earnings of their earlier years. SUCH MEN COMPOSED, IN HIS OPINION, THE MAJORITY OF THE FARMERS OF ENGLAND; the exceptions were those who had large capital, and those who received a liberal education. It was the former class—the smock-frock farmers, he might call them—who would be most affected by a repeal of the Corn Laws."

Hear this, ye farmers of England! Look at the above picture of your class drawn by one of your protectionist "FRIENDS!" This is the condition to which the monopolist squires would, if they could, reduce you—a bettermost kind of upper servants.

We deny that farmers with little capital are benefited by monopoly; on the contrary, they have suffered more from it than farmers of ampler means; but it seems now confessed that it is to protect the "old servant" class of farmers that the community is to be afflicted by monopoly.

But away with such silly twaddlers as Mr. Cayley, and their nonsense about "old servant" farmers, and let us see what those who write and speak for the farmers, the real farmers of England, are writing and talking about. Now the Mark Lane Express is perhaps the most accurate representative of farmers' opinions of the day, and what do we find the objects of that journal? Why, to justify the farmers from imputations of want of skill and enterprise, and to show that bigotted adherence to obsolete usages, which has so retarded agriculture, is not fairly attributable to the farmers; and it seeks to place the blame where blame is due, upon the landlords. Contrast the following remarks on the coming Corn Law with Mr. Cayley's puerilities:

"It is passing strange that, despite the serious apprehensions of a considerable number, and the positive conviction of a great proportion of the agricultural body, that the proposed measures of the Government, if passed into law, will most materially affect the profits to be derived from the cultivation of the soil, there seems no lack of disposition to embark capital in the pursuit, that improved appliances are brought in aid with more earnestness than heretofore, and an increased vigour manifested incompatible with the dreary prospects which would seem to await the result of their labours. We are sensibly alive to the indomitable perseverance of our countrymen: we know that there are no men more brave, more resolute, more determined, or who will advance on a forlorn hope with more firmness and determination; but yet, forlorn though it be, there is even in that case a 'hope.' Must we, then, come to the conclusion that the British farmers are resolved to display in their peaceful occupation that spirit of determination to meet an ordeal which threatens ruin to themselves and families, entertaining still the 'hope' that the result may not be forlorn, but that they may surmount the difficulties and dangers which seem to await them?"

Here is a quiet vein of sarcasm, directed to the loud-tongued prophets of ruin to farmers, from Free Trade; to which prophecies the farmers are calmly giving the lie by "embarking" more "capital in that pursuit."

But the issue does not rest with the farmer alone. He is ready to do his part, and more than his part; but how is he backed by the landlord? See what the farmers' advocate says on the subject:

"If such be the spirit in which the British farmer, tricked and deceived as he has been, is prepared to exert his energies in the pursuit of his occupation, and that he is met by his landlord in such a manner as the exigencies of the times require, who can form an estimate of the probable produce of the soil of the United Kingdom? We hear much of the necessity of stimulating the tenant farmers to increased exertion, of rousing them from their old jog-trot habits, of forcing them to cast aside their antiquated prejudices; but what, we ask, is the extent of reform required of the tenantry as compared with the landlords? We have no hesitation in asserting that, taking the landlords as a body so far as regards the management of their estates, and the tenantry as a body so far as regards the management of their farms, the former are centuries behind the latter."

This is strictly true. Nor do the landlords employ the most competent agents; but even the agents are far a-head of their employers, though often fearful drags upon enterprising farmers.

The tenants, however, have found out that to be successful, they must be secure of reaping where they have sown, and that they must attain social independence.

The writer proceeds to say:

"It is, however, gratifying to know that the tenant farmers are beginning to look into their real position, and that the relation of landlord and tenant will, beyond a doubt, be speedily better understood and better defined. We cannot concur in the opinion, that, in order to maintain a kind and friendly feeling between landlord and tenant, the latter must be kept in a state of dependence upon the former. In a primitive state of society, that species of connection might be not only agreeable but useful to all parties; but to the tenant farmer of these times, who possesses an educated mind and independent spirit, the surest bond of friendship between himself and his landlord will be, a reciprocity of interests, and the recognition of his just rights, as well of position as of property. By the time that the question of 'tenant right' has been discussed at the various farmers' clubs throughout the country (and we trust it will be in every one before the year 1846 has expired), we may hope that tenants generally will begin to understand the subject better, and that the landlords will see that instead of lessening the value of their estates, or decreasing their legitimate influence, it will have a direct tendency to increase both."

The abrogation of the delusions of protection was a necessary preliminary to the assertion of independence by the tenant farmers; the game has been well opened for them by the Free Traders, and we shall be mistaken if the farmers do not play it out.

FLAX CULTURE.

The growth of flax is attracting the attention of vast numbers of farmers, who see that by the ordinary four-course system all has not been done for husbandry of which it is capable. We learn also that fabrics of flax are coming more into use than heretofore, and that there is every prospect of an increased demand for flax, which, however, at present sells at prices amply remunerative to the grower. At this time, therefore, the publication by Mr. Warnes of his book "On the Flax Crop, and the Use of its Seed" (printed by Clowes and Son) is very opportune.

The readers of THE LEAGUE will be well aware of the general outline of Mr. Warnes's plans. He grows flax; and in preparing the stalk for the spinner, employs at good wages so many men, women, and children, that it is quite clear, that should the growth of flax become general, it will at once furnish employment for all our (so-called) redundant agricultural population. The growth of flax too is very profitable; then why is it not more grown? There is a notion that it is an exhausting crop, and most leases forbid its cultivation; but it is not so, provided the seed be consumed on the farm for feeding stock. On the contrary, the cultivation of flax and consumption of the seed is one of the most certain means of improving the fertility of all kinds of soils. The great object required for the general introduction of flax culture is, that there should be persons to purchase the stalks in their raw state from the growers: for though the manufacture of the stalk into flax is not very difficult, it is not strictly a farming process, and will not be readily adopted by the general run of farmers. However, we have no doubt that as the growth extends, a class of flax-dressers will soon arise.

Another part of Mr. Warnes's plan is feeding cattle with the seed (linseed) crushed, boiled, and mixed with cut straw, grass, &c., and a little meal; and that in boxes, by which the manure is improved and economised.

We cannot give an extract from the book more useful to our farming readers than Mr. Warnes's description of his bullock boxes, which is as follows:

"It is impossible for the inexperienced to form a correct estimate of the advantages of box feeding cattle. The plan is simple and feasible,—its greatest recommendation. Lofty and incomprehensible theories have been too long obtruded upon the agricultural community, to the exclusion of those benefits which were absolutely within their grasp. The farmer's attention has been directed to fattening his cattle upon foreign food, and to the vain attempt of enriching his land by foreign manure, instead of obtaining both from the resources of his own farm. In attempting to point those out, I am sensible that I shall again be subjected to the fate of a prophet in his own country."

"The sketch in the appendix represents the elevation of one angle of my boxes, and the ground-plan of the whole; including passages, space for cribs, grinding, turnips, grass, and straw houses. The angle in which the cooking department is situated, consists of buildings that were formerly used as stables, &c. The whole is surrounded by a wall. The cost of erecting similar boxes, with the same advantage of a wall, including such materials and labour as could fairly be brought into the account, would average about 30s. a box, which would be repaid in a year. For instance, if the erection of a box costs 30s., and the bullock fattened in it pays that sum more than he would have done if grazed abroad, the money is of course returned to the pocket, and the box remains for future inhabitants. To be more explicit; let twenty bullocks be divided, and ten fattened in boxes, and ten in the yard or field. I assert that the former will pay 15l. more than the latter. But in justice to my own experiments, I must add that the advantage of box feeding would be from 2l. to 3l. per head, over the field or yard; and the extra expense of attendance amply repaid by the economy of the food."

"The description of these buildings is difficult, because however clear and explicit, it must convey ideas of magnitude and intricacy, while neither exists. To make ten boxes, a space will be required of 90 feet long and 12½ wide; then let a line be drawn from one end to the other, three feet and a half wide from the side most convenient for the passage. Next let the mould, to the depth of one foot, be excavated from the other part and thrown on the side intended for the front, and spread to the thickness of a foot deep. This will give two feet from the bottom of the boxes to the surface. A wall of brickwork, four inches wide and two feet high, is next to be built round the inside of this part excavated, and intersected at distances of eight feet and a half. At each angle the brickwork should be about nine or twelve inches square, which will both support the posts and afford strength and durability. Upon the wall a sill of wood is next to be placed, for which purpose large poles, either squared or split, are adapted. The foundation being now complete, posts six feet long, and the necessary sills and ties, may be placed upon it. Across the ties the most ordinary poles may be laid to support a roof composed of the trimmings from hedges and ditches, and completed with a thatch of straw or rushes. Two gates, according to the drawing, must be added to each box; one of which is to move on hinges, and the other to be secured to the top and bottom sills of the building, so as to be taken down at pleasure. Presuming that we have taken advantage of a barn or other walls on farm premises, the external part is finished. The internal has merely to be parted off with a few poles between each bullock and the passage separated by the cribs, which are to move up and down between the interior posts, which are placed upon the angles of each box, and support the roof on the passage side.

"The superiority of box feeding, and summer grazing over any other system I shall attempt to point out next week. In the mean time, I offer the following questions for the calm consideration of all interested persons; and I hope their calculations will be made with the aid of their pen and ink, that when mine shall appear they may be compared, squared, and the balance drawn; and then, I feel persuaded, that the account will preponderate much in my favour. But there is a spirit in men worse than prejudice, which I do not expect to overcome, nor shall I make the attempt. Time is the best developer of all things."

"1st. What are the advantages to be obtained by feeding cattle in boxes, with turnips, and with or without the addition of artificial food?"

"2nd. With grass, or without the addition of artificial food?"

"3rd. What extra degree of efficacy may be expected from the box manure over that of the farm-yard?"

"In conclusion, I would observe that straw houses are very necessary appendages to the boxes. Their shape is immaterial, and structure simple. According to the space in the yard the circumference must be adapted. The earth should then be excavated to the depth of five or six feet, and a wall four inches thick of brick or stone be built from the bottom to the surface, which wall is then to be thickened and raised three feet higher, leaving a space for the door. Upon the wall planks are to be laid on posts five or six feet long attached, which are to be covered over with a roof, according to the elevation. A building of this kind, placed near the doors of a barn, will be found at all times most convenient to receive straw from the threshers; and being sunk in the ground, is rendered capable of containing an extra quantity of straw, particularly if trodden down by a horse."

We may mention that this plan of feeding with boiled linseed and cut straw, and making manure in boxes, is not confined to fattening cattle. We have adopted it with milch cows and young stock, with the best results. In feeding young stock, the proportion of straw to linseed would of course be much more than for fattening cattle. Nor is it necessary that the farmer should grow his own linseed.

In Mr. Warnes's book the farmer will perceive full accounts of his experiments, his plans, and their results; and he has illustrated his text with cuts which will be very useful to those who wish to adopt the plan of box feeding.

In recommending this work, we must not omit to guard the reader against some very croneous economical notions on the subject of Free Trade—home production, independence of foreigners, and so forth; but which, however, ought not to repel the intelligent farmer from the truly valuable suggestions made by Mr. Warnes, who often gives a bad reason for a very useful practice. Neither can we altogether overlook the writer's occasional flings at the League, which we suppose were necessary to keep up his reputation as a "protectionist;" for, assuredly, the whole scope of his work is to show, in practice, the utter absurdity of protection to agriculture.

Indeed, Mr. Warnes's quarrel with the League is founded on a mistake. He seems to suppose that the Free Traders have discountenanced and opposed the growth of flax. Nothing is further from the truth. The use made of the protectionist's recommendation to grow flax was this—we say you monopolists pretend that you require protection on wheat against foreign competition, and yet you recommend farmers to grow flax—an article altogether open to foreign competition; and the argument is one which has pinched the monopolists not a little. So far from opposing the system Mr. Warnes recommends, we ask him whether his plans have not met with more effective support, and been made more extensively known, through the medium of THE LEAGUE during the last six months, than by all the monopolist aid he has had from the very commencement of his exertions?

WHEAT, &c.—The following is an account "of the quantities of wheat, barley, oats, wheat-flour, and oatmeal, imported into Great Britain from Ireland, from the 5th day of March to the 5th day of April, 1846 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 162, of the present session)." Month ended the 5th of April, 1846:

	Quarters.
Wheat	19,540
Barley	10,148
Oats	80,802
	Cwts.
Wheatmeal or Flour	89,048
Oatmeal	50,360

CATTLE.—An account "of all cattle, sheep, and swine imported into Great Britain from Ireland, from the 5th day of January to the 5th day of April, 1846 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 25, of the present session," published by the House of Commons yesterday, gives the following results:

	Number.
Oxen, Bulls, and Cows	14,859
Calves	183
Sheep and Lambs	11,121
Swine	152,841

Since the year 1825, when the trade between Great Britain and Ireland was placed under coasting regulations, the official record of the interchange of produce and manufactures between the two countries (except in so far as the article of corn is concerned) has of necessity been discontinued. The foregoing return, therefore, has been framed from non-official documents collected at the ports of exportation, and consisting chiefly of printed market and shipping reports.

REVIEW.

The Life and Times of the Right Hon. Henry Grattan. By his Son, Henry Grattan, Esq., M.P. London: Colburn.

At a time when the affairs of Ireland attract a more than ordinary share of public attention, these volumes, which comprise nearly all that is valuable in the history of that country, and which supply materials for elucidating, and perhaps explaining, the principal anomalies in its social condition, are replete with interest and instruction, not merely to the statesman and politician, but to all who feel desirous to maintain the integrity of the empire. We differ from the estimable writer of these memoirs in the general inference he deduces from the record, but this does not lessen our estimate of the value of the record itself. We know not, indeed, a better repository of arguments for the maintenance of the union between England and Ireland than this work, a very disproportionate part of which is devoted to the advocacy of repeal. The very first measure advocated by the great patriot, "the Free Trade" for Ireland, involved in its principles an identity of commercial interests between the insular kingdoms which stand between Europe and the Atlantic, and must, if fairly developed, have compelled an identity of legislation. The spirit of monopoly delayed the union which was vainly sought as a boon by the Irish themselves in 1707. The spirit of monopoly rendered the measure so imperfect, that the attainment of its objects was long impossible; and the spirit of monopoly still prevents their complete realization.

It has been said that the Turks have only encamped in Europe. When Grattan was born, Ireland with more truth might be said to be merely garrisoned by that class on which the law conferred exclusively the privileges of political existence. But these garrisons submitted as reluctantly to English rule as the Beys in Egypt did to the sovereignty of the Sultan; and only consented to dependence because the strength of England was necessary to support their powers of oppression. Grattan attempted from these discordant elements to form a nation; it was a glorious effort—it was even magnificent as a failure. But, unlike most other failures of statesmen, Grattan accumulated in his struggle so many elements of good, and developed so many resources of power, that his ill success is fraught with more advantage to his country than most other nations have reaped from the most decisive triumphs of patriotism.

Henry Grattan was born in Dublin, July 3d, 1746. His father was Recorder of the city, and for many years its representative in Parliament, where he supported the system then pursued by the English Government towards Ireland. The difference in politics between the father and son was early developed; and the former, who died while Henry was a student in the University, alienated from him the paternal mansion. He lost his mother, to whom he was fondly attached, while qualifying for the bar in London, and she died so suddenly, that she had not time for taking the measures necessary for securing him the reversion of some landed property she had destined for his use.

Though Grattan had obtained high honours in the Dublin University, and had been a most diligent student while at the Temple, he did not exhibit any remarkable powers in his first essays as a lawyer; but his abilities as a politician becoming known to Lord Charlemont, that patriotic nobleman brought him in for one of his boroughs, and he took his seat in the Irish Parliament Dec. 11, 1775. At this time, the restrictions imposed on the manufactures and commerce of Ireland for the supposed benefit of England had reduced the country to a state of bankruptcy; and this distress was aggravated by an embargo which the Government imposed by proclamation on the export of provisions; but also, at this time, England was involved in a calamitous and expensive war with her American colonies; and as the struggle deepened, it became necessary to court the aid of Ireland by a conciliatory policy. The patriotism of the Irish senator and the policy of the English Minister had, however, to struggle against a pensioned Parliament. The Irish administration was nothing but a series of bribes and jobs. As Grattan said, in one of his earliest speeches, "Ministers had taken the jewels out of the crown, and had staked them against the liberties of the people." Grattan's motion for an address to the crown, simply setting forth the distressed condition of Ireland, was lost by a majority of 113 to 66.

About this time intelligence was received that the French meditated an invasion of the north of Ireland. The inhabitants of Belfast and Carrickfergus applied to the Government for protection, and were informed that the only force which could be spared for their defence amounted to about 60 troopers! The inhabitants armed themselves, formed independent companies, and assumed the name of VOLUNTEERS. Their example was contagious. Similar associations were formed in various parts of the country; and the Lord Lieutenant, after having delayed until the enemies were almost in sight of the coast of Ireland, found himself obliged to furnish the volunteers with arms.

In Ireland and in England this has been generally represented as a great national movement. It was no such thing; it was, in fact, nothing better than an association of the partisans of the ascendancy—an armed Orange League, not to defend the rights of Ireland, but to prevent English participation in the plunder and oppression of the Irish Catholics. The demand for Free Trade was a land-lord cry to raise the price of produce at home by exporting to foreign markets; and it was accompanied by the formation of associations to prevent the import of English manufactures, Catholics being at the time excluded from every lucrative branch of manufacture, and even prohibited from residing in many of the corporate and market towns. Most of our readers have heard of the distich said to have been inscribed on the gates of Bandon:

"Turk, Jew, or Atheist,
May enter here, but not a Papist."

And they may also have heard of the clever retort by a poor scholar, when excluded from the anti-Popish town:

"Whoever wrote those lines, wrote well;
For the same is inscribed on the gates of hell."

We know not whether the poetic prohibition was literally emblazoned over the gates; but we know that its spirit was observed with the most rigid strictness, as any one may see who consults the strange records of impolicy and intolerance preserved in the Report on Irish Corporations. We have two lists before us,—that of the officers of the Volunteer companies who took the most active part in the great movement of 1782, and that of the officers of yeomanry corps and of the magistrates who exhibited the greatest barbarity and cruelty in the melancholy insurrection of 1798. The lists are almost identical. The most flaming patriots in the one period were the most bitter persecutors in the other. Let us not be misled by names. The "Free Trade" sought by the Volunteers in 1778 was simply freedom of exports to enrich landlords, and prohibition of imports to enrich Orange manufacturers. The combination was a decided fraud and wrong on the great mass of consumers—the Catholic population. It was significant of the real object of the movement, that its greatest demonstration was made on the 4th of November, 1779, King William's birth-day, and round the statue of that Orange idol in College Green.

We by no means assert that all the Irish patriots were patrons of ascendancy and monopoly. We believe that from the first such men as Grattan, Yelverton, and Hussey Burgh embraced in their view the whole Irish people. The following brief speech of Burgh's is decisive on that point:

"The usurped authority of a foreign Parliament has kept up the most wicked laws that a jealous, monopolising, ungrateful spirit could devise, to restrain the bounty of Providence, and enslave a nation, whose inhabitants are recorded to be a brave, loyal, and generous people; by the English code of laws, to answer the most sordid views, they have been treated with a savage cruelty; the words penalty, punishment, and Ireland, are synonymous, they are marked in blood on the margin of their statutes; and though time may have softened the calamities of the nation, the baneful and destructive influence of those laws have borne her down to a state of Egyptian bondage. The English has sowed their laws like serpents' teeth, and they have sprung up in armed men."

But assuredly this cannot be said of Fitzgibbon, Latouche, Langfield, Ogle, St. George, and Sir Richard Musgrave. None of these men had sympathy with the sentiments of the brilliant peroration in which Grattan wound up his speech on moving the Declaration of Right:

"Hereafter, when these things shall be history, your age of thralldom and poverty, your sudden resurrection, commercial distress, and miraculous armament, shall the historian stop at liberty, and observe, that here the principal men among us fell into mimic traces of gratitude,—they were awed by a weak ministry, and bribed by an empty treasury,—and when liberty was within their grasp, and the temple opened her folding doors, and the arms of the people clanged, and the zeal of the nation urged and encouraged them on, that they fell down, and were prostituted at the threshold."

"I might, as a constituent, come to your bar and demand my liberty. I do call upon you, by the laws of the land and their violation, by the instruction of eighteen counties, by the arms, inspiration, and providence of the present moment, tell us the rule by which we shall go,—assert the law of Ireland,—declare the liberty of the land."

"I will not be answered by a public lie, in the shape of an amendment; neither, speaking for the subjects' freedom, am I to hear of faction. I wish for nothing but to breathe, in this our island, in common with my fellow-subjects, the air of liberty. I have no ambition, unless it be the ambition to break your chain, and contemplate your glory. I never will be satisfied so long as the meanest cottager in Ireland has a link of the British chain clanking to his rags: he may be naked, he shall not be in iron; and I do see the time is at hand, the spirit is gone forth, the declaration is planted; and though great men should apostatise, yet the cause will live; and though the public speaker should die, yet the immortal fire shall outlast the organ which conveyed it, and the breath of liberty, like the word of the holy man, will not die with the prophet, but survive him."

"I shall move you, 'That the King's most excellent Majesty, and the Lords and Commons of Ireland, are the only power competent to make laws to bind Ireland."

We find that the Rowleys, the Steffingtons, and others who were supporters of the Declaration of Right, opposed the concessions which the English Government made to the Catholic body; and that these concessions were carried by the "Castle hacks," or the party which always voted as the Government directed. Thus the Catholics were indebted for the first measures of emancipation to the English Government, not to the Irish Parliament; and we may add, that in a preceding generation Sir Robert Walpole had to exert all the power and influence of England to prevent the Irish penal code from being rendered even more oppressive and disgraceful than it now stands. Grattan, on this occasion, made a noble profession of nationality:

"The question is now, whether we shall grant Roman Catholics the power of enjoying estates,—whether we shall be a Protestant settlement or an Irish nation? whether we shall throw open the gates of the temple of liberty to all our countrymen, or whether we shall confine them in bondage by penal laws? So long as the penal code remains, we never can be a great nation. The penal code is the shell in which the Protestant power has been hatched, and now it has become a bird, it must burst the shell or perish in it."

"In Holland, where the number of Roman Catholics is comparatively small, the toleration of their religion is an act of mercy to them; but in this country, where they form the great bulk of the inhabitants, it is an act of policy, an act of necessity, an act of incorporation. The question is not, whether we shall show mercy to the Roman Catholics, but whether we shall mould the inhabitants of Ireland into a people: for so long as we exclude Catholics from natural liberty and the common rights of men, we are not a people; we may triumph over them, but other nations will triumph over us. If you love the Roman Catholic, you may be sure of a return from him; but if you treat him with cruelty you must always live in fear, conscious that you merit his just resentment. Will you then go down the stream of time, the Roman Catholic sitting by your side, unblest and unblest, blasting and blasted?—or will you take off his chain, that he may take off yours?—will you give him freedom, that he may guard your liberty?"

"In Ireland, as connected with England, the indulgence we wish to give to Catholics can never be injurious to the Protestant religion,—that religion is the religion of the state, and will become the religion of Catholics if severity does not prevent them. Bigotry may survive persecution, but it never can survive toleration. But gentlemen who speak of the enormities committed by Catholics groaning under a system of penal laws, do not take into account the enlightening and softening of men's minds by toleration, nor do they consider that as they increase in wealth they will increase in learning and politeness."

"I give my consent to the clause in its principle, extent, and boldness; I give my consent to it as the most likely means of obtaining a victory over the prejudices of Catholics, and over our own; I give my consent to it, because I would not keep two millions of my fellow-subjects in a state of slavery, and because, as the mover of the Declaration of Rights, I would be ashamed of giving freedom to but six hundred thousand of my countrymen, when I could extend it to two millions more."

The independence of the Irish Parliament was unanimously asserted on the 16th of April, 1782. Grattan's speech, on proposing an address to the royal message, in which the claims of England to legislate for Ireland are asserted, has the solemn grandeur of a pæan:

"I am now to address a free people: ages have passed away, and this is the first moment in which you could be distinguished by that appellation."

"I have spoken on the subject of your liberty so often, that I have nothing to add, and have only to admire by what heaven-directed steps you have proceeded until the whole faculty of the nation is braced up to the act of her own deliverance."

"I found Ireland on her knees; I watched over her with an eternal solicitude; I have traced her progress from injuries to arms, and from arms to liberty. Spirit of Swift; spirit of Molyneux! your genius has prevailed! Ireland is now a nation! in that new character I hail her! and bowing to her august presence, I say, Esto perpetua!"

"She is no longer a wretched colony, returning thanks to her governor for his rapine, and to her king for his oppression; nor is she now a squabbling, fretful sectary, perplexing her little wits, and firing her furious statutes with bigotry, sophistry, disabilities, and death, to transmit to posterity insignificance and war."

"Look to the rest of Europe, and contemplate yourself, and be satisfied. Holland lives on the memory of past achievement; Sweden has lost her liberty; England has sullied her great name by an attempt to enslave her colonies. You are the only people—yon, of the nations in Europe, are now the only people who excite admiration, and in your present conduct you not only exceed the present generation, but you equal the past. I am not afraid to turn back and look antiquity in the face; the revolution—that great event, whether you call it ancient or modern I know not, was tarnished with bigotry; the great deliverer (for such I must ever call the Prince of Nassau), was blighted with oppression; he assented to, he was forced to assent to acts which deprived the Catholics of religious, and all the Irish of civil and commercial rights, though the Irish were the only subjects in these islands who had fought in his defence. But you have sought liberty on her own principle; see the Presbyterians of Bangor petition for the freedom of the Catholics of Munster. You, with difficulties innumerable, with dangers not a few, have done what your ancestors wished, but could not accomplish, and what your posterity may preserve but will never equal; you have moulded the jarring elements of your country into a nation, and have rivalled those great and ancient commonwealths, whom you were taught to admire, and among whom you are now to be recorded; in this proceeding you had not the advantages which were common to other great countries; no monuments, no trophies, none of those outward and visible signs of greatness, such as inspire mankind and connect the ambition of the age which is coming on with the example of that going off, and forms the descent and concatenation of glory; no; you have not had any great act recorded among all your misfortunes, nor have you one public tomb to assemble the crowd, and speak to the living the language of integrity and freedom.

"Your historians did not supply the want of monuments; on the contrary, these narrators of your misfortunes, who should have felt for your wrongs, and have punished your oppressors with oppressions, natural scourges, the moral indignation of history, compromised with public villany and trembled; they excited your violence, they suppressed your provocation, and wrote in the chain which entrained their country. I am come to break that chain, and I congratulate my country, who, without any of the advantages I speak of, going forth as it were with nothing but a stone and a sling, and what oppression could not take away, the favour of heaven, accomplished her own redemption, and left you nothing to add and everything to admire.

"You want no trophy now; the records of Parliament are the evidence of your glory; I beg to observe, that the deliverance of Ireland has proceeded from her own right hand; I rejoice at it, for had the great requisition of your freedom proceeded from the bounty of England, that great work would have been defective both in renown and security; it was necessary that the soul of the country should have been exalted by the act of her own redemption, and that England should withdraw her claim by operation of treaty, and not of mere grace and condescension; a gratuitous act of Parliament, however express, would have been revocable, but the repeal of her claim under operation of treaty is not; in that case, the legislature is put in covenant, and bound by the law of nations, the only law that can legally bind Parliament; never did this country stand so high; England and Ireland treat ex æquo. Ireland transmits to the King her claim of right, and requires of the Parliament of England the repeal of her claim of power, which repeal the English Parliament is to make under the force of a treaty which depends on the law of nations—a law which cannot be repealed by the Parliament of England.

"I rejoice that the people are a party to this treaty, because they are bound to preserve it. There is not a man of forty shillings freehold that is not associated in this our claim of right, and bound to die in its defence; cities, counties, associations, Protestants and Catholics; it seems as if the people had joined in one great national sacrament; a flame has descended from heaven on the intellect of Ireland, plays round her head, and encompasses her understanding with a consecrated glory."

In the excitement of national gratitude, the sum of 50,000*l.* was voted to purchase an estate for Grattan; within three or four months he was an object of popular dislike and mistrust. The Volunteers were not satisfied with what had been achieved; they formed a military convention under the guidance of Flood, and resolved to frame a constitution which would secure the perpetual domination of the Orange party. A personal altercation of unequalled bitterness was the first consequence of these differences. We shall extract some specimens of this Irish invective without any comment; and we shall first give Flood's attack on Grattan:

"I am not afraid of the right hon. member; I will meet him any where, or upon any ground, by night or by day. I would stand poorly in my own estimation and my country's opinion, if I did not stand far above him. I do not come here dressed in a rich wardrobe of words to delude the people. I am not one who has promised repeatedly to bring in a Bill of Rights, yet does not bring in that bill, or permit any other person to do it. I am not one who threatened to impeach the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, for acting under an English law, and afterwards shrunk from that business. I am not the author of the simple repeal. I am not one who would come at midnight, and attempt by a vote of this House to stifle the voice of the people, which my egregious folly has raised against me. I am not the gentleman who subsists upon your accounts. I am not the mendicant patriot who was bought by my country for a sum of money, and then sold my country for prompt payment. I am not the man who in this House loudly complained of an infringement made by England, in including Ireland in a bill, and then sent a certificate to Duncannon that Ireland was not included. I never was bought by the people, nor ever sold them. The gentleman says he never apostatized; but I say I never changed my principles; let every man say the same, and let the people believe them if they can. But if it be so bad a thing to take an office in the state, how comes that gentleman connected with persons in office? They, I hope, are men of virtue, or how came that gentleman so closely connected with Colonel Fitzpatrick? I object to no man for being in office; a patriot in office is the more a patriot for being there. There was a time when the glories of the great Duke of Marlborough shrunk and withered before those of the right honourable gentleman; when palaces, superior to Blenheim, were to be built for his reception, when pyramids and pillars were to be raised, and adorned with emblems and inscriptions sacred to his virtue. But the pillars and pyramids are now sunk, though then the great Earl of Chatham was held inferior to him. However, he is still so great, that the queen of France, I dare say, will have a song made on the name of Grattan.

"Lord Harcourt practised economy; but what was the economy of the Duke of Portland?—One hundred thousand pounds was voted to raise 20,000 seamen, though it was well known that one third of that number could not be raised; and what was the application of the money? It was applied to the raising of the execrated Fencibles.

"It is said I supported Lord Harcourt's administration; it is true, but I never deserted my principles, but carried them into the cabinet with me. A gentleman who now hears me, knows that I proposed to the privy council an Irish Mutiny Bill, and that not with a view of any parliamentary grant. I supported an absentee tax; and while I was in office, registered my principles in the books of Government; and the moment I could not influence Government to the advantage of the nation, I ceased to act with them. I acted for myself; I was the first that ever told them that an Irish Mutiny Bill must be granted. If this country is now satisfied, is it owing to that gentleman? No, the simple repeal, disapproved and scouted by all the lawyers in England and in Ireland, shows the contrary; and the only apology he can make is, that he is no lawyer at all. A man of warm imagination and brilliant fancy will sometimes be dazzled with his own ideas, and may for a moment fall into error; but a man of sound head could not make so egregious a mistake; and a man of an honest heart could not persist in it after it was discovered. I have now done; and give me leave to say, if the gentleman enters once into this kind of colloquy with me, he will not have much to boast of at the end of the session."

We now come to Grattan's reply, but cannot insert it without protesting against the allusion to Flood's personal peculiarities, his sallow complexion, hoarse voice, and deformed nose:

"I will suppose this man's honour equal to his oath. I will suppose him an insufferable egotist; I will stop him in his career, and say,—Sir, you are mistaken if you think your talents are as great as your life is infamous. We have seen you a violent opposer of Government, and afterwards on the most trying questions silent—silent for years, and silenced by money; we have seen you haunting this house like a guilty spirit, watching the moment when you should vanish from the question; or you might be described hovering about this dome like an ill-omened bird of night, with sepulchral note, cadaverous aspect, and a broken beak, watching to stoop and pounce upon your prey; or we have detected you hid behind that chair, to avoid a division, or feigning infirmities to excuse your absence. Influenced by place, or stung by disappointed ambition, we have seen you pursue a course of most manifest duplicity. You can be trusted by no man—the people cannot trust you; the Minister cannot trust you; you have dealt out the most impartial treachery to both, and now you tell the nation she was ruined by others when she was sold by you. You fled from the Mutiny Bill—you fled from the Sugar Bill—you fled from the Six Month's Money Bill—I therefore tell you, in the face of your country, before all the world, and to your beard, you are not an honest man."

On this occasion, the great majority of the Volunteers joined with Flood. A plan of Parliamentary reform was prepared, and one of its leading features was the continued exclusion of the Catholics from the elective franchise. They chose for their head a madman, the Earl of Bristol, who was then Bishop of Derry; and they obtained from Lord Kenmare a kind of unofficial declaration that the Catholics were willing to relinquish their claims to emancipation. Flood's measure of reform was opposed on the constitutional ground that it had originated in an armed convention. It was rejected, and for a few days it was doubted whether the Volunteers would not take such a course as might precipitate a civil war. Prudence finally prevailed over passion, the Convention was dissolved, and the Volunteers sunk into insignificance. Their fall was hastened by Flood's insisting on a denial of the right of Catholics to carry arms, and on the resolutions adopted by a large proportion of the independent companies not to admit Catholics into their ranks.

When we are called upon to admire the age of the Volunteers as the most brilliant period of Irish history, we feel ourselves compelled to make large abatements in their claims. Their Free Trade was a disguised monopoly; their free constitution an undisguised ascendancy; their great Convention at once a confederacy and conspiracy of a minority against the rights of a majority.

In the debates on the commercial propositions, the legislatures of the two countries vied with each other in exhibiting the most perfect contempt for all sound principles of commercial economy; and we have no wish to disinter the masses of brilliant nonsense with which protections, prohibitions, and restrictions were advocated at both sides of the water; but this very circumstance so strongly showed the inconvenience of two imperial legislatures in one empire, that we have ever regarded the event as one of the strongest proofs of the necessity of a union. Custom-houses are strange links of union between the constituent parts of an empire.

We give Grattan the credit of having won for his country an independent legislature; but instead of regarding this legislature as a blessing, we look upon it as a nuisance which ought to have been abated. As an instrument of local government, it became such an engine of oppression, that Grattan himself seceded from it in despair. As an imperial legislature, the only time that it acted with freedom it showed that its existence was incompatible with the integrity of the empire. On the question of a regency in 1789, the English and Irish legislatures differed beyond all hope of reconciliation. Had not the king recovered, the two countries must have had different executives. The able biographer whom we are reviewing laments the occurrence, but does not seem to perceive that the very same difference of opinion might have arisen in the case of a disputed succession, and actually did arise in the war between William III. and James II. The worst result of this great calamity was the alienation of George III. and Mr. Pitt from the great body of the Irish nation; the Catholics were devoted to the party of the Prince of Wales, whose liaison with a lady of their religion was matter of notoriety. The king believed that it was intended to take advantage of his insanity to deprive him of his crown, and the attempt was never forgiven or forgotten. The majority of the Irish Parliament hastened to make terms with the king and his ministers; the terms were for their own aggrandisement, and they included the abandonment of the nation. On this point we adduce the evidence of Mr. Grattan himself:

"The people of this country suppose that England acceded to their liberties, and they were right; but the present Ministry has sent us the curse after that blessing: hear the curse! You have got rid of the British Parliament, but we will buy the Irish; you have shaken off our final judicature, but we will sell yours; you have got your Free Trade, but we will make your own Parliament suffer our monopolists in one quarter of the globe to exclude you, and you shall remain content with the right, destitute of the possession. Your corporate rights shall be attacked, and you shall not stir. The freedom of your press, and the personal freedom of the subject shall be outraged, and you shall not arraign. Your city shall be put under contribution to corrupt its magistracy, and pay a guard to neglect and insult her. The seats of justice shall be purchased by personal servitude, and the qualification of your judges shall be to have borne their suffrage and testimony against the people. Taxes shall be drawn from the poor by various artifices to buy the rich. Your bills, like your people shall be sold. You shall see the genius of your country neglected, her patriotism dismissed from commission, and the old enemies of your constitution made the rulers of the realm."

The treatment of the advocates of the Catholics in the Irish Parliament, and on a question in which that body was opposed to the English Parliament and Government, is thus described by the same authority:

"I could hardly obtain a hearing. As to Denis Browne (who always supported the Catholics), he could not be heard at all; they would not listen to him. I spoke against the sense, Browne against the noise of the house, and he was abused, insulted, and covered with reproaches."

In 1793, the year following this disgraceful exhibition, the Speech from the Throne recommended concessions to the Catholics; and the address on this occasion was seconded by Mr. Wellesley, the present Duke of Wellington, who expressed himself in favour of their claims. None were more conspicuous in their opposition than some of those who had been the chief leaders of the Volunteers. Pitt, at one time, seemed disposed to pursue the policy of conciliation, and sent over Earl Fitzwilliam as Lord Lieutenant; but the powerful party of the ascendancy prevailed over the minister's better judgment, and Earl Fitzwilliam was recalled by Irish intrigues, and at the instigation of Irish factions. Let us now take Grattan's account of the treatment received by the Catholics from the Parliament of the Volunteers:

"They scolded the people from the bar of the House of Commons—they had kicked their prayers after them, they had instructed Grand Juries to punish denunciations against the Catholics—they had then taken up the Catholics—they had then resumed the Protestant ascendancy; again they had taken up the Catholics, and again they had let them down—encouraging and maturing by alternate hope and apprehension, the zeal of the distinct sects—the blockhead's sense and the Court's deistical devotion, to unite under the crazy colours of religious war and carnage—they had in the progress of their defeat promised a change of ministers and measures—they get a great supply—recall the minister for making the promises under their own authority, and tell the Catholics, whom they had deceived, that they must for ever remain disqualified for seats in Parliament, and offices in the State, for the better securing the Crown and the connection—the people petition—they then answered their grants by disappointment—they had answered their petitions by Fencibles; the army they had withdrawn when the French had threatened the country—and they pour it in when the people petition the Crown. The leading Catholics who had assisted in planning the petition to his Majesty they had prosecuted, without colour or pretence, for high treason—the lower orders of the Catholics they give up to an armed mob, to be exterminated with violence—triumphant in a course of years, and put them out of the protection of the law: they do this, when by their misconduct abroad, they had reason to apprehend invasion at home, and when they had so reduced the army, that they had left his Majesty's Government no chance for its safety, but in what, I imagine, now must be its best security—the unanimity of his people. If ever this country is lost to England, depend on it this system will be the cause."

This country can only be saved by her own force, and her own force can only be procured by adopting the Catholics, and they can only be adopted by a total and entire change of maxims, measures, and manners, accompanied with a free and full participation of whatever privileges the constitution can boast, and what is infinitely more essential, whatever privileges the constitution intended. This is the force, the power, the charm, the staff of your Saint, that will banish from your isle all noxious animals; the wand that opens the sea to the English, and will wall it up against the French. Quick—very quick—you have not a moment to lose—you have given your fellow-subjects a share of your taxes, your defeats, and depopulation, kindly, very kindly—give them now a share of your blessings, whatever your ministers have left you. Let us make no more sacrifices of our liberties—let us now sacrifice our prejudices—they will ascend in incense, the best use you can make of them—and be a tiding to your God, that you are become a convert to your country."

On this part of our subject we are not disposed to dwell; but we must in justice quote the strong condemnation of the Irish Parliament, pronounced by Mr. Grattan himself; it is a painful comment on his high hopes and proud anticipations, in 1782:

"There are but two measures in the country—Reform, or force. We have offered you the former, you seem inclined to the latter. Let us consider it—to subdue, to coerce, to establish unqualified submission.' An arduous, a precarious undertaking—have you well weighed all its consequences? Is there not much of passion in your judgment?—have you not lost your temper a little in the contest? I am sure you have shown this night symptoms of irritation—a certain impatience of the complaints of the people. So it was in the American business. Nothing less in that contest than their unconditional submission—alas! what was the consequence? As far as you have tried your experiment here it has failed—the report shows you it has failed. It has increased the evil it would restrain—it has propagated the principles it would punish, but if repeated and invigorated, you think it will have more success—I apprehend not. Don't you perceive that instead of strengthening monarchy by constitutional principles, you are attempting to give it force by despotic ones?—that you are giving the new principle the advantage of success abroad, and of suffering at home—and that you are losing the people, while you think you are strengthening the throne—that you have made a false alliance with unnatural principles, and, instead of identifying with the people, you identify with abuses. Before they are to be reformed, rebellion, you tell us, must be subdued. You tried that experiment in America—America required self-legislation—you attempted to subdue America by force of angry laws, and by force of arms—you exacted of America unconditional submission—the Stamp Act and the tea tax were only pretences—so you said; the object, you said, was separation—so here the Reform of Parliament, you say, and Catholic emancipation, are only pretences—the object you say is separation—and here you exact unconditional submission—“YOU MUST SUBDUED BEFORE YOU REFORM;”—Indeed!—Alas! you think so; but you forget you subdue by reforming—it is the best conquest you can obtain over your own people. But let me suppose you succeed—what is your success?—a military government—a perfect despotism—a hapless victory over the principles of a mild Government and a mild Constitution—a Union!—but what may be the ultimate consequence of such a victory?—a separation. Let us suppose that the war continues, and that your conquest over your own people is interrupted by a French invasion—what would be your situation then? I do not wish to think of it; but I wish you to think of it, and to make a better preparation against such an event than such conquests and such victories. When you consider the state of your arms abroad, and the ill-assured state of your government at home, precipitating on such a system, surely you should pause a little: even on the event of a peace you are ill secured against a future war, which the state of Ireland under such a system would be too apt to invite; but on the event of the continuation of the war—your system is perilous indeed—I speak without asperity—I speak without resentment—I speak, perhaps, my delusion; but it is my heartfelt conviction—I speak my apprehension for the immediate state of our liberty, and for the ultimate state of the empire; I see, or imagine I see, in this system, every thing which is dangerous to both; I hope I am mistaken; at least I hope I exaggerate—possibly I may—if so, I shall acknowledge my error with more satisfaction than is usual in the acknowledgment of error. I cannot, however, banish from my memory the lesson of the American war, and yet at that time English government was at the head of Europe, and was possessed of resources comparatively unbroken. If that lesson has no effect on Ministers, surely I can suggest nothing that will. We have offered you our measure—you will reject it; we deprecate yours—you will persevere; having no hopes left to persuade or to dissuade, and having discharged our duty, we shall trouble you no more, and AFTER THIS DAY SHALL NOT ATTEND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS!”

When Mr. Grattan pronounced these words, he justified the Union.

We shall, perhaps, return again to these very important volumes; but before we conclude, we should suggest the propriety of an abridged life of the great Irish patriot, whose example belongs not to Ireland alone, but to the civilised world. The volumes before us are too large and too weighty. They contain documents of great value, but not of general interest. Grattan was one of those for whom two biographies should be written: one for the politician, and one for the general reader.

VOICES FROM THE CROWD.

FRANCE AND ENGLAND.

We make no boast of Waterloo;
Its name excites no pride in us;
We have no hatred of the French,
No scorn of Yankee or of Russ.
The glory that our fathers gained
In bloody warfare years ago,
And which they talk of o'er their cups,
Gives us no joy to think upon.
In truth we rather love the French,
And think our fathers did them wrong;
And sometimes blush when in the streets,
Quite out of date, an ancient song—
Ghost of a prejudice—comes back,
And tells us how, in days gone out,
The best of Englishmen was he,
Who put a dozen French to rout.
We have no foolish thoughts like these,
Of France, or any other land;
And jealousies so poor and mean,
We're somewhat slow to understand.
We'd rather with our friends, the French,
Encourage kindness of thought,
Than gain a score of Waterloos,
Or any battle ever fought.
And in this year of “forty-six,”
We rising men, in life's young prime,
Are men who think the French have done
The world good service in their time.
And for their sakes, and for our own,
And freedom's sake o'er all the earth,
We'd rather let old feuds expire,
And cling to something better worth.
If thought of battles gained by us
Disturb or gall them, let it rest;
Napoleon was a man of men,
But neither wickedest nor best:
Neither a demon nor a god;
And if they will adore a king,
The honest man who rules them now
Deserves a little worshipping.
To be at strife, however just,
Has no attraction to our mind:
And as for nations fond of war,
We think them pests of human kind.
Still—if there must be rivalry
Between us and the French;—why then Let earth behold us, while we show
Which of the two are better men.
We'll try the rivalry of Arts,
Of Science, Learning, Freedom, Fame—
We'll try who first shall light the world
With Charity's divinest flame—
Who best shall elevate the poor,
And teach the wealthy to be true—
We want no rivalry of arms,
We want no boast of Waterloo.

FACTORY AND LAND—EXTENSIVE BUSINESS PREMISES—FREEHOLD AND LEASEHOLD.

To be Sold by Auction, by MESSRS. CROCKETT and SON,
(subject to conditions to be specified at the time of sale),
At the Black Swan Inn, Devises.

On Friday, the 23d May, 1846, at Four o'clock in the Afternoon.
Lot I.—All that substantial brick-built Factory Premises, situate in New Park-street, Devises, formerly used as a Woollen and Silk Factory, but now converted into a Corn and Provision Warehouse, in the occupation of Mr. Richard Rex; having a frontage of 84 feet, and a depth of 46 feet, with four floors, besides the basement story, divided into numerous apartments adapted to the varied purposes of trade. In the north-west wing is a neat and commodious Dwelling-House, with parlour, drawing-room, suitable sleeping rooms, domestic offices, and court yard, attached. These Premises are partly Freehold and partly Leasehold, the latter part held under leases granted by the Corporation of Devises for 94 years, commencing at Michaelmas, 1816, subject to small reserved rents amounting to 18s. 2d. annually.

Lot II.—All that valuable piece or parcel of Freehold Land, containing a frontage of 38 feet, a depth of 167 feet, and a width varying from 68 feet to 38 feet; advantageously situated for building or other purposes, adjoining Lot I., and now used as a timber-yard in the occupation of Mr. Edward Gane.

The whole of the above Premises are now let at an annual rental of £101. The Purchaser to have possession at Christmas.
To the Capitalist and man of business the above presents an eligible opportunity either for occupation or investment: the influx of trade arising from the extension of railway communication and other measures now in progress place it on a superior footing to any other disposable property of the same character in the neighbourhood.
To be viewed by permission of the tenants. Further particulars obtained on application to Mr. George W. Anstie, solicitor, Devises, or to the Auctioneers.

LONDON, Friday Evening, May 15, 1846.

Before this paper reaches the hands of our readers, it is probable that the Corn Bill will have passed through its last stage in the House of Commons, with a greater majority, and with less reluctance on the part of the minority than the resistance offered to its early progress would have led the public to expect. The manly testimony of Mr. Stafford O'Brien to the reality of Irish distress, the dreadful picture of the destitution of the labourers in Dorsetshire, truthfully and powerfully portrayed by Mr. Sheridan, are gratifying proofs that there are some in the ranks of the protectionists who will not sanction the falsehoods of faction, nor give currency to the inventions of party. Many of the protectionists who took a lead in opposing the ministerial measures when first proposed, are likely to absent themselves from the division on the third reading, because they are weary and ashamed of the leadership of Lord George Bentinck. His lordship, however, may still count on the support of those legislators who qualify themselves for the duties of statesmanship by making the stable their school, and the race-course their university, whose private tutors were grooms, and who selected jockeys as their most honoured professors. Patience is worn out by a debate which has so diminished in interest that the House was nearly counted out during its continuance. The only point which can engage a momentary addition is the amount of the majority on the division, and this we hope to be able to give in part of our impression.

Thursday night was mainly devoted to the case of Mr. Toulmin Smith, introduced to the House by Mr. Spooner; and we need hardly add that it was utterly unimportant, else it would not have been entrusted to the care of that very erratic gentleman. When this case was disposed of, Lord George Bentinck called the attention of the house to one of those brilliant discoveries commonly called “mares' nests.”

In a formal division on some minor point, the Government was left in a minority in the Canadian legislature, whereupon Lord George declared that our Colonial empire was about to be ruined by Free Trade, and that the Canadas were about to withdraw their allegiance from Great Britain, and throw themselves into the arms of the United States. Such an inference from the simple fact of the Canadian ministers being left in a minority on a mere question of adjournment, is a precious sample of protectionist logic. On this basis however, Lord George founded one of those stories which the great English dramatist has aptly described as “Tales told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.” Mr. Roebuck replied to the noble lord by a simple explanation of the facts of the case:

“We had had hardly any news from Canada for the last six weeks, and now that we had a small fragment of information, it was trumpeted forth by the organ of the protection party, as if there were something important in a division upon a motion for an adjournment. It was true that the Government were left in a minority of seven upon that division, but he would suggest to the noble lord that this result might have been attributed to some party disputes to which they were not in that house altogether unaccustomed. He might suppose the Government to be not very warmly supported, and he might suppose an acute party leader leading his forces in direct opposition to all his former political feelings. Now, this was not mere supposition, as he knew it to be the fact. Did not the noble lord know that the particular administration which had the confidence of the country had been put out of power, and that by various means a party was now in power which was not the party of the great Canadian people? That party was the one which was usually called the narrow English party of that country—the protectionists. The solicitor-general for Canada stated that patriotism, he found, meant pecuniary profit, and that loyalty meant selfishness; and so it was that the party which had always professed loyalty and affection to this country now turned round and threatened us with the annexation of Canada to the United States. The Orange Irishmen, and peccant Englishmen, were the parties who threatened us with the annexation of Canada. It was not the Lower Canadians who now spoke of annexation, but the English, the Irish, and the Scotch merchants, who threatened us with annexation when they thought their interests were in danger.”

We have long known that the great proportion of the Canadian population has felt the system of protection to be a serious disadvantage to the development of their national resources; the carrying trade on the St. Lawrence, and the system of canals connected with that river, would yield tenfold more profit than the timber monopoly, which is advantageous only to a few jobbers, while it seriously impedes agricultural progress. We have before us the report of a Free Trade meeting at Montreal, when the following resolution was unanimously adopted, though a small majority appeared in favour of maintaining the protection on timber:

“That, in order more effectually to secure the carrying trade by the River St. Lawrence, it is, in the opinion of this meeting, desirable that American produce, imported into Canada, should at once be admitted into England on the same terms as colonial produce, the advantage of which would be that a transit trade might be permanently established through Canada before the total repeal of the Corn Laws in Great Britain shall have left us exposed to unrestricted competition with the United States.”

Now here we have Canadian monopolists themselves joining in the demand for the repeal of those duties on the import of American corn, the preservation of which Lord George Bentinck declares to be the condition and essence of their allegiance. Mr. Roebuck has exposed, with caustic severity, the gross inconsistency of the protectionists on this question of Canadian corn:

“But of what did the noble lord complain? Within the last two years they passed the Canadian Corn Bill, Who were its greatest opponents? Why, the party opposite—the gentlemen who represented the landed interest. They called it the first great step to the destruction of the landed interest. But what was the noble lord's argument to-night? Why, it was based on the Canada Corn Bill. Let him remind them that they could not have two cries at once if they wished to be considered honest (hear, hear). To what cry did they attach themselves? Was it to the cry against or with the Canada Corn Bill? He did not dispute the noble lord's knowledge. No doubt the few months which he had given to the consideration of our commercial policy might have enabled him, by that species of divine intuition which he possessed, to acquire all sorts of knowledge upon all sorts of subjects; but here was a country of which, from particular circumstances, he had a particular knowledge, a knowledge which enabled him to suggest an explanation to the noble lord as to a subject which appeared to have puzzled him not a little. The noble lord said, the exportation from this country to Canada formed something like three eighths of the whole of our export trade. Did the noble lord know why it bore so high a proportion? If he took a glance at the map of the American Continent, he would see that on the south of the St. Lawrence lay a not unimportant country, that of the United States. The noble lord talked of Canada as if the exports thither were exports to Canada alone. Now they knew what that meant. The large Canadian imports were not to Canada, but through Canada. They went to the United States. Now the noble lord began by saying that he would prove the importance of Canada, and carried out his

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

THE PEERS AND THE PEOPLE.

In the course of our long and exciting controversy, we may have been occasionally betrayed into bitter expressions towards the landed aristocracy, but we confidently appeal to the general tone of this organ of the League, extending over seven years, and to the speeches of its leading orators, as proof that we have not sought to convert our agitation to democratic purposes. In the time of our weakness, when Whigs and Tories alike repudiated our principles, we resisted all offers of alliance from the advocates of organic change, whether in the guise of Radicalism, Complete Suffragism or Chartism. Ours has been a politico-economical struggle, and nothing more. We have not sought to pull down, or remodel institutions, or to touch constitutional forms and privileges. Upon questions of Church and State we have observed as strict a neutrality as if we had been an association of anti-quaries or geologists. Nor have we advocated Free Trade as a class interest. What we have demanded for one portion of the community, we have offered to all—freedom to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market. We have laboured to reconcile the interests of every calling with the universal application of a just principle, without the exclusion of farmers, landlords, or any one member of the community. Although we have been occasionally brought into collision with individual dukes and lords, who can charge us with having arrayed ourselves against the institution of the peerage? Nay, where have rank and title been more gladly welcomed than in the persons of the only three living peers who have joined the ranks of the League? Did Lords Radnor, Ducie, and Kinnaird, ever have a more willing or enthusiastic homage—was conventional precedence ever more deferentially offered them than in crowded meetings of Leaguers in London, Manchester, Bristol, Birmingham, and Dundee?

We are most sincerely anxious that this state of things should continue—that our agitation should neither merge in a conflict of classes, nor become, however remotely, a question of constitutional privilege. There is, however, danger ahead. The repeal of the Corn Laws is no longer a question at issue with the people, whose representatives have closed the controversy by the majority of last week. No human power can reverse that verdict of the Commons. Henceforth, therefore, the struggle, if it be prolonged, will be between the people and the peers. "What will the Lords do with the Bill?" is now the question everywhere. The public mind is nervously and irritably sensitive. The funds will rise and fall, like the barometer, as every rumour, adverse or favourable, reaches the city; and trade will be paralysed until the problem be solved—what will the Lords do?—Pass the Government measure gracefully and without mutilation, we would fain hope. If so, it is our conscientious opinion, that neither in a pecuniary sense, as touching their revenues, nor in a political or moral view, as affecting their influence and privileges, will the Free Trade triumph involve the slightest sacrifice to our landed aristocracy. But we regret to find that there is a large number, perhaps a majority, of the peers bent upon a different course. The Bill, it is said, is to be mutilated in committee. Everything is to be risked for the sake of a wretched attempt to retain a tax of a few shillings a quarter upon corn! We say everything is to be risked; because it is well known that any alteration in a money bill in the Lords is tantamount to its entire rejection. By the constitutional practice of the legislature, all taxes must originate in the Commons, at the request of the Crown. In the present instance, the Queen, through her Minister recommends the removal of the tax on corn as unnecessary, impolitic, and unjust. The Commons comply, and the Lords, we are told, are going to insist that the representatives of the people shall tax the food of the people!

We hardly like to anticipate so unwise a decision, but it may not be amiss to consider its consequences. The two houses will be brought into collision, and who shall yield? This might not be a question of very difficult solution if the matter rested solely in the hands of the statesmen and members of the two branches of the legislature; for we candidly confess we believe a majority of them might not be irreconcilably averse to a compromise. But the matter will be taken in hand by the public out of doors, and it will be settled there. The Free Trade agitation will instantly assume a new character. Instead of the proselytings and lecturings of the League, there will be a sharp agitation against the lords. It will, we repeat, become a struggle of the people against the Peers. Folks will ask why the bill has been rejected?—why the Lords insisted upon having a tax upon bread? Was it for revenue? No, they have nothing to do with providing revenue. Besides, in this case, the Queen and her Prime Minister have declared they don't require a tax upon corn. Was it for protection? People will then analyse bluntly and coarsely the incidence of this tax for protection. They will say it is intended to keep up the price of corn. They will ask, who and what are the men who want to enhance the price of corn, and the answer will be, that they are not manufacturers, or merchants, or tenant farmers, or shopkeepers, or labourers, but, to a man, landlords, whose rents are regulated by the price of corn. All this, and a great deal more, will be said, in a very different tone and spirit, to the past speeches of the Leaguers.

We do not wish to say one syllable which can be construed into an attempt to intimidate their lordships. They have a right to the credit of delivering an unbiassed verdict; and should their decision be, as we trust it will be, in favour of Free Trade, no body can justly charge them with having yielded to coercion or menace. But they have also a right to know that if they resist the Government measure—if they attempt to patch up a compromise of a small fixed duty, or to perpetuate Sir Robert Peel's diminished scale, the League will be no party to the measure. From the moment that the present bill is rejected or altered in the Lords, the League will fall back upon the country and renew the agitation for the full measure of justice; and thenceforth no minister will be entitled to a moment's confidence from the people who shall propose to Parliament any plan short of the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Law. We write with the full concurrence of the leaders and the council of the League, whose forbearance and moderation during the last four months have confirmed the confidence of the Free Traders, and deserved the respect of their opponents; and in their name we announce once for all that there shall be no compromise with injustice—that the question at issue is whether there shall be any tax upon the necessary food of the people. Yes, or no—this question shall for ever be decided. Should the lords say "aye," we answer "nay," and, in the confidence of a just and righteous cause, we shall appeal from their decision to the highest human tribunal,—the public opinion of this great empire.

WHAT WILL SIR ROBERT PEELE DO, IF THE LORDS MUTILATE THE BILL?

"When the time comes, honourable gentlemen will see whether her Majesty's Government are sincere or not. I can tell honourable gentlemen, that there is NO PROOF OF SINCERITY with regard to this Bill, WHICH SHALL NOT BE GIVEN in the event of its failure, or ALTERATION, in its progress through Parliament."
—SIR ROBERT PEELE, March 30.

We take this to be answer enough to the profoundly momentous question above indicated. The Premier has made it very easy to us all, to solve queries anticipatory of his course with respect to the great measure with whose doctrines he has charged himself. If the Lords mutilate the Bill, Sir Robert Peel WILL DO HIS DUTY. Let his sincerity be tested by the event of the "failure or ALTERATION" of the Bill—and "THERE IS NO PROOF OF SINCERITY WHICH SHALL NOT BE GIVEN." There will be no resigning—no running away—no desertion of the glorious and most responsible post which the Queen, and the people, and the course of events, and the necessities of the time, and the intelligence of the age, have committed to his fidelity and courage. He will not be faithless to a great trust—he will not let slip a great opportunity—he will not throw away a great power. His colleagues may resign—HE will not resign. In such a business, a Prime Minister has no colleagues. The country does not want a cabinet, but a MAN. Any cabinet, or any pro tempore substitute for a cabinet, will do the work of the time, if only we have the head and heart, the resolute manly will, of a statesman cognisant of national wants, in sympathy with national ideas, and bent on giving effect to the national purpose. If the Lords mutilate the Bill, Sir Robert Peel will go TO THE COUNTRY, though he go alone.

Our full and unhesitating conviction of this, we risk not merely on the Premier's deliberate and explicit pledges, but on the palpable demands of the crisis, as these must have already interpreted themselves to his sagacious and prescient mind. An appeal to the people, in the event supposed, is exactly the consummation to which the whole Parliamentary history of his measures points. An appeal to the people will be Sir Robert Peel's answer to the monopolist taunt, that he has "treacherously" and "perfidiously" used the pliancy of a once protectionist Parliament to break faith with protectionist constituencies. It will dispose of the question of the "moral competency" of the House of Commons. It will inform protectionist peers of that which they have professed so eager a solicitude to ascertain—the real opinion and will of the people. All along they have been saying, "Appeal to the country,"—with the implicit addition, "What the country says ought to be done, we will do." Thus far, Sir Robert Peel has, most wisely and justly—on grounds as strong in point of constitutional legality as of practical utility and necessity—declined taking a course which assumes the incompetency of the legislature to legislate, and which, had it been adopted, would have thrown the whole public business of the year into most disastrous confusion. Still, if they press him, he has nothing left for it but to take them at their word. If they must have it so, they shall have it so. If they appeal to Cæsar, to Cæsar shall they go.

For his character's sake—for the sake of that honourable name and fame in history which Sir Robert Peel has avowed to be a cherished object of his aspirations—he will keep the faith which he has pledged, and fulfil the just expectations which he has awakened. Not for an instant will he loose his hold of the great question with whose fortunes he has so manfully identified his own. At the very moment when history may be said to be already waiting, pen in hand, to inscribe his name on the noblest national enterprise of this age, Sir Robert Peel will not run away from his work, and take his chance of being called back to finish it another day. He will not leave the vacant niche to be filled by a rival. He will not risk losing the honour of a task, which, though he never did anything else afterwards—though, in the very hour of its completion, he retired from public life and became politically dead—he might contentedly show to after ages, as constituting his title to historic fame.

We repeat it, then—if the Lords mutilate the Bill, Sir Robert Peel will go to the country. He will bid the people—the real "Commons of England"—to judge between him and the faction that brand him "treacherous" for postponing a fictitious class interest to the most substantial and vital of national rights, and impudently use the people's name to consecrate a tax on the people's bread.

He will go to the country. Need we add—he will go to the country on an issue that the country can understand. In leaving the question to the people, he will take care to simplify it into a shape suited to the popular capacity. There will be an end, at once, and for ever, of the worse than nugatory concession of the three years' "interval of preparation." The offer which was made once; in the very vain hope of propitiating landlord prejudice, and disarming landlord hostility, will not be made again. Sir Robert Peel cannot repeat the sort of overture to compromise contained in the terms of his present bill. He has as good as told us that he cannot—and why he cannot. Since he made that overture he has seen what he did not see then. "During the debates on the question, his opinions have undergone a change, and the change is this—that restrictions which he at first believed to be impolitic, he now believes to be unjust." He did not perceive the injustice, when he first proposed the three years' reduced sliding scale—and these are those calling themselves Free Traders of long standing, who seem not to perceive it now. It was then a question of policy with him—to be dealt with, like other questions of mere policy, as one of degree—a little more or a little less. It is now a question of ethical obligation; it ranks among the moralities, and admits of no other answer than a plain downright Yes or No. If the Lords compel him to begin his work again, he must start from the point of his present moral convictions. He will say, not that "Monopoly is impolitic and inconvenient, and we must endeavour to get rid of it on the cheapest and easiest terms," but "Monopoly is wrong, and we will have none of it, on any terms." We entertain the fullest confidence—we cannot deem it a case open to the intrusion of a rational doubt—that if Sir Robert Peel must call in the people at last, to finish their own and his work, he will instantly unfurl the banner of Total and Immediate Repeal. In justice to the great principle which he has espoused, in justice to those by whom he has been so heartily and vigorously supported, in justice to himself and his own reputation as a statesman, he cannot do less than take that course which can alone ensure him the full, undivided, and enthusiastic support of the people.

We tell our friends everywhere to be of good cheer. Do any among them make themselves uneasy about the Parliamentary casualties which befall a Free Trade Government on those questions of second rate, or tenth rate, importance which have of late occupied so large a portion of the legislature's very abundant spare time? These are not worth a thought. They make no manner of difference in the position and power of the ministry. The Government is, with all its defeats, a surpassingly strong Government—inconceivably stronger than in the palmiest days of the "working majority." Sir Robert Peel may be defeated once a day, in each House of Parliament—it does not signify, and he knows, and the wiser among the landlords know, that it does not signify. He is our FREE TRADE MINISTER—and that makes up for everything. He can afford to be in a minority, any number of times that it may please fortune and the protectionists. He is irresistibly strong on the Corn Bill—and the Corn Bill is his only business now. No Parliamentary mishaps, no party weakness, can harm the minister who is in the act of championing the rights of industry, and untaxing the bread of the millions.

The people's Minister is, in every ordinary political sense, at the head of a very "weak Government," and his enemies, open and secret, are many and unscrupulous. Yet, despite all the intrigues, negotiations, and private party arrangements now on foot, or said to be on foot—despite all the rumours, and reports of rumours, that clog and thicken the political atmosphere, and make breathing difficult in "political circles," the people's cause is safe—safe in the people's own strength, union, and determination. We have kept throughout to our first faith, and we are rewarded through all the difficulties and temptations of a seven years' struggle; our question has been kept intact of party—and we now reap the fruits of our fidelity to principle. We are ready for all contingencies; ready to meet in the field of constitutional warfare the rash men who dream of stemming with a lordly "non-content" the tide of a nation's will—ready to obey, on the shortest notice, the summons of a patriotic Minister to work out our own enfranchisement—and ready to rend to shreds those Lilliputian meshes in which an unprincipled faction of monopolists and quasi-monopolists would entangle the noblest of causes.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Eighteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 23.

With unfeigned satisfaction we anticipate an early termination of the duty of holding up a Free Trade Mirror of legislative proceedings. The two great bills are now in the House of Lords—the Corn Bill and the Customs' Duties Bill; and in spite of hostile rumours, and threats of mutilation, we have some reason to believe that they will both pass through the trying ordeal of the great House of Protection, and finally become the law of the land.

The closing debate on Friday on the third reading and passing of the Corn Bill in the House of Commons was long, but interesting. The House sat from 4 o'clock in the afternoon till half-past 4 o'clock on the following morning. The sun was up long before the house: and broad daylight streamed in upon the important division. Although we gave the result in last Saturday's LEAGUE, there are some of the speeches which deserve a passing notice.

The early portion of the debate was comparatively uninteresting, none of the speakers throwing out a single new idea on the subject, or even by their manner enlivening it. At last Mr. D'Israeli rose. Everybody anticipated something. He was to make out his "complete and overwhelming case," and probably something more. His "complete and overwhelming case" was a complete and overwhelming failure; nor did he secure anything like attention until he got upon his own line of epigrammatic malignity and sparkling but most insolent personality. The early part of the speech was an elaborate attempt to show that though a Corn Law raised the price of food, it correspondingly increased the purchasing power of the community, and thereby augmented the commercial vitality of a country. Taking England as an agricultural as well as a commercial nation, he apprehended that the displacement of corn-growing labour by the competition of foreign-produced corn would injuriously affect our industrial energy. We were, relatively, less a manufacturing people than we were a century ago. Formerly our manufacturers were diffused over the country; now they are concentrated in one or two counties; and the policy which preferred a particular county to the entire kingdom was but a restoration of the heptarchy. The English agriculturist, comparing him with the corn growers of the rest of the world, wasted less and produced more than any other; and yet they were going to withdraw that protection from the English farmer under which our rural industry has been developed. Lincolnshire, in relation to agriculture, held a similar position as Lancashire did to manufactures; and its prosperity and productiveness were a striking testimony to the efficacy of protection. But for protection, Lincolnshire must have remained in its primitive condition, of wild wold, heathy fen, and plashy marsh. Nothing in the condition of the country—not even in that of Ireland—justified so great a change as the one now proposed. The change he attributed to the efforts of the Anti-Corn Law League—the cause of it must be traced to the energy and eloquence of a commercial confederation, which, however, was more remarkable for these qualities than for a knowledge of human nature, or of political science. This led him to slide into his attack on Sir Robert Peel. The agricultural party were not to be blamed for want of a combination similar to that evinced by the Anti-Corn-Law League: they confided in leaders who had deceived them. Nothing could be more complete than the success of Sir Robert Peel in deceiving his party. The first information of his intentions was furnished by a journal not in the habit of announcing facts except on the highest authority. Being abroad at the time, he knew that the highest potentates had sent to British ambassadors for an explanation, and British ambassadors had assured these high potentates that there was no truth in the rumour. After all the changes, the Minister who formed the omnipotent minority in the Cabinet met the house and his party as if they had deserted him, and not he them. But injustice had been done to Sir Robert Peel; for his success in converting the 112 who supported his measures against their own conviction, reminded him of that conversion of the Saxons by Charlemagne, when they were converted in battalions and baptised in platoons. Throughout his political life Sir R. Peel had traded on the intelligence of others; his career was a great appropriation clause; he was the burglar of other men's intellects; in our whole history there was no statesman who had committed so much petty larceny on so great a scale. True, the minister avowed that he was not humiliated by his change of policy. Humiliation was a matter of feeling, depending much on the idiosyncrasy of the animal; but if Sir Robert Peel did not feel humiliated, his country ought. He had bought his party on the cheapest, and had sold it on the dearest terms. But he felt confident that the country would not much longer submit to the huckstering tyranny of the Treasury bench, and though all confidence in public men was at present lost he believed that the national intelligence and spirit would once more revert to that which constituted the cause of the people, of the nation, of England. The whole speech was as great a failure in logic as it was successful in concentrated vituperation. Mr. D'Israeli was followed by Lord John Russell, who thought that Mr. D'Israeli was much happier in invective than in argument; his speech had little relation to the bill before them. Trusting that he was addressing the house for the last time on the subject of the Corn Law, he entered into details, showing that the proposition of the 8s. fixed duty in 1841 was no suddenly adopted idea, either on his own part or on that of the other members of the then Whig Government. He still thought that if it were practicable, a fixed duty would have been the best settlement of this great question, as it would have rendered the transition from protection to Free Trade comparatively unfeeling. But in the existing state of public opinion such a transition was impossible; the change to Free Trade was as imperative as its necessity was just. After arguing the general principles of Free Trade, he expressed himself not displeased with the disruption in the Conservative party. With all its activity and energy, it had no great public object for which to contend. The only thing on which it had been united was turning the Whig Government out of office. Sir Robert Peel was also undoubtedly to blame for his cautious reserve of opinion; but he had acted with Huskisson in the promotion of the Free Trade measures of that statesman, and the discordant party which accepted him as its leader ought to have known his predilections. He believed that the bill before the house would raise England amongst the nations of the world. Already its influence was manifest in the United States, with which he hoped that we would long remain in amity, and that a satisfactory arrangement would be made of the Oregon dispute; and, trusting that the House of Lords will pass it by a large majority, he expressed his cordial concurrence in the measure.

The First Lord of the Treasury then followed, making what we trust has also been his last speech in the House of Commons on the Corn Laws. He commenced by an expression of his belief that it would be an insult to the house and the country if he were to delay the final reading of the Bill by bandying personalities. He foresaw that the breaking up of political ties, and much acrimonious attack, would be the consequence of the change in his policy; but the smallest of the penalties which he contemplated was the continuance of the venomous assaults of Mr. D'Israeli. He who now reviewed his whole political career, and charged him with continuous petty larcenies, had been willing, in 1811 and 1812, to unite with him his political fortunes, and had given him the strongest proof of political confidence. He went over the reasons which had led to the change in his views and policy with respect to corn and trade. Though on the subject of protection to native agriculture he had changed, he gave a peremptory contradiction to the allegation that his present principles of commercial policy were at variance with the opinions of his whole political life, and concluded with an emphatic vindication of the motives which have actuated him as a Minister. "Deprive me," he said, "of power to-morrow, you cannot deprive me of the consciousness that I have exercised the power committed to me from no corrupt or selfish motive." These and other expressions were greeted with loud cheers.

Mr. D'Israeli assured the house that he had never applied to Sir Robert Peel for any favour whatever. A communication had been made to him in 1841, which he presumed came from the Government; and it was asserted that he had solicited a diplomatic appointment to Madrid. He denied it, and affirmed that his opposition to the Government proceeded not from personal disappointment, but conviction.

Sir Robert Peel said that, in 1841, he understood Mr. D'Israeli was ready to afford that proof of political confidence which is implied by acceptance of office.

Lord George Bentinck spoke at great length, though, from the lateness of the hour (or rather, from the early hour), but little of it has been reported. The same reason operated against an adequate report of the speech of Mr. Villiers, who most fitly closed this debate, which, we trust, crowns his longlabours on the great question of the Corn Laws.

The house then divided, when the numbers were—

For the third reading of the bill	327
Majority	98

The bill was then passed amid loud cheering, which, when it subsided, Mr. Eliot Yorke, the brother of the Earl of Hardwicke, proposed, much after the fashion of a schoolboy, that the title of the bill should be "The Foreign Lands Improvement Bill," alias "The Ministerial Mutability Consolidation Bill." He was too late; the bill was passed; and members went home to bed or to breakfast.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, there was what we may literally term a sham debate on the order of the day for bringing up the report on the Customs' Duties Bill.

Lord George Bentinck, in a speech in which he urged that the reductions proposed in the tariff were all in favour of countries commercially hostile to us, while we did nothing in favour of such countries as China, which received our manufactures on favourable terms, and during which he criticised in detail the commercial policy of the Government, especially with reference to our colonies, moved that the report be taken into consideration that day six months.

Mr. Lawson and Mr. Alderman Humpfrey having addressed the House,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer vindicated the commercial policy of the Government, as conducive to the interests of the consumer, favourable to commerce and trade, and beneficial to every interest of the country.

Mr. Banks reiterated the usual arguments, contending that the measures of the Government were wholly distasteful to the country.

Mr. Hawes asked, if that were so, why no one connected with manufactures had that night joined in opposition to measures which must as seriously affect them as others? The commerce and trade of the country were really seriously affected by the delay, and urged the importance of arriving at a definite conclusion.

Mr. Peter Borthwick, Mr. Plumptre, Dr. Bowring, Col. Sibthorp, and Mr. Henley, spoke for and against the measures, as did also Mr. Hudson, who gravely assured the house that he had listened most attentively to the debate,—a fact of which there was a good-natured doubt expressed by loud laughter and cheering.

Lord George Bentinck then withdrew his amendment, a little to the surprise of the house, and the report was received, and on Tuesday the Customs' Duties Bill was read a third time and passed, after a brief conversation on the subject of agricultural statistics, and the bill was straightway carried up to the House of Lords.

Turn we now to the House of Lords, where the future interest of these great measures now centres. On Monday about five o'clock, the Corn Bill was carried up to the bar, with the usual announcement of "My lords, a message from the Commons." And shortly afterwards, F. M. the Duke of Wellington rose, and the crowded house became still. In his blunt and brief way he moved that what he termed the "Corn Law Repeat Bill" be read a first time.

The Duke of Richmond rose, and, with considerable emphasis and warmth, entered his protest against the measure and the Ministers by whom it had been introduced. He regretted to see the distinction which was drawn between public and private honour. Sir Robert Peel was a man of strict honour; his private honour was unimpeachable; and at Tamworth his word was his bond. But he did not consider it to be consistent with his honour as a public man, to abandon all the principles he had ever professed, and to induce others to violate promises and pledges. The present Parliament, elected for the support or protection, had no right to abrogate it; and he trusted that the House of Lords would sustain their character with the country, and stop rash and dangerous legislation, full of peril both to great interests and public confidence. He, however, reserved his formal opposition till the second reading.

Lord Brougham thought that a conscientious change of opinions in a statesman was honourable, and reminded the Duke of Richmond that he was a member of the Government which, in 1831, never dreamed of advising a dissolution of Parliament until it had rejected the Reform Bill.

After an exchange of explanations from Lord Brougham and the Duke of Richmond,

The Marquess of Londonderry deprecated personal attacks upon Sir Robert Peel for a change of opinion, seeing the Duke of Richmond had himself frequently changed his position in that house.

The Duke of Richmond assured the house that he had only expressed himself on the present occasion, because, on the second reading of the bill, he intended altogether to abstain from personal considerations.

The Earl of Ripon was glad to hear this assurance, partly for his own sake (this raised great laughter, the noble earl, as Mr. Robinson, being the author of the Corn Bill of 1815), and partly on account of Sir Robert Peel. He was, however, ready to meet any attacks which might be made upon him for his share in the awful responsibility of the present measure.

"There is no terror, in thy threats,
For I am armed so strong in honesty,
That they pass by me as the idle wind,
Which I respect not."

The bill was then ordered to be printed, and to be read a second time on Monday next.

On Tuesday, the Duke of Buccleugh moved the first reading of the Customs' Duties Bill, which had just been brought up from the House of Commons, where a few minutes previously it had been read a third time and passed.

The Duke of Richmond entered his protest against the measure, as an unauthorised abandonment of the great principle of protection to British industry, and leading consequently to the destruction of our colonial system, and an ultimate sweeping away of all customs' duties.

Lord Montagu would not admit the principle thus laid down, for the doctrine of Free Trade recognised a clear distinction between protective and revenue duties.

A conversation, partly explanatory and partly contradictory, arose between the Duke of Richmond, Lords Montagu, Beaumont, and Brougham, when Earl Grey rose, and declared that he could not accept the measures of the Government as a perfect scheme of Free Trade, but only as an instalment. He was still, as he had ever been, against all duties for protection; and he could answer for the great body of the manufacturers of this country, that they desired not a particle of protection for themselves when they asked for the removal of all protective and differential duties on every article of consumption.

Lord Ashburton said that it was important that they should have full information on the question respecting which new light had so suddenly dawned on the Government. Under this new system, of what future use were to be our colonies? All the manufacturing body were not in favour of Free Trade; and he felt it to be an unwarrantable assumption during the debates in the House of Commons, that the only interest which required compensation was land. During a storm, it might be some consolation that all were to founder together; but here, in a scheme of policy threatening general ruin, they were told that there was no interest likely to suffer, unless it were the agricultural. He protested against the shuffling logic which confounded revenue and protective duties together.

Lord Montagu would not suffer any imputation to rest upon him of unfair argument.

Lord Ashburton meant nothing of a personal nature—he only spoke generally.

The Earl of Dalhousie pointed out the inconvenience of raising a debate on the first reading of a bill just brought up from the House of Commons. At the proper period the Government would be prepared to adduce good and sufficient reasons that it was for the general good of the community that the measures of the Government should be adopted.

The Duke of Richmond admitted that it was an unusual course to raise a debate on the first reading of such a bill, but then it was justified by the fact, that the Government had adopted the unusual course of suddenly abandoning all the former principles of protection to British industry, which only last year, they had strenuously advocated.

The Earl of Haddington reminded the house that the Government had not suddenly become advocates of Free Trade, for during several previous sessions they had heard, from the cross benches on which the Duke of Richmond sat, earnest declamations against the course which they were pursuing. The delay which had occurred in bringing up these measures had been owing to a protracted opposition, unexampled in the history of Parliamentary debate; and whether their lordships approved or rejected them, it was highly expedient that a termination should be put to the uncertainty in which the commerce and trade of the country were kept.

A conversation now arose as to the day on which the second reading of the Customs' Duties Bill should take place.

Lord Stanley rose, and suggested that it might be nominally fixed for Thursday, the 28th, with the understanding that if the debate on the Corn Bill was not then over, it should be fixed for a still future day.

The Duke of Richmond said that even if he disagreed with Lord Stanley, he would acquiesce in the arrangement proposed by him, because he looked upon him as their mainstay in the approaching debates. This remark provoked loud laughter.

The bill was then read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

We give below the entire speeches of Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel, on Friday night, on the third reading of the Corn Bill; and likewise a corrected copy of Mr. Villiers' speech at the close of this memorable debate. The speech of Mr. Villiers was very imperfectly reported in the morning papers, from the lateness of the hour when he rose.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S SPEECH.

LORD J. RUSSELL: In rising to address the house after the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, I should feel certainly considerable hesitation if I thought that the hon. gentleman had been equally successful in his commercial theories and in his agricultural views, as in his powerful invectives against the right hon. baronet the first Minister of the Crown, whom he accuses of having deserted his party (hear, hear). But the house cannot but have felt how great was the contrast, and that the hon. gentleman's talent lies in wrapping up and adorning in very powerful language his invectives against the Minister, rather than in proving that the bill before the house is not a measure which should pass into a law (hear, hear); and, as it does happen that the business of to-night is to determine whether this bill shall be read a third time, and not whether we shall pass a censure upon the Minister of the Crown, I feel much comforted in addressing the house after the hon. gentleman (hear, hear). I acknowledge that the hon. member had a good opportunity,—for I am rather a spectator than a party concerned,—which has not been neglected by him, of dwelling upon the conduct of the hon. members opposite with reference to this subject. But to begin with the beginning, according to the old rule. The hon. member begins by an accusation of abandoned arguments. I do not think this need at all hang upon the minds of the hon. gentleman and his party; we have no right to complain, for they have not abandoned arguments which are not merely old, but have been repeated twenty, fifty, or a hundred times; arguments which we supposed had been disposed of and become obsolete. Indeed I do not know if the whole case of the protectionists could be more accurately stated than in the language of an old letter which a noble lord has referred to as having been written by an ancestor of his in the year 1610. I think that letter does contain, in its antique language, the whole argument of the protectionists, and to this day they have not abandoned that argument. But I did suppose that some of these old arguments—prejudices, I must call them—had been abandoned and become obsolete. The noble lord's ancestor said that, in the year 1610, the wicked bakers were always raising the price of bread. Even this argument is not abandoned, for an hon. member to-night has told us that potatoes in Yorkshire are cheap, and may be had for 2s. a-bushel, but that the wicked potato monopolists in London will not sell them so cheaply; and the simple Yorkshiremen (who I always thought were sufficiently alive to their own interest), though they have potatoes in abundance, do not send them to a market where they can get 10 times the price they obtain in the country; so that there is not any one of the arguments of the protectionists which has been abandoned by them. The hon. member said that I have abandoned the doctrine that protection is the bane of agriculture. I have not abandoned that doctrine, for I do consider that the agriculture of this country has been injured by protection. I do not deny that under that system there has been high cultivation in several parts of the country; but in other parts of the country cultivation is still in a backward state; and in those parts where there is good agriculture it dates only from six, or eight, or ten years ago; and my opinion is, that if protection had not been kept up, the agriculture of this country would have been greatly improved ("No, no"). If it must be admitted that within a few years agriculture has made enormous advances in this country, they have not been equal to the impulse given to agriculture by the number of persons seeking to possess property and to cultivate farms; and it is only since about ten years ago that these great advances have been made. But the noble lord who commenced this debate asked me whether protection was not the bane of manufacture, and I say it is. First, with respect to cotton and wool, the protection being insufficient, did no harm; but where the protection has been an effectual protection, trade and manufactures have been injured by that protection. But let me suppose instead of altering that system of protection no such system had ever existed, and we bought our wheat and bread and manufactures as cheaply as we could, and imposed taxes solely for the revenue; I should like to know what would be thought of a Minister who should come down to Parliament and say, "I have a great plan to propose, in order to promote the domestic industry of the country; I propose that you should pay dearer for the articles you consume; that you should pay a high price for your bread, and high prices for your coffee and your sugar." Why, if that were the case, I believe that such a system, if proposed now for the first time, would be scouted at once; and not the authority of St. George himself, far less that of his namesake, would succeed in persuading the house to adopt it. But this is not a new thing proposed for the first time; it is an old system, and the question is, how is it to be changed? And I must beg the permission of the house—and I trust I address the house for the last time on this subject (hear)—and I request their attention for a few minutes whilst I state what has been my course on the subject of the Corn Laws for a number of years past. When I gave my support to the principles of Mr. Huskisson, I considered him the soundest Minister in his views respecting corn and commerce the country ever had, and I never voted against him. But when I perceived the working of the bill of 1828, and weighed the arguments and observations respecting that measure, as I thought that bill was working injuriously to the country, I stated, first to Mr. Ricardo, and afterwards to the house, that my opinion had been changing in favour of a fixed duty, and I thought then that a moderate fixed duty was the best system that could be adopted, and a permanent fixed duty of 10s. a qr. was first mentioned by me to Mr. Ricardo. In the year 1840 that question was again brought before the house, and I again stated my opinion in favour of a fixed duty; but I wish to show further, that that was not a solitary opinion, and that of the Government to which I belonged the greater portion had stated the same opinion. In 1840 the question of the Corn Laws was brought before both houses, in the House of Lords by Lord Fitzwilliam, and on those two occasions 11 members of Lord Melbourne's Cabinet voted for a consideration of the Corn Laws—in the House of Lords for a resolution that it was expedient to reconsider them, and in this house for a committee, I declaring that either myself or my right hon. friend then the President of the Board of Trade would propose a fixed duty, if that committee were granted. I said at that time that I thought the settlement of the tithe question and the New Poor Law made a great difference as to the corn question, and that a greater competition with foreign corn and foreign produce might be adopted with safety to British agriculture. There were two or three members of the Cabinet who did not give any opinion on the subject, but of those who did, Lord Melbourne, the Prime Minister, and one other member of the Cabinet, voted against any change. There was an opinion of Lord Melbourne's given on the occasion, which has been so often referred to that I beg to state what Lord Melbourne did say on the occasion (hear). Referring to Lord Fitzwilliam, he said, "The noble earl proposes that it is neither expedient nor necessary to maintain the present Corn Laws. Now, although I am distinctly of opinion that it is expedient, yet I wish to guard myself against being supposed to be determined always to maintain the existing laws. I never pledged myself to that, nor do I mean to do so. It is no stubborn question of principle, and I will not pledge myself that various considerations of policy might not arise which would justify, if not render necessary, a different course." Now, with that opinion so given by Lord Melbourne while he voted against the proposed change, and four members of the Cabinet in the other house, and all those who were in this house declaring for the change, that was going as far in favour of a change in the Corn Laws as Mr. Canning ever went at the end of his life on the Catholic question. Then I say, after these facts in 1839 and 1840, that the whole ministry as an united Cabinet should in 1841 propose a change in the Corn Laws was not surprising (hear). Sir, I feel justified in thus troubling the house with this detail, because I know that it has been over and over again said, for years, that the proposal of 1841 was a sudden thought produced by the difficulties of the Ministry. The fact was, that we had long, as individual members of the Government, been for a fixed duty, but then we for the first time proposed, as a Ministry, what we thought should be the amount of that fixed duty. I have already said that if the circumstances of 1841 could come over again, I should still be of opinion that a moderate fixed duty would be the best change from the law of 1828. I was of opinion that when the laws of protection had not only been imbedded in your statute book, but also incorporated in the habits of your people, these changes should be made gradually, and with a general assent. I believe that the manufacturing interest and the Anti-Corn-Law League would then have been prepared to accept an 8s. duty, although they would still have considered it a high duty (cries of "No, no"). I have authority, good authority, for making that statement (hear). Sir, from that time to the middle of last year I was still the advocate of a fixed duty, as being the best mode of changing the law. I considered, that after a fixed duty had lasted for a number of years, and a steady trade in corn had been the consequence, the change to Free Trade would be almost imperceptible, and that it would excite no panic or alarm. But, Sir, when those changes were obstinately resisted, when for seven years the association called the Anti-Corn-Law League had advocated this question in public, and had made the deepest impression on the public mind, the question bore no longer the same aspect. Having had the offer of a fixed duty rejected, there was not, from the days of the Sibyl down to the time when Mr. Canning threw over the securities on the Catholic question, any precedent for adhering to an offer that had been rejected (hear, hear, hear). Therefore I had to consider last year, and I think I have to consider it now, whether there was anything short of the settlement proposed by the right hon. baronet, resting on total repeal, which was likely to give satisfaction to the country, or to terminate the angry discussions on the question (hear, hear). Had I been able to carry a fixed duty with the general consent of both the manufacturing and agricultural interests, and with the concurrence of the great body of the people, I might have felt proud to accomplish that object. But to be placed in the situation of defending a duty which could scarcely be called a large protection, and yet which would be the constant source of irritation—to defend such a duty from year to year, and debate after debate, would have been a position which I confess I was not anxious to occupy. I am therefore of opinion, that as matters now stand, the question is between keeping up the present protection, which most gentlemen seem to think can scarcely be maintained, and the total abolition, after the lapse of a few years, which the right honourable baronet proposes of all the duties on corn. Do I say that it is the way in which I should at first have wished to have made the change? No; I agree with Adam Smith and Ricardo, and others, that such changes should be gradual, and so conducted as to inflict as little injury as possible on existing interests; but, as matters now stand, and as the question is now put before the country, believing that repeal of the Corn Laws is a right object, and that in itself it is the best system, I see no course between keeping up the system of protection as it exists, or to come to a total repeal almost immediately (hear, hear). Sir, I may as well tell the honourable gentleman who spoke last, that at the same time that he made an assertion he made an admission also. He admitted that the Corn Laws tend to enhance the price of corn, and that at the same time the power of the community to purchase was increased also ("hear, hear," from Mr. Roebuck). But, Sir, while what he admitted is capable of proof (and his admission strengthens that proof), he gave at the same time no proof of the other part of his proposition—that the power to purchase was also increased by this law. The hon. gentleman said, indeed, that the prices of corn would be ruinously low—that new markets would be opened, immense supplies of corn introduced, and the English labourer displaced. But let us observe in the first instance that his argument destroys entirely what has been the main strength of the case for protection—that we ought to be independent of foreign nations for our supply of food. I could understand, if all our supplies of corn came from one or two countries, and they our rivals, that in time of war this country might run a danger of scarcity from the supplies being intercepted. I have, however, gone over in my mind the case of Russia, Prussia, and America, and I find that during the last century, as regards the two former, and since 1783 as to the latter, it has been a very few years indeed during which we have been at war with either; and that there was no period at which we were at war with all. I was comforted by this reflection, because it showed that we need not regard with apprehension our dependence on foreigners. But the hon. member went further and said we could receive a supply of corn from Hungary, Spain, and Egypt; in fact, that there was no place on the globe which would not send us supplies of corn. Then what becomes of his argument as to the fear of war? So long as we retain our maritime superiority, and are at peace with nine out of the ten of the nations of the globe, we shall have the supply the honourable gentleman has so kindly told us of (hear, hear). But now as to the very low prices the honourable gentleman told us of. He tells us of a number of places in Hungary, Sissek among the rest, from which corn would be brought at 18s. the quarter. I confess, Sir, it does appear to me that this is very like another Tamboff story. I rather think that this immense supply can scarcely be calculated upon from those places. I find that there were even very low prices after that, the averages having been from 40s. to 50s., and I at least am not much alarmed at such a rivalry with this country. It is, indeed, very much a question whether the prospect of having a great quantity of cheap corn is a prospect which ought to alarm the people of this country (hear, hear). I have heard the honourable gentleman, the member for Somersetshire (Mr. Miles) go on by the hour, showing how great would be the fall in the price of wheat, and at last we began quite to dread that a gentleman's butcher's bill would fall almost to nothing; and now the hon. gentleman, the member for Shrewsbury, gives us additional alarm about the butter, and has shown that our bread will be excessively cheap indeed (laughter). Why, my opinion is, that if you admit there will be a large quantity of bread, as an honourable gentleman said at the commencement of to-night's discussion, there will be a great many mouths to eat it—that there will be a much greater consumption of food by having a greater plenty, and thereby consuming many of the products of agriculture. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) gave us a very vivid picture of the state of Lincolnshire, owing to the existence of protection; but it is not partly owing also to the flourishing state of manufactures, and the ready market for the agricultural produce, that produce being demanded and consumed by the persons who are dependent on the foreign trade of this country (hear, hear)? And much of that protection at the same time co-exists with an increased foreign trade in respect to corn. I do not feel those apprehensions which the hon. gentleman has expressed of an increased foreign trade in corn; I think that in some years great quantities of corn will come into this country in the expectation of prices which will not be realised; but that there will be a permanent depression of the market such as to cripple the agriculture of this country is not an apprehension that I think need be felt (hear, hear). The hon. gentleman has spoken of the great fluctuations in this market. I will not venture with him to compare the fluctuations which have occurred in the European and American markets; there may be causes for these fluctuations of which we are not aware. But with regard to the fluctuations in this market, they have been not only very considerable, but the prices have been exceedingly high. In January, 1838, corn was 52s. the quarter; in December, it was 78s. 4d.; and in January, 1839, it rose to 81s. 6d., falling again to 65s. in October. Is there not to be found in the fluctuations of these two years a very sufficient reason for the Government saying, "Let us have a greater admission of foreign corn; let us, if possible, have the people of this country better fed than they now are" (cheers)? I said just now that I think we have got accustomed to much higher prices of corn than our ancestors had any notion of. Looking to the prices which ruled in the last century, after there was an admission of foreign corn, in 1763, when this country ceased to be an exporting country, and there became a large import of corn, I find that Mr. Burke, in a pamphlet of his, says, with no sort of compassion for agriculture, that he thought the people had no great cause to complain of the high prices of bread, because, for many years, the prices of Baltic wheat ruled from 32s. to 40s. Taking the years from 1752 to 1784, the price per quarter for wheat was about 45s. That was a price which was not generally complained of; and so little complained of, that when in 1791 Mr. Pitt proposed that the duty should fall to sixpence, when the price rose from 50s. to 61s., Lord Liverpool in the House of Lords spoke of it as a great injury to the manufacturing classes. We may believe that high prices in a time of war, and especially depression of the currency, altered our views and made us expect that there ought to be much higher prices of corn than were just—much higher prices than the producer was entitled to (hear, hear, hear). Look likewise to the question as it regards manufactures and corn (hear, hear). We find that while the prices of manufactures have fallen about 23 per cent., the prices of corn have risen about 20 per cent. (hear). Is not that a reason in some respects why we should not exclude foreign corn; is it not a reason why—as manufactures have fallen to so great a degree, as corn has thus risen in comparison to the last century—you should no longer retain a law which presents such obstacles to its import. The hon. gentleman has spoken of an important principle of which he has been the advocate; but, unless it was for maintaining the present Corn Law, I do not know what that important principle was. The hon. gentleman referred to our colonies, and asks, are we going to ruin them? Now I do not think we run any risk with respect to our colonies (hear, hear). I think that they have great advantages, setting apart those which they may enjoy from the differential duties. The law for the colonies, I think, ought to be proceeded with more gradually than that with respect to the people of which we are the representatives; but being, as they are, united to this great empire, forming a part of this empire, they will not be sorry to see this restrictive system abolished (cheers). And as for Canada, I cannot find in the accounts from that colony any symptom of that alarm which has been spoken of (hear, hear). It does not appear either from the meetings of the house of the Legislative Assembly, or from the public meetings, that the people of Canada do entertain those fears, or those insuperable objections of which we have heard to the change (hear, hear). The hon. gentleman ended his speech by giving an account of the mode in which the right hon. gentleman opposite came into power, and of the manner in which he abandoned the principles he before professed. Now, upon this subject, I cannot agree in thinking that all the blame belongs exclusively to the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues. I think that some part of it must be shared by those who for so many years have been his followers (cheers). I think, indeed, that the right hon. gentleman, coming forward to declare that that system of protection, of which he has long been the upholder, was unjust, having declared some four years ago that another bill of which he was a great opponent in opposition, was fraught with injustice and founded on injustice, shows a want of wisdom in his former opinions upon political matters.

But when I consider what the party was which existed in 1841, I am not one of those who lament the disruption which has taken place (cheers and laughter). I will frankly confess that, in my opinion, there was one inherent defect in that great Conservative party which came into power in 1841. Their discipline was admirable; their machinery for elections was exceedingly well organised; they had candidates for every hustings, being, I may say, "Bene nati, bene vestiti, mediocriter docti" (laughter); and these gentlemen had many party cries which they found of exceeding value at the elections, with little inventions of their own (hear, hear). There was the fable of the Lichfield-house compact; another fable of Mr. O'Connell governing the whole Whig party; and various other inventions which indicated a great deal of fancy on the part of those who used them, found exceedingly useful, and which diminished by degrees, but certainly to the very smallest possible amount, the majorities of the Whig Government. At the same time there were great orators and great leaders in both houses of Parliament: persons, too, of every grade. There was, which was a great glory, the Duke of Wellington at the top, and at the bottom, with ready though smaller services, were the runners of the Carlton (laughter). Yet there was one thing which was wanting to this great Conservative party, and that was, some public object for which to contend (loud cheers). Mr. Burke says that a party means a "union of men for some great object of public welfare"; but such a union did not exist among that party (loud cheers). The opinions of many honourable gentlemen who have spoken in the course of this discussion against the measure of the Government were very decided, and in all cases, no doubt, very honest. I think, however, that often they were exceedingly narrow (hear, hear, hear). These opinions were that protection, that the whole system of protection to native industry, was bound up with the prosperity of this country (great cheering from the protectionists). They had also great fears of the Roman Catholics, and demanded that the Protestant ascendancy, the Protestant supremacy, or, as Lord Stanley called it, the Protestant constitution, should be maintained above all others. Among their leaders such were the views entertained, and, I do not doubt, honestly entertained, but they chose the right hon. gentleman, now First Minister of the Crown, who had sat with Mr. Huskisson, as a great promoter of Mr. Huskisson's measure, who had acted with caution in Mr. Huskisson's measures of Free Trade, but who was known, in principle, to be of those opinions of Mr. Huskisson, in favour of Free Trade, and against the system of protection (hear, hear). The right hon. gentleman, too, in regard to the Catholics, had been the person who moved the Relief Bill for the removal of the disabilities under which they laboured; and he repeatedly declared in general terms his persuasion that that Act ought not to be repealed, and that it should be observed in the spirit as well as the letter. Those opinions as to Free Trade and protection, relating to the measure of 1842, have led him in time to the measure of 1846. Those opinions as to the Roman Catholics led him to the Maynooth Bill, which met with such violent opposition last year. But then, I say, what was this great Conservative party? What but a union of men to turn out a Government they disliked? but being in office they had no bond of union, and no principle which they held in common (cheers). When that opposition was carried on entirely against particular measures of the Whig Government, when these measures were found fault with from day to day, and no general principle was stated as the ground of opposition, when the party was going on in its course with the prospect of final triumph, how came none of those gentlemen to ask, with Sir Christopher Hatton, "What mean these mighty preparations?" And is their reply, that they could not till the play began, that till their party was in office they could not give an answer. In fairness they ought to have come to some understanding when in opposition, as to the principle they were to carry out when in power (cheers, and cries of "hear"); and therefore I do not wonder that they are disappointed in this and other measures. I think the right hon. gentleman to blame. He ought not causelessly to have reserved his opinion (cheers from the protection benches); but he ought to have stated to them fully the principles on which he acted—principles in which I see little to find fault (cheers from the protection benches), however much they might be blamed by honourable gentlemen opposite. But to go on week after week and year after year in order to overturn Government, risking the peace and safety of Ireland (cheers),—risking the security and tranquillity of the empire, without having some settled views as to the way in which Ireland might be tranquillised, and the empire governed—that was a fatal defect in their Government; and I am not sorry that that defect should have led to their dissolution. I can admire the Cavaliers of 1684, who struggled on behalf of their sovereign against popular rights—I can admire the Jacobites of 1784, who fought for the Stuarts against what I believe the just cause of the house of Hanover; I can admire in both cases the chivalrous spirit, the determined loyalty, the firm adherence to settled opinions which led men to contend for those two unfortunate causes. But when I come to this triumphant cause of 1845, I find such an absence of all chivalry, such a want of all united principle, that in my opinion it were far better that men so disunited in principle should, as a party, be totally disconnected. Honourable gentlemen opposite have stated that they consider the measure before the house injurious to the country. They have done great credit to themselves, not only by the great talent, but by the spirit with which they have asserted their opinions. They conceive that the bill will tend to lower this country among the nations of the globe. I consider, on the contrary, that it will tend to raise this country among the nations of the globe. I think it will tend to foster peace and amity among them. Looking at one of the greatest nations of the globe, I am happy to find there are symptoms of returning feelings of amity and good will. When I read the speeches of Webster, Calhoun, and others, I forget all the idle menace wafted from the other side of the Atlantic. I trust her Majesty's Government will be able to fix finally the limits which divide the dominions of her Majesty from those of the United States; and I trust the convention or treaty which shall settle that boundary will be but the prelude of a more intimate connection between us and that vast commonwealth of a free people; that we shall carry on together our manufactures and our agriculture, vying with each other, if you will, to make our productions more and more perfect, striving, in the neutral markets of the world, for pre-eminence; striving also, in our respective branches of production, that we may clothe them and they may feed us, but hoping that there never shall be occasion to cross the bayonets of Britain and America on any bloody field whatever (loud cheers). Sir, with this wish that such may be the prelude of this bill, to which I trust the other House of Parliament, should it pass by a great majority here, will give their assent. I shall give my hearty support to the motion for the third reading (great cheering).

SIR R. PEEL'S SPEECH.

SIR R. PEEL: Sir, I believe it is now nearly three months since I first proposed, as the organ of her Majesty's Government, the measure which I trust is about to receive this night the sanction of the House of Commons; and considering the lapse of time, considering the frequent discussions that have taken place, considering the anxiety of the people of this country that these debates should be brought to a close (cheers), I feel, Sir, that I should be offering an insult to this country, if I condescended to bandy personalities on such an occasion as this (loud cheers). Sir, I foresaw that the course which I had taken from a sense of public duty would expose me to serious sacrifices; I foresaw, as its inevitable result, that I must forfeit friendships which I sincerely valued, that I must interrupt political relations in which I took a sincere pride; but the smallest of the penalties which I contemplated was the continued venomous attacks of the member for Shrewsbury (loud and vehement Opposition cheering). Sir, I will only say of that hon. gentleman, that if he, after reviewing the whole of my previous political life—a life of 30 years before my accession to office in 1841—if he then entertained the opinion of me which he now professes—if he thought I was guilty of those petty larcenies from Mr. Horner and others, of which he has spoken to-night, it is surprising that in 1841, after that long experience of my public career, he should have been prepared to give me his confidence (cheers); it is still more surprising that he should have been ready, as I think he was, to unite his fortunes with mine in office (loud cheers)—thus implying the strongest proof which any public man can give of confidence in the honour and integrity of a Minister of the Crown (continued cheering). Sir, I have explained more than once what were the circumstances under which I felt it my duty to take this course. I did feel in November last that there was cause for apprehension of scarcity and famine in Ireland (“oh, oh,” and cheers). I am stating what were my apprehensions at that time, and what were the motives under which I acted; and those apprehensions, if denied now, were at least shared by hon. gentlemen who sit below the gangway, because the member for Somerset did expressly state that at the period to which I refer, he was prepared to acquiesce in the suspension of the Corn Laws (loud cheers); and another hon. gentleman, a recent addition to this house, who spoke with great ability the other night, the member for Dorset, distinctly declared that he thought I should have abandoned my duty, if I had not advised that, considering the circumstances of Ireland, the restrictions upon the import of foreign corn should be removed (cheers). I may have been wrong, but my impression was, first, that duty towards a country threatened with famine required that that which had been the ordinary remedy under all similar circumstances should be resorted to, namely, that there should be a free access to the food of man from whatever quarter it should arrive. Sir, I was prepared to give that best proof which public men can in general give of the sincerity of their opinions, by tendering my resignation of office, and devolving upon others the duty of proposing this measure. And, Sir, I felt this: that if these laws were once suspended, and there was an unlimited access to food, the produce of other countries, I, and those with whom I acted, felt the strongest conviction that it was not for the public interest—that it was not for the interest of the agricultural party, that an attempt should be made permanently to re-impose restrictions on the import of food (hear). I could not propose the re-establishment of the existing law with any guarantee for its performance. As the noble lord says, I had acted with Mr. Huskisson in the years 1824, 1825, 1826, in revising the commercial system, and applying to that revision the principles of Free Trade. In 1842, after my accession to office, I proposed the revision of the Corn Laws. Had anything taken place at the election of 1841 which precluded that revision? Was there a public assurance given to the people of this country at the election of 1841 that the existing amount of protection to agriculture should be retained? (“Yes, yes.”) There was? Then, if so, you were as guilty as I was (Opposition cheers). If there was the assurance given that the amount of protection to agriculture that existed in 1840 and 1841 should be retained, opposition ought to have been made by you to the revision of that system (cheers). Why was the removal of the prohibition upon foreign meat and foreign cattle assented to? That removal must have been utterly at variance with any assurance that the protection to agriculture which existed in 1840 and 1841 should be continued (hear, hear). Yet that removal was voted by this house by large majorities (hear); and after the passing of the bill of 1842, was I not repeatedly asked this question—“Now you have passed this bill; now you have enacted a new Corn Law, will you give a public assurance that to that law you will at all times adhere?” And did I not uniformly decline to give any such assurance (“hear,” from the protectionists)? I said I had no intention of proposing an alteration of that law at the time the question was put to me (“Oh, oh!” from the protectionists); but I distinctly declared I would not fetter myself from the discussion of this question (“oh, oh!”—with cheers from the Opposition). These things are upon record. And then, it was impossible for me, consistently with my own convictions, to propose the re-enactment of the existing law, after the suspension of its operation, with any security of its continuance (loud cries of “hear, hear, hear”). I think the question that naturally arose was this,—shall we propose some diminished protection to agriculture in the state of public feeling that would exist after the suspension of restriction, or shall we propose a permanent and ultimate settlement of this question (hear, hear)? And now, after all these debates, I am firmly convinced that it is better for the agricultural interest to contemplate the final settlement of this question, rather than to attempt the introduction of a law giving a diminished protection (loud cheers). My belief is, that a diminished protection would in no one respect conciliate agricultural feeling (hear, hear); to be of any avail, the amount of protection must be greatly diminished beyond that which at the present moment exists; I believe that it would have met as much opposition from the agricultural body as the attempt to procure a final settlement (hear, hear): and this I must say, nothing could be so disadvantageous as to give an ineffectual protection and yet incur all the odium of giving an adequate one (cheers). What have we been told during this discussion? With scarcely an exception, I have listened attentively to every speech that has been made on this side of the house; and, admitting the talent that has been displayed, I confess they have in no respect altered the conviction upon which I have acted (“oh, oh,” and murmurs from the protection benches).

You tell me it would have been possible, with such support as I should have received, to have continued the existing law; I believe it might have been done. As far as the gratification of any object of ambition is concerned (loud cries of “oh, oh,” and laughter from a few protectionists)—I am perfectly ready to listen to any reply that may be made to my observations (hear, hear, and tremendous cheers), and I think it is hardly fair to attempt to interrupt me by such expressions (hear, hear, hear); but it has so far succeeded. [The right honourable baronet paused a few moments as if to recover the thread of his argument, and then continued.] I was told it would have been possible to have continued the existing law, after the suspension of it: for I assume the suspension of it as a necessity on account of the state of Ireland; but the difficulty of maintaining it would have been greatly increased, because it would have been shown after the lapse of three years, that although it had worked tolerably well during the continuance of abundant, or at least average harvests, yet the moment it was exposed to the severe trial of scarcity, then it ceased to effect the object for which it was enacted (hear, hear). And that, in addition to the state of public feeling with reference to restrictions on imports generally greatly increasing the difficulty of continuing the law, there would have been public proof of its inefficiency for one of the great objects for which it was enacted. And let me say, although it has not been brought prominently under consideration, that without any reference to the state of Ireland, the working of the law as far as Great Britain is concerned, during the present year, has not been satisfactory (hear, hear). You would have had to contend not merely with the difficulty arising from the suspension of the law on account of the Irish case; but it would have been shown that the rate of duty has been high on account of an apparent lowness in the price of corn, that lowness of price arising from deficient quality (hear). You would have been shown conclusively that there has been a greater disparity in point of price between corn of the highest quality and the lowest than existed at former periods; it would have been proved that there never was a greater demand than during the present year for wheat of a fine quality for the purpose of mixing with wheat of an inferior quality, the chief article that is brought for sale into the domestic markets of this kingdom (hear). It would have been shown that had there been freer access to wheat of a higher quality, the whole population of this country would, for the last four months, have been consuming bread of a better quality than they have done (hear). I say when after the suspension you came to propose the re-enactment of the existing law, my belief is you would have had to contend with greater difficulties than you now have to sustain. But you tell me you would have had a majority (hear, hear); I think you would have had a majority (hear, hear); I think you would have maintained this law, notwithstanding these enormous difficulties, some short time longer. But I believe that continuance would have been but short; and that during that period of continuance there would have been a desperate struggle between different classes in this country (hear, hear). Your arguments in favour of the law would have been refuted, and had the cycle of unfavourable harvests returned,—and who could give an assurance that they would not—you might have had no alternative but to concede the alteration of this law under circumstances infinitely less favourable to a settlement of this question (loud cheers). The hon. member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Banks) says, “We could have fought the League with its own weapons” (“hear, hear,” and cheers from the protectionists). That is to say, finding that you could not control by law those measures, the resorting to which I do not defend, which I for one sincerely reprobate,—the establishing in counties voters not being naturally electors in them—you could have fought the League by making faggot votes as well as they (hear, hear). And you say that the landed interest would have had greater facilities for making faggot votes than the League (cheers from the protectionists). But what a sad alternative is this (cheers)! What a sad conflict to be carrying on (hear, hear). It may have been necessary; but I think if you could consistently with your honest convictions avert the necessity for such a conflict, one that was destroying the independence of the constituency of the country, it would be wise to consider whether the alternative may not be avoided (loud cries of “hear, hear”). And believe me, you who are anxious for the maintenance of the aristocratic system, you who desire wisely, and justly desire, to discourage the infusion of too much of the democratic principle into the constitution of the country, although you might for a time have relied on the faggot votes you created in a moment of excitement, yet the interval would not be long before that weapon would break short in your hands (cheers). You would find that those additional votes created for the purpose of combating the votes of the League, though when brought up at the first election, under the influence of an excitement connected with the Corn Laws, they might have been true to your side, yet after the lapse of a short time, some exciting question connected with democratic feelings would arise, and then your votes and the votes of the League, not being subjected to legitimate influence, would unite, and you would find you had entailed on the constitution permanent evils, for the purpose of providing a temporary remedy (cheers). I believe you were about to enter into a bitter and ultimately an unsuccessful struggle, and that has induced me to think that for the benefit of all classes, for the benefit of the agricultural class itself, it was desirable to come to a permanent settlement of this question. These are the motives on which I acted. I know the penalty to which I must be subject for having so acted; but I declare, even after the continuance of these debates, that I am only the more impressed with the conviction that the policy we advise is correct (hear, hear). An hon. gentleman, in the course of this evening, the hon. member for Sunderland (Mr. Hudson) informed us that he had heard that there was an excitement about the Corn Laws, but he undertook to give a peremptory contradiction to that report (“hear” and a laugh), for he never recollected any public question being proposed involving such great interests which, on the whole, was received by all the classes concerned—by the manufacturing and by the agricultural classes—with less excitement and with a greater disposition to confide in the wisdom of the decision of Parliament. Well, if that be so—if this question is proposed at such a time—(“No, no,” from Mr. Hudson, who was sitting at the time on the extreme benches near the doorway, but who immediately moved, amidst some laughter, to the seat usually occupied by him, more in the body of the house). I certainly understood the honourable member to make that statement.

MR. HUDSON: I will explain after.

SIR R. PEEL: I may be mistaken, and of course I am, if the hon. member says so; but I understood him to say, that so far from there being any undue excitement, he thought that there was much less than could have been expected, and that all parties were disposed to acquiesce in the decision of Parliament.

MR. HUDSON: What I stated I believe was this: that there was no excitement in favour of the bill—not that there was a deep feeling on the part of the agriculturists against it, but that there was no public excitement in its favour. [This was what we understood the hon. member to say, but from what afterwards occurred it would seem to have been his intention to say, “not but that there was a deep feeling on the part of the agriculturists against the bill”]

SIR R. PEEL: That varies very little from the expressions I used, and entirely justifies the inference which I drew (cries of “No, no”). If there be no excitement in favour of the bill, and no strong feeling on the part of the agriculturists against it (“No, no,” and some confusion), it appears to me that this is not an unfavourable moment for the dispassionate consideration by Parliament of a subject otherwise calculated to promote excitement on the part of one class, and to cause great apprehension on the part of another; and the hon. member's statement is a strong confirmation of my belief that it is wise to undertake the settlement of this question when there is such absence of excitement, rather than to wait until a period when unfavourable harvests and depressed manufactures may have brought about a state of things which may render it less easy for you to exercise a dispassionate judgment on the matter (hear, hear). I do not rest my support of this bill on such temporary ground as the scarcity in Ireland (cries of “Oh!” and cheers). I do not rest it on the ground of temporary scarcity. I believe that that scarcity left us no alternative but to undertake the consideration of this question, and that consideration being necessary, I think the permanent adjustment of the question necessary (hear). But I repeat now that I have a firm belief that it is for the general interest, independent of all obligations from temporary pressure—it is for the general interest of the great body of the people that an arrangement should be made for the permanent removal of these restrictions (hear). I will assign my reasons for so saying, and I will take the facts from you—who are the strong opponents of this bill. I take the speech of the hon. member for Oxfordshire,—a speech distinguished by his usual ability and gentleness. I repeat, we will have no difference about facts. I take them from the opponents of the measure; and the only question is as to the inference to be drawn from them. The hon. gentleman made these observations:—he said that “he looked at the facts and figures produced for the last 30 years, and that he found that there had been a great increase of trade; that there had been a cheapening of commodities; but that there had been no improvement in the social condition of the people.” Why, I apprehend we all admit that the real question at issue is what is for the improvement of the social and moral condition of the masses? what will elevate in the gradations of society that great class which subsists by manual labour (hear)? The mere interests of the landlord or the occupying farmer, important as they are, are subordinate considerations, as is admitted on all hands, to this great question—what is calculated to increase the comfort, to improve the condition, and to elevate the moral character of the millions who subsist by labour, whether agricultural or manufacturing (hear)? And what says the hon. member for Oxfordshire? I take his statements to be correct, and if they are, they suggest matter for deep consideration (hear). Here is a country in which wealth has increased, trade increased, and commodities cheapened; but the hon. gentleman says that he takes every test by which he can determine whether the social condition of the people has improved, and he comes to the conclusion that it had not. That is a formidable statement (hear, hear). Increased wealth, increased trade, and cheaper commodities give you no ground for contentment, if the hon. gentleman's statement be correct, that there has been no corresponding improvement in the social condition of those who form the great foundation and platform of society (hear, hear). He says that he has looked at crime, and finds that increased; and that he looks to the great articles not of subsistence, but luxuries which, by use, have become necessities, such as sugar, tea, &c., and he finds no corresponding increase in their consumption, and he says he founds this statement on the facts and figures of the last 30 years. Well, let us go back to the period when that 30 years commenced. That was 1815 (hear). Then began the system of protection to agriculture (cheers). The honourable gentleman says he has carefully considered these things, and that, looking at the facts and figures for the last 30 years, he finds increased wealth, increased trade, but a deteriorated condition of the people. With what preceding period do you compare the condition of the people during these last 30 years? Take any period of the last century, excluding the period of war, which began in 1793, during which there were great dislocation of capital and great derangement of social interests. Compare, then, the condition of the people during a period of peace in this century with their condition during a period of peace also in the last century (hear, hear, hear). Take what period you please—that period which elapsed from 1740 to 1791; and let us compare the state of the law when the people were in a more prosperous condition than during the last 30 years. For the first 66 years of the last century there was no impediment to the importation of corn in this country. For the first 66 years of the last century, this country was an exporting country; the price of corn was low here, and did not exceed 41s. What was the law passed in 1773? It admitted free import at a 6d. duty whenever corn was above 49s. 6d., and under that law for six years after 1773, this country was an exporting country of corn. Did agriculture suffer? Why, during that period, when foreign corn might be brought here at a duty of 6d. when the average price of corn exceeded 49s. 6d., there were, I think, not less than 1560 Enclosure Bills passed. Do you say, then, that during that period the condition of the people was better in point of morality, in point of command of comfort, in point of happiness, than it has been since 1815? Well, in 1815, the commencement of that period of 30 years, this law was passed, that foreign corn should not be imported into England until after the price had arrived at 50s.; there was a positive prohibition of import unless corn was above 80s. (hear, hear). Now that was the perfection of protection. Was that to continue? You relaxed it. In 1822 you permitted the import of foreign corn when the price exceeded 70s. In 1828 you altered this law again, which the honourable member for Newcastle (Mr. Colquhoun) ranks with principles and national institutions; and by the law of 1828 you subjected foreign wheat, when wheat was under 64s. a quarter, to a duty of 23s. 8d.; when it was 69s. a quarter you subjected it to 16s. 8d.; and that law remained till 1842

(hear, hear). Under the influence of these laws, only altered in 1842, as I have it on the admission of the honourable member for Oxfordshire, the social and moral condition of the people of this country was not improved (hear, hear). Now, what did we in 1815? We imposed these enormous duties upon imports from foreign countries (hear, hear)—a positive prohibition until the price exceeded 80s. At that time the duty upon foreign butter and cheese was 2s. 6d. and 1s. 6d. respectively; we raised it to 1l. and 10s. 6d. Therefore did we in 1815 adopt the principle of strict protection to agriculture, and the hon. gentleman says that he finds crime increased, and the command over comforts and the moderate luxuries which partake of the nature of necessities lessened. He says that is the result of the inspection of 30 years (hear, hear). So much, then, for the condition of the great body of the people. Now I come to the facts of the hon. member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Cayley). I heard his speech; I was sorry to observe the indisposition under which he laboured—an indisposition which in no degree prevented the exercise of his intellectual faculties, or prevented him from speaking with his usual clearness and power (hear, hear). I ask you to take the facts of the hon. gentleman since 1815. I am quoting every expression; the account I am giving of agriculture since that period is not mine, but his. I followed him closely, and took down his account of the position of agriculture under a state of almost perfect protection. In 1815 you had prohibition of foreign importation till corn exceeded 80s.; and these are the historical annals of the hon. gentleman, the advocate of agricultural protection. In 1816 and 1817, he says, you had severe distress. (Mr. Cayley: "In 1815 and 1816.") I think it was after 1815 and 1816—I think it was in 1817 that a speech was made from the throne lamenting the state of society, the efforts that were made by designing men to take advantage of the distress of the country. It was in 1817 that the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended and the Sedition Meetings Bill was passed. In 1819, the hon. gentleman said, such was the severity of distress, the Six Acts passed into a law. In 1822, he said, agricultural distress was so intense that a committee was appointed for the purpose of devising a remedy. He said that at that time the price of wheat—of beautiful wheat—was 40s.; that a farmer stated, I think, that where there were 150 persons usually out of employ, there were then 300, and that he had the greatest difficulty, on account of the low price of wheat, in giving employment to the agricultural labourers. From 1822 the hon. gentleman advanced to 1830, and he said that in 1830, on account of the depressed state of agriculture, we had the "Swing" fires. In 1833 agriculture was again so depressed that it was necessary to appoint a committee to consider the state of that distress, and to attempt to devise a remedy. He said that there were 35 villages in the North of England with a population of 200,000 persons depending upon their labour, and their wages did not exceed 3s. 8d. per week. In 1834, the honourable gentleman said, the Preston operatives presented a petition to this house, in which they complained of poverty, of ignorance, and of vice. The year 1835, he said, was as bad as the year 1822, and prices were so low that the ordinary employment of agriculture could not be afforded. 1836 and 1837, he said, were years of sudden prosperity, but that came to end in 1838, and there was prostration and suffering from 1839 to 1842. That is the account which the honourable member gives of the state of agriculture under that protection, which was terminated by the bill of 1842 (cheers). Now, observe what the hon. member also said; he said that there was a constant alternation of high prices and of low prices; and he said, differing from many who concur with him in their vote, that the low prices, though caused by favourable harvests, entailed the greatest suffering upon the agricultural classes, and that in 1822 and 1835 the farmer who had sold his wheat for less than 40s. complained, on account of the lowness of prices, that he could not give the usual employment. That lowness of price did not arise from competition with foreign corn; there was no foreign corn imported to reduce prices; that low price was caused by the suspension of the natural dealing in corn. There was a glut on account of productive harvests, there was no outlet for it, and there was prostration and suffering in consequence. That is the account which the hon. member gives of the result of high protection, not upon the manufacturing interest, but upon the agricultural; and when he had given that account—when he had detailed those sufferings on the part of the agriculturists, I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman conclude with a quotation,

"Woodman, touch not that tree."

(Laughter.) I beg pardon, I am afraid I should have to ask the hon. member to supply me with the verse (a laugh), but the purport of it was that not a bough must be touched, that those whom it sheltered in youth ought to let it remain in their old age (hear, hear)—after that account of the consequences of this high protection upon the agricultural interest, I was surprised to hear that advice which the hon. gentleman gave us, not to touch a bough of that tree, under the shade of which agriculture had so long flourished (a laugh). If he had said:

"Ille et nefasto te posuit die

* * "agro qui statuit meo

Te, triste lignum, te caducum

In domini caput immeritis."

I think it would have been a more appropriate quotation (laughter and cheers). But now, is there no exception to be made from this period of 30 years? Did nothing occur at the latter part of that period of 30 years to exempt it from the stigma which the hon. gentleman cast upon the preceding part? There have been three years—1843, 1844, and 1845—during which you have had, from some cause or other, the benefits of plenty and of cheapness. During the last three of these 30 years the average price of wheat a little exceeded 50s.; and let us see whether during that period that censure will apply which applies to the former period—let us see whether, during the last three years, there has been no increase of comfort, no improvement in morality, no abatement of seditious feeling or disaffection. I care not what may be the cause of the abundance which has prevailed during the last three years; you say the cause is not to be attributed to the tariff; but that good harvests have produced abundance. Be it so. But there has been comparative abundance. There has been a less outlay required for the purchase of articles of first necessity. You say there has been a demand for labour on railways. Why, that is an effect, and not a cause (hear, hear). It is on account of your prosperity that you are enabled to supply your capital to internal improvements, causing this demand for labour and increasing wages; and do you believe if wheat had been at 70s. instead of 50s., there would have been the same stimulus to the application of capital (hear, hear)?

But grant that the tariff of 1842 had nothing to do with the abatement of price in 1843, 1844, and 1845. I will concede it to you that it is attributable to the favour of Providence—to good harvests. But let us see what has been the result of this abundance. I will take the tests of the hon. gentleman. He says, facts and figures show that there has been no increase of consumption. Now, I will show you that during the last three years trade has flourished, capital has accumulated; but that you cannot say of the last three years what you can say of the preceding 27 years—that there has been a deterioration in the social condition of the people. I will first take those articles which enter largely into consumption. I have here a statement of the quantities of the undermentioned articles entered for home consumption in the United Kingdom from 1839 to 1841, and from 1843 to 1846, showing the average quantity of each article in each of those periods. In the first three years, when the prices of provisions were high, the average consumption of sugar—for the three years ending in 1841—was 3,826,000 cwt. The average consumption for the last three years, ending the 1st of January, 1846, had increased from 3,826,000 cwt. to 4,346,000 cwt. (hear, hear, hear.) The average consumption of tea in the first three years was 31,685,000 lbs. In the last three years it had increased to 42,000,000 lbs. The average consumption of coffee during the first three years of high price was 27,941,000 lbs. annually; the average consumption of the last three years was 31,883,000 lbs. The consumption of cocoa in the first three years averaged 1,859,000 lbs. annually; in the last three years 2,575,000 lbs. Take another article, which, though in a smaller degree, enters largely into the consumption of the poor, and which is not a bad test of their comfort. During the first three years the consumption of currants averaged 175,000 cwt.; in the last three years it had increased to 280,000 cwt. (cheers). I take then the tests of the hon. member for Oxfordshire—the consumption of articles necessary to the comfort of the people; and I show him that comparative plenty has produced this change in the command of the working classes over the smaller luxuries of life (cheers). I will next come to a more important point—the state of crime. You have now an official record, presented within a few days, of what has been the state of crime in this country during the last 30 years. Now, what was the state of crime during the first period of 27 years? From the first record in 1805 down to 1842, when the commitments attained the maximum number hitherto recorded, the increase in crime progressed from year to year, until it had extended to above 600 per cent. In 1843 a change commenced. In that year the number of commitments decreased. Within the last six years, three years of great increase of crime have been followed by three years, during which the decrease was so considerable that the number of commitments in 1845 has been reduced to what it was seven years ago (cheers). In the three years of high prices, this was the state of crime in each year:—The number of commitments in the first year was 27,187; in the second, 27,760; and in the third, 31,309. During the last three years the number of commitments has been—in the first year, 29,591; in the second, 26,542; and in the third, 24,303 (hear, hear, and cheers). Well, then, I take this other test of criminality and the extension of morality, and I ask whether we can resist the legitimate inference that the comparative cheapness and plenty which have existed during the last three years have had their effect in producing this diminished criminality (cries of "hear, hear, hear"). The gentleman who drew up this return says:—"The decrease of commitments in England," for the last three years, "has therefore been general, continued, and extensive, to a degree of which there is no recorded example in this kingdom" (loud cheers). He says again:—"In the 6th class, containing those offences which do not fall within the definitions of the foregoing classes"—violence to the person, and offences against property—"there is a total absence of commitments for seditious riots or sedition." A total absence of commitments for these offences (hear)! Why, can you have a stronger proof of the improvement of a country, apart from the command of comforts, than the fact that there should have been this progressive diminution in commitments, and a total absence of any commitments for sedition or seditious riots (cheers)? I say, therefore, comparing the result of the three years when we have had diminished protection to agriculture and a reduced price of provisions with the 27 preceding years, the inference is—just that the diminution of crime is attributable to an increased command over those articles which constitute the food of the people (hear, hear). But you say, "As this happy state of things has arisen during the existence of the present Corn Laws—as the present Corn Laws have been co-existent with cheapness and plenty, on what principle do you seek to disturb this happy arrangement? You have proved that, co-existent with the Corn Laws, there have been cheapness and happiness; why then do you now come forward to propose their alteration?" Why, if you can show me that those laws were the cause of this happiness and plenty, that would no doubt be a strong and powerful reason for their continuance (hear, hear). But this cannot be denied, that simultaneously with a reduced protection to agriculture, there has been not only no diminution in agricultural improvement, but diminished prices and increased comfort (hear, hear, hear). As you have proceeded downwards from 1815 to 1842, there has been a corresponding benefit from the abatement of protection. If we could anticipate that the law of 1842 would continue to produce all the advantages to which I have referred, that might be a conclusive reason for adhering to it (hear). But you assert that favourable harvests have occasioned these advantages (hear). Why, what guarantee have you for the continuance of favourable harvests? You have had comparatively favourable harvests for the last three years, and you say, "As a matter of necessity, therefore, continue the law." Continue the law, if the law has been the cause of these advantages. But if favourable harvests have been their real cause, that is no reason for the maintenance of the law. Those who have remarked the vicissitudes of seasons, have observed that there have been cycles of favourable and unfavourable seasons. You had three unfavourable seasons in 1830, 1840, and 1841. You then had great distress. You have had three favourable seasons since, and in them there has been comparative abundance. But, supposing a cycle of years as unfavourable as those which preceded the last three years should return, have we any security that the law of 1842 would guarantee an ample supply of food (hear, hear)? Supposing that, co-existent with these unfavourable seasons there should be a depression in manufactures, should we then be in a favourable position to consider an alteration of this law (hear, hear)? Remember how short a time has elapsed since the state of Paisley, of Sheffield, and of Stockport, was brought under your consideration. If such times should again return after this interval of comparative happiness, when the contrast of misery would be heightened by the comfort which had previously prevailed, do you believe it would be possible to maintain in existence a law which levies a duty of 10s. a quarter when the price is 56s? You may say, "Disregard the progress of public opinion; defy the League; enter into a combination against it; determine to fight the battle of protection, and you will succeed." My firm belief is—without yielding to the dictation of the League or any other body (loud cries of "Oh, oh!") which interrupted the right honourable baronet for some moments),—yes, subjecting myself to that imputation, I will not hesitate to say my firm belief is, that it is most consistent with prudence and good policy, most consistent with the real interest of the landed proprietors themselves (renewed cries of "hear, and oh, oh!") from the protectionists) most consistent with the maintenance of the influence of a territorial aristocracy, seeing by how precarious a tenure—namely, the vicissitudes of seasons, you hold your present comfort; that we should, at this time of comparative calm, anticipate discussions which might hereafter arise, and propose a final and just settlement of the question. But you may say,—"You are acting upon the experience of three years, and contrary to the principles you have avowed during your whole life." I admit that I have defended the continuance of the present Corn Laws; I admit that to the present period I have defended the Corn Laws, and refused to acquiesce in any change; but when I am told I am acting inconsistently with the principles of my whole life when I advocate Free Trade measures, I give the assertion a most peremptory denial. During the last three years I have subjected myself to many taunts. You say Lord Grey found out something. Why, did I not say that I thought the true policy to which we should conform, not hastily, not disturbing vested interests by rash legislation, but that the principle to which you should conform was that principle of political economy which suggested purchase in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market? Did I not say that there was nothing special in the case of agriculture that should exempt it from the application of those principles which had been applied to other articles? You may have a right to taunt me with a change of opinion with respect to the Corn Laws, but when you say that by adopting the principles of Free Trade I am acting in contradiction to the doctrines I have avowed during the whole of my preceding life, I say that charge, at least, is destitute of foundation (cheers). Sir, I will not enter at this late hour into the discussion of any other topic (cheers). Sir, I foresaw the consequences that have resulted from the measures which we have proposed. We were charged with the heavy responsibility of taking security against a great calamity in Ireland. We did not act lightly. We did not form our opinion upon merely local authorities likely to be influenced by an undue alarm. Before I and those who agreed with me came to that conclusion, we had adopted every means—by local inquiry, and the transmission of perfectly disinterested authorities to Ireland—to form a just and correct opinion. Whether we were mistaken or not—I believe we were not mistaken—but, even if we were mistaken, a generous construction should be put upon the motives and conduct of those who are charged with the responsibility of protecting millions of the subjects of the Queen from the consequences of scarcity and famine (cheers). Sir, whatever may be the result of these discussions, I feel severely the loss of the confidence of those from almost all of whom I received such generous support. So far from expecting them, as some have said, to adopt my opinions, I perfectly recognise the sincerity with which they adhere to their own. I recognise their perfect right, on account of the admitted failure of my speculations, to withdraw from me their confidence. I honour their motives, but I claim, and I always will claim, while intrusted with such powers and subject to such responsibility as the minister of this great country is intrusted with, and is subject to,—I always will assert the right to give that advice which I conscientiously believe to be conducive to the general well being (loud cheers). I was not considering, according to the language of the hon. member for Shrewsbury, what was the best bargain to make for a party. I was considering what were the best measures to avert a great calamity, and, as a secondary consideration, to relieve that interest which I was bound to protect from the odium of refusing to acquiesce in measures which I thought to be necessary for the purpose of averting that calamity (cheers). Sir, I cannot charge myself or my colleagues with having been unfaithful to the trust committed to us (cheers). I do not believe that the great institutions of this country have suffered during our administration of power (cheers). The noble lord (J. Russell) says he hopes that the discussions which have threatened the maintenance of amicable relations with the United States will be brought to a fortunate close. Sir, I think I can appeal to the course which we have pursued, against some obloquy, some misconception, some insinuations, that we were abandoning the honour of this country—I think I can appeal to the past experience of this Government, that it has been our earnest desire, by every effort consistently with the national honour, to maintain friendly relations with every country on the face of the globe. This principle, so long as we are entrusted with the management of public affairs, will continue to influence us in respect to the settlement of our unfortunate differences with the United States (hear, and cheers). Sir, if I look to the prerogative of the crown—if I look to the position of the church—if I look to the influence of the aristocracy—I cannot charge myself with having taken any course inconsistent with Conservative principles, calculated to endanger the privileges of any branch of the legislature, or of any institution of the country (cheers). My earnest wish has been, during my tenure of power, to impress the people of this country with a belief that the legislature was animated by a sincere desire to frame its legislation upon the principles of equity and justice (cheers). I have a strong belief that the greatest object which we or any other Government can contemplate should be to elevate the social condition of that class of the people with whom we are brought into no direct relationship by the exercise of the elective franchise (cheers). I wish to convince them that our object has been so to apportion taxation, that we shall relieve industry and labour from any undue burden, and transfer it so far as is consistent with the public good to those who are better enabled to bear it. I look to the present peace of this country; I look to the absence of all sedition—to the absence of any commitment for a seditious offence; I look to the calm that prevails in the public mind; I look to the absence of all disaffection; I look to the increased and growing public confidence on account of the course you have taken in relieving trade from restrictions, and industry from unjust burdens; where there was dissatisfaction I see contentment, where there was turbulence I see peace; where there was disloyalty I see loyalty; I see the disposition to confide in you, and not to agitate questions that are at the foundations of your institutions; deprive me of power to-morrow; you can be neither depriving me of the consciousness that I have exercised the powers committed to me from no corrupt or interested motives (loud cheers), nor for the gratification of ambition or any personal object (continued cheers). But I have laboured to maintain peace abroad consistently with national honour and dignity—to uphold every public right—to increase public confidence in the justice of your decisions, and, by the means of equal law, to dispense with all coercive powers, relying on the attachment and loyalty of the great body of the people (loud and protracted cheering).

MR. VILLIERS'S SPEECH.

MR. VILLIERS said that the noble lord had commenced his speech by an assumption somewhat presumptuous—that he and his party had a higher regard for religion and honour than the rest of the house; in either respect he must dispute that title. The noble lord insinuated that when the Government referred the improvement of the people to the cheapness of food, they forgot that this cheapness was to be traced to the bounty of Providence, an influence which he said the ministers had been much disposed of late to forget. He (Mr. Villiers) considered, on the contrary, that this disregard of the bounty of Providence was directly chargeable upon the noble lord and his party. It was the bounty of heaven, in this country and abroad, with which gentlemen opposite were always warring. The noble lord says, that he is glad when cheapness comes from abundance in this country, and admits the blessing it confers on the people. But the noble lord knows nothing of the history of his subject, or the objects of his party, if he believes that such was, or had ever been, their view of cheapness and plenty. The law was passed to prevent cheapness, and whenever it failed in its object, his party had never omitted to complain of it as an evil. Let the noble lord ask the honourable member for Somersetshire if he could deny this (hear, hear, hear); he (the honourable member for Somersetshire) said that, but without reference to the cause of the cheapness, he had himself complained of the fact, though he never disputed the blessing it conferred upon the people. It was then of the bounty of Providence that they complained; and what was it that the noble lord had been doing himself for so many weeks past but complain of the abundance of other countries which, by Free Trade, might be made accessible to the people of this country? But was abundance abroad not equally the bounty of Providence as the abundance at home? and when the Ministers had proposed a measure giving the people access to it, and the noble lord tried to defeat that measure, were they or the noble lord with most justice chargeable with indifference to the gifts of Providence? It was precisely to enable the people to enjoy these blessings that we had been labouring so long; and when the hon. member for Shrewsbury said that they had abandoned all their leading positions, one of which was to make the necessities of life abundant, which he calls the cry of "cheap bread," he (Mr. V.) told him that there was no foundation for such a statement; and it was satisfactory to reflect that, during the annual discussion which for nine years past had taken place on this question, there was no fact, no argument, no opinion that he had ever stated in its support that was not now recognised as true, or that he had reason to retract; they had been admitted to be sound by the measure itself before the house, and the arguments by which it had been supported; but above all, by their having, during the long and dreary debates of this session, received no answer or refutation from the gentlemen opposite. It had been shown how the law had failed in all its pretences of advantage, and how it had verified every prediction of mischief attending it. Gentlemen opposite could have no better proof of their failure than the fact that the more they had spoken, the more time they had wasted, the more they had alienated their partisans from them, and while there was no vestige of panic or alarm at the measure out of doors, there was as little interest taken in their proceedings against it from within. There was one circumstance elicited during this debate, that had shown the hollowness of all that had been said in favour of the law, and of the little reliance to be placed on it by its friends. He meant the admission that the whole House of Commons was willing, upon an apprehended deficiency of food last October, to suspend the Corn Law, and considered that the cure for scarcity was to abolish for the time all protection to agriculture. The law which was to produce plenty, and to save the country from scarcity? Yes! the whole house, it seems, deemed the remedy for a deficiency of food, was to abolish the Corn Law. He thought this was a most instructive circumstance, and could not be repeated too often, to show the value of protection: for in the first place, he asked how this was to be justified to the farmers, who were promised protection against foreign competition? They were told that they could be protected consistently with the welfare of the community, and they relied upon its continuance. But how was it more just to them to suspend the law than to repeal it entirely?—they would have been less prepared for it in October last than at any other time; and if any suffering was to follow from it, it would have been the farmers alone, and no one else, at that time, that would have felt its effects. Again, if this was the proper remedy last year, who can say it would not be equally required this year? And if the farmer was to be constantly subject to this suspension of the law, where was the worth of protection to him. But he asked attention to the fact that this was the remedy proposed when famine was expected. Now what was meant by famine?—it only meant, in reality, that food would become comparatively scarce, and less accessible to a greater number of people than before; but for this difficulty in getting food, every party in the House of Commons considered in last October that the remedy was to suspend the Corn Law! There was no doubt then that this would meet the evils of a scarcity of food, and prevent the people from starving, or resorting to coarser food; but if this is the remedy for food being too dear for a few more people than usual, why, he asked, was it not the remedy for the millions who are usually deprived of good and wholesome food on account of its dearth? It was apprehended from a scarcity in England, that perhaps one or two million would find it difficult to get good food; but that is habitually the case in Ireland. Why is not the remedy then so considered good for England to be deemed also good for Ireland, suffering as she does habitually from the same malady. When the Government, then, sees that we have to expect periodical scarcity in this country, and as the people increase, that we have to expect we shall be obliged constantly to suspend the Corn Law, what is it but wisdom and justice to all concerned, to remove altogether the barrier to a regular and plentiful supply, and dissipate the delusion under which those who depend on its continuance have ever been placed. It was for this reason that he considered the ministerial insure an honest one, founded on all the evidence and experience which this country has had offered of its necessity, and one which promises nothing but advantage to the people. It was honestly intended; and ministers have therefore had the advantage of being able to argue and defend it honestly, which they have done. Had it been founded on the notion that a tax or toll of 10 or 20 per cent. upon the entry of an article into this country could be imposed, without raising its cost to the consumer, or had it given any sanction to the fancy that a fixed impediment to commerce would not limit the supply because that impediment was fixed, and not fluctuating,—or had it proceeded on the principle that food could be wisely taxed for revenue in this country, after the experience they had had that whatever raised the price of food impairs the other sources of revenue, it would have been deemed a fraudulent and delusive measure, and would have failed to obtain the requisite support for its success. The measure, has, however, wisely recognised the failure of the experiment of having a Corn Law at all in this country, and provided for its total abolition. The country was therefore under a deep obligation to the Government for the measure; and if there was anything that could enhance that obligation, it was the spirit, ability, and courage with which it had been supported; and now he asked those hon. gentlemen opposite to pause before they proclaimed themselves to the country, and transmitted their names to posterity, as having to the last endeavoured to withhold from the people the unquestionable right, the undoubted privilege and great advantage, of carrying the fruits of their industry to the highest market, and of allowing them the freest access to the bounties which Providence, through the industry of other nations, had provided for them—let them reflect before they vote, that the law of which they are so tenacious has been discredited by all experience, denounced by every intelligent authority, and has, upon facts undisputed, because they are indisputable, been shown to have brought upon the poorest of our fellow-creatures as much misery, affliction, destitution, and crime as was ever produced by any pestilence or calamity that ever visited the country—let them pause then, he said, before they offer to the country and posterity no other or better testimony of their efforts in public life than that of endeavouring to withhold from it a great advantage, and to perpetuate on the poor an enormous injury and wrong.

RETALIATION OF SPAIN—THE SUGAR DUTIES.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

The Tariff Bill, on which so much opposition was threatened by the protectionists, passed the House of Commons last night without even a division, and was immediately carried up to the House of Lords, where, after another tirade from the Duke of Richmond, it was read a first time. We have thus the pleasure of congratulating the country upon the whole of the commercial reforms which have been proposed to the House of Commons having passed that branch of the legislature unaltered and unmodified. While the House of Lords is called upon to deliberate upon a bill providing for the ultimate freedom of the trade in corn, it cannot fail to be a matter of important consideration to their lordships that at the same time they have before them a bill, which has also received the sanction of the House of Commons, providing for an immediate repeal of all duty on the most important staple manufactures of the country. By this bill all duties on woollen, cotton, and linen manufactures are repealed. The manufacturers and artisans interested in these great branches of trade have unhesitatingly assented to the free competition of all the world. Their lordships are at one and the same time called upon to affirm Free Trade in corn, and in the great leading articles of manufacture.

The only remaining part of the general plan of commercial reform contained in Sir Robert Peel's announcement at the commencement of the session, which has yet to be brought under the consideration of Parliament, is the proposed alteration of the sugar duties. We sincerely wish that Sir Robert Peel had displayed the same wise determination to abandon at once the flagrant and dangerous fallacies on which our recent legislation has been conducted in regard to sugar, as he has done in the case of corn. Unfortunately, however, the right honourable baronet adheres not only to the principle of a differential duty; but, what is of more serious and immediate consequence, he has announced the determination of the Government to persevere in that invidious distinction between free-labour and slave-labour sugar which has already led to an open rupture between this country and Brazil, and to the most scandalous disregard of national honour in our refusal to comply with the plain and unquestionable rights of Spain, under existing treaties. From the first, when the Duke of Sotomayor made a demand for the admission of the sugars of Cuba under those treaties, we have not failed to urge, not only the justice of the claim, but the interest of the British public, as sufficient grounds on which they should be admitted. We, moreover, showed the imminent danger which we incurred by relying upon any construction of those treaties which would justify their refusal. The treaties themselves, of which we last week gave extracts, bear the intention of the parties obviously on their face. Both countries had on all occasions, but more especially of late years, recognised these treaties, and the construction contended for by the Spanish Government, in their daily practice and frequent negotiations affecting the commercial relations of this country. The fact, however, that the British Ambassador has not for many years been without complaints before the court of Madrid founded upon some breach of these treaties, and based on the construction contended for in support of the Spanish claims, shows how much more our interests are involved in the matter in dispute than those of the other contracting party. The complaints of our Minister have invariably received attention, and our rights, under those treaties, to all the advantages of the "most privileged nation," have always been clearly and distinctly recognised. We foresaw that our refusal to admit the construction contended for by the Spanish Government must strike a blow at British trade, not only in Spain but in the Spanish colonies, and leave us at the mercy or caprice of a power smarting under a deep sense of wrong.

We regret that the apprehensions of danger which we so often pressed upon the Government last year, when this question was under discussion, have received a practical confirmation. The Spanish Government, finding after the discussion which took place in Parliament in the last session that there was no chance of obtaining an acknowledgement of their just claims—finding, in fact, that Mr. Gladstone, in his defence of the Government, really and practically threw overboard the existing treaties between the two countries, and treated them as so much waste paper; and knowing, at the same time, that the abandonment of those treaties and the construction contended for would be a matter infinitely more serious and inconvenient to Great Britain than to Spain, determined to abandon their application as legal, to take us at our word, and to deal with British commerce and British produce in that way only that might best suited to their own views and interests. The acuerdo which we have received from His Majesty's foreign office with a detail of the first fruits of a retaliatory policy. Instructions had been received by the Governor from the Government at Madrid, and steps had been taken to carry them into effect, which must exterminate British trade in Cuba and Porto Rico. British ships are to be subjected to heavy additional charges. Differential duties are to be placed upon British manufactures, but especially upon our cotton goods, which constitute the great bulk of our trade. The differential duties are to be of three different and distinct classes, increasing in amount exactly as they will inflict most injury on British interests. A certain rate of differential duty is to be placed on British cottons imported from Spain in a Spanish ship; a second and a higher rate is to be placed on British cottons, imported from Great Britain in Spanish ships; and a third, still higher rate, is to be placed on British cotton goods imported from Great Britain in British ships. In proportion as the transaction becomes more purely British it is to be prohibited, or at least rendered profitless, by high duties.

We are free to admit that in pursuing such a policy the Spanish Government displays but a short sighted regard to its own interests. It is difficult to conceive how the disappointments of the Cuban sugar-growers, in being deprived of this market for their produce, is to be compensated by thus inflicting upon the community of that island the necessity of paying a higher price for their cotton goods. They could not, however, have selected any other article which would do us so much injury, and themselves so little. Cotton goods form the great bulk of our trade, and a practical prohibition of these goods will, therefore, affect us more than any other. But cotton goods are at the same time those with respect to which the Americans, the Swiss, and the Germans come nearest to us in competition. With respect to some classes of those goods, a differential duty of five per cent. against us would effectually destroy our trade altogether. The Spanish Government, therefore, in selecting that class of goods in particular, have shown that they have discriminated in order to do us most mischief at least cost to themselves. But this is not altogether a question of pounds, shillings, and pence. It is a question of outraged feelings and broken faith. It is the only revenge which a weaker nation feels it can take for wrongs perpetrated by the more powerful.

A combination of events at the present moment tend to show in the strongest light the folly and impolicy of the course we pursued last year with respect to Spain. Sir R. Peel last year reduced the sugar duties, giving up between one and two millions of revenue, with the hope of encouraging an extensive consumption. But the right honourable baronet made no provision for a supply to make that consumption possible. The stocks of sugar have been gradually undergoing a reduction, until they are thirty per cent. less than at the same period last year, and the price has been rising in proportion. To make matters worse, the crop in the West Indies is ascertained, at the lowest calculation, to be short of last year's quantity by twenty thousand tons. Free-labour sugar arrives in extremely small quantities, altogether inadequate to supply the increasing demand. The consequence is that the consumer gets little or no benefit from the reduction of the duty, while the revenue is seriously injured. There is now a difference between the price of Java sugar in Holland and in London of ten shillings the cwt.; but our navigation laws prevent the importation of colonial produce from any Continental port. Do what we will there is but one escape from our difficulties—one way by which the supply of sugar can be so increased as to meet at once the wants of the country and the interests of the revenue. If we will supply the country with cheap sugar, and rely upon a large consumption, we must take it from those countries, whence alone it can be supplied in large quantities; we must throw aside the policy which has exposed us to the ridicule and suspicion of other countries, and admit the sugars of Cuba and Brazil. There is no other way by which the consumer can now be saved from an exorbitant price, or the revenue from an enormous loss. An honourable course pursued towards Spain would have saved us from the whole difficulty.

SUNDERLAND CORPORATION.—On Wednesday, May 20th, at a general meeting of the council of this borough, the Mayor in the chair, it was moved by Mr. Thompson that a petition from the Corporation be sent to the House of Lords, praying their lordships to pass the bill sent up from the Commons, for repealing the Corn Laws without delay. The motion was seconded by Mr. R. French, shipowner; and Mr. Featherstonhaugh, an extensive manufacturer and local magistrate, thought it more especially necessary for the council to express the public feeling of the borough, in consequence of the unfortunate circumstance that a Conservative gentleman (Mr. Hudson) had been returned as one of its members (applause). He rejoiced in the opportunity of showing to the country that Sunderland is, as it ever had been, a liberal borough. He trusted that it would always be so, and that by their divisions they would never again be guilty of returning an anti-liberal member to misrepresent the opinions of the town (loud applause).—The petition was adopted unanimously. It was then resolved that Earl Grey be requested to present the petition to the House of Lords, and the Marquess of Londonderry (who has become a convert to Free Trade principles) to support it.

EFFECT OF FREE TRADE.—At one of the Dumfriesshire farms of James Oswald, Esq., of Auchincruive, now out of lease, twenty offers were received, and the farm has been let at a rise of 33 per cent. on the former rental.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO GEORGE WILSON, ESQ., CHAIRMAN OF THE LEAGUE.

Ellet Vale, Blackheath, May 16, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—The easiest of roads to parliamentary distinction is to attack a man who it is at the same time boasted is not there to make reply.

Let the League should take too much to heart the inferences which might be drawn from the member for Shrewsbury's song of triumph over me in the House of Commons on the night of the vote of the third reading, allow me to put you in possession of a reason for doubting their validity.

It is quite within my recollection, that at the election for Maidstone in 1837 alluded to, on the day before the poll my decision was asked on a proposal, purporting to come from a hundred of the electors, who would vote for me for 5*l*. a-head, and declared they should ask the Tory 8*l*. They were refused, and so they voted against me: how far they put in execution the part of their intention which was not relating to myself, is what is not in any degree within my knowledge, or I would declare it. I am sorry I had not the opportunity of adding this circumstance to the graphic account of the election contained in the romance of Coningsby.

You see, sir, where the pinch lies. You see why it is, that an enemy, of talent in his way, shall go to Parliament to oppose your cause, and an ancient advocate, whom many consider as having as deeply attended to the subject as anybody save some of the Queen's ministers, shall be made into a cushion to stuff out his greatness. And you must perceive the senselessness of the system, which settles that because a man refuses to break through the duties of an officer and a gentleman, he shall be proscribed from Parliament, and be personally triumphed over there by the individual who had the benefit of his refusal. These things will be altered; but that is not exactly within your line.

To the objection urged against anything of mine, I could answer better if I knew more distinctly what it was. As far as my perception goes, there is nothing but an attempt to note the discrepancies among what has been said by different persons at different times and places; a sort of curry powder substituted for argument. What the Protectionists will never grapple with, whatever the triumphs the state of the representation may afford them, is the knowledge by this time pervading every Mechanics' Institute in the country, that whenever a trader of any kind attracts increased prices or employment to himself through what is called protection, every fraction of it is abstracted from industrious members of our own community in some other part, which makes a balance, and the difference of price stands out after it all, as a gratuitous loss to the consumer.

The public, now or at some time, will decide among all concerned. I only implore the member for Shrewsbury to pay marked attention to the fact, that however he may be pleased to place your opinions and mine in his "limbo," it is his opinions and not ours, that are in the limbo of a minority of 98 on the third reading in the House of Commons.

I am, dear sir, yours, very sincerely,
T. PERRONET THOMPSON.

LETTER FROM THE FREE TRADE ASSOCIATION OF MONTREAL TO THE COUNCIL OF THE ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

Montreal, Canada, Free Trade Association Office,
3, St. Sacrament street, April 28, 1846.

SIR,—I am requested by the Montreal Free Trade Association to put myself in communication with you, in order that you may be made aware of the movement which is going on in this part of the British empire in favour of a system of unrestricted commerce. You will learn with satisfaction the existence of a Free Trade Association in a colony which has been hitherto so deeply bound up in the protective system; and that, far from desponding at the prospect afforded, a large portion of the most influential of the mercantile class in Canada regard the approaching changes with hope and satisfaction. It is felt that, however kindly meant and gladly received, the protective system has operated as a dead weight upon the energies of the country, and prevented that development of its vast resources which would otherwise have taken place. The Montreal Free Trade Association have a most confident feeling that Canada can safely be left to herself in the management of her commerce, and that the time has arrived when this liberty cannot be denied her. They do not, however, conceal from themselves that, as the pioneers of the Free Trade movement on this question, they have a sturdy battle to fight. The great mass of the people of this colony has been so long used to look to the protective system as essential to the connection with Great Britain, and their own colonial existence, that they look with some suspicion on the new movement. The vicious course of the provincial government also, acting in imitation of the policy of the mother country, has encouraged these feelings, and made the agriculturist of the west almost as inveterate a protectionist as his yeoman brother at home. These feelings must, however, yield before a calm discussion of the questions at issue, and a knowledge of the capability of Canada to engross the large carrying trade of the western states of the neighbouring union—which fact it has been one of the objects of the Montreal Free Trade Association to show.

You will see from a copy of the Montreal Herald of the 11th inst., that a public meeting has been held in this city, and that resolutions in favour of Free Trade were carried. The result was very much more favourable than could have been anticipated, considering that it was the first attempt of the kind, and that the protective party had taken alarm, and assembled in considerable numbers. You will see by the report that they succeeded, through Mr. Gilmore, in carrying one resolution.

Since the meeting, the operations of the association have been directed to the dissemination of their opinions and views by the means of printed reports, and through the influence secured by members. They have taken charge of the petition adopted at the public meeting, and have obtained nearly 1000 signatures, including the names of many of the most influential residents, both commercial and professional. Another step they are now engaged in is the publication of a weekly Free Trade newspaper, the first number of which will appear on Saturday next. It is to be called the Economist, and will, I trust, be the means of enlightening the public mind on the subject of Free Trade, and its applicability to the colonies.

I have not thought it necessary to state in this letter what are the precise objects which the Montreal Free Trade Association propose to accomplish, as you will find them fully set forth in the speeches of the different speakers at the public meeting, and particularly in that of Mr. Elder.

One of my objects in writing to you is to solicit that you will afford us such assistance as may be in your power, by furnishing us with your publications, and in any other way that you may consider consistent with your rules, and the interests of your association. On our parts, we will let you know from time to time what progress we are making, and be always glad to attend to any suggestions emanating from your body.

Trusting I have not wearied your patience,
I have the honour to remain,
W. H. FLEET, Sec. F. T. A.
The Chairman of the Anti-Corn-Law League.

OUR WEST INDIAN COLONIES.

MY DEAR SIR,—While the selfishness of legislative cupidity has been obstructing, as far as it could, the admission of food to relieve the wants of a starving population, it may be worth while to call attention to the following paragraph, which I find in the St. John's (New Brunswick) Morning News of the 10th of last month which has just reached me:

"YANKEE NOTIONS.—The New York True Sun says—Upwards of SEVEN THOUSAND of white gravel have been shipped from this city to London since the 15th of September last. It is taken from the beach of Long Island, and used to beautify the parks and gardens of London!!"

Surely while the monopolists clamour so lustily for "Protection to British Industry," when food is the subject of discussion, they ought not to exclude from the benefits of that "PROTECTION" the gravel of our own shores, or the wages of the Dorsetshire slaves, who might find employment in raising it, and thus make some addition to the horsebeans and turnips which constitute their normal diet.

I was glad to see Mr. Kitson's letter respecting the success of his new system in Tobago, in your last LEAGUE. But valuable as it is for the facts it contains, there is one fact which demands more particular notice, as furnishing a flat contradiction to the demand made by the West Indians for a further supply of labour. Upon referring to Mr. Kitson's letter, it will be seen that his maximum rate of wages does not exceed 8*d*. per day, or 4*s*. a week; which currency is not much above 2*s*. sterling, or below even the Irish standard of 4*d*. per diem; and yet even for this pittance, a powerful competition exists among the sable candidates for employment. Mr. Kitson says:

"I have 110 people on my pay list constantly engaged, and, instead of Armo's Vale being abandoned, I refused, in the past month, the aid of NO LESS THAN TWELVE EFFECTIVE LABOURERS!!"

What is true of Tobago, is no doubt true of all our islands; and yet in the teeth of this glut of labour, I find, from the West Indian papers, that the following provision has been made for the introduction of no fewer than 7993 unfortunate beings to swell the bloated tide of human misery, and rob the native of the soil of the fair remuneration for his labour:

Jamaica, 7 vessels to carry 1787 Coolies.
British Guiana, 16 " 3978
Trinidad, 8 " 2228

In all 31, to transport 7993 victims from India to toil and starve and die in our West Indian Islands, to aggravate the evil, and make the cup of iniquity overflow the brim. The fund from which the expenses of this immigration are defrayed, is raised from taxes imposed upon the very portion of the community whose means of living are to be lessened by their introduction. And what is the condition of the Coolies already imported? From the Anti-Slavery Reporter for the present month, we learn that:

"The Kingston papers of last week contained statements to the effect that great discontent prevailed amongst the Coolies, and that several in a state of nudity had been to Spanish Town to complain to the Agent-general of ill-treatment; but, owing to that gentleman's illness, and absence from town, their object could not be secured. On Thursday they returned in greater numbers, and wandered about the town in a state of nakedness and misery. The police were compelled, for the sake of decency, to take them in charge. We are told that clothing was distributed among them, and that the people willingly supplied them with food. The cause of their discontent we have not learned, but report says, it arose from the ill-treatment they received from their Sindars. What the end of Coolie immigration will be is pretty evident. Many lives will be sacrificed, much bad feeling engendered, large sums of money wasted, and the whole scheme pronounced a failure. The editor of the Falmouth Post states, that a party of Coolies had come to town in a state of the greatest destitution and misery. He describes them as mere walking skeletons, infected with disease, and indulges in severe strictures on the inhumanity of bringing them from their own country, to die a wretched death in Jamaica."

And yet we learn from the same authority:

"A correspondent at Lucea, writing to us on the 23d of February, says, 'The barque Mandarin, commanded by Captain John Cleland, arrived here yesterday, with 276 immigrants. Of this number 237 are Hill Coolies, and 39 are Africans, the latter having been taken by British cruisers out of slave ships, and shipped on board the Mandarin, by order of the Governor of St. Helena. Captain Cleland reports that he made the passage from Calcutta to this place in 105 days, and that the Hyderabad was to have left in a fortnight after he did, with another lot of Coolies for Savanna-la-Mar. A third vessel would sail in a month after for some part on the north side, probably Falmouth.'"

Altogether it is expected that in the course of the year not fewer than 12,000 immigrants will be introduced into the three colonies of Jamaica, British Guiana, and Trinidad, in the course of the year at the expense of those unfortunate labourers who are natives of the soil, with whose labour they are intended to interfere, and whose remuneration they are designed to reduce. The principle is the same as that of the New Poor Law, as administered at home—to place the labourer in a state of hopeless, endless, dependence upon the tyrant landowner, and mock him with the name of independence while he is robbed of the reality. And this is what the protectionists call giving encouragement to native industry!

Mr. Smith and Mr. Kitson prove the readiness of the negro to work for fair reward; but the object of the hypocritical predilection for free labour sugar is to compel him to accept what his employer will give, however below the just standard. It is this unfair and impolitic preference which perpetuates the horrors of slavery under another name, and furnishes the enemies of freedom with a plausible argument against the abolition of slavery.

Leaving you to use the extracts I have given, and the arguments I have used, in any manner your judgment suggests, I remain, my dear Sir, Yours truly, Wm. HAMILTON.

A. W. Paulton, Esq.

THE SCHOOLMASTER WANTED.—The following epistle was sent a short time since from a farmer in Devonshire to his friend.—"Der Jan,—The Oxen ar com to praise the Gods." Meaning to inform him that the auctioneer was come to appraise the goods.

PASSAGES FROM THE LIFE OF AN ENGLISH FARMER.

PASSAGE III: Giving some account of his landlord.

Mr. Hurst's farm contained 120 acres, including roads, hedgerows, ditches on each side of the hedgerows, banks raised on the side of the ditches; marshes containing willows and wild ducks—the willows for himself, the wild ducks for the young squire; copses for game; a covert of furze (only in part on Berryhill farm) for foxes; and the ground on which stood the farm buildings and some cottages forming the outskirts of Berry village. On the Berry Park estate there were from fifty to sixty farms as large as this, and upwards of one hundred smaller. Altogether including 3600 acres in Berry Park, and 750 acres of copse and fox covert and common, outside the park walls, the estate contained nearly 47,000 acres.

And there was not an estate of land on the beautiful face of England more fair to look upon than that of Berry Park. There was not one less deceptive in its outward beauty; for below that beauty lay all the elements of excellent agriculture; and, as Mr. Hurst has since said, they only wanted money and men's strength, and two or three other advantages which the young squire could have added to money, and men's strength to have worked those elements into activity, to have made him a richer squire than his father was. And his father was rich enough to charge the estate only with 1000*l.* of annuity to an elderly relation, and 2000*l.* a-year to his widow, the young squire's mother. All his other children, daughters as well as sons, and the widow in part, were provided for out of his personal property.

No; there was not at that time a fairer inheritance of land in England than that which fell to this young squire by his father's death. Larger properties there are in England, and in Scotland too. It would not have measured with the acres of the noble Cavendish of Chatsworth, Grosvenor of Eaton Hall, Percy of Alnwick Castle; nor with the acres of twenty or thirty other Lords and commoners. Least of all with the regions of the grouse and the red deer of Athole or Argyle, or the sheep walks and the fields of oats and barley of Buccleuch. Yet it was a rich and a beautiful inheritance, large even amongst the lordly lands of England.

But fair and fruitful and exceeding lovely as were those 47,000 acres of woodland, rock, river, green meadow, and corn field, they lay not on the face of England more pleasant to the beholder than stood the young owner of them, generous and beloved, among those who enjoyed his personal friendship and favour. To have said to him who never heard the alms-seeker ask for a halfpenny without giving a shilling, who never had an act of duty or generous service done to him, so far as he knew it, without rewarding the duty with more than its payment, and the generous service with five-fold generosity; to have intimated to him that to sustain his dignity and provide himself with the pleasures which he was educated to desire and enjoy as necessities of life, he would make poor men of men not then poor, that men of honesty and industry would be by him driven in old age to the workhouse—to have told him of this he would as soon have leaped from the tower of his college at Oxford headlong, and broken his bones, every one of them, as have believed it; nor believing it, could he have continued to ride his racers and steeple-chasers across break and bar, ditch deep and hedge high, and drive his mail coach to Woodstock and Banbury and back again, loaded with young noblemen and the heir of a dukedom, in the uniform of a guard blowing the guard's bugle. No; such was the native generosity of his nature that he would not and could not have made the pleasures and pastimes to which these college exercises were but initiatory, the necessities of his life, had he known to what they would lead. But if he had been told to what they would lead, or might lead; had he been told what as a certainty they would prevent him from doing, namely, his duty to himself and his country, as the owner of 47,000 acres of land, he would not have believed those who so told him. His education led him to form different opinions on the duties of a rich landowner.

Had it been intimated to him by some friend who sat near his ear when he first went into Parliament, a young member and a young man, two years before his father's death, that instead of being a protector of agriculture, as he was sent to Parliament to be, and believed himself to be, he was its enemy, though its owner, he would have deemed that friend unfit for further confidence, kind and forbearing as he naturally was. Such had been the purport of every thought implanted in him by others; such the bent of every opinion which had grown within him of his own conception. For men's opinions, like a plant's leaves, grow to the light by which they are cherished.

We need not now take time to recount in detail all the elements of agricultural wealth which were then known to be on the Berry estate—but though known, not applied to use; nor the greater store of unapplied resources on it, and not then known—not known by reason of the traditions of agriculture having been for centuries deemed superior to new discoveries; nor then known, because it was left to the English manufacturers to take science by the hand and say, "Come work for us," while English farmers turned their backs on science, and would not let it even touch their dung-hills, saying, "We have always done as we do; we will do well enough if let alone;" the farmers speaking thus, because landowners had no higher knowledge of their duties and their interests than our young squire had. We shall not occupy time and fill space by putting into this narrative the details of the wasted wealth of the 47,000 acres of Berry Park, nor yet to put into form and shape palpable to the understanding that which is almost impalpable to human perception—the legal intricacies which are interwoven with all English tenures, and in such seemingly simple tenures as tenancies-at-will; and which, unhappily for English agriculture, ensnare it and mar its progress at every step. We may have yet time and space to give these in detail. At all events, we shall soon see in this little history what their effects are.

But at present let us proceed to say that the young Squire Thornecliffe—Francis Augustus de Aubrey Thornecliffe, at the age of 25, succeeded his father, Francis John de Aubrey Thornecliffe, who died at the age of 63. Let us proceed to review how the young rich man, now the possessor of property in land, the market value of which was about 1,500,000*l.* sterling, exclusive of timber, minerals, buildings, furniture, much valuable live stock, six church livings, the great tithes of several parishes, and the almost undisputed power to return two borough members to Parliament; let us proceed to review how he, already two years a legislator, pledged to support the interests of agriculture in Parliament, and honestly inclined so to do according to his best ability (his natural abilities were good)—and according to the political opinions which he had inherited with his high rank and great wealth; let us see what he did to advance that great interest which he believed to be beyond comparison paramount to all others in this country—the agricultural interest. And as we write and read in this paper for instruction, and not for mere amusement, let us put the actions of his early life in that point of view where they will be most instructive, though at the risk of being less entertaining. And let us touch upon some of those facts of occurrence and traits of character which have sober truth in them, though little romance.

Squire Thornecliffe was not a frequent speaker in Parliament. He had little time, and not much inclination, to attend the House of Commons. His two packs of hounds; his horse-races, steeple-chases, yeomanry cavalry, game preserves, and grand battues among the game; his coursing and breeding, and buying of hounds and horses for coursing and hunting and racing, his betting on all events and amusements, and paying of bets to gentlemen less wealthy, but sharper or more fortunate than himself; all these left him little time, and less inclination to spend his evenings in the House of Commons. Still he was often there when a vote was required for the party to which he was attached by inheritance and education, and always there when a vote was required to support, as he honestly believed it was to support, that interest which was his interest, and to which he was voluntarily pledged.

He had spoken in Parliament before succeeding to his estate in deprecation of some motion for Parliamentary reform, and, in doing so, founded his objection to reform on the ground that it would weaken the agricultural interest, and transfer its political strength to the manufacturing and commercial towns. He spoke then slightly of the men called cotton lords; and even seriously warned the legislature of the national danger involved in the increasing magnitude of English manufactures; and he has at times, when opportunities served, spoken similarly since. And when he has not spoken, his votes have conveyed to the public the fact that he has not altered his opinions.

Now it so happened, that in the year of his accession to the Berry estate, there died, at about the distance of 200 miles from London, a gentleman who was both a manufacturer and a merchant, and who left one son, the sole inheritor of his wealth; that wealth consisted of two coal-pits, with steam-engines and all the gear in working order; two large ships trading to the United States, shares in seven ships trading to the West Indies and South America; one steam-ship going between Liverpool and Dublin; shares in steamers working as pilots and ferry-boats on the Mersey; shares in several of the Midland Counties canals; one canal and the wharves on it all his own; a warehouse in Liverpool, and shares in a Marine Insurance office in the same place; also a cotton-mill, steam engine, and machinery for spinning and weaving in the neighbourhood of Manchester; which last was let at an annual rental of several thousand pounds to a manufacturer. Indeed, the greater part of all the property enumerated was under the management of second parties, who hired it and paid rent, or freightage, or dividends, as the case might be.

This young man of wealth, though not so rich as Squire Thornecliffe, was richer than most of the squires and many of the lords in England; and he might have used his property for pleasure, and pleasure only, as they used theirs, if he had been so inclined. Where he was educated, and what the maxims of his education were, cannot be now told with certainty.

But he did not stop the engine of the coal-pits and the pump, and go down into the pits for sport, and be hauled up again and again let down for sport at break-neck speed showing courage and spirit on his part, yet hindering the work of the coal-master, who rented the pits, and of the colliers, who worked the seams of coal.

He did not, when the ships were loaded with cutlery, and crockery, and plate, and calicoes, and silks, for Boston, New York, and Baltimore, and Charleston, go and fill them with vermin, for the pleasure of hunting the vermin, and killing some of it, and holding some of it by the tail, and cutting off the tail; overturning bales of goods upon the deck in the pursuit; breaking the cutlery and the crockery; defacing the plate, and treading the calicoes and the silks under foot; ordering the merchants, whose goods these were, and who had freighted the ships, to leave the ships, if they complained, with their goods instantly, before the voyage was made; he still taking freightage from them, by compulsion, because the goods were in his ships, and the law authorised him to take freightage, whether the voyage was completed or not; he did not do all, nor any of these things, to the merchants, his tenants.

He did not prevent those who held shares jointly with himself in the ships trading to the West Indies and South America from making the most of any new merchandise or new mercantile project, which the most sagacious of them deemed to be profitable.

He did not load his steam ship, going between Liverpool and Dublin, with idle passengers, who paid no fares, merely because those idle passengers were agreeable companions, well-dressed, and pleasant to be seen in a steam packet, even though that packet was entirely his own, and he might have got a premium for making such a show.

He did not, for the sport of taking pleasure-trips every day for nine months of the year in the ferry-boats on the Mersey, hinder the trade and the profit of those boats, and pay penalties to those who owned them jointly with himself; thus losing his own share of the profits, and making good their losses also.

He did not let the canal, which was all his own, flood the wharves and the warehouses, by defective drainage and broken flood-gates, nor keep that canal for the mere breeding of fish, with a force of armed men around it to preserve the fish, and keep away all fishers, and all boats and barges, and the navigators of them, who might attempt to use the canal for the common-sense uses of its construction.

He did not, when he let his spinning and weaving factory to the manufacturer, bind the latter to keep it all in repair, and yet allow him, the owner, to come into the mill with bet-headed associates, whose life was idleness, to get the steam up to a pressure which the safety-valve could not ease, that the machinery might be made to go at a rate which wheels, shafts, pulleys, cranks, spindles, and shuttles, never went at before—all to see which wheel could go fastest and longest without breaking down. Nor did he bind this manufacturer to spin only certain kinds of cotton, certain numbers of thread, and weave certain lengths and lengths of pieces of cloth, under penalty of being fined triple, quadruple, and quintuple, the value of the threads and pieces of cloth made against rule. Nor did he depute the power of doing all or any of those things, in his name, to lawyers, who know nothing of ships and factories, and spinning and weaving, yet who like a job to do, and cannot live without a job to do.

He did not do all those things, and profess to be the especial friend, protector, and encourager of ships, canals, factories, and of the occupiers and workers of ships, canals, and factories. He offered his tenant, the manufacturer, no protection, but security, that he would not interfere with him until the term of years for which the factory was leased had expired, save to draw the rent, and see that the machinery was not wilfully injured or destroyed. He gave the merchants who freighted his ships, and the captains and crews of the ships no promise of protection,—only liberty to sail with what tide they chose, and what wind, to whatever port they chose, with whatever cargo—wisely judging, that they knew better than he how to choose a cargo and take advantage of wind and tide. As for them seeking redress for his stocking of the ships with vermin, that he might hunt the vermin over the bales of goods, shouting and tallyhoing as he hunted, and hold the vermin up by the tail when it was caught, and cut off the tail, and each of the four nearest of his companions cut off a foot as a trophy; as for the merchants and the captains seeking redress for goods damaged, and time wasted thus, they never once thought of such a thing. In commerce, and also in the dealings of the manufacturers, such waste of property, and of the resources and energies which produce property, are not known.

Not so in agriculture. The young Squire Thornecliffe believed that he did only what became a squire to do, and especially one so largely possessed of land as he was, in doing to his property and to those who hired it and paid rent for it, all those things which the young merchant did not do to his mercantile property.

And yet he continued to marvel why this adventurer in merchandise and manufactures became richer every year, and added to all his business that of a banker, and to all his ships and canals and shares in these more ships and shares in railways, and, before long, to all his wealth a landed estate; while he, the owner of land, born to it, and bred a landowner of the first class, advanced not in wealth, but sank into debt. And farther, he and many more of his Parliamentary party, continued to marvel why the manufacturer, who only rented the factory, should become so rich as to build a new one for himself, and extend his business far beyond its former limits, while those who were tenants in land became no richer, and could not extend their manufacture of corn and cattle and human food without loss or complaints of loss.

Yet did he continue to keep his two packs of hounds that he might hunt four days in the week, and also all the horses necessary for so much hunting, and many more than was required even for that. And his packs of hounds were the most complete in his county, and the hunts were the best attended. So was his mansion noted for its hospitality, as he was for generosity in all personal actions. Yet he was only a fair specimen of the richest of English landowners, and a specimen of what even the most moderately endowed of the squires attempted to be; for though they could not all spend thousands a year on the mere items of hounds and horses, they all hunted and spent as far as their land, and those who lend money on land, would let them spend.

They rode with Squire Thornecliffe, and were proud of the honour and the privilege of hunting with his hounds four days of the week. And a hundred of them, and sometimes half as many more, would scour at the gallop across the farm fields, a fox first, hounds next, and the fleetest of them at the tails of the hounds. Some would halt not at hedge, or ditch, or high wall, but clear these, or any other obstacles, at a bound, plunging into another field of October sown wheat, it might be, or fold of fattening sheep, or meadow with cows in calf, striking terror into the sheep and cows, and making them run and stand appalled, as nothing on earth can terrify them; others, and by far the greater number, did not clear at a bound every hedge, ditch, and high wall; they rode through gaps in the fences; if there were gaps; they pulled down palings to make gaps, if there were none, or they rode to the gates and forced a way through them, and rode on and left them broken and open. And even the richer of the tenant farmers rode over one another's land thus; and were proud of the permission to ride with their squire and the fifty other squires there. And they hallooed and tallyhoed like the best of the squires, and called that farmer a "muff" and a "knave," whoever he might be, that grumbled to have his fields of new wheat, and his fences, and cattle, and sheep thus ridden upon, broken, and terror struck.

And last of all was it admissible for a tenant farmer to make deep drains, to draw the water from his fields to the great ditches, and cover in the drains and make conduits into which foxes could run for shelter in the hunt; nor was it pardonable to do anything, no matter what agricultural philosopher might recommend it, that would interfere with the pleasures of the chase, the breeding of foxes for the chase, and the preservation of game of all kinds for the dogs and guns, and great days of killing, wounding, and unwinning.

But in sooth there was little heard of the murmurs, if there were murmurs. It was in the conditions of their occupation of the farms for the tenants to submit to all those things, and to many more. The four-footed game, and the winged birds of the woodland coverts, and of the weedy wastes by the ponderous hedges and ditch banks, the farmers were bound not to injure, depredators though these were; but, on the contrary, to aid in preserving them until they were of numbers exceeding in multiplicity even the rooks, the sparrows, the mice, and the rats; yea, exceeding these, when added to all the fowls and chickens, ducks and ducklings, geese and goslings, hogs large and pigs little, on the broad estate.

Then when the harvest had been gathered in, and the game could get no more of that, and the wheat seed and the winter vetches had been sown, and had sprung up, and they could not eat more of either than they had eaten, and longer life would have led to leanness, the birds and the beasts, which ten armed gamekeepers and assistants, with sticks in their hands, and as many Acts of Parliament as there were gamekeepers, and more magistrates than there were men with sticks—the birds and beasts which they had preserved to that time, by and with the assistance of the farmers on whose crops they were chiefly fed, were encompassed in the woodlands and in the weedy boundaries of the fields, and driven forth in the face of the squire and many lords and lesser squires.

And men, expert in loading guns with powder and shot, loaded them and put caps to the locks, and handed them to the noble lords and the squire, and even to the lesser squires, who all of them fired at the shrieking birds as they rose above the copse one after another, and half dozens at a time, and brought them to the ground broken winged or killed outright, and never halted in their killing until they had brought many hundreds of pairs to the ground, and could tell of an excellent day's sport.

And then, when the shooting and hunting season was over, and birds were allowed to be at peace, and choose their mates, and hatch young birds for next year's battue, Squire Thorncliffe, and the other squires and lords, who sat in Parliament, repaired thither, and sat on their legislative eggs and hatched them into new Acts of Parliament, still more to protect agriculture and preserve game.

And again was money lavished on London life, beyond the measure of income, on mere consumption without production. And again did the racing come round, and the betting and the cheating of those rich enough to be cheated. Again the hunting came, and the battues, and the steeple-chases, and again and again the Parliament.

At last Squire Thorncliffe had mortgaged Berry Park estate—even the whole of the 47,000 acres; and what with the bonds of the mortgages added to all the other disabilities of the tenants as agriculturists, and the breeding and feeding of game, which was not now lessened, though the squire went abroad and let the sporting out for hire; and what with the inevitable consequence of augmented rents to pay the mortgages their interest, and still allow the squire 10,000*l.* a-year, agriculture was marred and buffeted, and put back, and compelled to linger on the road a beggar for alms, while commerce and manufactures marched on, and gained strength and wealth and independence.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

AGRICULTURE.

"THEY HUG EACH DEAR DELUSION TO THE LAST."

"For repealed they are, though there be a respite of three years."—Mark Lane Express, 18th May.

It is said that the monopolists indulge in the dream of a compromise; that they can, in the Lords, make some terms for their monopoly; that they may be able to retain some power over the supply of food; that the production of artificial scarcity is still to be a privilege of the Peers. Poor day dreamers! Suppose they should succeed in substituting some modified scale, or "a moderate fixed duty"—now the height of monopolist ambition—for the prospective Free Trade of Sir Robert Peel's Bill; suppose a dissolution of Parliament, and the farmers cajoled, or frightened into the most active electoral exertions; and suppose some measure of compromise to be passed into an Act of Parliament, does any rational human being believe that such compromise would be a settlement? Why, the League would effectually prevent that.

In 1842, just four years ago, the existing Corn Law was passed by overwhelming majorities, and was to have been a final settlement of the Corn Law question. Farmers were to rely on the law; land agents were to value according to the promises of the law; monopolist landlords were to extract high rents from yearly tenants by means of the law; in a word, the substance of monopoly was to be retained in unimpaired integrity. Nothing but the "superfluous odium" of the old law was to be abandoned. The inoperative extremes of the sliding scale were alone to be given up. The Standard pledged its character and veracity—pledges of no great value, we admit—to the assertion that the Corn Law question had been settled for 20 years. Yet, in less than four years, monopoly is in extremis. Every public man of reputation has abandoned it as untenable. In the Commons, the monopolists have been compelled to seek for a leader in the elevated and intellectual region of the betting ring. Then, the protectionists had the countenance and counsel of Sir Robert Peel, and the practised band of public men who constitute his Government; now they must rely on the prudence of a Stanley, and the sagacity of a Richmond, to support their wrong against the aroused indignation of the British people.

And this indignation is no vague or momentary feeling, which may subside if opposed by a Stanley—Richmond—Bentinck Cabinet. It has its organised, disciplined, and tried interpreter. It is embodied in the League. In 1842, the League told the farmers that the question would never be settled till the trade in corn was free—till all laws respecting the importation of grain should be totally abolished; and the League has gone so far to produce the fulfilment of its prediction, that its absolute accomplishment is inevitable. As the shrewd protectionist of the Mark Lane Express says, "the Corn Laws are repealed," though the final extinction of all restriction is resented.

And what was the state of the public mind in 1842, as compared with its present state? The League then declared that the New Corn Law would be, and should be, no settlement of the question; and it relied upon its power to instruct the public. Has the League been idle in the interval? For every individual who then understood and admitted,—and to understand is to admit,—the economical truths on which the resistance to monopoly is founded, there are now fifty. The League fund of 50,000*l.* was then thought a grand effort—by some too great to be accomplished; yet it has been raised, and applied to the instruction of the people. Then a further fund of 100,000*l.* has been since raised, and applied in the same way; and now the creation of a third fund of a quarter of a million, for the same object, is suspended until it is sure whether the Peers will or not risk any real effort to uphold their monopoly. Now, too, the value of the 40*s.* franchise, as an instrument to break down the unrighteous power of monopoly, has become known. And, with these facts before them, do any rational persons believe that there can be any settlement of the Corn Law question by a compromise?

The very proposition is an absurdity. The League is pledged to the abolition of all restrictions on the import of grain; every statesman of the nation has also pledged himself to the same opinions; and can it be supposed that the mere brute force of landlordism—a force which has daily become weaker and weaker, as the people have become acquainted with its real character, can sustain monopoly even in a modified form?

We especially call the attention of farmers to these facts. We ask them to review the progress of the Anti-Corn-Law agitation. Let them start with the Free Trade meetings in the rural districts—pass on to the counter-agitation of the landlords by their "Protection Societies,"—an agitation which has indirectly done as much to spread Free Trade efforts amongst the farmers, as the direct efforts of the League itself,—then to the county franchise movement; and, finally, to the proposal by Government of a measure which eventually provides for the total abolition of the Corn Laws. After such a review, can they hug the delusion that "protection" in any form can be maintained? We venture to say they cannot. Yet there is a considerable section of landowning monopolists who still hug that delusion with a devotion amounting to fatuity. These are the men who dream of a compromise. The realisation of their dream is impossible. Nevertheless they may attempt to realise it; for, as politicians, they are not accountable beings. And the attempt will be made by the agency of the farmers they can control, and at the expense of the whole farming body.

That the League will defeat the attempt of any section of the landed oligarchy to uphold the Corn Laws is absolutely certain, and in all probability, if the contest be renewed, it will be of no very long duration.

But what, in the mean time, becomes of the questions about which farmers are naturally so anxious, and which so directly and seriously affect their interests? Till the question of the Corn Laws has been settled—and nothing but total repeal will settle it—all hope of improved and secure tenures, of the arrangement of tenant rights, of rational leases, or abandonment of game preserves, must be suspended. Self delusion, and to delude their tenants, will be the aim of the monopolist landlords; while uncertainty, and possible miscalculation, will beset every arrangement in his business which the farmer may attempt to make. For their own sakes, then, as well as in mercy to their infatuated leaders, let the farmers meet any efforts to impede the too tardy settlement of the Corn Law question, which the Government bill proposes to effect, by a distinct declaration that they have had enough of protection; that it is not worth the turmoil of its maintenance (even if it could be maintained), and that above all things, the farmers desire to have the question settled.

THE FOREIGN CATTLE TRADE.

If anything was now necessary to convince the farmers that the monopolist landowners, who have hitherto assumed to act in the name of the agricultural interest, have been actuated by motives which they have not avowed, it would be found in their ridiculous exaggerations of the capacity of foreign husbandry. Take, for instance, their fables about foreign cattle. What farmer does not remember the outcry about the tariff? How many of them sacrificed their stock under the influence of a sort of panic? Now, the most cursory inquiry would have satisfied the most timid stockholder that any serious depreciation of the value of British cattle from foreign competition, was, and is, impossible. Nothing but the absurd premium offered by our Corn Laws to foreign feeding of stock could have made the tariff worth the farmer's consideration.

But although the cattle panic has passed away, the "farmers' friends" in Parliament are endeavouring to raise similar false alarms upon the subject of corn; and it will, therefore, be useful to farmers to learn upon what unsubstantial foundation their former tales about cattle were based.

We have, elsewhere, made some remarks upon the farmers' prospects, with an open market for corn; and we shall here give some passages from the letter of a correspondent of the Times, from "the Banks of the Elbe," on the importation of German cattle.

The information is derived from an English gentleman, who has for upwards of 20 years farmed his own estate in Northern Germany, and his remarks on the tariff are divided into two heads: 1*st*, its effect on the English grower of stock; 2*d*, on the grower of corn. On the first point he says:

"The English stock grower dreads being overwhelmed by such an importation of foreign cattle and sheep as will reduce prices to, if not below, the cost of production. My decided conviction is, that no quantity of stock which can now, or for many years to come, be spared from the home consumption of Germany, can in any degree lessen the profits of the English farmer, or produce any perceptible fall in the markets; and I ground my assertion on the following data—1*st*, whilst the importation of foreign cattle into England during the last three and a half years has (with the exception of the panic period) caused no diminution whatever of English prices, the small number of 8000 head removed from our consumers has produced so sensible a rise in our markets that good meat now fetches in this country very nearly as much as in England. An attention to the following quotations will at once show the relative positions of the two countries in this respect:—Prime beef is stated in The Times, of the 14th inst., to have brought 4*s.* 4*d.* per stone on the 13th of April. The best oxen which can now be procured in this country sell at 14 dollars per 100*lbs.*; but they are far from being what an English butcher would term prime; I question, indeed, if they would be esteemed equal to the second quality at Smithfield, and for this reason—oxen of first quality are very rarely to be met with in this country, except in autumn, when the cattle fatted in the rich delta of the Elbe are brought to market; while, at this season, few beasts are offered for sale except draught oxen, which, having been cast at the commencement of winter from the ploughing team on account of age or stiffness, and having been since fed on dry food or the refuse of potato distilleries, have not, it may easily be imagined, exchanged during such a process of stall-feeding the tough, stringy muscle induced by eight or nine years' hard work for flesh of a much more palatable or juicy nature. And when, in addition to these deteriorating circumstances, the inferior class of animals bred in these countries is taken into account, with their heavy heads and foreheads, their long legs, and their light hind quarters, it will, I think, be granted that such can never be classed higher than with second-rate beef in England. And yet even these coarse animals cannot, as I have said, be bought here at present for less than 14 dollars per 100 lbs., or about 3*s.* 8*d.* a stone. Now, as The Times of the 14th states second quality beef as selling at 4*s.* per stone, the speculator in foreign cattle here has, in return for risk, freight, commission, and profit, the tempting possibility of realising 4*d.* per stone!"

Nor is the risk of transporting cattle trifling. In October last no less than 18 oxen were thrown overboard from one Hamburg steamer, during a storm; and the unprofitable nature of the trade has been shown by the fact that comparatively few cattle have been shipped from Hamburg during the last four months, though the navigation has been quite open. But then it has been said that the rise of price abroad will give an impulse to the German stock farmers. But the well-informed correspondent says:

"It so happens, however, that serious, in some respects insurmountable, obstacles oppose themselves to this being done to any considerable extent. The first and most unconquerable difficulty is the climate, which necessitates the housing of all fatted animals during the whole winter (seven months on an average), if they shall retain the flesh they brought with them from the pastures; and it need hardly be remarked, that building is an expense which proprietors alone will undergo, and one which few would be likely to go to on speculation. Germany, it may be said, is a wide world, and that although the far north may deserve this description, it cannot apply to the more southern portions. I reply, meteorological tables prove a very remarkable similarity of temperature throughout the whole of Germany. Thus it is ascertained that the mean temperature of what is called the north-west district (Hamburg, Brunswick, &c.) is,—winter, 1 deg.; summer, 18 deg. 2 min.; while that of the valley of the Rhine, including Frankfurt, Stuttgart, Mannheim, and Würzburg, is only,—winter, 1 deg. 10 min.; summer, 18 deg. 9 min.) of Reaumur—much too small a variation to afford any just ground for calculating on a different mode of animal treatment, even were it not well known that the warmest portions of Germany are not grazing countries. Again, it may and has been said, 'Admit cattle into England, and the vast plains of the Bannat and of Poland will send us millions of cattle.' But how are they to reach a sea port? How support or be supported through the arid sands of Prussia? And in what condition would they reach the English shore? But the necessity of housing cattle is not the only obstacle which the German climate presents to any extensive increase of stock-breeding; the difficulty of producing and securing an adequate supply of food arising from the same cause is very great. Turnips, that foundation of English agricultural prosperity, and the hinging point of English agricultural argument, cannot be grown to any extent. Many a soil which, to the eye of the traveller posting for amusement or business through Prussia, appears a second Norfolk, requiring only English skill to raise turnips, and English sheep to eat them off, in order to become the finest land in the world, is, in fact, wholly incapable of growing them at all from the moistureless aridity to which it is reduced in the summer months.

But that is not all :

"Even where the soil is not unfavourable, the very short interval—usually four weeks—which can be reckoned on as intervening between the frosts of winter and the sudden heat and consequent rapid development of summer, now and then varied by a parching drought which bakes the ground into iron, leaves scanty time, with the aid of a comparatively small agricultural population for getting in the grain and potato crops, and renders the laying down of any considerable breadth of Swedes (the only turnip which is worth taking trouble with here) very nearly an impossibility."

But, suppose all the difficulties of want of hands, want of implements, and want of capital, in an unfavourable climate surmounted, the turnips sown, and escaped from the fly—"in that country a very Egyptian plague"—and suppose the plants cleaned and hoed, no easy matter, the troubles of the German breeder and feeder are not over :

"The frost, which generally sets in sharply the first days of November, even although it afterwards relaxes, may deprive him of the fruit of all his labour, since it is no easy matter to get all the winter corn sown, the potatoes pitted, and every other esculent rescued from the frost. But even when taken up, the difficulty is not surmounted. If the weather becomes mild and moist, the turnips grow in the pit; if it be severe, they can scarcely be saved from freezing by any depth of covering in a climate which occasionally, and often most unexpectedly, freezes two feet deep in a couple of nights. Feeding off is, of course, wholly out of the question, and the trouble, expense, and uncertainty connected with turnip culture, as above depicted, are much greater than the mere renter of a farm will encounter, while the rich proprietors know little of, and care less for, farming."

But the summer supply of food for stock is as limited as the winter. The writer says :

"Nor is it in winter only that the German cultivator suffers from climate. Green crops, too, are of very uncertain attainment. Last year, for example, was one singularly unpropitious to the stock farmer. Not only did the severe and late-continued frost destroy nearly all the clover and ryegrass throughout the country, but the supervening long drought, and the alternations of extreme heat and cold withering winds which characterised the summer, prevented the deficiency being made good by vetches, or other fallow crops; the consequence was, a great dearth of fodder, to which was afterwards superadded the potato disease, thus cutting off the usual resource of the German farmer when hay is scarce. From all this it is plain the agriculturists here have little encouragement to breed cattle on speculation, and that whatever, in the usual routine course can be spared from home consumption for exportation must ever remain a mere drop in the bucket as to any influence it can have in depressing the English market, even were the British population to remain stationary."

But if population is increasing here, it is increasing also in Germany :

"The rapid increase of population here, as elsewhere, in these peaceful times; the vastly-increased consumption of butchers' meat since the cholera was affirmed to be fostered by a vegetable and fruit diet; and the very high price it bears in Prussia and Saxony (both of them destitute of pastures), whether any surplus from their neighbouring lands will assuredly go so soon as the railroad communication, now in a great state of forwardness, affords the means of rapid, cheap, and regular transport. Any considerable exportation of fat sheep from Germany to England is a chimera. There are three breeds kept in this country—the long legged, coarse-wooled, small-carassed, indigenous heath sheep; the fine merino, kept for the sake of the fleece as long as it can eat, and which by no process of feeding can be made to lay up flesh on the forequarters; and the large marsh sheep, which affords a heavy, coarse, woolly-tasted mutton. The larger English breeds have been repeatedly imported, with the view of improving the native sheep, but have always proved a failure, as they can neither endure the heat and drought of summer, nor the being housed for months in winter; and as mutton is very justly considered the worst meat Germany produces, home consumption would never repay the farmer for the loss on wool he must incur, should he, by crossing with English rams, obtain a better carressed animal. On all these grounds, the English farmers need not waste a thought on any evil likely to accrue to them from the admission of foreign cattle into England free of all duty."

The German feeders, however, quite understand the value of our present Tariff and Corn Law to them, which, by excluding their cheaper grain and admitting their stock when fattened, offer a direct premium to the German graziers at the expense of the British stock-feeder; for the writer adds :

"But should the House of Peers be so obliging as to persevere in opposing Sir R. Peel's measure in regard to corn, while they sanction its adoption in respect of cattle, we farmers on this side of the water ought to drink their healths in champagne every day of our lives, for nothing could be a greater boon to us."

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS.

In the House of Commons on Tuesday night, Mr. Stafford O'Brien inquired whether Government had framed any machinery to obtain agricultural statistics, which, in 1844, had been suggested to, and undertaken by, the Government. He thought that though the farmers might not at first readily furnish all the information that was desirable, yet they would become gradually familiarised with the subject, and in time furnish more complete and detailed information than could be expected at first.

Sir George Clerk, on the part of the Government, stated that they had tried the experiment in Hampshire, in the county of Edinburgh, and in Cavan, in Ireland. From Ireland and Scotland—in the latter the parochial schoolmasters having been employed to furnish the returns—they had obtained the required information :

"In the northern division of Hampshire, however, they had not succeeded so well. They had employed the officers of the Poor Law; but from some jealousy which had sprung up they had only received returns from a few places. He admitted the importance of the subject; and he trusted that in a short time the returns would be completed. When they were obtained and presented, then the house might consider the question whether the information obtained should be voluntary or compulsory. After the opinion expressed by his hon. friend he trusted that the agriculturists would afford all the information required of them."

And, from a fuller report than that from which we have quoted, it appears that the Hampshire farmers are unwilling to furnish the information required. We are not much surprised at this; because we know that amongst the great body of English farmers, who are yearly tenants, an opinion prevails that if they are known to have made any considerable improvements in the cultivation of their farms, advantage will be taken by the landlords of such information, in order to advance their rents. We regret to say, so many advantages have been taken of tenants, that it is impossible to deny that the apprehension has some foundation. We think, however, that farmers generally need not decline to give information of the statistics of their farms on that ground, because most farms are rented to the full as high as they ought to be, under yearly holdings, and the existing state of the relations of landlord and tenant. But, in every other respect, it is to the interest of the farmers to give full and accurate statements of the statistics of their farms.

Say, for instance, the acreage, the division into pasture and arable, the breadth of the various grain, root, and green crops, the number of labourers employed; the horses, the stock of cattle, sheep and pigs, kept, bred and fed; the quantities of artificial food and artificial manure purchased, the extent of damage done by game, the size of the enclosures, the prevalence of timber, the state of the hedge-rows, the ditches and the drainage, the extent and condition of the homestead and farm-buildings, and so forth; so the return of each kind of grain, roots, and other produce per acre, would furnish a mass of information which would greatly elucidate the actual state of English husbandry.

We have no doubt that such a return would redound much more to the credit of the tenantry than the landlordism of the country. It would be found, that where the produce is large—where much stock is maintained, and many labourers employed—where land is well drained, and fences well kept, the tenant is exempted from some of the burdens of landlordism, and has practically a secure tenure, and complete possession of his farm; that he either has a lease, or holds under circumstances, which induce him to expend capital in cultivation with the full expectation of reaping where he has sown. On the other hand, it would almost invariably appear, that where the produce of the land is small, the stock scanty, labour stinted, and so forth, that the cold shade of landlordism has overspread the farm; that the tenant has no security of tenure; that he is oppressed by obsolete or injudicious regulations; that timber abounds; that his buildings are bad; that he is infested with the pest of game, or that other evils of the same nature exist.

Now it is better for the tenant that these things should be known, for that would be the first step to a remedy. With the exception of game-preserving landlords, who must be put out of the category of civilized persons, as many proprietors mismanage their estates and oppress their tenants, from ignorance and bad advice as from design; and a large proportion of them would, ere long, on the evils being plainly shown to them, consent to apply a remedy. It is so clearly the interest of all persons connected with land, that accurate statistics should be accessible to all, that we hope some general and effective plan for collecting them may ere long be adopted.

GOOD ADVICE.—Never cut a piece out of a newspaper until you have looked on the other side, where, perhaps, you may find something more valuable than that which you intended to appropriate. Never burn your fingers, if you can help it; people burn their fingers every day, when they might have escaped it if they had been careful. Let no man ever quarrel with a woman; if you are troubled with her, retreat; if she abuse you, be silent; if she tear your eyes out, feel your way to the door, and fly—without a word!

MEETING OF THE MANCHESTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

MANCHESTER, THURSDAY.—An unusually large and influential meeting of the Chamber of Commerce took place here to-day to petition the Lords in favour of the Corn Bill, in consequence of reported danger to the measure in that branch of the legislature. The attendance included T. Bazley, jun., Esq., the president, James Kershaw, Esq., W. R. Callender, Esq., John Brooks, Esq., John Budd, Esq., H. Ashworth, Esq., E. Armitage, Esq., W. Bickham, Esq., Edward Shawcross, Esq., Lewis Williams, Esq., Wm. Mayson, Esq., James Hindle, Esq., John Leisler, Esq., Nicholas Heald, Esq., Jos. Simpson, Esq., and T. Nicholson, Esq.

The CHAIRMAN, in rising to open the proceedings, was loudly applauded. Having read the advertisement calling the meeting, he said:—Under ordinary circumstances our excellent secretary would have convened this meeting; but his absence from town compelled me to take the responsibility of summoning you to meet on the present occasion—and probably on no occasion of greater importance could you be called together (hear, hear). Having been informed, upon good authority, that the Free Trade measures which are in progress in the legislature are threatened with serious obstructions, I thought it right to take the opinion of the members of this chamber upon the subject, with the view of placing that opinion upon record, as well as with the intention of giving support to the passing of the measures referred to, and which we desire to see consolidated (hear, hear, hear). The chamber, it will be in the recollection of the members, petitioned Parliament upon this question, as late as the month of February last, when the Board of Directors took the opportunity of saying to the House of Commons, "That your petitioners regret that the principle to which they refer is not so extensively applied as they could wish, nor made immediately operative; they believe that no moment could be selected at which the change could be made full and final with less disturbance to existing interests, or with greater effect upon the well-being and solid happiness of all classes of her Majesty's subjects than the present." These expressions were contained in the petition of the 9th of February. Since then, finding that in the House of Commons the commercial proposition of Sir Robert Peel was making very slow progress indeed, and that it was being impeded by the efforts of factious individuals, while the trade of this extensive district was suffering very greatly, and that that state of things was then every day being increased, the directors of the Chamber thought it right to petition the House of Commons for the purpose of urging upon them the propriety and necessity of increasing, if possible, the speed with which they were deliberating upon the measure; and on the 25th of February, the Chamber petitioned the house to carry forward, and to pass the ministerial propositions with the least possible delay. We are aware that this chamber petitioned for the speedy passing of the measure, having for its object the prospective repeal of the Corn Laws. The Commercial Association, you are also aware, likewise petitioned for the passing of the measure. So intense has been the public feeling in the town of Manchester upon this subject, that the bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and other inhabitants, voluntarily and simultaneously came forward for the purpose of petitioning the legislature to pass the Free Trade measures now before it with as little delay as possible. And for the purpose of giving some little weight to such a general petition of the merchants, traders, and other inhabitants, it was considered proper, and acted upon, that a deputation from Manchester should proceed to London to place that petition in the hands of Sir Robert Peel. Accordingly the president of the Commercial Association, Mr. J. Aspinall Turner, myself, Mr. Edward Tootal, and Mr. Stewart, were appointed a deputation to carry the petition to Sir Robert Peel. We had a satisfactory interview with the Premier (hear, hear). He said he required not to be urged to promote with as little delay as possible, and as far as was in his power, a proposition which he had himself originated (hear, hear). We heard, gentlemen, while in London, that very serious danger was apprehended to the commercial measures of the Government, in consequence of the course which was likely to be pursued by Lord Stanley, when they reached the upper house. Under these circumstances the deputation thought it right to make an endeavour to obtain an interview with his lordship (hear, hear). And assisted by the efforts of some members of Parliament, who took great trouble with us, and showed us great courtesy (hear, hear), we attempted to see his lordship, but without effect I regret to say (hear, hear). His lordship said it would not be convenient for him to see us. But before leaving London we thought it right to put him in possession of the object we had in view in visiting London, and accordingly to write to him on the subject (hear, hear). The letter was dated the 24th March, 1846, and was signed by Mr. Aspinall Turner and myself. The following is a copy of the letter:

"We think it proper that, connected as you are with the county of Lancaster, you should be informed of the deep interest which is felt, both in Liverpool and Manchester, in the speedy passing of the Customs and Corn Importation Bill, introduced into the House of Commons by Sir Robert Peel. The desire felt that this bill should become the law of the land is almost universal among commercial men of all grades of political opinion in the whole town, as well as in the neighbouring boroughs; and this desire is equally felt by the working classes. A great anxiety, however, is beginning to manifest itself as to the delay and slow progress of the measure, and as to its ultimate success in the House of Lords. We feel, therefore, most desirous of communicating to your lordship our conviction that serious consequences are likely to arise from such a far extending among the mercantile houses and operatives whom they employ."

We duly reported to the petitioners of Manchester, the result of our mission to London. A committee of the petitioners, consisting of the bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and other inhabitants, thought it right that another application should be made to Lord Stanley, with the view of sending a more numerous deputation from this town to wait upon his lordship at Knowsley during the Easter recess (hear, hear). Mr. Gardner, as the chairman of that committee, wrote a letter to his lordship on the subject, with a copy of which letter Mr. Gardner has favoured me, and which I will read to the meeting:—

"My Lord.—As chairman of a committee appointed at a large meeting of the bankers, merchants, and manufacturers of this district, to promote the speedy passing of the tariff measure now before Parliament, I am requested respectfully to solicit the favour of an interview with your lordship for a deputation consisting of gentlemen deeply interested in the subject. The deputation from the committee to London having been made to see your lordship, in consequence of your lordship's being so fully occupied with Parliamentary duties, it is hoped that your lordship will now be able to grant the desired interview.—I am, my lord, your lordship's most obedient servant, (Signed) "ROBT. GARDNER."

To that letter, three days afterwards, Mr. Gardner received the following reply:

"Knowsley, April 21, 1846.

"Sir—I have to acknowledge your note, requesting an interview with me on the part of a deputation from a committee appointed to promote the speedy passing of the Corn Measures now before Parliament. Entertaining an opinion entirely at variance with that of the gentlemen whom you represent, as to the policy of the measures in question, it is my intention to give them a decided opposition in the House of Lords, whenever they may reach that body; but I have no control whatever over their progress, or the delay of their progress, in the House of Commons; and this being the case, I trust you will excuse me if I decline giving the deputation the unnecessary trouble of calling here for the purpose of an interview, which can lead to nothing—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"R. Gardner, Esq." (Signed) "STANLEY."

The propriety of our attempting to obtain interviews with Lord Stanley is, as I think, fairly established by recent events (hear, hear). We find that his lordship is now engaged in the leadership of a kind of forlorn hope against the commercial measures of the Government (hear, hear); and these measures, be it remembered, are eminently qualified to benefit the people, his fellow-subjects (hear, hear, hear). Knowing that Lord Stanley is a resident in this vast industrial county, we have, in deference to him and to his position, thought it right and dutiful to make a proper appeal to his lordship; and we had thought it possible he would be desirous of showing courtesy to parties among whom he is residing—parties who have increased vastly his personal importance (hear, hear, hear); parties who have contributed immensely to the princely revenues of the house of Derby (hear, hear). Now, gentlemen, was it courtesy, was it just, on the part of his lordship, to refuse an interview to gentlemen who merely wished to furnish him with such evidence as would enable him to form a sound and correct opinion on a subject which would be brought before his notice in the upper house (hear, hear). We find his lordship simply in the position of a hereditary legislator, willing to take the responsibility of legislation without at the same time being willing to receive the evidence of facts by which he should be ruled and governed in the exercise of his legislative functions (hear, hear). I wish to say nothing which may be considered either severe or disrespectful to Lord Stanley. But I hope he may be disposed to reconsider the position he has assumed, and that instead of putting himself in opposition to the wants, to the interests, and the comforts of the people of the United Kingdom, he will array himself on their side (hear, hear); that he will desert the banners of fancied protection and of monopoly (loud cries of "hear, hear, hear"), and that he will evince some community of feeling with the great mass of mankind (applause). Hitherto employment has been continued to a great extent in this district, I believe, in the confident hope that the measure now before Parliament, if passed into law, will bring immediate and permanent relief to the trade of this country, and to the trade of Lancashire in particular (loud cheers). And I have some doubt that, to a very great extent, the labouring classes are being paid at the present time—more especially those in connection with the establishments having steam or other power to propel them—I have some doubt, I say, that these labouring classes are being paid to a great extent out of capital (hear, hear)—neither out of money received from ordinary sales, nor from the usual resources of business, but clearly out of the capital, which I fear in many instances is rapidly diminishing (hear). We see that amongst print houses of the first importance and respectability many of them have thought it right and prudent to suspend their operations altogether, and I believe that some most respectable and extensive shippers are standing almost totally still (hear, hear). We know, too, that the handloom weavers are unemployed to a very great extent (hear, hear), and, consequently, distress of a serious character exists among that very depressed body—a body depressed by circumstances. And unless some step in the direction of right and justice be taken by the legislature, with the view of supplying the wants of those people, I see nothing almost but annihilation for them (hear, hear). And I cannot contemplate without great fear the results of any disappointment which may possibly arise from the commercial measures now before Parliament not becoming the law of the land (hear, hear, hear). The general indications from manufacture and commerce are, on the one hand, most depressing and discouraging, whilst, on the other hand, if the propositions of Government were realised, I believe the prospect would be exceedingly cheering (loud applause). Perhaps at no time has greater harmony existed than at the present meeting (hear, hear). The people were waiting with patience (hear, hear)—with extreme patience (hear, hear)—and I believe that a remedy for many of the evils under which they have long suffered has at length been proposed; and though the benefits it will confer are not to be immediately realised, it is yet prospectively before us (hear, hear); and if it can be attained it will, I believe, accomplish all that which those who support it consider it capable of accomplishing (loud applause). We are relying on the legislature, under the circumstances upon which I have very briefly dilated, believing that no permanent benefit can arise to the circumstances of distress around us but such as the legislature has the power of giving. And I look forward to the time of the obtaining of something like Free Trade, when the people shall receive the practical advantage of those further moral improvements and changes which must eventually confer benefit upon the labouring classes, and in fact upon the masses of our fellow countrymen (applause). And I believe that the people, instead of directing their attention to political subjects for relief, as they have been accustomed to do, will eventually direct their attention to the advance of social improvement, when they will endeavour to raise themselves in the scale of civilisation (hear). And they will succeed, for there is an elasticity in the human mind, and especially in the minds of Englishmen, that gives them sea room, and they fear no danger (loud applause).

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved the adoption of the petition.

Mr. Alderman CALLENDER said it was a new state of things, he was sure they would all say, that the Chamber of Commerce should send a petition to his Grace the Duke of Wellington to present on Free Trade (hear, hear); but it was one which he believed they all felt would be the best under the circumstances. In rising to second the motion he would only make a remark or two, and one remark was, since last September there had been no good business done in the general trade of this town (hear). There might have been particular trades which were an exception; but if they took the general trade, he would say, without the fear of contradiction, there had been very little indeed; and he thought their rulers ought to know the condition in which they were, and should be, unless steps were taken by them to enable trade to right itself (cheers). He had conversed with several of the gentlemen who were doing the largest business in the country trade and with shipping houses that visited this market, and one and all, they said they never had so bad a spring trade. For eight months and a half they might be said to have had no business, and were waiting in fond hopes that the passing of these measures by Government would liberate corn from the bonded warehouses, and afford the means of paying for goods, till which there could be no prospect of improvement (cheers). Indeed, unless something of that kind was done, he was persuaded that the fears of the chairman were within the mark, and they should have a degree of excitement that would tell upon the House of Lords. Sorry should he be if they put them selves in the unenviable position of first saying, "there is no excitement in the country," and thus compelling excitement, and then say, as they had done before, "we are not to be intimidated into a course by clamour out of doors" (hear, hear). He hoped a wiser course would be adopted on this occasion, and with these remarks he would second the adoption of the petition (cheers).

The PRESIDENT asked if any gentleman had any remarks to make on the subject before he put the motion?

Mr. HENRY ASHWORTH did not know how far in a false position they might be at the present moment, inasmuch as they were anticipating injury to the Government measure more from an alarm being sounded than from any specific information, or from any real position which had yet been taken up in the House of Lords by the opponents of the bill (hear, hear). In the present position of affairs it would be premature for them to array their strength against the opponents of the measure, and thus be said to become the aggressors. He thought they had great reason to complain of the want of courtesy of a nobleman intimately connected with this county (hear, hear). They could not shut their eyes to the fact that on Saturday last his lordship and sixty or seventy others met to consider what description of obstruction they could throw in the way of the passing of these measures (hear, hear). There was obviously something like good earnest in the course he was taking, and quite sufficient to warrant this body in considering what was the course they should adopt, if it were attempted to put into execution that which was thus threatened. When they came to look at the advantages likely to result from the passing of these measures, there was no party in this country—there was no part of the world—that was not intimately connected with the interests involved in them (applause). And if they were to judge of the propriety of their being adopted, they had only to refer to the state of public opinion on the subject. They might also refer to the fact that the representative portion of the Government had responded to the feeling out of doors, that they had not only the guarantee of public opinion, but that that opinion had been acted upon by one branch of the legislature. They had tolerated up to the present period a description of legislation which had been based permanently on the ownership of the soil, and they had tolerated it up to the time when toleration of it might become matter of consideration (hear, hear). He believed they were most of them willing to defer the political government of this country to the hands of those in whom it had been vested, so long as they might be willing to derive from the country a practical acquaintance with its opinions, and to be guided in legislating by the result of those practical opinions; but when those who opposed these measures refused to receive the opinion of practical men, when they met together to co-operate against the interest of every class of society, it behooved them to consider in what way we should deal with such an obstructive body if they persevered in the course they had been taking (applause). It was not for him to consider what might be done under the guidance of mind such as had raised this country to its present commercial eminence, nor what should be done by the influence and power of a body with 200,000 at their command. He believed they might safely leave any antagonism of class interests in the hands of those who had undertaken to conduct the opinion of the country in reference to this question—he meant the Anti-Corn Law League (cheers). With becoming courtesy to the measures of the ministry, and with a feeling of unwillingness to disturb an extensive and well-considered act of justice, the League had refrained for months past from parading before the public their opinions and the means they had of carrying out their ends; but it was not for him to consider how long forbearance on the part of that body would be allowable in reference to the obstruction of the opponents of this measure (hear, hear). He would rather leave the question of antagonism and class against class to be taken up by some other body, and on some other occasion, than enter upon it here; but he believed that if a conflict of opinion were to be undertaken, the event would be by no means favourable to the estimation of that house which was now placed beside the Thames (applause and laughter).

Mr. Alderman BROOKS humorously referred to the silence of Lord Stanley by the Tamboff exhibition at Lancaster, and his repeated disagreement with the various governments and parties with which he had acted, and likened him to what in Lancashire is called a "self acting mule."

The motion was carried unanimously.

The Chamber then separated.

The following is a copy of the petition:

"That your petitioners have seen with satisfaction that a bill to amend the laws relating to the importation of corn has been passed by the honorable the House of Commons, and is now under the consideration of your right honorable house.

"That in thus expressing their satisfaction, your petitioners respectfully avow that it is rather to the principle on which this, and the other commercial measures introduced into the legislature by her Majesty's Government, are founded, than to the manner in which that principle is carried out, that their approval extends; they would have preferred that the change from an unjust and unwise policy, to one which they regard as the harbinger of peace and blessings, not only to this country but to the whole human race, should have been full and immediate, and not partial and deferred; and your petitioners still regret that that course has not been pursued, inasmuch as this great and inevitable change could never be made with less disturbance to existing interests than at the present time.

"That the progress the questions to which your petitioners refer have made in the minds of the reflective and intelligent of all classes, renders it unnecessary to recite at length the grounds on which the fixed opinions of your petitioners are based, but they feel themselves bound to state most energetically to your right honorable house that the tedious delay which has intervened between the introduction of the measures of her Majesty's Government and the present time, though useful in having afforded opportunities for discussions which have more firmly cemented the determination of the people, has yet been attended by many evils: the transition even from an unwise to a wise course of legislation must necessarily be accompanied by a state of uncertainty in commercial transactions, so that the period of such transition should at all times be as short as possible.

"In the present instance, a degree of embarrassment has been hitherto patiently endured by those who are engaged in the commerce and manufactures of this district, which cannot be much longer supported, and which would long ere this have caused distress and loss of employment to our labouring classes, had not the certainty of a favourable change from the passing of the measure, now before your right honorable house, cheered and sustained their employers.

"Approving, therefore, of the principle on which the great and beneficial measures of her Majesty's Government are founded, but retaining their regret at the application of that principle as not being made full and immediate, your petitioners humbly but firmly pray that your right honorable house would pass the bill as sent up by the Commons in all its integrity, in order that an easy and wise settlement of this all-important question may relieve commerce and industry from an embarrassment, and the people from a suppressed excitement, not the less resolute because momentarily to be suppressed, and which, if longer continued, threaten combinedly immediate and fearful consequences."

REPRESENTATION OF ORKNEY AND SHETLAND.

The following requisition, bearing the signatures of the senior magistrate of Lerwick, and a large majority of all the electors who could be conveniently communicated with, has been addressed to Mr. Arthur Anderson, of London:

TO ARTHUR ANDERSON, ESQ., LONDON.

SIR—Believing that a dissolution of Parliament is an event not unlikely to occur soon, we take the earliest opportunity of soliciting that you will stand as a Parliamentary candidate for this county, convinced that both on public and private grounds no more eligible person could possibly be found to represent its interests in Parliament.

It is known to us, and we have no doubt to most of the inhabitants of these islands, that you are, and have always been, a staunch and zealous supporter of liberal political opinions, and of the great principles of Free Trade. Those principles, long recognised by the ablest political economists and the most enlightened statesmen as just in themselves and essential to the prosperity of a commercial and maritime state like Great Britain, have, at length, in spite of all opposition and obliquity, forced themselves upon the conviction of the greatest and most influential public men of our time, without reference to party connexions or previous opinions.

Their ultimate triumph, therefore, we conceive to be certain. Still the crisis is an important one; and unless men of liberal views and business habits be returned to Parliament, the successful issue of the struggle, and its consequent benefit, may be deferred at least for a time, to the great detriment of the trade of the country and danger of its peace. But, sir, in addition to these public motives, we confess we are actuated by more private and local considerations. You are a native of the county, and entertain towards it, as you have often already shown, those feelings of interest and goodwill which it is natural for every man to bear to the land of his birth. Its resources and capabilities, as well as its wants, can be understood by none better than by yourself; and when we reflect that it is by your own energy and ability that you have been placed in the position which you now occupy, we feel satisfied that (without disparagement to any), no one has yet represented it more capable of developing the one or of supplying the other. With these sentiments we therefore, would now respectfully invite you, in the event of a contemplated dissolution of Parliament, to come forward as a candidate, when we pledge ourselves to support you to the utmost of our power.

Lerwick, 20th April, 1846

In consequence of the above requisition, Mr. Anderson has issued the following Address to the constituency:

TO THE ELECTORS OF THE COUNTY OF ORKNEY AND SHETLAND.

GENTLEMEN—A requisition to become a candidate for the representation of your county in the next Parliament has been addressed to me by a numerous and respectable portion of your body; and I am informed that the sentiments and wish therein expressed are participated by a still larger proportion of the constituency, who had not an opportunity of appending their names to the requisition.

Feelings of personal respect towards your present representative would have prevented me from taking, of my own accord, any steps tending to interfere with his relations with you, in the event of his wishing to represent the county in another Parliament. But I feel that I should respond very unworthily to the spontaneous call which has been, in such gratifying terms, made on me, were I to permit considerations of a merely personal nature to deter me from affording to you the opportunity of selecting by whom you will be represented. I therefore place my humble services at your disposal, and should it be your pleasure, when the time arrives, to confer upon me the honourable post of your representative, I will make it my endeavour to repay so great a mark of your confidence by devoting my best energies to the highly responsible duties which it involves, and by the most earnest and active efforts to promote your general, local, and individual interests, by every legitimate means in my power.

My political opinions are, I believe, not unknown to most of you. I have always been, and still continue to be, a zealous though humble advocate of the relief of commerce and industry from all injurious restrictions; and, especially, from such as tend to limit the supply and enhance the cost of the first necessities of life. An important approximation to the giving effect to the great principles of commercial freedom is, I trust, on the eve of accomplishment in the measure now before Parliament. But much will still remain to be done in the reformation of our fiscal system requiring the exertions in the legislature of practical men.

I am decidedly opposed to the extension of state endowments to the Roman Catholic priesthood.

And in regard to other points of public policy, I may describe myself as a constitutional reformer,—that is, by a timely correction of such defects and abuses as are found to be practically injurious to the great body of the people, I would the more firmly consolidate and perpetuate our otherwise excellent constitution.

I am unfettered by any party ties, and will support good, and oppose bad measures, without regard to who may originate them.

For a guarantee of an active and vigilant attention to the local interests of the county, I trust, I need only appeal to my past and not unsuccessful exertions to improve its trade and industrial resources.

I hope to be able to take an opportunity ere long of personally ascertaining the general sentiments of the constituency as to my eligibility to become their Parliamentary representative.

And in the meantime, Gentlemen, I remain, your faithful servant, countryman, and sincere well-wisher.

LONDON, May, 1846.

ARTHUR ANDERSON.

RISE IN FARM RENTS.—Occasional notices have appeared of late of farms out of lease being re-let at an advance of rent; but we have now to announce perhaps the most remarkable instance of the late improvements in agriculture, and the expectations entertained of its continuance on the part of the tenantry, in the case of the large and fine Farm of Mains of Elcho. This Farm, which is the property of the Earl of Wemyss, is situated on the banks of the Tay, about four miles below Perth. The lease, which has just expired, was one of nineteen years' duration, and at an average of the fairs prices for that period, the rent has been about 600*l.* per annum. At the same average the new rent, which is to be partly money and partly grain, will reach nearly to 1000*l.* and has been taken by no inexperienced and rash farmer but by one of the oldest and most successful agricultural families in the country.—Perth Courier.

REVIEW.

The Life and Times of the Hon. Henry Grattan.
By his Son, Henry Grattan, Esq., M.P. London, Colburn. (Second Notice.)

In our preceding notice, we mentioned the secession of Mr. Grattan and a body of his friends from the Irish Parliament, as evidence of their opinion that the Irish Legislature was inadequate to the task of governing the country. Of this fact every statesman must have been convinced who attended to the practical working of the Irish administration. A rebellion was provoked by a series of atrocities, compared with which the conduct of the Russians in Poland, of the Turks in Greece, or even of the Spaniards in Peru, might be quoted as examples of leniency; and these measures were defended in the House of Commons by the ministerial measure as judicious means to make the insurrection prematurely explode. An undisciplined army, which Sir Ralph Abercrombie declared to be so demoralised as to be formidable to everybody but the enemy, was let loose at free quarters upon the peasantry; a bigoted yeomanry, taught that their personal and party ascendancy was at stake, was hounded on, not by the Government, but by the local magistracy, and all the excesses they committed were sanctioned by the local legislature. A schoolmaster, named Wright, was seized by Judkin Fitzgerald, the high sheriff of Tipperary. A letter of introduction from a French royalist was found in his pocket, but the sheriff, being ignorant of French, wisely concluded that everything written in that language must be treasonable, and ordered Wright to be flogged in order to extort a confession. The unfortunate man had received five hundred lashes, when an officer came up who could read French; to him Fitzgerald showed the note, and its innocent nature was explained. Wright brought an action against the sheriff, and recovered damages; but as other victims threatened to seek similar redress, the Irish Parliament passed an Act of Indemnity, and we shall extract a few specimens of the outrages thus solemnly sanctioned by a "native" legislature.

"The case of Matthew Scott, tried in 1799 before Mr. Justice Kelly, at Clonmel, is also illustrative of the character of the laws, and of the temper of those who administered them. Scott was a wealthy and respectable inhabitant of Clonmel—a man of large property, and high repute; he was imprisoned on a charge (totally false) of sending pikes in his boats that were laden with corn. Judkin Fitzgerald refused no less a sum than 100,000*l.* bail for him! and when applied to, swore 'By God he shall not be brought to trial!' However, after much intercession in his favour, he was let out of jail on giving bail in the amount of 20,000*l.*: an action was brought against Fitzgerald, who relied on the indemnity act, protecting those who had acted since the 25th of October, 1798, for the suppression of the insurrection, and the preservation of the public peace. Captain Jephson, who commanded a corps of yeomanry in the county, was examined on the trial, and swore that the conduct of Fitzgerald was the most infamous he ever witnessed, and such as if persevered in would assuredly ruin the country: that he had persecuted in a most oppressive and cruel manner, a man of the name of Wells, who was perfectly innocent, and what Fitzgerald had stated was utterly false; the jury, however, found a verdict for Fitzgerald.

"Another case was that of Doyle, merchant and cloth manufacturer, of Carrick; it occurred in 1798, but the trial did not take place till 1801. Doyle had been arrested by Fitzgerald, tied up, and flogged; he could not endure the torture, and after 100 lashes he fainted. He was guilty of no offence, and accordingly brought an action. Fitzgerald defended himself; and in his speech disclosed some of his enormities, in which he seemed to glory. He stated, as a proof of his services, that he had arrested a Mr. O'Brien, (whom he called colonel of the united party,) to have him flogged. O'Brien made an excuse to retire, as he wanted to shave himself, and pretending to do so, he cut his throat to avoid the horror and ignominy of the torture. This act Fitzgerald gravely advanced as a defence to the action! He then gave a catalogue of the tortures he had inflicted: he had flogged many men on the 16th of May, at Nenagh; on the 23rd he had flogged a Mr. Fox, whom he called a general; a Mr. Quinn, whom he called a colonel; a man of the name of Kearey, and a man of the name of Wells, a yeoman in Captain Jephson's corps; that Capt. Jephson had threatened he would get his men to fire on him, but 'I defied him, and flogged Wells and two more men, THOUGH THEY WERE ALL INNOCENT!'—these were his words; and it was for this man that the Attorney-General Toler (afterwards Lord Norbury) got the indemnity bill passed.

"The reader must bear in mind that Lord Clare, Lord Camden, and Mr. Pitt, denied such acts of torture had been used. Lord Camden, in his speech in the English House of Lords was express on this point, saying, 'nothing more than necessary was resorted to'; but here appears the naked fact, proved by their friend and protégé, the man for whom was passed this very indemnity bill; here he comes forth, avowing and glorying in the fact, and adding this very remarkable note and comment, 'THAT HE FLOGGED THEM, THOUGH THEY WERE ALL INNOCENT!' But another circumstance appeared on this trial: a disclosure was made which brings the guilt nearer to head-quarters. In his defence, Fitzgerald produced a letter, addressed to him, and signed by William Bagwell, 'Brigade Major,' dated 6th June, 1798,—a military rank, and then in the employment of Government: in this letter, Bagwell informed Fitzgerald, 'that if he found any good to arise from fighting, he might go on with it, but let it not reach my ears.' Well might Lord Camden say he knew nothing of flogging. The evidence given on this trial also, by Captain Jephson, is too important to be omitted, and serves to lift up the veil from the entire scene of these sanguinary Government orgies: he swears, 'I wrote to Government for troops, for two reasons; 1st, because I thought from Fitzgerald's conduct no loyal yeoman would bear arms; this I feared from the despair manifested by the inhabitants of the country on hearing of the flogging; 2ndly, I was afraid that not only the yeomen would not bear arms, but that the cruelty exercised in inflicting the torture would infuse a spirit of disloyalty into the most loyal, and consequently encourage the most disaffected. I am of opinion that Sheriff Fitzgerald's conduct was calculated to promote rebellion; for had it not been for my being possessed with superior information, the oath of allegiance I had taken, the property I had in the country, and my being a captain of a yeomanry corps, I would, on seeing such wanton cruelty, have joined the rebels!"

"Lord Avonmore, in charging the jury said, 'Before the indemnity acts passed, no damages you could give would be too great, but if under these acts you believe the defendant was forced, through imperative necessity, to commit this abominable outrage against the plaintiff, (a man of acknowledged loyalty) you are bound to find for him: the information he acted on he has told you was that of a vile, perjured, and infamous informer, and this too not upon oath! To render a verdict for the plaintiff of any avail, you must find that the defendant acted maliciously, and not with the intent of suppressing the Rebellion, or of serving the state; such are the words of the Act, which places an insuperable bar between injury and redress, and sets all equity and justice at defiance!' at the same time he dashed the Act upon the cushion, and threw himself back on the bench. THE JURY ACQUITTED FITZGERALD!! upon which he took legal proceedings against the man he had so flogged, and recovered damages against him to the amount of 12*l.*, as by the law a verdict for defendant saddled the plaintiff with double costs."

There were but two courses open to the English Government: they must either have delivered over the Irish people to the tender mercies of an Orange ascendancy, or procured for that people the protection of the British Parliament by the Act of Union. In fact, the Orangemen were bitterly opposed to the Union, which they clearly foresaw would lead to the extinction of their exclusive privileges of misgovernment; and on the other hand, the Catholic hierarchy and a large portion of the laity materially assisted in accomplishing the measure. They subsequently became repealers, not because the Union was bad in itself, but because the promises made to them were violated by the obstinate resistance of George III. to the concessions proposed by his ministry. Mr. Grattan says:

"There can be no doubt that the Catholics were intentionally and basely deceived, and that Lord Cornwallis was the direct participator in the fraud appears from the following facts, which are here given as they were narrated by one of the parties concerned in the transaction, and who was desirous that they should be known. Mr. Robert Johnson voted for the Union and was created judge; he favoured the Catholics, and thought they had been deceived at the Union. Under these impressions he stated to the Author, in 1816, the following occurrences:—That he was one of twenty-five members in the Lower House who had agreed that they would oppose the Union if they found that the Roman Catholics were hostile to it, and that they would vote for the measure if the Roman Catholics were friendly to it; that, as the Catholics constituted the majority of the population, their wishes on a subject in which they were so deeply interested would guide them, and that their numbers (twenty-five) were certain to turn the scale on a division. Lord Cornwallis sent for Johnson, and he went to the castle, accompanied by some of the twenty-five, and Lord Cornwallis declared that they were mistaken in their opinion as to the Catholic resistance; that 'they were betrayed by the Catholics,' (such were the words) for that the Catholics would not hold out in opposition to the measure. The party took the assurance of the Lord Lieutenant, they believed his statement, and thus (said Johnson) we were dissolved."

It is an error to say that the Catholics were intentionally deceived. We learn from Lord Malmesbury's letters and diaries, that Pitt had no reason to anticipate the king's opposition, and that his Majesty's latent prejudices were only worked up to obstinacy by the intrigues of a section of the Cabinet at the head of which was the late Lord Auckland. Had emancipation accompanied the Union, that measure would have been complete; but so long as emancipation was delayed, the Union was imperfect; it existed only in name.

A stronger case for a Union could hardly have been made out than that which Grattan himself established in his reply to Mr. Cony, one of the most terrible pieces of invective existing in any language.

"The right honourable gentlemen says I fled from the country after exciting rebellion, and that I have returned to raise another. No such thing. The charge is false. The civil war had not commenced when I left the kingdom, and I could not have returned without taking a part. On the one side there was the camp of the rebel, on the other the camp of the minister, a greater traitor than that rebel. The stronghold of the constitution was nowhere to be found. I agree that the rebel who rises against the Government should have suffered; but I missed on the scaffold the right honourable gentleman. Two desperate parties were in arms against the constitution. The right honourable gentleman belonged to one of these parties, and deserved death. I could not join the rebel—I could not join the Government—I could not join torture—I could not join half-hanging—I could not join free quarter—I could take part with neither. I was therefore absent from a scene where I could not be active without self-reproach, nor indifferent with safety.

"Many honourable gentlemen thought differently from me. I respect their opinions, but I keep my own; and I think now, as I thought then, that the treason of the Minister against the liberties of the people was infinitely worse than the rebellion of the people against the Minister."

"I have returned, not, as the right honourable member said, to raise another storm; I have returned to discharge an honourable debt of gratitude to my country that conferred a great reward for past services, which, I am proud to say, was not greater than my desert. I have returned to protect that constitution, of which I was the parent and the founder, from the assassination of such men as the right honourable gentleman and his unworthy associates. They are corrupt, they are seditious, and they, at this very moment, are in a conspiracy against their country. I have returned to refute a libel, as false as it is malicious, given to the public under the appellation of a Report of the Committee of the Lords. Here I stand, ready for impeachment or trial. I dare accusation. I defy the honourable gentleman. I defy the Government. I defy their whole phalanx; let them come forth. I tell the Ministers I will neither give them quarter nor take it. I am here to lay the shattered remains of my constitution on the floor of this house in defence of the liberties of my country."

Now in the heat of debate it might be allowable to speak of "the treason of the Minister against the liberties of the people;" but in sober truth, all the atrocities which Mr. Grattan enumerated were not merely sanctioned by the Irish Parliament, but in many cases extorted from the ministry by the majority of that Parliament. So far as the Government had free power of action, it interfered on the side of mercy; and it had to exert all its influence to prevent an Orange Parliament from giving martial law a retrospective effect, and butchering at once all the State prisoners who had been taken into custody. Grattan then in effect declared that no true patriot could join either the Parliament or the people, and from this it clearly followed that the existing state of things must have terminated either in a peaceful union or a sanguinary revolution. In the last speech which Grattan made on the question he points to a defect in the terms of union, which has not yet been adequately remedied.

"The cry of the connection will not in the end avail against the principles of liberty. Connection is a wise and profound policy; but connection without an Irish Parliament is connection without its own principle, without analogy of condition, without the pride of honour that should attend it, is innovation, is peril, is subjugation—not connection."

"The cry of disaffection will not in the end avail against the principle of liberty."

"Identification is a solid and imperial maxim, necessary for the preservation of freedom—necessary for that empire; but without union of hearts—with a separate Government and without a separate Parliament—identification is extinction, is dishonour, is conquest—not identification."

"Yet I do not give up the country; I see her in a swoon, but she is not dead. Though in her tomb she lies helpless and motionless, still there is on her lips a spirit of life, and on her cheek a glow of beauty."

"Thou art not conquered; beauty's ensign yet
Is crimson on thy lips and in thy cheeks,
And death's pale flag is not advanced there."

"While a plank of the vessel sticks together, I will not leave her. Let the courier present his flimsy sail, and carry the light bark of his faith with every new breath of wind—I will remain anchored here, with fidelity to the fortunes of my country, faithful to her freedom—faithful to her fall!"

The continuation of a separate Government in Ireland after the Parliaments had been united, was a palpable blunder; but it was to some extent rendered necessary by the long delay of Catholic Emancipation. The want of uniform legislation in the two countries, the excitement of religious differences when a cry was necessary to support the exigencies of parties, the appeals made to English and Protestant prejudices against "aliens in language, religion, and blood," and the limitations maintained on electoral and municipal rights in Ireland, are the real causes of the present popularity of the Repeal cry. The experiment of a real Union has never yet been tried, for there can be no identity of nations without an identity of legislation.

A curious instance of the malice which the agents in the misgovernment of Ireland manifested to the only Irish statesman who ventured to expose their malpractices, was exhibited by the notorious Giffard, (father of the Editor of the Standard) at the Dublin election of 1802:

"When Mr. Grattan presented himself to vote for Sir Jonah Barrington, Mr. Giffard objected to his competency, as having been disfranchised by the Corporation of Dublin in 1798. The rival candidates disclaimed any wish to avail themselves of such an illiberal advantage. Mr. Grattan's competency was, however, established, inasmuch as the act of disfranchisement was not recorded in the original hall, and his name still stood on the records of the town clerk's office. Before Mr. Grattan voted, he thus forcibly expressed his feelings on Mr. Giffard's objection; to which no reply was attempted by the objector, or any of his Orange associates. 'The objection comes from the hired traducer of his country, the excommunicated of his fellow-citizens, the unpunished ruffian, the bigoted agitator, the regal rebel. In the city a firebrand, in the courts a liar, in the streets a bully, and in the field a coward.'

In the close of 1803, Mr. Grattan wrote a valuable letter to the Right Hon. C. J. Fox; it is a valuable state-paper, and clearly points out the means by which alone the Union could have been perfected.

Stradbally, Dec. 12th, 1803.

"My dear Sir,—Your idea is reducible to two questions—whether a better system be not necessary to Ireland's permanent allegiance? whether the rejection of that system would not hazard our present repose? I incline to the affirmative of both propositions. The rejection of such a system, together with the acquiescence of our Parliament in torture, free quarter, and conflagration, produced the union with England. A similar proceeding at this instant in the British Parliament, accompanied with justification of such violence, might lead to a union with France. The best way, perhaps, of showing immediate spirit is to bring forward the bad qualities of the enemy, but to keep in the background those of the Government. The question might be so greatly supported and the liberal sentiments so prevalent as to avoid my objection, but in that case the question would be substantially carried, and of such an event, so devoutly to be wished, I am no judge, not knowing the disposition or tone of the house; but if the question be lost and debated as in the Irish Parliament, or as the Martial Law Bill was in the last English Parliament, the discussion would do mischief; on that debate (I think it was in that debate) you and a few others had to stand against the representatives of England and against the representatives of Ireland—the latter giving false evidence against their country (they had before given corrupt votes), and the former making laws on that false evidence.

"As to the other question, namely, the change of system, I must entirely agree. The Union is not carried. The Parliament is destroyed, and that bond of union removed, but equality of conditions, civil or political, not even commenced. All the subjects you mention—Catholic Emancipation (for such I must call it), payment of the Catholic clergy, tithe, and perhaps some little improvement regarding our church; and, above all, a faithful and cordial execution by the executive magistrate of the laws in favour of the Catholics; their appointment to a share in offices to which they are now qualified (I believe there are scarcely any of them so advanced); the withdrawing from any intrigue to exclude them from the corporations, to which they are admissible, but excluded by a faction; the imposing silence on any Government press who would wish to sustain a religious war; the withdrawing the countenance of Government from all such who are notoriously and inveterately foes to the Catholic body; the gracious reception of their persons (it was so in the time of Lord Fitzwilliam). These things, the manners of the court, as well as their measures, would be absolutely necessary for that security and unity which you desire. Legislative provisions are not enough; it is necessary that the Minister should love those provisions. Mr. Pitt lost the benefit of the Catholic Bill, because, after he had given the law to the Catholics, he gave the execution of the law and the Catholics to their enemies.

"That bill had hardly appeared when the leading Minister of Ireland pronounced it an act of insanity, and formed an intrigue with the ascendancy party to exclude the Catholic from getting corporate freedom, to which, by this bill, he was qualified. The Irish Government press accompanied laws of reconciliation by volumes of abuse against the parties to be reconciled.

"Mr. Pitt had never been able to raise a rebellion by his measure if he had not been assisted by the gross manners of his partisans. Therefore what you say is extremely just. Legislative provisions alone won't do. The general spirit of the executive government must be looked to. It was against the hostility of that general spirit that the people, notwithstanding their legal acquisitions, revolted; a revolt very criminal, very senseless, but deriving its cause from the Government, which was guilty not only of its own crimes but the crimes of the people.

"I am more fully convinced that the system caused the rebellion, and that allegiance—permanent, active allegiance—is only to be secured by its removal, when I consider the good effects that have attended its abatement.

"Without any alteration in the legal condition of this country, and merely by a temperate exercise of the existing laws, the present chief governor of Ireland has more advanced the strength of Government and its credit, than could have been well conceived. A rebellion broke out in the capital; in a few days, without the torture, he discovered, I believe, 2000 pikes; and in a very few weeks had more yeomen than Lord Camden in the whole of his government; and without a single act of violence put down, I think completely for the present, the insurrection; or rather, he set up the laws, and made them put down rebellion; withdrawing the credit of Government at the same time from religious and political controversy. From the manner in which this last rebellion was put down, I incline to think that if Lord Hardwicke had been Viceroy, and Lord Redesdale Chancellor, in '98, the former rebellion had never existed; but how far either have powers to effect that radical change, and to plant loyalty—permanent, unfeigned loyalty—in this country, I have great fears; rather, no hopes that I shall live to see that executive or legislative philanthropy that shall make the two countries act as one, not merely from the dread of France or the apprehension of plunder from their own populace, but from the love of one another. Should such an event take place, I shall feel much joy, and you will feel much comfort in the consciousness of being the principal cause."

In his first speech in the English Parliament, the completion of the Union, not its repeal, was the policy recommended by Grattan.

"The Parliament of Ireland—of that assembly I have a parental recollection. I sat by her cradle, I followed her hearse. In fourteen years she acquired for Ireland what you did not acquire for England in a century—freedom of trade, independency of the legislature, independency of the judges, restoration of the final judiciary, repeal of a perpetual Mutiny Bill, Habeas Corpus Act, Nullum Tempus Act—a great work! You will exceed it, and I shall rejoice. I call my countrymen to witness, if in that business I compromised the claims of my country, or temporised with the power of England; but there was one thing which baffled the effort of the patriot, and defeated the wisdom of the senate, it was the folly of the theologian. When the Parliament of Ireland rejected the Catholic petition, and assented to the calumnies then uttered against the Catholic body, on that day she voted the Union; if you should adopt a similar conduct, on that day you will vote the separation: many good and pious reasons you may give; many good and pious reasons she gave, and she lies there with her many good and her pious reasons. That the Parliament of Ireland should have entertained prejudices, I am not astonished; but that you, that you who have, as individuals and as conquerors, visited a great part of the globe, and have seen men in all their modifications, and providence in all her ways; that you, now at this time of day, should throw up dykes against the Pope, and barriers against the Catholic, instead of uniting with that Catholic to throw up barriers against the French, this surprises me; and, in addition to this, that you should have set up the Pope in Italy, to tremble at him in Ireland; and further, that you should have professed to have placed yourself at the head of a Christian, not a Protestant League, to defend the civil and religious liberty of Europe, and should deprive of their civil liberty one-fifth of ourselves, on account of their religion—this surprises me; and also that you should prefer to buy allies by subsidies, rather than fellow subjects by privileges; and that you should now stand, drawn out, as it were, in battalion, 16,000,000 against 35,000,000, and should at the same time paralyze a fifth of your own members, by excluding them from some of the principal benefits of your constitution, at the very time you say all your members are inadequate, unless inspired by those very privileges."

This was even more forcibly stated in 1812.

"Without enquiring whether the repeal of Catholic disability was actually promised, it was the expectation of that measure which carried the Union. It is the price for the Union; and an essential part thereof; you will now pay the purchase of that measure. National honour is power; in trade it is capital; in the state it is force. The name of England has carried you through a host of difficulties; we conjure you by that name to accede to those petitions; should you finally refuse, you repeal the Union; you declare the Irish and the English to be a distinct people; you not only declare it, but you do it; you dissolve the incorporation; they were kept together by hope, and you divide them by despair; you make them two distinct nations, with opposite and with hostile interests; the one with civil privileges, the other without; the one in the act of disqualifying the other; the oppressor and the oppressed.

"The idea of the Union is twofold; a union of Parliament, and a union of people. I see the union of Parliament; and in that I see the measure which makes the legislature more handy to the minister; but where are the people? where is the consolidation? where is the common interest? where is the heart that should animate the whole, and that combined giant that should put forth his hundred hands for the state? There is no such thing: the petitioners tell you so; they tell you, that it is impossible such a policy should last; a policy that takes away the Parliament of Ireland, and excludes the Catholic from the Parliament of England; a policy that obtained the Union by the hope of admission, and now makes the exclusion everlasting.

"The Catholics now come to you; they have brought their Protestant neighbours along with them, and they both call upon you for the civil capacities of the Catholics, and for the integrity of the empire.

"Thus, you perceive, it is no longer a question between the different sects of Ireland, no longer a question regarding the security of the Protestant property or the Protestant church. Far from looking for that security in civil disqualifications, they deprecate those disqualifications as their principal danger, and they reduce the subject to a question between the people of Ireland, and the ministers of the Crown.

"So it now stands. But should you wish to support the minister of the Crown against the people of Ireland retain the Union and perpetuate the disqualification; the consequence must be something more than alienation. When you finally decide against the Catholic question, you abandon the idea of governing Ireland by affection, and you adopt the idea of coercion in its place. National disqualification, national litigation, informations, attachments, an angry press, an angry prosecution, errors on both sides; men discharged for their virtuous sentiments in favour of the people; such was the case of Mr. Stanhope; domestic feud added to foreign war. Such must be the situation of Ireland; a situation which is nothing more nor less than preparation to render the Irish mind completely hostile to Great Britain. This misfortune will be very great to both of us. In what particular way it will break out I know not, but I know it will be ruin; when I say ruin, you must know I mean ultimate separation, separation either in fact, or separation in disposition,—either will undo us. Nature protests against it: France with all her powers, could not achieve it; civil disqualification may. We shall first be destroyed, and your gorgeous empire will follow; you are ruined by the hostility of Ireland, you are ruined by her neutrality. You are therefore pronouncing the doom of England. You, opposed to the population of France, with all her appendages; you, with only sixteen millions of inhabitants, strike out of actual operation four. Never was an instance of human insensibility so fatally displayed. The mad Athenian, when he disqualified for a few bushels of corn, a part of his fellow citizens, was not so frantic. The mad Greek, who in the last moments of his existence refused the assistance of the West, damned the cardinal, and gave up his empire, was not more frantic.

"A nation fighting for her existence, a wise nation, a civilized nation, striking out of operation one-fourth of her people, deliberately, in her senses, for no reason; the euclartist is no reason, the worship of the Virgin Mary is no reason; arguments of public sense, if they were not the cause of public ruin; without any cause, except we suppose that the land of death precipitates the empire; I say, you are pronouncing the doom of England. If you ask how the people of Ireland feel towards you, ask yourselves how you would feel towards us, if we disqualified three-fourths of the people of England for ever. The day you finally ascertain the disqualification of the Catholic, you pronounce the doom of Great Britain. It is just it should be so. The king who takes away the liberty of his subjects, loses his crown; the people who take away the liberty of their fellow-subjects lose their empire."

That Grattan would have preferred an Irish legislature to an Imperial Parliament we may well believe, because all the prejudices and affections of his life were connected with the legislature he had raised into independence. But he never sought the repeal of the Union. On the contrary, he insisted on Catholic Emancipation, chiefly because it was necessary to the completion and perfection of the measure. His son has made these volumes the medium for advocating the repeal of the Union, but he has not hesitated to expose the profligate character of the Irish Parliament during the period of its melancholy existence. He confesses that it was only "pushed forward to liberty by the bayonets of the volunteers," and that the liberty which it acquired was privilege for the minority and degradation for the great majority of the people. His case, therefore, is broken down under him; he would not, himself, prefer to the imperial legislature such a Parliament as that from which his father seceded in disgust and despair.

These volumes do not increase our admiration of the great Grattan, for his speeches long since published have won him an immortality of fame, from all who admire sublime eloquence,—of affection from all who love earnest devotion to the cause of freedom. But they lead us to regret that the living Henry Grattan has not read aright the policy pursued by his father in the British Parliament; he advocated justice to Ireland as essential to British greatness. He laboured for Britain's greatness as essential to Ireland's prosperity. His earnest wish was to see the two countries united by the bonds of common liberties, common interests, and common affections;—this is a great work which remains yet to be accomplished, and the glory of Grattan will be rivalled only by that of the Irish patriot, who sets himself to the task with earnestness and devotion.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Friday Evening, May 22, 1846.

The present quietude of the country, in the midst of much privation and commercial suffering, arises entirely from the confident hope of speedy relief from the passing of the Ministerial measures. Beneath this tranquillity there is a stern and fixed determination that monopoly shall be at once and forever abolished; and the very strength of this resolve is the cause of the apparent inaction. The nation is quiet in its self-reliance; it neither agitates nor blusters, because it is assured of success. Now that the principles of justice have been solemnly affirmed by the people's representatives, there is no obvious necessity for their enunciation by the people themselves, The Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham, mistaking the nature of the present tranquillity, and supposing, or appearing to suppose, that the silence of conscious might is apathy or indifference, have commenced an out-door agitation, for the perils of which they must be responsible. This worthy brace of hereditary statesmen have for some time laboured to get up a great protectionist demonstration, and missives have been sent to picked tenant farmers in all parts of the country. On Thursday last the monopolist convention met in Willis's Rooms, under the auspices of the two dukes aforesaid, supported by Lord Beaumont, Lord George Bentinck, Sir John Tyrrel, Colonel Sibthorp, and Benjamin D'Israeli. It is sufficiently obvious that this was a convention of notoriety rather than of notables, since it included less than a score of peers and about the same number of members of the House of Commons.

The speeches delivered by the tenant farmers were rather above the average of the effusions of the agricultural members in the recent debates, for the poor farmers exhibited the sincerity of men frightened out of their wits by visions of imaginary Tamborfs and Utopian prairies. They cried that the soil would be thrown out of cultivation—that the sun would cease to shine and rains would no longer descend from heaven to fertilize British earth; they declared that Church and State would fall with corn, and that Queen Victoria, like Sultan Mahmoud, would only reign over ruined villages. We cannot deal with the insane ravings of these miserable dupes; the task of refutation is impossible when there are no arguments to refute; and as to the assertions, they have been so often reiterated and so often exposed, that we should be better employed commenting on the effusions of Bedlam. But passing from the dupes to the dupers, we find Lord George Bentinck very plainly menacing armed resistance to the Minister, and declaring himself ready to carry a musket instead of the marshal's baton which he has been chosen to wield as a leader of the monopolists. Mr D'Israeli recommended the continuance of agitation, and the Duke of Richmond spoke of the necessity of agricultural demonstrations to influence the House of Lords. If such vaunts belong not to the well known arts to which bullies have recourse, in order to frighten away fear, these noble dukes are challenging a conflict in which much more will be risked than is at present endangered. We know not how far this demonstration is approved by the other protectionists; it may be a miserable pretext for getting a sanction of something like public opinion to the rejection of the ministerial measure; should this be the case, they will find that the out-doors' agitation which has been thus provoked will be one without a parallel in the history of England, and, we believe, in the history of Europe. Let it be borne in mind that the League and the Free Traders are not the parties who provoke the conflict; the nation has been challenged to the contest by the Dukes of Richmond and of Buckingham; they have proclaimed agitation as a principle and a duty. Should the majority of the peers adopt a similar course, the nation will accept the lesson, and it will go hard if it does not better the instruction.

COMPOUNDING FOR POOR RATES.—THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

On Saturday was continued the public vestry of the inhabitants of the parishes of St. Margaret and St. John the Evangelist, Westminster. The meeting was for the purpose of making a poor rate, and was of importance, as "involving the question of the right of the occupiers of compounded houses to be on the rate book, and the legality of compounding for the rate in parliamentary boroughs."

Mr. FORTY was called to the chair. All persons except inhabitants being required to withdraw, the reporter sent by this journal was likewise excluded. Ratepayers only were present. The following report is from a ratepayer:

The Vestry Clerk (Mr. Rogers) informed the meeting that the overseers had received a requisition containing upwards of 300 names of occupiers of "compounded houses," demanding to be placed on the rate in the occupiers' column, in accordance with the provision of the 6th and 7th Wm. IV., cap. 96 (the Parochial Assessment Act), and likewise giving notice that the rating of the owners, to the exclusion of the occupiers, was illegal in all "cities and boroughs wherein the right of voting for members of Parliament depends on the assessment of the occupier to the poor rate." 59 Geo. III., cap. 12. sec. 23. In consequence of these notices, the parish officers had submitted a case for the opinion of Messrs. Jervis and Bodkin, and which opinion was read to the meeting. They stated that they were of opinion that there was no power to rate or compound with the owner, not being the occupier, in any parliamentary boroughs, and that a rate so constructed would be entirely illegal. The Vestry Clerk then announced that all the persons who had sent such notices had been placed in the occupiers' column in the rate now in course of preparation.

Inquiry was made whether the parochial officers intended to extend this arrangement to occupiers of tenements generally, when the Vestry Clerk stated that the names of all "occupants" would be inserted before the completion of the rate by the presence of the persons themselves, by a claim, or by the personal knowledge of an inhabitant present.

Much discussion then ensued, in which Messrs. Wood, Wilson, and others took part, the former of whom cast much crimination on the originators of the movement, and which was distinctly avowed to be for the purpose of enfranchising a class of persons, in these parishes, amounting to about 800, who had hitherto been systematically excluded from their political rights; and also in reference to the expediency of ceasing the long-continued practice of compounding for the poor-rates in respect of small tenements; but the Vestry Clerk, as the legal adviser of the overseers, said, they could do no other than discontinue a practice now that they had had such opinion as to its illegality.

A motion was made by Mr. George Wilson, seconded by Mr. Huggett, which whilst requiring that all occupiers named should be inserted, also proposed that the convenient practice of compounding should be still continued; but the Chairman, by the advice of the Vestry Clerk, declined to entertain it, and the making of the rate was then proceeded with on the strict principle of "an equal rate or assessment," so that the practice of compounding is entirely given up in these parishes.

Mr. Huggett handed in some names of occupiers to be included in the rate, but were objected to on the ground that he had no personal knowledge of the fact; and it was moved by Mr. Rogers, "That no name be inserted in the rate, except on written claim, or personal application, or on the knowledge of those present."

Mr. Wright moved an amendment, seconded by Mr. Huggett—"That this Vestry do adjourn till Wednesday next, at 7 o'clock in the evening, for the purpose of allowing the collectors time to ascertain the names of the occupiers of the property hitherto compounded for."

It was argued, that the Parochial Assessment Act placed the onus of making up the rate according to the prescribed form given in the schedule of that Act, on the overseers, and that it was consequently incumbent on them to take all the necessary means, and that otherwise they could not conscientiously put their hands to the declaration at the foot of the rate, "that they had used their best endeavours to ascertain the several particulars required by the schedule."

The amendment was, however, lost by a small majority.

CORN MARKET.
MONDAY, May 18.—We are not largely supplied with any kind of grain to this day's market, the trade generally is dull, notwithstanding the attendance of buyers being small. The inferior qualities of Wheat are difficult of disposal at 1s. to 2s. per quarter reduction from Monday last; but the finest samples were sold early at about the prices of that day. In Bonded there are few transactions at late rates. Barley is dull of sale, at rather lower prices. The buyers of Oats are as cautious as they have been for the last fortnight. Holders continue pretty firm, and no alteration can be quoted in the value of this article. Beans and Peas are in short supply, and the turn in favour of sellers.

FRIDAY, MAY 22.—With short supplies of grain we have a dull market for every description of corn. There is no new feature to remark in any branch of the trade, except a slightly improved inquiry for bonded oats. Holders of such ask rather more money than of late; but buyers will not concede to the demand, and the business done is at former prices. The duty rose 1s. on Barley yesterday.

GREAT HISTORICAL PICTURE OF THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE.

The accomplishment of Free Trade will be one of the most remarkable events, not only in the history of the British Empire, but of the civilised world. No movement so important, so effective, and so successful, has ever been before witnessed by mankind. Those to whose zeal, integrity, prudence, and ability this great triumph is due, will be recognised as the best factors of mankind to remote generations.

It is a duty, then, which we owe to the world and to posterity, to preserve some permanent memorial of the Council of the League—that deliberative and executive body, which has achieved more by moral force, than has been accomplished by associations that include physical strength and political power. For this purpose arrangements have been made with Mr. Herbert, R.A., to paint a Historical Picture of the Meeting of the Council of the League, including accurate portraits, not only of the principal leaders, but of those less prominent members, whose indefatigable labours during the whole course of the movement have entitled them to public gratitude. It is proposed that this shall be engraved by a first-rate artist, on a large scale (31 by 22 inches), and that the copies shall be sold at such a price, as to place within the reach of persons of moderate fortune, a monument of the mighty movement by which monopoly was overthrown, and the cause of justice established, without any remembrance of outrage or violence to lessen the enjoyment of so glorious a victory. The principles of universal peace have been established by their own practical development in peaceful agitation.

In order to accomplish this great work of Art, on a scale and in a style worthy of the subject it is designed to commemorate, those who are interested in its production, are requested to communicate to Mr. AGNEW, Printers and Publisher, Manchester, the Class of Engraving for which they wish to subscribe.

There will be three Classes of Engravings from this great Historical Picture, at the following prices:—
First Class Proofs, Ten Guineas. Second Class Proofs, seven Guineas. Third Class Prints, Four Guineas.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN. M. JULIEN'S CONCERTS D'ETE, (FOR ONE MONTH ONLY).

M. JULIEN has the honour to announce that emboldened by the success of his Winter Series of Concerts, and flattered by the kind and liberal patronage now for several years bestowed on his exertions, he has determined on organising also

AN ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS D'ETE.

That portion of the year termed the London Season attracting as it does Artists of the first eminence, from all parts of Europe to this Metropolis, offers great facilities to an undertaking of this nature; while the congregation of VOCAL as well as INSTRUMENTAL talent will afford an opportunity of imparting novelty to the Concerts D'ETE.

Of these advantages it is M. JULIEN'S intention to avail himself in every possible way, and to present his Patrons with a SHORT SERIES of CONCERTS, embracing both VOCAL and INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC of a First rate order, and at such a reasonable charge as to allow all classes to enjoy the Entertainments.

The Concerts will commence early in June, and in due course full particulars will be announced. Advantage will be taken of the Season to arrange a NEW FLORAL DECORATION, and every arrangement made which can add to the attractions of a Popular Amusement.

ON AND AFTER THE FIRST OF JUNE,

THE DAILY NEWS, LONDON MORNING NEWSPAPER,

TWOPENCE HALFPENNY.

The Newspaper is the intellectual life of the Nineteenth Century—the great agent of modern Civilisation. Not to speak of the moral and political safeguards which it affords, it places all, whatever their varieties of fortune and position, on a level as to information. By its means only, the small capitalist is enabled to contend successfully against his wealthy rival for a knowledge of those changes which affect supply and demand—and therefore prices. Without the daily Newspaper, a man and his family might be located as well in the back settlements of Canada as within ten miles of the great centre of European Civilisation. These facts are felt—the gain is understood—and the number and character of the Newspaper Press of any country are an admitted test of the enterprise and intelligence of the people. It is remarkable, then, that more than a century since, there were Eighteen Papers published in London, daily or three times a week—while now there are only Fifteen! Thus, the population of to-day bears a ratio to that of the period in question of more than 3 to 1; and by means of the post and other facilities, the whole kingdom has been brought within the easy range, and under the direct influence, of the London Press. In the single city of New York, more daily papers are published than in all England, Scotland, and Ireland put together. The circulation of papers in Paris exceeds that of London twenty fold. How is this? Of a fact so startling, where lies the explanation?—what is the cause?—PRICE!

That the public know the advantage of having a daily Paper is manifest, from the thousands and tens of thousands who pay twopence for an hour's reading, and threepence for a paper the day after publication. What, then, are the causes which maintain the high price? First, the amount of capital required to be invested in a Newspaper speculation—with whose extent and proper application the man of business and the capitalist are for the most part unacquainted. Next, the various talent, knowledge, and experience which must combine to produce the important result. The number and greatness of the requirements have, in truth, occasioned something very like a monopoly—and monopoly always commands its own price. Thus, whilst energy, enterprise, capital, and competition have been doing good service in all other things, including literature in various branches, nothing has been attempted, in the direction indicated, for the political, social, and intellectual wants of three great nations; and a daily Paper still remains a costly luxury, in which only the wealthy can indulge. In Paris within the last five years a reduction of one half of their old price has been made in the most distinguished journals, with the result of increased efficiency, power, and interest. Any such attempt in London does not seem to have been thought of.

The experiment is about to be tried of establishing a London Daily Newspaper, on the highest scale of completeness in all its departments, which shall look for support, not to comparatively few readers at a high price, but to many at a low price.

Its success depends upon the Public. In the first instance, however, it was necessary to prove that the projectors are capable of competing with the high-priced—that in energy and ability they are able to perform all that is required; and of this the Public have now had sufficient experience. THE DAILY NEWS appeared in January last, and no one has hinted a suspicion that it is inferior to its contemporaries in any respect. The time has now come when the projectors are prepared to develop their plans; whatever has hitherto attracted public favour to their enterprise will be continued and extended; and, working in the Spirit of the Age, they will publish

ON THE FIRST OF JUNE,

THE DAILY NEWS

TWOPENCE HALFPENNY.

The Paper will be of the same size as all other journals were within seven years; it will be larger than many of the high-priced daily journals are now; and, in every particular of interest, it will contain as much information as the most successful amongst its contemporaries. But it will be expensive; and double sheets will be given whenever an important Debate, a pressure of News, or Advertisements, seems to require it.

THE DAILY NEWS, THEREFORE, WILL CONTAIN EVERYTHING THAT IS TO BE FOUND IN OTHER JOURNALS; AND ALL ACCOUNTS OF MARKETS—ALL TRADE INFORMATION—WILL BE SO ARRANGED THAT THE MERCHANT AND MAN OF BUSINESS SHALL FIND WHAT HE WANTS ALWAYS, AS NEARLY AS POSSIBLE, IN THE SAME PLACE, AND IN THE FEWEST POSSIBLE WORDS. THE MODERN NEWSPAPER HAS NOT BEEN DEvised AND PLANNED AS JUDGMENT MIGHT HAVE ORIGINALLY DIRECTED, BUT HAS GROWN UP UNDER CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH IT COULD NOT CONTROL; AND THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A NEW PAPER AFFORDS THE OPPORTUNITY FOR A REVISION, WHICH SHALL EFFECT A SAVING OF THE READER'S TIME, AND PRESENT THE INFORMATION WHICH HE SEEKS IN A MORE SYSTEMATIC FORM.

THE DAILY NEWS WILL BE PUBLISHED IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Let us repeat the marking features of our scheme:

1st. We give to the reader, in what we hope will be an improved and more convenient form, all that he can find in the most approved of our competitors; enlarging always our surface to embrace whatever of unusual interest the times may present. The difference between them and us will be only in that host of Advertisements, which we too will be happy to give in an additional sheet whenever the public shall supply us with the occasion.

2dly. To the reader who now pays Fivepence for his paper, we offer the same thing at half the price; and to the man who hires his paper, a paper of his own at about the cost of the hire. It, then, only remains for the public to justify the experiment, remembering that their interest in the issue is no less than our own.

Let him who would support us in the reasonable attempt, subscribe at once. Where even the reduced price is beyond his means, let him at once join with a friend or neighbour in subscription. If, again, these friends can arrange with others in the country to receive the paper, by post, on the day of publication, at half price, the cost to each of the New Daily Paper, will be little more than One Halfpenny.

Every News Agent will, we hope, supply the paper at Twopence Halfpenny, where payment is made in advance; the same proportionate allowance as with other papers—something more than twenty-four per cent.—being allowed by the proprietors to the trade. When credit is given, it is a matter of private arrangement, with which the proprietors have nothing to do. As, however, in an undertaking so bold and so novel, it is advisable to guard against possible inconvenience, the proprietors of THE DAILY NEWS will undertake to get all persons supplied who shall forward a post office order payable to JOSEPH SMITH, DAILY NEWS OFFICE, Whitefriars, London.

FOR THREE MONTHS, 10s. 4d. Any longer period at the same rate.

Let all who are interested in the success of this undertaking—who is not?—be active, and success is certain.

THE SONG OF THE CITY.

Suggested by a visit to the magnificent new Establishment of E. MOSES and SON, now open to the public for inspection or for the transaction of business.

What a wonderful City am I!
How widely my flag is unfurled!
All gaze with a wondering eye
On London—the pride of the world!
What City in all the wide earth
Such mighty achievements has won?
What City has e'er given birth
To tradesmen like MOSES and SON?
What City can boast of a Man
Like MOSES'S commercial Exchange?
Behold the huge House! and you'll start
To see the magnificent range!
I am proud of this warehouse of fame!
I am proud of the good it has done!
And I'm proud of the dresses which claim
Such credit for MOSES and SON!

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE QUESTION FOR THE LORDS.

"The next question was this—whether the Bill was called for by the people? * * * Their lordships' course was plain and easy. The Bill had been sent up to them by a majority of the House of Commons, but not by a clean majority. If the people were to send up the same Bill by a new House of Commons, by a clear and clean majority, he did not say he would abandon his opinions or apprehensions with respect to the measure, but as an ENGLISH PEER HE SHOULD FEEL BOUND TO BOW TO THE UNDOUBTED AND INDISPUTABLE WILL OF A MAJORITY OF HIS COUNTRYMEN."—The Earl of Malmesbury, May 26.

This really simplifies the case very much. The Earl of Malmesbury has certainly a happy way of stating a plain question in plain terms. This announcement of the noble Earl's is, in every respect, creditable to him, and to the party whose sentiments it is well known to express. It is a manly avowal of that deference which, according to the spirit and the forms of the constitution, the hereditary and aristocratic branch of the legislature owes to the will of the House of Commons and the people, on all matters of taxation and trade. By this declaration of the Earl of Malmesbury, which, as we need scarcely tell our readers, merely reiterates the repeated and uniform dictum of the entire protectionist party—and which was subsequently, on the same evening, confirmed by an interlocutory "hear, hear, hear," from the protectionists, in the course of the Earl of Haddington's speech—we are given to understand, that the protectionist peers are perfectly ready to pass the present or any future Bill for the total repeal of the Corn Law, if they can only be satisfied that such is the desire of the constituencies. Resistance to the popular will is not contemplated for a moment, and never was. The only question with them is, What is the popular will on the subject? Whatever may be their private opinion of the utility of a bread tax, they have not the remotest intention of keeping up any such tax, should it once clearly appear that the electors of the United Kingdom prefer eating untaxed bread. Nothing can be more fair and reasonable. We do not see what further the people could expect or desire, than this unreserved submission of the whole case to popular arbitration.

The question is thus narrowed to one of fact. What is it that the people really wish to see done with the Corn Law? To ask, "What will the Lords do?" is the same thing as to ask, "What would the people have the Lords do?" We submit, however, to the best consideration of the Earl of Malmesbury and the party with which he acts, that there are two modes of ascertaining the will of the people. It may be learned directly, or indirectly—expressly, or inferentially—by actual appeal to the people, or by that anticipation of the result of an appeal to the people, for which ample arithmetical data, of indubitable authority, are afforded by a comparison of the division lists of the House of Commons with the registries. As the latter of these two modes is equally reliable with the former; as it must, one would think, be infinitely the more agreeable of the two to their lordships' political amour-propre; and as, in the existing state of the trading and agricultural interests of the country, and of the public and private business of the legislature, it has the further recommendation of tending to save many weeks of most precious time;—we would earnestly advise its adoption in the present instance. With all the respect due to the constitutional authority of the House of Lords, yet with the confidence justified by that thorough knowledge of the facts of the case which long and minute study has given us, we now beg the protectionist peers deliberately to entertain the question, in what position would they find themselves after a general election?

That a general election, taken on the question of the repeal of the Corn Law, would give the Free Trade Minister a "clear and clean" working majority; that no amount of protectionist successes which, according to the most sanguine calculations of agricultural arithmetic, can be regarded as coming within the bounds of possibility, could—we do not say, convert the Free Trade majority of 98 into a minority, but—reduce the majority below the point required for the convenient working of the Government;—this is a proposition on which we do not think it necessary to bestow one word of proof. It were needless to demonstrate what no one, so far as we are aware, affects to dispute. Our own impression, founded on a very careful study of the registries, goes, indeed, a good deal further than the above guarded and qualified statement—but we have no wish to add to the strength of a case which is superfluously strong already. We believe that the protectionists would literally gain nothing by the result of a general election—that their successes would be fully balanced by our successes—that the relative numbers of the two parties in the House of Commons would remain very much what they now are—and that Sir Robert Peel would open the new Parliament with a total-and-immediate-repeal majority of somewhere about ONE HUNDRED. As this is only our opinion—though a very decided opinion, formed after thorough and minute examination of the registries—we leave the protectionists to accept or reject it as they think proper. But it is something more than a matter of opinion, that—as Mr. Cobden told them in his speech of the 27th of last February, after an analysis of the constituencies which has never to this hour been contradicted—the Free Trade majority in the new Parliament would include the representatives of every town in England; having 20,000 inhabitants—the whole twenty representatives of the metropolis and the metropolitan county—the representatives of Edinburgh and Dublin, of Manchester, Glasgow, Liverpool, Leeds, Birmingham, and Bristol—the representatives of South Lancashire and the West Riding—the representatives of 'all the intelligence, industry, commercial wealth, and political activity of the country. It would embody an amount of moral, social, and political power, that would give overwhelming strength to any Minister who knew how to wield it.

Such would be the issue—the foreknown and foreseen issue—of that appeal to the people by which protectionist peers avow themselves ready to be bound;—a clear working majority of Corn Law repealers—of total and immediate Corn Law repealers—combining with its numerical preponderance all those elements of active power which would render even a numerical minority irresistibly strong. It is hardly necessary for the lords to tell us that they would then repeal the Corn Law. Of course they would then repeal the Corn Law—with the fewest words. But why not anticipate? Why not deal with a proximate, as with a present certainty? Why make it appear, that their submission is not to the counsels of policy, nor to the demands of justice—but to "pressure from without," in its most palpable and obtrusive shape?

It is needless to say, that Sir Robert Peel knows exactly how this matter stands, and is prepared to act upon the knowledge. Our readers will have observed with satisfaction the explicit evidence given by the debate of this week, that the Premier takes that view of his duties and powers which we pointed out in our article of last Saturday. In the speech of his colleague, the Earl of Haddington, on Tuesday, we find the following highly significant passage—which, both as a manifesto of ministerial purpose, and as a piece of wise and friendly counsel to the Peers, is every way worthy of attention;

"He believed that by throwing out the Bill, their lordships would be entering into a hopeless contest for the maintenance of the Corn Law. He believed that on such a struggle they could not but be defeated in the end. If they threw out the Bill now, THEY WOULD HAVE THE BENEFIT OF A GENERAL ELECTION THROUGHOUT THE WHOLE COUNTRY. His own impression was, that the return of a new Parliament would show an overwhelming majority in favour of Free Trade, and that their lordships would, under that pressure, be in a manner compelled to pass the Bill. Indeed, most of their lordships who had spoken had stated that if the country really and deliberately decided in favour of Free Trade, the house would be compelled to accede to their request ('hear, hear, hear,' from the protectionists). Well, in the event of a general election, they would be directly and obviously yielding to pressure from without."

It is highly creditable to Sir Robert Peel's forbearance and moderation, that, with his knowledge of electoral statistics, he did not long ago take "the benefit of a general election." It would have made his work much easier and pleasanter to him. Both his interests as a politician, and his feelings as a man, would have been much better consulted by his taking the course which he has shown throughout so earnest a desire to avoid. By refusing to submit his new policy to the Parliament of 1841, and making his appeal at once to the people, he would have saved himself all the protectionist taunts of "treachery" and "perfidy," and would have secured a Parliamentary and popular ascendancy that would have immeasurably strengthened his tenure of office. The Premier has chosen the more patriotic and generous part. He has borne and forborne. He has declined making use of the enormous power which events had placed at his disposal. He has strained every nerve to accomplish a great national end in that particular mode which involved the minimum of éclat, and the maximum of odium and unpleasantness for himself individually, and whose only recommendation was that it seemed the most conducive to the public interests. He has eschewed the bold and brilliant coup d'état that would at once have made him the most powerful people's Minister of this age, and has been contented to negotiate, on terms extremely disadvantageous to his own political interest, the treaty which he might have authoritatively dictated. Nothing can be more thoughtlessly unjust than the protectionist denunciations of Sir Robert Peel for the course which he has taken on this question. Should the party eventually decide on committing that fatal blunder into which rash men would hurry them, they will see at a glance the full extent of the self-denying forbearance which they have hitherto so miserably ill required.

It now remains for the House of Lords to decide whether it would not be wise to do at first that which they have already made up their minds to do at last, on a certain condition—which condition is as sure of being fulfilled as to-morrow's sun is sure of shining. They are quite free to choose. There is no kind of competition in the case, other than that which foresight of consequences imposes on the wise man. "Intimidation" is a thing quite out of the question. Their lordships may throw out or mutilate the bill, with the most perfect safety, so far as the peace of the country is concerned. There will be no disturbance, no rioting, no brickbats and bludgeons, neither breaking of heads, nor breaking of windows. We will stake the whole of our political credit on the prophecy, that not even the establishments in No. 17, Old Bond Street, will have the slightest occasion for the services of the glazier. We shall have quite a quiet time of it. It will be a profoundly interesting, and even exciting, but by no means a noisy, election. There will be very few contests. No monopolist will deem it expedient to re-appear on the hustings of Liverpool, Bristol, Birmingham, Newcastle, Sunderland, South Lancashire, or the West Riding—and we dare say that it is not within the contemplation of the Free Traders to disturb the squirearchical ascendancy in the counties of Bucks and Dorset. Each party knows its own, and the business of distribution will be conducted in a perfectly business-like way. We are so well satisfied of this, that we have not the least desire for the peers to go counter to their own choice and judgment. Certainly we do not wish for a general election now; we should exceedingly regret the loss of so much valuable time. Defective as is the Ministerial Bill in some respects, we should be sincerely glad to see it pass without further delay. Yet we cannot shut our eyes to the obvious and important countervailing advantages that the country would reap from an appeal to the electors. We should at once be rid of the nugatory and pernicious "three years." The clear and clean majority would pass a clear and clean bill. The time lost on the passing of the measure would be time gained as regards the practical effect of the measure. The date of the Royal assent would be retarded by some months—but the date of the total abolition of the Corn Laws would be hastened by upwards of two years. And not only would the settlement be more perfectly satisfactory in itself—but all parties would be more completely made aware that it really was a settlement. Still we do not desire to see it come to this. We had rather that the bill, as it stands, passed now, for our languishing commerce and straitened industry have need of it. On the whole, we leave the matter to their lordships, with no other wish than that they should act according to the dictates of their deliberate and unbiassed judgment of the right and expedient.

LORD STANLEY AND THE EARL OF CLARENDON.

The contrast, in matter and manner, between the speeches of the above-named peers—the only speeches which, up to the moment of our writing, have relieved the tedium of an otherwise insufferably dull discussion—is as wide as is that antagonism of principle of which the noble speakers respectively represent the two extreme terms. The difference between their lordships is the difference between the clever boy and the wise man. The fall of an expiring monopoly was graced by a dashing harangue, in which flimsiness of thought, and a certain free and easy way of dealing with facts, were helped out by all the force of diction, and imposing confidence of tone, characteristic of "the Rupert of debate;" and the advent of a new and juster policy was signalled by the calmly earnest eloquence, and the lucid, cogent argument of a statesman, whose generous sympathies and large intelligence renders him the fitting advocate of that cause with which his family name will be identified in our future history.

Lord Stanley's extravagantly bepraised speech of Monday night is certainly not undeserving of some portion of that laudation of which protectionist critics have been so excusably lavish. It was well put together, and well spoken. It was a very telling speech. It could not be otherwise. Lord Stanley came to the question with great advantages. His oratorical talents had unusually free scope. Lord Stanley has kept himself singularly free from those harassing and cramping restraints which an accurate knowledge of the facts of a case is apt to impose on a man's rhetoric. As, during the four years that he remained in the House of Commons after the Free Trade question had begun to assume its present prominence, he never could be induced to take sufficient interest in it to open his lips in debate; as he has taken excellent care of late to avoid the intrusion of that unwelcome description of useful knowledge with which the "school of Manchester" sought, the other day, to disturb his rural leisure; and as, of course, he never gave his private hours of study to the perusal of works illustrative of "the cold, and selfish, and calculating doctrines of political economy;" he was able to approach the subject with a happy exemption from the paralysing influences which exact information sometimes has on the orator's fancy. The inspirations of his imagination had free scope. He could come out, very strongly and effectively, with "the combined authority of all times and of all countries, in favour of protection to agriculture"—a burst which would have been completely spoiled had he been at all deep in "The Industrial History of Free Nations," or had he even read the article, "Amsterdam," in that most useful compendium of politico-economical information, Mr. McCulloch's "Commercial Dictionary." His lordship's very brilliant and splendid exordium would have fallen dead on the ear, had he been obliged to qualify "all this weight of authority, both past and present, not only of the statesmen of this country, but of every other country," with such an exception as that of the statesmen of the most powerful and flourishing commercial country of Europe, during two brilliant centuries of its history. It was well for his eloquence that he had never heard of HOLLAND, which grew no corn—which was absolutely "dependent on foreigners" for food—and which, in virtue of that dependence, never knew scarcity, and was always ready to meet the demands of European famine from her overflowing granaries. Lord Stanley's rhetoric is under great obligations to his ignorance.

We trace, throughout his lordship's harangue the happy influence of this convenient and agreeable destitution of politico-economical knowledge. His very effective prediction of the five millions of quarters of best wheat annually coming pouring in upon us from Hungary and Ukraine at 40s. per quarter, would have been lost to the house and the world if Lord Stanley had been in possession of a little accurate information as to what it takes to grow and carry five millions of quarters of wheat—how much seed—how much labour—how much capital—how much science—what implements—what roads—what vehicles. His indignant invective against the prudent Premier, for declining to tell the landlords what their corn is likely to fetch on and from the 1st of February, 1849, could never have been uttered by a man cognizant of the elements that constitute price, and capable of understanding that experience of the last 30 years which so decisively demonstrates the impossibility of fixing the price of corn by Act of Parliament. Neither should we have had the old Tamboff story over again (with the venue changed to Hungary and the Ukraine), had Lord Stanley's mind been open to the corrective influence which argument and ridicule exercise on error and absurdity. Nor would it have been possible for a man in the slightest degree acquainted with what is going on in the public mind, to venture on so felicitous a piece of rhetorical daring as that of deprecating the "pauperism" of the "landed aristocracy"—expatiating on the national peril of "reducing to a lower position in the social scale" those men who "spend their money at least as fast as they get it"—and pleading for the sanctity and perpetuity of a "moral influence," created and sustained by a bread tax. Lord Stanley is fortunate in his ignorance. It is an immense advantage to be able to come so fresh to a subject. This happy viridity of intellect gives his oratory that charm of a brilliant and dashing frankness, without which it were an intellectual nullity.

We do not know whether any, and what, effect, beyond a momentary admiration of a successful rhetorical hit, was produced in the house by the display of the new protectionist leader. We should think, however, that the speech of the Earl of Clarendon, on the ensuing night, must have had great weight even with some of those in whose willing ears the Stanley declamation sounded like philosophy. Both in argument and in tone, it was a speech well worthy of the occasion, and of the speaker, and will be abundantly satisfactory to those who had felt that they might naturally look to the brother of Mr Villiers for an earnest and able defence of the rights of industry. We regret that our limits do not permit us to do more than allude to the noble earl's demonstration, that no one class or section of the industrial community—neither the agricultural labourers, nor the tenant farmers, nor the great manufacturers and merchants, nor the little manufacturers and tradesmen—can, by possibility, have a beneficial interest in the landlord's bread tax, and that "this is a landlord's question, and no one's else." The concluding portion of his speech, in which he adverted to the bearings of England's Free Trade policy on the commercial fellowship and political amity of nations, will be peculiarly welcome to that large class of our readers to whom Free Trade principles are especially endeared by their peace-preserving tendencies; and his lordship's sentiments on this weighty topic derive additional force and authority from his diplomatic experience:

"He need not repeat what had often been said as to the failure of diplomacy and negotiation on subjects of trade. All such negotiations had proceeded upon the basis of an exchange of equivalents, which it was found impossible to adjust with satisfaction to the various parties. If a treaty were concluded, one of the contracting parties always thought it was over-reached, and becoming dissatisfied, either violated the engagement or evaded its stipulations, as in the case of the Brazils; or all negotiations were broken off, as in the case of France and Spain, and some other countries, leaving the contracting parties in a disposition far less friendly than they were before. The only safe course was, for each country to pursue the course best adapted to its own interests, without regard to that taken by any other nation. We had to look only to our own interest, and whilst we were advancing in wealth, by adopting our own course, their lordships might rely upon it that we should be setting an example which the rest of the world not only would but which they must follow."

"As for ourselves, impelled as we were by a necessity to provide for increased demand by increased powers of production, we were about to adopt a policy which other nations must follow—a policy by which we should extend the intercourse of nations, and carry into effect that law of God which ordained men to be mutually useful to each other—a policy by which we should give and receive perpetual guarantees for placing upon a solid foundation that greatest and most inestimable blessing of peace."

We regret that unavoidable and painful circumstances prevented Earl Ducie from taking a share in the debate on the second reading of the Corn Bill in the House of Lords.

THE SUGAR CROP.—The letters by the West Indian mail were received here on Wednesday, and contain a more favourable account from the sugar plantations in some of the colonies, where they had at length experienced a genial fall of rain. Its principal effect, however, will be felt by the ensuing crop, which had just been planted, and to which it was invaluable; the present can benefit but slightly by it. In Jamaica, Trinidad, and Porto Rico, they were still under the influence of the drought, although in the south-west part of the first-named island some of the plantations would exceed their shipments of last year. It is, however, the exception to the rule, as the aggregate deficiency of the present crop of sugar in Jamaica, as compared with the last, is estimated at fully one-fourth. Barbadoes will suffer the least of all the islands, as it is anticipated that her exports will be from 23,000 to 24,000 hhds. against from 24,000 to 25,000 hhds. for last year. The sugar market here has been quiescent under the effect of these advices.—Liverpool Albion.

THE SUGAR TRADE.—During the recent influx of shipping at the several dock establishments of the port of London, a large number of the vessels consisted of East Indianmen, and also ships from the Mauritius, and the quantities of sugar (in bags) brought to and housed in the docks, out of the vessels alluded to, have been very extensive. Some idea may be formed of the correctness of this remark, when we state that at the East India Docks alone, since the commencement of the month of April ultimo, there have been landed and warehoused between 60,000 and 70,000 bags of sugar, of the finer description and best quality. The qualities imported into and housed at the other docks have been in a proportionate degree not less extensive or important. The mention of this is of interest and importance at the present time, when the rumoured or actual insufficiency of the crops, and the supply of sugar for consumption in the country, is made matter of particular remark, and the general questions of the importation of and the duties leviable on sugar are on the eve of consideration by the legislature.

POTATOES.—We notice a great deal said pro and con about the scarcity of potatoes in other journals; but from all we can learn, they have in this district never been sold at half their present price. On Saturday last they brought, in Brecon market, the enormous price of 25s. per sack,—just five times the rate at which they have frequently been sold here, and throughout the previous week not a single potato was offered for sale.—Shiruria.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE
SESSION OF 1846.

Nineteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 30.

The hope which we expressed, last week, that the House of Lords will pass the Corn Bill, even against its own predilections, was confirmed in a striking manner on Monday. On the morning of that day it was announced that all those members of the peerage constituting the Whig party, and who usually act together, had assembled on Saturday last at Lansdowne House, and had formally agreed to resist all and any amendment in the bill, which they also pledged themselves to support steadily through all its stages. This destroyed the hope and the fear that the bill in committee would be mutilated, a circumstance which would ensure its rejection, as it is against the privileges of the Commons to agree to alterations by the Lords in a money bill. So far this is creditable to the Whig party in the House of Lords, as many of them have been long advocates of a fixed duty, which they now abandon with reluctance. Should the division take place on Friday morning, we will of course be enabled to communicate the result before going to press.

The interest outside and within the House of Lords, on Monday, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, was very great. Crowds of strangers were assembled round the passages, and blocked up the entrance to the gallery door, more armed with peers' orders than could possibly gain admission. The house was exceedingly full; and amongst the visitors were several of the foreign ambassadors, one of them being the Count de St. Aulaire, the French Ambassador, who was in attendance on each night, and evinced great interest in the debate. There were ladies also present, anxious to hear the debate, and to listen to their noble relatives; while great numbers of the members of the House of Commons, quitting their own legislative assembly, in which, as if by consent, all interest has been for the time suspended, listened to the first vital Free Trade discussion which has shaken the "dry bones" of monopoly in the House of Lords. The body of the house was filled with a greater throng of Peers than we ever remember to have seen assembled since the days of Catholic Emancipation and the Reform Bill. Altogether the scene was exceedingly animated, evincing the grave importance of the measure, which is to effect one of the greatest social changes of modern times.

The Earl of Ripon moved the second reading of the bill. This, in itself, is an extraordinary fact. Frederick Robinson is now 64 years of age, and he introduced into the House of Commons the Corn Bill of 1815. This naked statement is in itself an illustration of the maxim that we are, or ought to be, "schoolboys from the cradle to the grave." His speech will be read entire by every man who wishes to have some portion of "secret history," as well as some idea of an extraordinary system now disappearing before public opinion. The first portion of his speech was a vindication of himself. Though he had introduced the Corn Bill of 1815, he had, at the time, expressed to the Earl of Liverpool his reluctance to do so; and the only ground on which he had ever supported a Corn Law was a conviction, sincerely entertained, that it was not desirable this country should be unduly dependent on foreign countries for the supplies of the chief article of subsistence. The tendency of population, according to Lord Ripon, is to outrun the productive powers of a country; the question of the abrogation of the Corn Law with him was never other than one of time. That time has now arrived. This was something to hear from the introducer of the measure in the House of Commons in the year 1815. Protection to native agriculture or native industry, in his idea, was never the system of England; there were a series of regulations in this direction, each of which grew out of some chance circumstance, as the duties upon timber, upon wool, on butter, and on cheese, &c., which were never intended to be of permanent endurance—the country is now in a condition to set its face against these fortuitous enactments being allowed to harden into a system. Lord Ripon entered at length into the history of the Corn Laws from 1791 down to 1842, and stated that the only ground upon which he had ever rested his support of any of them was independence of foreign supply, and, in his opinion, regard being had to the increase of population, this ground was no longer tenable. He stated it as his belief that land would not be thrown out of cultivation, and instanced the case of Lincoln Heath, over the approaching desolation of which, our readers will remember, Mr. D'Israeli so picturesquely bewailed himself in the House of Commons, and stated that a portion of that district, which, according to the protectionists, was to be thrown out of cultivation, was his own property, and that during the excitement of last autumn, when it was known that a fundamental change in the Corn Laws was impending, certain parcels of land belonging to him fell out of lease, which he immediately was able to re-let, not at a reduced, but at an increased rent. This shows pretty clearly what the opinion of practical farmers is upon this momentous head of the discussion. After the noble earl had given his elaborate history of the Corn Laws, contending that they originated in fiscal and not in constitutional considerations, he urged that we had now outgrown their necessity, as the investment of capital in the cultivation of the soil was going on more vigorously than ever.

The Earl of Ripon was followed by the Duke of Richmond, in a speech full of acrimonious feeling. His grace thought it necessary to play the old farce over again, with which we have been already nauseated in the House of Commons, by reading pages of Hansard over to Lord Ripon, containing his immature opinions upon the Corn Law question. After citing and contrasting the past and present opinions of the Earl of Ripon, he contended that this great change, which would ruin thousands of tenant farmers, was undertaken to serve and gratify a mere section of the Manchester cotton spinners. If the vote were taken by ballot a majority of their lordships would be found opposed to the measure. But noble lords were reluctant to oppose the Government—they were determined to vote with their party. But Sir R. Peel had abandoned his party, not the party Sir R. Peel. The Prime Minister had no more chance of regaining the confidence of the people of this country than he had of occupying the throne. He believed that the adoption of this measure would shake the foundations of the throne, and sap the institutions of the country. The only thing in the shape of argument was his usual clap-net for the farmers. Do you hope to improve the condition of those who depend for their subsistence upon the soil, by lowering the price of agricultural produce? The question should rather run—Do you hope to improve their condition by impoverishing their markets? Does not a large portion of every shilling gained by the manufacturing and commercial classes go to enrich the agriculturists? What would the mere soil of England be worth minus her manufactures, minus her commerce? What would that soil be worth to its owners were these doubled in amount? Can these ever so double themselves under any other system than one of free imports? He concluded by moving, as an amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Earl Fitzwilliam expressed his determination to vote for the Bill, because he considered the settlement of the Corn Law question a matter of paramount consideration. But he vindicated his own views of commercial policy, especially with reference to a fixed duty, which he had advocated for many years, and considered the Government deserving of severe blame for the manner, time, and mode of introducing the Bill. Earl Fitzwilliam, however, implored the house not to reject the Bill, nor to prolong a contest for repeal which has been so mischievous to all classes of society, more especially to the agricultural. The noble lord wished certain changes to be made in our system of taxation, and was averse to the three years' delay.

The Duke of Cleveland, as might have been expected, vindicated the cause of protection, and affirmed that the Government were unworthily yielding to mere clamour, the effect of which would be visible, a few years hence, in the destruction of other and more important interests than the Corn Laws. If, said, his grace, such taxes as the poor rates and tithes were thrown equally on all the great sections of society, then the produce of the land would require no more protection than the produce of manufactures. An important admission this from the Duke of Cleveland.

The Marquis of Londonderry, in a characteristic speech, vindicated Sir Robert Peel, whose administration, foreign and domestic, had been pre-eminently beneficial for the country, and who now only yielded the question of the Corn Laws from a conscientious conviction of the necessity of the measure. He maintained that not only in the county of Durham, but throughout the whole of the north of England, the feeling of the farmer was in favour of the Government measure. The noble marquis saw no reason for withdrawing his confidence from her Majesty's ministers, considering how well they had carried the country through great difficulties. He maintained that this was more a question of rent-roll and profit than one of high principle.

Lord Stanley must, however, be considered as having made the speech of the night, and a brilliant piece of declamation it was. In delivery and in force it was altogether the best speech on behalf of protection that has yet been delivered. Lord Stanley was quite conscious that he was keenly observed, and in order to avoid all imputation of being actuated by personal feeling, steered clear of personalities. He, in fact, took the tone, hitherto so grievously wanting in all protective speeches—something resembling statesmanship. He spoke for upwards of three hours; and during all that time sustained the attention of the house. The principle of protection to native industry, he argued, had been recognised by all our past legislation, and had received the sanction of our most distinguished statesmen—Chatham, Pitt, Huskisson, Liverpool, Canning, and Grey. All foreign countries also, who had any interest in the cultivation of the soil, protected by special legislation their native industry. After complimenting the Duke of Wellington, whose character raised him above all suspicion, and also admitting that Sir Robert Peel really believed in the emergency which had led him to propose the present measure, he contended that the Government had mistaken the brawling torrent of agitation for the strong still current of public opinion. The Anti-Corn-Law League had triumphed over the ministers of the Crown, and these again had triumphed over their own political supporters, and even over the independence of Parliament. But when the Government were asked what would be the probable consequence of the present measure, they frankly declared that they did not know. They were about to try this great experiment, not in some remote corner of the globe, where an error was not irrevocable, but in the wealthiest, mightiest, and most artificially constructed country in the world. The noble lord then entered into personal details respecting the dissensions in the Cabinet during last autumn, intimating that though he disbelieved in the existence of a "famine," he had, nevertheless, been willing to join in a temporary suspension of the Corn Laws, provided that it were temporary. He urged that the Corn Law had fulfilled its purpose of keeping prices moderate and steady, as well as rendering us independent of foreign supply, while the great progress in the annual value of our manufacturing industry showed that it had not been inconsistent with its welfare. These points he argued at great length, contending that our shipping, our commerce, and trade had all flourished under protection, while no increase in the exports of our manufactures could take place without a cheapening of the value of the articles, and inevitably a reduction in the wages of labour. He granted that we might, for a time, stimulate the production of manufactures, but a time of reaction must inevitably arrive; and when we had destroyed our great home market, and found our foreign one failing us, what was to become of the great industrial community of this country? The adoption of the cold, calculating doctrines of political economy involved the destruction of the yeomanry of England. All small farms must be broken up, for the sole question being reduced to one of profit and loss, all associations and old ties must be broken up, and the tenantry turned adrift. He did not think so hardly of the landlords of England as to suppose that, even under the pressure of Free Trade, they would be guilty of cruelty like this. But if this were to be the case in England, what were they to do with Ireland? There it must end in extermination. And what was to become of our great colonial system, based as it was on reciprocal and mutual advantages? There was no zone in either hemisphere in which our power and influence were not recognized; and we were now about to tell the British emigrant that henceforth his interest was of no more concern to us than those of any foreigner. The St. Lawrence would no longer be the great highway of Canada; New York would supplant Quebec and Montreal; and the consequences of the removal of protection, involving, as it did, the welfare of our colonies, had been pointed out in a recent message from Lord Cathcart. He conjured them not to sacrifice their home and colonial markets for supposed advantages, admitted to be very doubtful of realization, even by so leading a manufacturer and member of the Anti-Corn-Law League as Mr. Gore. The House of Commons, which, a year ago, had rejected the repeal of the Corn Laws by a large majority, had now passed the present measure by a majority of ninety-eight. Sudden conversions like these could not command the respect of the country. Organized agitation was never put down by concession, and he quoted a passage from a speech by Mr. Lawrence Heyworth, of Liverpool, in order to show that the advocates of Free Trade had ulterior objects. The noble lord concluded a speech of more than three hours in duration by an emphatic appeal to the House not to become the mere registrar of the edicts of a Minister, but to save the country from the consequences of rash and hazardous legislation.

Lord Brougham followed in reply; and when he had concluded the debate was adjourned till Tuesday. There was not quite the same amount of excitement as on the previous day, nor was the attendance of peers quite so large, which was probably partly owing to the fact that it had been arranged that there should be another adjournment. Still the interest felt was great, and the eagerness of peers to speak was occasionally the cause of a "scene" in the usually calm and well ordered assembly.

The debate on Tuesday was opened by

The Earl of Wilton, who stated his extreme regret at being obliged, from his sense of public duty, to oppose the Government in their present measure for repealing the law of 1842, which he considered had realised all the conditions desirable in a Corn Law.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge then rose, along with other peers; but the cry of "Cambridge, Cambridge" from all parts of the house made those who were up give way. Some curiosity was felt to know the line which would be taken by the uncle of the Queen towards the Queen's Ministers. He had heard Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons state his reasons for the introduction of the bill, and notwithstanding his respect for the great ability of the right honourable baronet, he had failed to convince him of the necessity for the measure. But in accordance with the policy which he has pursued during the last 45 years he has been a member of the House of Lords, as he cannot vote with the Government, he will therefore not vote at all.

The next speaker was a young peer,

Lord Granville, who addressed the house for the first time, and who delivered a neat and pointed speech, advocating the truth of Free Trade as a principle, and the necessity as well as the safety of its application in a country like this, with its accumulating capital and increasing population.

The Marquis of Normanby, though not participating in the exaggerated expectations of advantage to be derived from a repeal of the Corn Laws, supported the bill because he felt that the balance of the benefit was in its favour. At the same time he thought that the Government had not acted with reference to the repeal of the Corn Laws in a way calculated to sustain either the character of the executive, or the dignity of the legislature. It was obtained at an enormous waste of that confidence which ought to be reposed in public men. After pointing out the necessity for ameliorating the moral and physical condition of our manufacturing classes, he urged their lordships not to encounter the responsibility of rejecting a measure which had been sent up to them by so large a majority of the House of Commons, inasmuch as it would expose them, however unjustly, to imputation of an interested nature, calculated to impair their legitimate influence.

The Earl of Cardigan protested against that abandonment of the policy which has hitherto united the great Conservative party, and which he regarded as broken up by this mischievous and uncalled for measure.

The Earl of Winchelsea also, with great vehemence,—in fact, with oratorical violence, which sounded excessively ludicrous,—argued against the adoption of Free Trade as ruinous to our agriculture, which, since the passing of the Corn Bill of 1842, had been making rapid progress, through draining, artificial manures, and other scientific improvements. Our farmers would be unable to compete with the overwhelming produce of the United States, and our heavy clay soils must go out of cultivation. He implored them not to forfeit their credit with the country by registering the edicts of any Minister of the House of Commons, which had abandoned the principles on which it had been elected.

The next speech was indeed an able one, and was so felt by every one who listened to it, whatever his opinions might be. In manner, in style, and in argument, it was unique; and we observed that the bench of bishops paid it a marked attention. It was delivered by

The Earl of Clarendon (elder brother of Mr. Villiers), who reminded the house that the question was not one of party, but of time, fact, and experience. There was no question on which, during the last thirty years, so great a change of opinion had taken place. Even those who, a few years ago, had scornfully rejected a fixed duty, were understood to be now favourable to its adoption, and were ready thereby to abandon their principles of protection to agriculture for the sake of protection to the exchequer. No Minister, under a due sense of responsibility, could have acted otherwise than Sir Robert Peel had done, with such reports as were officially transmitted to him from Ireland in October last. He referred to the oft-repeated declarations of Ministers within the last four years, that with cheapness and abundance were connected the diminution of turbulence, the abatement of crime, increased commerce, and improved morals; and that in periods of scarcity and dearth the contrary of all those results prevailed. From these assertions, the repeal of the Corn Law was the practical deduction. And even if any of their lordships were blind to the intentions of the First Lord of the Treasury, the country was not. It was impossible to apply the principles of Free Trade to colonial asses, prunes, and oils, and yet refuse to apply them to the staple food of our rapidly-increasing and always underfed population. The cry was formerly "Protection to agriculture." Something more comprehensive was required, and "protection to native industry" was substituted. But the industrial interests of the country did not ask for it. "British industry," said Lord Clarendon, "wants no protection—it repudiates alike your newborn sympathies, and your worn-out legislation." He denied that the labouring agricultural classes were interested in the maintenance of protection to agriculture, for this simple reason, that when you looked at the rate of wages which the labourers received, at the quantity and quality of food by which their lives were maintained, their helpless life of unbroken toil, their sanitary condition, it was impossible that the labourers could sink lower in the social scale than the point at which they were at present. Their condition might be made better by the change—it could not be made worse. Protection had not in the slightest degree benefited the agricultural labourer; and then Lord Clarendon, with great point and emphasis, ridiculed the wild fears entertained of some overwhelming importation of foreign grain, as if it were to be borne on the waves of the ocean, and delivered gratis at every man's door. The alleged panic was not manifested by farmers selling their stock, discharging their labourers, or throwing up their farms, while land still maintained its value. Looking at the progress of public opinion, no Ministry could maintain the protective system much longer. Passing to the subject of hostile tariffs, he showed that our exports to France had rapidly increased, as was in fact the case in Spain, Italy, and elsewhere, for the smuggler was always at hand to modify the prohibitory system. We had, therefore, only to pursue our own course, and look to our own advantage. At the same time it was impossible not to observe the effect which our example was already producing on public opinion in other countries. The noble earl concluded a most effective speech by depicting the probable results of a liberal commercial policy in harmonising the intercourse of nations, and placing the question of peace on a new and firmer basis.

The sense of pleasure and satisfaction which the speech of the Earl of Clarendon had excited, was completely smothered by the next peer who spoke. It was the Earl of Carnarvon, who, in a most tedious, drawing, sermonising way, was on his legs for two or three hours, repeating the same idea over and over again, till every body was sick of listening to him.

The Earl of Carnarvon, while admitting that the principles of Free Trade might be true in the abstract, urged that they were utterly inapplicable to the circumstances of such a country as this. Great as was the desolation which had been effected by the Currency Bill of 1819, the mischief which would be produced by the present bill amongst the small occupiers of the soil would be far greater. He traced the mode in which he considered it would operate, leading to glut and ruinously low prices at one period, and unnaturally high prices at another, as injurious ultimately to manufacturing, as in the first instance it would be to agricultural industry. Sir Robert Peel had no right to abandon the principles which had secured him the following of a powerful party, without at least one more contest on the battle-field of the country, and enabling the constituencies to say whether or not they had changed their opinions with the Government. He expatiated on this point at great length, deploring the insatiable policy adopted in a time of profound prosperity at the bidding of unfounded clamour, and calling on the House of Lords, to vindicate its honour and character by refusing to abdicate its legislative functions, or submitting implicitly to adopt any measure dealing with great interests.

The Earl of Malmesbury, who has repeatedly visited the Hebrides, pointed out the destitution of the population consequent on the reduction of the duty on barilla, by which the manufacture of kelp had been destroyed. He considered this to be an example on a limited scale of what would be the result of the adoption of Free Trade, enforcing this view by several other illustrations.

The Earl of Haddington stated that his opinion on the question of protection had long been modifying, and he had frequently, of late years, expressed in private his conviction that no injury would arise from a repeal of the Corn Laws, were it not for the panic which he apprehended, would ensue. He then recounted the share he had in the circumstances which led to the breaking up of Sir Robert Peel's Cabinet, and its resumption of office. The Government of the country was at a stand; and seeing that the Corn Laws were doomed, he felt no shame, either in his change of opinion, or in his official connection with a Cabinet which undertook their repeal. But though anticipating much opposition, he did not expect to hear so many prophecies of evil—anarchy, confusion, and ruin to Church and State—as the result of the adoption of this measure. So far from entertaining these fears, he believed that the great majority of the people of this country, including a considerable portion of the landed interest, were in favour of the bill. The sagacity of Sir Robert Peel was unquestioned; and it would have been madness in him to break up his party and weaken his power, did he not sincerely believe that the exigencies of the country demanded the change. For his part, he believed that, by effecting it, Sir Robert Peel had conferred on the country one of the greatest benefits any Minister ever had it in his power to bestow. After dwelling on the probable immaterial effect on prices which will be the result, he declared his firm conviction that, if there were a general election on the Corn question, the new Parliament would exhibit a great majority in favour of the total repeal of the law, and urged them no longer to delay the settlement of a question, which not merely the Anti-Corn-Law League, with its great power, but the tenant farmers themselves were anxious to see disposed of.

The Earl of Hardwicke said it was an aristocracy of wealth which was pushing on this question. With the mighty power of the steam-engine, they were prepared to flood the world with their goods; and if they were able to do this, they cared not a straw for the rights of humanity or the interests of the poor. The rich landed proprietors would suffer least from the repeal of the Corn Laws—it was the smaller owners and occupiers, with the poor, on whom the greatest amount of injury would fall. Under a system of protection, agriculture had flourished, commerce had expanded, and the revenue had been elastic. The wages of skilled labour had not varied with the price of food; but the unskilled labour of the agricultural districts did, and therefore the price of corn was an important element in the employment of the poor man. The temporary pretext for the repeal of the Corn Law (the famine in Ireland) had now been abandoned. The noble Earl dwelt on the great fall in price which must ensue from free importation, and urged that a reduction of one-fourth in the incomes of their lordships would be most disastrous to the country generally, including the manufacturing interest. The policy of this country was to keep us independent of foreign nations—hence the Sovereign must be a Protestant; but if we depended on foreigners for our supplies, we might find ourselves driven into a war to obtain our daily bread. It was the imperative duty of their lordships to let the question be referred to the country for decision.

A lively conversation now arose about the adjournment of the debate. The House of Lords does not sit on Wednesdays; and there was this additional circumstance, that the Wednesday of this week was "Derby day" at Epsom races. Earl Grey implored them, for their own character and credit with the country, to prefer business to amusement. But their lordships preferred amusement to business; and the debate was adjourned till Thursday, with the understanding that Earl Grey should open it.

Before the debate was resumed on Thursday, a significant incident occurred. The Earl of Dalhousie, President of the Board of Trade, was entrusted with the important position from the bankers, merchants, and influential individuals, of the City of London, praying that the measures of the Government may be speedily passed into law. He reminded the house that a similar petition from similar parties, in 1820 preceded those measures of commercial reform which we are only now in process of completing. Lord Ashburton, the Thomas Baring of former days, got up, and affirmed that a petition as numerous and respectfully signed could be got up, in the City, praying that the measures should not be passed into law. "If so," said Lord Brougham, "why not get it up?" "Yes," added Lord Montagu, "there is plenty of time yet for its presentation, before the measures are passed." The Duke of Richmond made rather an ingenious attempt at an escape. He asked how many of the merchants who signed that petition are owners of corn in bond? This raised great laughter. Earl Grey, at the close of his really able speech, adverted to this circumstance, and said if they rejected the bill it would set the country inquiring how many of their lordships were owners of land!

Earl Grey began the adjourned debate; and spoke at great length but with great power. In the House of Commons he delivered a number of remarkable speeches in favour of Free Trade, characterised by a straightforward boldness, lucid argument, and powerful appeal. He had, however, a tendency to be verbose, using an unnecessary number of words. On Thursday, he eschewed this habit, and delivered an animated speech, all the parts of which had strict relation to each other, forming a continuous pleading on behalf of Free Trade, not only overthrowing the whole of Lord Stanley's argument, but leaving nothing farther to be said. It was as gratifying to the advocates of Free Trade, as calling to monopolist lords, to hear him defend the Anti-Corn-Law League, and render homage to the genius and perseverance of Mr. Cobden and his colleagues.

Lord Ashburton followed; and spoke in a low, monotonous tone, humming and hawing over his words, repeating his ideas, his words, and his facts. It was positively a poor display.

The Marquis of Lansdowne and the Earl of Dalhousie both made admirable speeches—bold, spirited, full of facts and arguments, manly in tone, and unanswerable. As for the rest of the speakers, they were of the usual stamp on behalf of protection, with the exception of the Earl of Essex, who assigned very creditable reasons for his conversion to Free Trade views. The Duke of Wellington closed the debate, his speech being simply a defence of himself. The House of Lords sat from five o'clock on Thursday till half past four on Friday morning. Then came the division:

Majority in favour of the second reading of the Corn Bill, FORTY SEVEN.

We subjoin, at full length, some of the most prominent speeches delivered during the debate. We regret the impossibility of giving in full the excellent and able speech of Lord Lansdowne, as well as the masterly, high-toned, and most logically practical and statesmanlike speech of Lord Dalhousie. We shall, however, endeavour to give them without abridgement in our next number.

SPEECH OF LORD STANLEY.

Lord STANLEY then rose and addressed the house as follows:—I can assure your lordships that it is with the most unfeigned distrust of my own powers, but at the same time with the most unhesitating conviction of the truth and strength of the case which I have to support, that I venture to submit myself to your lordships' indulgence while I enter into a defence of that system and that law which has been designated by a noble earl on the other side of the house as absurd, and which has been most vehemently, but I can hardly say vigorously, assailed by those who have hitherto boldly and most strenuously defended it (cheers). I feel, my lords, how much need I have of your indulgence, because I find myself unhappily on this occasion opposed, inpar congressu, to all those who have been hitherto the leaders of both the great parties into which this house and the other house of Parliament have been divided. But, however much and however painfully I may feel the inequality of the contest in point of ability, I cannot admit that the weight of authority is in favour of those who propose the abolition of the Corn Laws (hear, hear). My lords, I will not appeal—it would be invidious to do so—to the authority and opinions of noble lords on either side of the house. I will not cite the opinions they may have formed or the expressions they may have made use of; but, my lords, I will venture to appeal from the authority of the living to the authority of the dead (hear, hear)—I will venture to appeal from the authority of the statesmen of the present day, to all the great names among those who have been the most liberal commercial ministers of England in times not long gone past; I will appeal to the authority of Chatham, to the authority of Mr. Pitt, to the authority of Mr. Huskisson; and, my lords, while I mention their names, I will refer to those of others whose eloquence still rings in our ears—and would to God their wisdom and prudence were still directing our councils—trusting I shall be forgiven by my noble friends who now occupy seats in this house, if I refer to those who first cast imperishable lustre on the names of Liverpool, of Canning, and of Grey (great cheering). But, I can appeal not only to statesmen of almost the present day; I can appeal against the statesmen of the present year (cheers),—to the authority of all those who have swayed the destinies of this country ever since it took a prominent place among the nations of the world. The noble earl (Ripon) says this question was not raised by former Governments on the principle of protection; and says that if you search the records of our history from the earliest times, you will find in the most distinct form, from the preambles of successive statutes in successive ages, that the principle which guided the ministers of this country was not the principle of encouraging the domestic industry, and protecting the agriculture of this country (cheers). As early as the time of Edward IV. I recollect a memorable preamble, one which might almost be applied to a statute of the present day: it recites, if I remember the words—"That whereas the labourers and occupiers in husbandry"—not the great owners of land, observe, not the great proprietors—but "the labourers and occupiers in husbandry be daily grievously endangered by the bringing in from foreign countries of corn into this realm when the price of corn within this realm is low," and the statute with that recital goes on to prohibit the importation of corn when the price here was 6s. 8d. per quarter. The same principle has guided the legislature of this country from that day to the present, varied according to the circumstances of the country, varied according to the exigencies of the times, varied according to the state of husbandry, and the state of our relations with foreign powers. But through all, without an exception, there has been maintained this principle, and in order to secure the independency of this country of foreign supplies for the food of its own people, it was the policy and wisdom of this great country to give encouragement and protection to the cultivation of its own soil (hear, hear, hear). But I will not be satisfied with appealing to home authorities; there is not one nation in the world of any eminence that has ventured up to this hour upon the bold and rash experiment upon which your lordships are invited to enter, of leaving the provision of the food of its people unrestrained by legislation, unprotected by fiscal regulation, and subject to mere chance, or worse than that—to chance controllable and controlled by the caprice, the enmity, or the inability to supply, of foreign countries (cheers). I will go through the principal nations of the earth. France and Holland have both not only a system of protection, but both have a sliding scale, and France has a sliding scale infinitely more complicated and stringent than our own. Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, the Germanic Confederation, Prussia, Portugal, Spain, the Roman States, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Egypt, and the United States of America. Have I gone through all the principal nations of the world (hear, hear)? Not one of all these countries has ventured to leave its agriculture unprotected, or to allow the provision of the food of its people to be dependent on foreigners. And when I see all this, not only can I not admit that the weight of authority is with the opponents of the measure, but I venture to doubt the truth of that which has been put forward as an indisputable axiom—that the prima facie inference is in favour of unrestricted importation (hear, hear). On the contrary, I think the weight of authority, the authority of the past and the present, of this and of all other countries, nations with every variety of soil and climate, with every variety of density and sparseness of population, under all varieties of civil institutions, from the most absolute monarchy to the most unrestricted republicanism, the combined authority of all times and countries is in favour of the system of protection (cries of "hear, hear"). I dispute that which has been held to be an indisputable axiom; I contend that the inference, the prima facie inference, is, that all statesmen of former times and countries were not wholly destitute of political wisdom and political sagacity (cheers). I cannot believe that not a single beam enlightened and dispelled the universal darkness, till that which flashed simultaneously and with such wonderful and marvellous power of conversion upon the statesmen of the present age, in the month of November last (great cheering). I hope I need not assure your lordships, and I am quite confident I need not assure the noble and gallant duke near me (the Duke of Wellington), that however deeply I may deplore the course he has pursued as a Minister of the Crown, no words shall fall from me in the course of the observations I shall have to offer in the slightest degree inconsistent with the deep personal respect I entertain both of his public and private character, or to cast the shadow of a suspicion—which does not exist or find a place in my mind—upon the entire purity of the motives by which he has been actuated (cheers). Even if my noble friend's brilliant career and the prominent position he occupies in this age and country, did not place him, —I will not say beyond criticism,—but above all apprehension of censure, the uniform singlemindedness of his character, his utter forgetfulness on all occasions of self, and his abhorrence of all that is low, mean, and selfish, would be a guarantee to your lordships and to the world, that whatever be the circumstances which have produced it, his decision has been formed upon a sincere, but, I respectfully think, a mistaken sense of what is best for the public interest (cheers). Nor, my lords, will I presume to doubt the sincerity of the conviction of my right hon. friend at the head of her Majesty's Government, that this measure was called for by a great exigency. A man of far less sagacity and experience than my right hon. friend could not long have failed to foresee that the inevitable consequence of this measure must be the dislocation and disruption of all those party ties without which, in my humble judgment, the affairs of this great country can never be steadily carried on; he must have foreseen the shock it would give to public confidence in public men, to the confidence of constituents in their representatives, to the confidence of the country in the House of Commons, and, forgive me for saying so, in your lordships' house also, if you should unhappily imitate the too facile conversion of that house (great cheering). He must have known the embarrassment, the painful conflict and struggle between personal attachment and public principle, to which it would expose his warmest and most devoted adherents (hear, hear); he must have felt the injury he was doing to his own public reputation, and the diminution he was causing to the means of his own future usefulness; I believe my right hon. friend foresaw all these circumstances, and therefore I cannot but think that he conscientiously believed the emergency of the case required this course to be pursued. But I think my right hon. friend fatally and unhappily mistook that emergency, that he mistook the public judgment, that he mistook the urgency of the position in which he was placed. I think he committed the error the most fatal a statesman can commit,—I think he took the brawling torrent of agitation for the still, deep current of public opinion (cheers). And it will not be the least unhappy consequence of this unhappy measure that this country and the world will believe,—truly or falsely, justly or unjustly, I will not say,—that a triumph has been gained by an organized and interested association over the Minister of the Crown (cheers), and that a still more fatal triumph has been gained by the Minister of the Crown, acting under the influence of that association, over his political supporters and the independence of Parliament (loud cheering.) With these observations I dismiss all that is personal with regard to this question. I will not be tempted to enter into personal motives even by that general panegyric of inconsistency (laughter) which has been pronounced by the noble marquis (the Marquis of Londonderry). But I must, in passing, express my regret that the noble marquis should have thought it becoming in him to cast a taunt upon those able, zealous, and conscientious men who, abandoned by those in whom they formerly placed their confidence, have been put forward in an unwonted struggle, and in that struggle have exhibited ability, talent, and courage which only reflect the greater credit upon them, because, for a long period of time, —as long as they could confide in those who formerly led them,—they had modestly kept those talents concealed from public view (cheers). I say I will not enter upon personal considerations. I will not expose myself to the sort of attack intimated by the noble marquis; I will not quote a single page of Hansard (hear, hear); I will not go back to one previous opinion or one previous speech; I do not desire to appeal to your lordships' passions, but to your reason; I do not desire to aggravate the feelings of mortification, perhaps I might use a stronger word, with which you must regard those who have been, I think, at least misled; I wish to omit all personal considerations; if, indeed, I were to enter into the question of consistency, I think I should have to direct my observations with tolerable impartiality to both sides of the house (hear, hear). I cannot concur with the noble duke (Richmond), who thought that those on the other side of the house are entitled to say that on this question they are pursuing a consistent course (hear, hear). I take leave, with great respect, to remind noble lords opposite that, up to 1841, there was little or no difference of opinion among them as to the necessity of maintaining the then existing Corn Laws. And though since that period there has been a difference between the two sides of the house, it has not related to the question whether agriculture is entitled to protection or not, but simply as to its extent and amount, and the most efficient and politic mode of applying and administering that protection (hear, hear). And such I believe was the case down to that memorable month of November, 1845—down to the day when the verbosa et grandis epistola venit (cheers and laughter); from that period, and that period alone, we can date the claim—if, indeed, there be a claim—to be considered the opponents of protection. It may be that some of your lordships who are about to vote for the second reading, desire to record your opinion against the principle of the sliding scale, to give effect to your own conscientious, and I believe I may say unaltered opinion in favour of a fixed duty (hear, hear). In that case I have nothing to say against your perfect consistency; but if you are about to join a Government for the purpose of abolishing all protection to agriculture, in whatever shape, you must not flatter yourselves that you are altogether free from the imputation of that inconsistency with which you are so ready to taunt her Majesty's Government (cheers). And now, I turn from the personal part of the question, and from the discussion of those by whom the measure was proposed and supported, to the much more important matter, the arguments by which it is maintained. But, here I must say, we are met at the outset by a difficulty of rather a singular kind. When, in the other House of Parliament, we have asked the Minister of the Crown a question,—not, I think, an unfair or an unreasonable one,—what do you anticipate will be the result of this measure? the simple answer given was, that they must decline to prophesy; their prophecies failed in 1842, and they would not risk their reputation as prophets hereafter. If we ask what the effect of the measure will be, we are frankly told they cannot say (hear, hear). Now where is it you are about to try this experiment, of which the Minister who brings it forward cannot tell what will be the possible or probable results? The old proverb says, fiat experimentum in corpore vili; try your experiment on some small scale, in some insignificant corner of the globe, in some infinitesimal state of society; try it where a mistake would not be irrevocable; where an error in judgment would not lead to such formidable consequences. But you are going to try this experiment in the wealthiest and mightiest empire of the world; you are trying it in this England of ours, the highest and mightiest among the nations of the world, that which is in the most artificial state of society—that in which the slightest derangement of the social scale, the slightest disturbance of the relations between the different classes of the community—may produce extensive, serious, and most irremediable mischief (cheers). And it is in this country, and supported by such arguments as you have heard from my noble friend to-night, that you are invited to try this great experiment, the issue of which the Minister of the Crown tells you he cannot foresee! It may be very well for an irresponsible body, like the Anti-Corn-Law League, engaged in an active and an interested pursuit of their own objects—I do not mean to say not believing that their own personal interests are not inconsistent with the public interest—it may be very natural, if not very legitimate, for their agents, and those whom they employ, to hold different language to different classes of the community (cries of "hear, hear") to speak to the manufacturing classes of cheap bread, of bread at half the price and wages double the amount, to talk of a grinding aristocracy, of the plunder of the poor, of robbery by the monopolists, of the heartless landlords, and all those clap-trap phrases by which an ignorant multitude have been deceived and deluded (hear, hear), and then to turn round to the agriculturists of this country, and to tell them of the universal prosperity that will result from this measure, and to say, "Do not for a moment apprehend a fall in the price of your produce, the price will rise; far from losing you will only be sharers in the universal gain." Somehow or other bread is to be infinitely cheaper to the consumers—somehow or other you are to get a much better price for the corn you grow (hear, hear). But, my lords, if this conduct be natural or legitimate in the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League, it is neither natural nor legitimate in the First Minister of the Crown (cheers), wielding the authority of the Crown, speaking in the name of the Crown, exercising the influence of his high station, and his high character, and his high talents, to carry measures of deep and vital importance, of hazardous and doubtful policy. Your lordships and the other house of Parliament have a right to be told by the Minister under such circumstances what is the object at which he aims; and you have a right to canvass fully and distinctly, first whether the object be in itself desirable, and next whether the means which he proposes for effecting it are likely to attain that object if it be desirable (hear, hear). You have a right to know from the Minister what he calculates upon, as being the probable effect of this great measure. My lords, in the silence of the Government upon this point, we turn to the arguments which they have made use of; and although certainly one of them has been in a considerable degree abandoned by my noble friend this evening, yet in the course of the discussions that I have heard, this measure has been rested mainly upon two arguments, namely, the apprehended famine in Ireland, and the successful operation of the tariff in 1842 (hear, hear). But, my lords, this does not relieve my difficulty. These arguments may both be invalid, as I will endeavour to show by-and-by that they are; but valid they cannot both be, for they are mutually contradictory, the one of the other. If the repeal of the Corn Laws, in any mode or by any possibility, be calculated to relieve the famine in Ireland, supposing always the famine to exist (hear, hear), it must be by bringing a large amount of corn into consumption at so low a price as to place it within the reach of the poorest and the most distressed of that starving population; but if I am not much mistaken in the boast which her Majesty's Government make of the successful operation of the tariff, it is this: that while it is materially extending commerce it has not diminished—on the contrary, it has rather tended to raise the price of the articles which have been subjected to its operation (hear, hear). Let me, however, examine these two questions: the famine, and the operation of the tariff; and if, in entering upon this topic, I am compelled to trouble your lordships at much greater length than I desire, and to enter upon some details which may be wearisome, but which are certainly not unimportant to the decision of this great question, I must pray your lordships' indulgence, on the consideration that in entering upon these dry details, I cheerfully and willingly sacrifice all advantage which I might derive in dwelling upon more exciting because more popular topics (hear, hear). Now, with regard to the famine, I must beg to call your lordships' attention so far back as to the period of October and November last. The noble lord has told us that the famine was not the inducing cause of this alteration in the Corn Law being proposed. With all respect for my noble friend, I will venture to say—and I am confident that I shall not be contradicted by any single member of her Majesty's Government—that if it had not been for the apprehension of scarcity in Ireland, and the supposed failure of the crops, your lordships would never have been asked—in the course of this session at all events—to alter or repeal the Corn Law (hear, hear). When the Cabinet was called together in the close of October last, it was for the purpose of considering the state of Ireland. Papers were laid before us, representing the failure of the potato crop, the anxiety that was felt, the reports of certain learned professors—which reports, by-the-by, tended mainly to aggravate the difficulty, and with all respect for them, if their advice had been followed, I believe the evil would have been aggravated (hear, hear). We were called upon to consider what steps should be taken for the relief of Irish distress—and it was for the relief of Irish distress, and it was in consequence of the supposed failure of the potato crop that we were invited to open the ports by Order in Council, and thereby to suspend the operation of the Corn Law (hear, hear). My lords, I was of opinion then, and I continue of opinion now, that at the close of October, in the first place, the real state of the case with regard to the famine, or the apprehension of scarcity in Ireland, was wholly unknown to the Government or to any one else. Not above a third of the potatoes had at that time been examined. Further, I believed then, and I believe now, that there never was a season in the history of Ireland when, so far from there being either famine or scarcity, there was so large a supply in the country of all descriptions of food for the consumption of the people. We were also told that foreign countries were taking steps to prevent the export of their supplies, that crops upon the Continent were short, and that if our supply failed we should have no means of renewing it from abroad. I certainly thought that was an additional reason against taking such a step as opening the ports, because the effect of this step under such circumstances would be to stimulate consumption at a time when, upon the hypothesis, it was desirable rather to discourage it, and that to stimulate consumption would be likely to aggravate the evil of distress, if indeed distress and scarcity existed (loud cries of "hear, hear"). But I entreat your lordships to bear in mind the wide and manifest distinction that there is between scarcity or famine, and great local and individual distress (hear, hear). My lords, I speak of the famine as a vision, an utterly baseless vision—(hear, hear)—which haunted the imagination of the Government. I speak in very different terms, and with very different feelings, of that amount of destitution and distress, into which a large body of the small cottiers in Ireland have been thrown by the partial or total failure of their potato crop; but I conceive, that this is a kind of distress, this is a species of destitution, upon which your repeal of the Corn Law, whatever effect it produces upon the price of wheat, will produce no more effect, and can produce no more, than if you were to pass a law which should reduce the price of pine-apples (hear, hear). The evil to these people is not that corn is dear, or potatoes dear; corn never was dear; the price of corn, in spite of all that took place, never rose to any very high pitch. The state of distress and suffering to which these people are exposed, arises from this, that they are not, as the labourer in England is, dependent for their subsistence upon labour and steady wages, the produce of their gardens serving to eke out their wages with some additional comfort; but that they have invested their labour, invested their all, in the cultivation of some small plot of ground, for which they pay a large rent, and if the produce of that plot fails, they have no labour to look to, their stock of provisions is gone, and having no means of employment they have no prospect of obtaining money wherewith to purchase food to replace the potato crop which has failed. That is the cause of the distress of the smaller cottiers of Ireland (hear, hear). But now I pray you to mark another class, and it is not an unimportant one, a class which, including the families of those who compose it, comprises probably 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 of the people of Ireland, namely, the small farmers and occupiers of land in Ireland. In what state are they placed? Their subsistence is upon oats and potatoes; their potato crop had failed, or a great part of it was diseased; it was unfit for human food. It was not unfit for the food of animals, and many of them very wisely increased the number of their pigs, fattened them upon the diseased potatoes, and realised a very fair profit. But what was the compensation to those farmers? Why, the potato crop had failed, but his oats were superabundant, bringing a very fair price; and he had in his superabundant oats the means of sustaining himself, and, in their price, of recovering in some degree the loss of his potatoes. And by way of relieving that man you propose, when he has lost his potatoes, to inflict a further injury upon him by reducing the price of his oats (hear, hear). Therefore, as applicable to the famine in Ireland—if famine there were—I took the liberty of recording my opinion against the proposed opening of the ports. At the same time, so strongly and so forcibly did I feel the importance of unanimity in the Cabinet,—so strongly was I convinced of the injury done by the breaking up of any Government, that without hesitation, doubting whether a suspension of the Corn Laws, and the opening of the ports would be of avail, or might not even be injurious, I intimated my entire readiness to yield my own opinion, and consent to a suspension of the Corn Law, provided a suspension only was proposed (hear, hear). But when I was told, not exactly in the language of the noble marquis, just now, who talked about a skilful general, and an able diplomatist, making use of the best plea he could find (cheers), but still told that that temporary expediency, that passing emergency of apprehended scarcity in Ireland, was not to lead to a remedy commensurate in duration with the expected evil, but to be made the groundwork of suspending, for the purpose of re-enacting, the Corn Law, I felt that I could not take that course consistently with my own feeling as an honourable man (cheers); and that to make such a proposition to Parliament was leading those who were disposed to support us, into a snare and a delusion (renewed cheers). Your lordships are aware, that the discussions at the close of October terminated by an adjournment of the question; several of my colleagues being of opinion with me, that at all events we had not sufficient information to act upon (hear, hear). When the Cabinet met again in November, I was one of those who cordially concurred in those measures for the relief of Irish distress adopted by the Government; the chief of those measures consisting in the appointment of a commission consisting of the heads of those departments of the Government who would have the best opportunity of furnishing the population in case of distress with employment as the means of subsistence, of communicating with the lords lieutenant of counties, establishing local committees in every district, compelling the landlords of Ireland to know the real state of the population and the provision which ought to be made for them, rendering assistance and co-operation through the medium of the commissariat, even entering upon the very delicate task of regulating the markets which settle the transmission of food from one part of the country to the other, to meet the consequences of extravagant speculation, giving employment where local funds were insufficient, and laying in a certain portion of provisions, in order to feed the destitute in the last extremity, when employment should not be found. I considered these measures applicable strictly to the case of Ireland. I considered that the abrogation of the Corn Law, unjustifiable in itself, could not be warranted upon that ground, and far from doing good would assuredly injure the people of Ireland (hear, hear). The question when the Cabinet met again was not different, but I confess it was with some surprise and no little disappointment that when the question was put to the Cabinet, not of an immediate issue of an order in council, but of an early summoning of Parliament for the purpose of proposing a gradual abrogation of the Corn Law, I found myself alone in my opposition. I felt deeply and painfully the prospect of separation from colleagues I esteemed. I felt most painfully the awful weight of responsibility which I found was about to devolve singly upon myself. I am not ashamed to say that I asked for 48 hours to enable me to decide. My lords, it was no sacrifice to me to abandon office; on the contrary, I had to examine most rigidly in my own mind whether I were unduly influenced to escape from the responsibilities and labours of public life; I tried to school myself into the belief that, under certain circumstances, the interests of the country might require even a sacrifice of personal and public character. My lords, I could not bring myself to so humiliating a conclusion (cheers), and most reluctantly, but without difficulty or doubt, supported as I was by one of my colleagues, whom I am not at liberty to name, (but whom, if I could name, I am quite sure his position and his character would satisfy all your lordships, that in his subsequently rejoining the Government he could be actuated by none but the most honourable motives,) I was compelled to tender the resignation of my office. Upon that the Government of Sir R. Peel was broken up. Your lordships are all aware of the circumstances which followed. I owe an apology for now detaining you upon them (hear, hear). Then we are called upon to abandon the Corn Law of 1842. And why? In what respect has it deceived your expectations? How has it falsified your prophecies? Your prophecies have been realized to a wonderful degree of accuracy (hear, hear). In what respect has it failed? The object of this and of every Corn Law, I take to be, to place this country in a state of virtual independence of foreign countries for its supply of food. I know that object may be scouted by some of the very enlightened politicians of the present day (a laugh); but it was not thought unworthy the consideration of great men, not long passed away (hear, hear). Your lordships will forgive me for referring to one passage in a letter of Mr. Huskisson's, which places this question in a very clear and forcible point of view; it was written immediately at the close of the war, when the consequence of our dependence upon foreign supplies, before 1815, had not been yet forgotten. (The noble lord here read the passage in which Mr. Huskisson urged the danger of leaving the food of the people dependent on foreign supply, even in peace, since the season when we might want a large import would frequently happen to be a bad harvest also with the foreign exporting country, which then would stop its export, and drive us, always partly dependent on it, to a state of famine in the year of scarcity. We had no security against frequent scarcity approaching to starvation, but in our country becoming habitually independent of foreign supply. Let the bread we eat be the produce of corn grown among ourselves, and the cheaper it was, so much the better. It was cheap then, owing to its sufficiency; but to ensure the continuance of that sufficiency and cheapness, our own growers must have that protection against foreign imports which produced these blessings. Cheapness produced by foreign import was the sure forerunner of scarcity.) You aim, then, by a Corn Law, at independence of foreign supply, accompanied and produced by such an encouragement to your home-grower, as shall guarantee him up to a certain point against foreign competition, and shall, beyond that point, protect the consumer against exorbitant and extravagantly high prices, protecting all parties against that which is most injurious to all—rapid and sudden fluctuations. Now, I say, that beyond any law which has ever been in force in this or any other country, this law of 1842 has accomplished these its great and main objects (hear, hear). First, with regard to the provision of a home supply, I find that from 1826 down to the present time (and I take a series of years, because any one year might be affected by that particular season), in the course of these last 20 years we have imported 21,432,000 quarters of wheat. The yearly average for the last 20 years amounts to 1,021,000 quarters; for the last three years, to 741,000 quarters; and in the course of the last year it was 308,000 quarters. Has this result, I would ask, been produced by any increased price of wheat at home? A great number of fallacies have been made use of, and statements attributed to us, who defend this Corn Law, which we never uttered. We are constantly told that the intention of this Corn Law was to guarantee to the farmer the price of 55s. a quarter. The intention of the Corn Law was no such thing. My right hon. friend, in introducing the measure, stated that if, by legislation, he could fix the average price of corn, he would fix it from 54s. to 58s. The object of the Corn Law, therefore, is this, that when the price is above 58s. the consumer may be protected by a large influx of foreign corn; and that when the price is below 5s., the producer may be protected against any other competition than that which he can engage with upon equal terms—namely, competition with those who are exposed to the same vicissitudes, and who have the same advantages and disadvantages. What has been the result of the Corn Law as far as the consumer is concerned? I find that the average price of wheat for the last 20 years has been 57s. 4d. a quarter, whilst the average price for the last three years, since the Corn Law passed, has only been 50s. 9d., and the price last year, which we have been told was a period of great scarcity, was 50s. 10d. My right hon. friend stated his wish to keep the price between 54s. and 58s., and since the passing of the bill the average price has not risen above 50s. 9d. or 50s. 10d. But a return last before the House of Commons gives a more accurate test of the operation of the sliding scale, and of the manner in which it acts to check the tendency to a rise of price whenever that tendency is exhibited. The paper I allude to is a return of the weekly price of corn in every week from March, 1844, to March, 1846; and with respect to those 104 weeks, the result was that the price has been between 54s. and 58s. in no less than 43 of those weeks; the price has been below 54s. in 53 other weeks; the price has been above 58s. in seven weeks only, and the price has never risen in any one week above 50s. (hear, hear). That is precisely the point where we desire to bring competition to bear, and the result has been, that above that price there has been a large proportional increase in the importation of foreign corn. This is conclusive that the present law acts in the direction and manner in which it was anticipated to act (hear). Another great and important point respects the fluctuation in the price of corn. Since this Corn Law passed, the fluctuation of price which has taken place between 1844 and 1846 is only from 58s. 4d. down to 45s. 2d. The whole difference between the highest week and the lowest week in those two years, is not a difference of 30 per cent. The greatest weekly fluctuation in the price, between any one week and the succeeding, is 1s. 6d., and the greatest fluctuation in any period for the whole four weeks of the month is a fluctuation of 4s. and no more (hear, hear). When this Corn Bill was introduced in 1842, I recollect it being put forward as a matter of boast, that the Corn Laws as they then stood had produced only a fluctuation of 19 per cent. in any one year, while the existing Corn Law has produced no more than a fluctuation of 30 per cent. in two years. But let us look to the fluctuation of price in other countries, from the month of December, 1844, to December, 1845. Observe, that in two years the total amount of our fluctuation has been 30 per cent., while in that one year the fluctuation at Dantzic was 56 per cent.; at Hamburg, 86; at Rostock, 78; at Stettin, 84; at Odessa, 50; and at Alexandria, 54 (hear, hear). Perhaps you may tell me, that this is the effect of our own sliding scale and of our Corn Law operating upon prices abroad. Then I will refer you to America. In 1842 my right hon. friend the Secretary for the Colonies moved for a return of the maximum fluctuation of prices in the markets of America, from 1834 to 1840, and according to that the greatest fluctuation in New York was 70 per cent.; in Philadelphia, 76; in Portsmouth, 72; and in New Norfolk, 62. The account of these fluctuations has been carried down to the present time, and between the years 1841 and 1846 (whilst our fluctuation never exceeded 30 per cent. between 1844 and 1845, and whilst on the market of Montreal, which ought, if the argument of the opponents of the Corn Laws is just, to have been affected by them, the fluctuation did not exceed 17 per cent. on the price of last year), in New York the fluctuation was 51 per cent.; in Philadelphia, 50; in Richmond, 76; and in Baltimore, 90. As far then as the experience of three years has gone, no law in this or any other country has produced so great a steadiness of price with cheapness as the law of 1842, which your lordships are now called on to abandon (hear, hear). If your lordships wish to refer to a period of the greatest fluctuation, refer to the period between 1792 and 1805, a period when there was the greatest dependence on the foreigner, and it appears from a pamphlet of Mr. Malthus, that during that period there were great fluctuations of price, corn having risen in that time from 42s. a quarter to nearly triple, namely, 118s., and having again fallen to 56s. If it were necessary to prolong the discussion on this point, I would ask your lordships to look to the fluctuations in other articles. You are told that the fluctuations in the price of corn are attributable to the sliding scale. Look to the fluctuations in the price of potatoes. There is no sliding scale as respects them; but there is free trade. They may be imported from anywhere, and they pay no duty. Yet I know that the price of potatoes varies from 100 to 150 per cent. in the course of a single year (hear, hear). Then, again, look at the price of upland cotton. No sliding scale affects it, yet scarcely any fluctuations could compare with the fluctuation in the price of upland cotton. I trust that I shall be excused for adverting to another point of importance, namely, the supply which our Corn Laws procure for us, and keep on hand to meet possible emergencies. I will recall to your lordships' recollection what was the state of the different countries of Europe at the commencement of the present year. There existed a great apprehension of scarcity among all, and measures were taken for their own protection and security, and that I may not be supposed to misrepresent in the slightest degree the facts of the case, I will read from a statement made by my right hon. friend the First Lord of the Treasury. [The noble lord here read an extract from a speech delivered by Sir R. Peel, in which he stated that the Belgian government had prohibited the exportation of articles of consumption until next harvest, on account of anticipated scarcity; that the same precaution had been adopted by Egypt, Turkey, and Sweden, &c.] This shows that the moment a pressure takes place measures are taken by these parties to stop the exportation of food, and deprive us of the opportunity of obtaining it from them. We were also told to stop the export and encourage the import—to take off the duty and prohibit distillery. We took none of those steps. We trusted to the operation—the steady, quiet, certain operation of our existing Corn Law. I believe that the best test of scarcity is to be found not in the report of learned professors (hear, and a laugh); but that there is a much better barometer as to that point, and that is the price of food in the market (cheers). The self-acting operation of the Corn Law did not come into effect, and because it did not, its authors said that it was a sliding scale that would not slide (hear, hear). Of course it would not, and for this good reason—because there was not a deficiency in the country to increase the price (cheers). By relying on the operation of the Corn Laws what was the result? What was the amount of corn in bond at the close of the year 1845, to meet the exigencies of our demand? I am not talking of the amount in bond now which has most unfortunately accumulated in consequence of the introduction of this measure; and which may now come in with a ruinous effect on the market (hear, hear). I am speaking of the amount which your Corn Laws provided in bond at a time of universal scarcity. The average quantity in bond in December for the last 20 years has been 445,000 quarters; and the highest amount in bond in December in any previous year was 899,000 quarters. But in December last, in face of the difficulties in Europe, in face of the established prohibition of export, you had in bond in waiting for an exigency that did not come, 1,103,000 quarters (cheers). Will any man then tell me that the Corn Law has failed in the essential points of keeping us, in the main, independent of foreign supply, in securing cheapness and steadiness of price, and in providing for us an abundant foreign supply in case we should require to make up any deficiency in this country (hear)? Will any man seriously contend that this great advantage resulting from the Corn Law has been purchased by the sacrifice of commercial interests? Is there any man who does not know the enormous and unparalleled strides which this country has made in commercial and manufacturing industry, I do not say on account of, but I will say notwithstanding, the operation of the Corn Laws? Since 1827, the exports of this country have increased from 36,000,000*l.* in value to 58,500,000*l.*; and in the course of those years the import of cotton alone had increased from 17,000,000*l.* to 721,000,000*l.* In the course of the period since 1814, while the value of landed property, as shown by the property-tax paid in respect to schedule A, has increased from 39,300,000*l.* to 45,750,000*l.*, being an increase of about 16 per cent., the increase on schedule B, showing the profits of trade, manufactures, and professions, has increased from 35,800,000*l.* in 1814, to 64,344,000*l.* in 1842, being an increase of no less than 84 per cent., against 16 per cent. increase in the value of land (hear, hear). Have, then, these Corn Laws been inconsistent with manufacturing prosperity? and why are we now invited to enter upon this great experiment (hear, hear). It is for the purpose, I suppose, of still further expanding the manufacturing activity of the country. I belong to a manufacturing county, and no man is less inclined than myself to depreciate the great advantages derived from the manufactures of this country, the great increase they have caused in the wealth of the nation, and in many cases the addition they have given to the comfort of the labouring classes. But this system of manufacturing activity is not without its attendant drawbacks, and requires to be steadily and carefully watched rather than to be unduly pampered and fostered. Manufacturing industry is subject to constant, great, and rapid fluctuations. Its powers of production are always overtaking the powers of consumption. A period of prosperity is invariably followed by the glutting of every market in the world, and by a corresponding period of adversity. Do nothing, for God's sake, to check the prosperity of manufactures, but do not be led by unwise legislation to promote and pamper an unwholesome increase, which, when the bubble bursts, involves all in serious evils (hear, hear). But if it is certain that the increase and extension of manufactures are desirable, it is not clear to my mind that the repeal of the Corn Laws would have the effect of increasing manufacturing industry. If there be no great reduction in the price of corn in consequence of this measure, it needs no demonstration to show that there will be no largely increased consumption of corn; and if there should be no great increase in the consumption of corn the consequence is, that there will be a transfer to a certain extent of the consumers and customers in this country to the foreign grower, and that would be all. If the Government are to be believed, there is to be no great fall in the price of corn; as in like manner they say that the new tariff has increased the prices of articles. Of all the paradoxes which were ever palmed on the credulity of mankind, and passed under the authority of great names for sovereign and supreme wisdom, the boldest and most laughable is that increased competition tends to raise the prices of articles (hear, hear). Reason and facts are both against it. True, the reduction of the duty of a halfpenny on wool in the course of last year taking place at a thriving period of manufactures did not produce the effect of checking the consumption, but what happened in 1825, when Mr. Huskisson made a more considerable reduction of the duty on wool? From 1819 to 1824 the average price of wool was 1s. 4d. per pound, and for five years after the reduction of the duty the price was 10d. per lb., the depreciation being equivalent to the reduction of the duty. With respect to timber, it is true that Baltic timber has not fallen to the full extent of the reduction of the duty; but what has become the price of the article in this country with which it competes? What is the effect of the tariff on British timber in this country? I hold in my hand a return with respect to the price of timber, which shows that the mean price for 50 cubic feet of timber for the three years preceding the operation of the tariff was 103s., and since the operation of the tariff the price was 91s. 8d., and in the course of last year the price fell to 86s. 8d. I would ask the noble lord connected with the Woods and Forests whether, having intended a sale of bark and timber out of the Forest of Dean, he was not obliged to withdraw those articles from the sale in consequence of the depreciation of price?

Lord CANNING stated that they were sold, and not withdrawn (cheers from the Ministerial and Opposition benches).

Lord STANLEY continued: I will not enter into the question about the rise in price on butcher's meat; which arose from the diminished supply afforded to the markets as compared with the supply of last year. I contend that, under this proposed abrogation of law, there will be a large reduction in the price of corn. But, before I leave the question of the tariff, I may be permitted to refer for a moment to the effect the tariff has had upon British shipping. Great stress has been laid on this point. Prices were to fall, but the tariff was to have the effect of immensely increasing our commercial activity in the employment of British shipping. A great deal has been said of the increase in the amount of our shipping employed between 1842 and 1845. But, my lords, how does this case stand? Why, unfortunately for the tariff—to which I was a consenting party, because I thought it would have a tendency to settle prices when there was a tendency to extravagant prices; and because I thought it would tend, moreover, to expose the home grower to such an amount of competition, and not more, as he could fairly and safely meet (hear, hear). The principle of the tariff was protection, and not prohibition (hear, hear). The principle of the tariff was competition; but my notion of competition is this—that you must have the competing parties placed upon an equality to start from, and that unless you have this equality to start from, and that unless you have this equality of circumstances in the competing parties, your principle of Free Trade may turn out to be the most rank and entire monopoly (hear, hear). Now what has been the increase of British shipping employed under the new tariff. The tonnage of vessels belonging to different ports of the British empire in 1842, was 3,619,000 tons; in 1844, it was 3,636,000 tons; showing, in two years, an increase of 17,000 tons. Now, since 1833 there has been a progressive annual increase in the amount of your shipping tonnage, each year, with one exception, surpassing the year preceding. The total amount of that increase has been 985,000 tons, and the average biennial increase 197,000 tons. But the increase in the two years since the adoption of the tariff has been 17,000. Is that all (hear, hear)? Now I will show you a branch of the shipping trade of this country in which there has been a large increase, and which compensates for the very large deficiency which would otherwise have been presented in the last two or three years—a branch certainly for which the tariff can take no credit, and which depends and has depended upon the prosperity of agriculture (hear, hear), and the agricultural improvement encouraged by the system of protection. I refer to the number of ships engaged in the guano trade in the years 1843 and 1845. You may smile, and think this an inconsiderable branch of trade; but what has been the increase in the tonnage and number of ships employed in it? That trade commenced in 1841. In 1843, the tonnage of British ships engaged in the guano trade was 4056 tons, and it afforded employment to 202 seamen. In 1845, British shipping of the tonnage of 219,000 tons, and 11,434 British seamen were engaged in the trade (hear, hear). There was, therefore, an increase of above 200,000 tons of shipping in the guano trade alone, to set against an increase in our whole commercial marine of 17,000 tons since the tariff was adopted (hear, hear). Now I contend that the fall in the price of corn, under the proposed law, would not be equal to the reduction of the duty. I do not think it is very difficult to estimate at what price we may expect to have a large quantity of foreign wheat brought into this country under the bill now before us. I do not found my calculation on the prices at Dantzic or Riga, or elsewhere. We are now called upon to legislate on the experience of the tariff. I find that, at a price of 55s., we had, as was expected, a very large importation of foreign corn. Now, at 55s., the duty is 15s. We had then a large importation of corn, realising to the importer something below 40s. a quarter. We may, therefore, fairly anticipate that, when the duty is taken off, we shall have a large importation of foreign corn at 40s. inundating our markets, and making 40s. a quarter pretty nearly the maximum price you can ever expect to realise (hear). I fear, my lords, I am troubling you at too great length (cheers). I am ashamed to do so; but this is a great question (renewed cheers). I feel that I am arguing it very imperfectly and feebly, but I trust your lordships will bear with me for a few moments (cheers). I this morning received a letter from a gentleman, who describes himself to be the head of the oldest firm engaged in the corn trade in Liverpool. He writes to inform me that he now holds in bond two cargoes of fair red wheat, imported last year from a port on the Danube. It cost him 14s. per qr., free on board, the freight to Liverpool being 9s. 6d. per qr. [The noble lord proceeded to read an extract from the letter, the writer of which expressed his "deliberate opinion that if the measure now before your lordships is suffered to become law, we shall, at the expiration of three years, be annually in the receipt of 5,000,000 qrs. of foreign wheat, provided the seasons be ordinarily favourable," and he added, that the prices would admit of the sale of this wheat at from 36s. to 40s., per qr., the duty in England being 1s. per qr.] In 1844 and 1845 there were imported above 120,000 quarters of wheat, when the price was permanently at 45s. and the duty 20s., and this corn realised to the importers from 25s. to 26s. a quarter. But I am not absurd enough to suppose that if the duty were taken off, and parties could import and sell corn at from 25s. to 26s., they really would do so (hear, hear). There are many districts of country on the Continent, larger, perhaps, than many of your lordships imagine, which might be devoted to the growth of corn. Look for example at the plains of Hungary. There you have a very considerable district, admirably qualified for the growth of wheat; and there can be no doubt that the application of skill and capital to the improved cultivation of that land, would give to the cultivator a far greater amount of produce from the present area than it now yields. Your cultivated and ill-treated farmers can produce about 28 bushels to the acre; in hardly any other country is the produce more than 14 bushels to the acre (hear, hear). A large profit is derived by the importers from these countries. This tends to produce the application of capital to the improvement of the soil. The continued application of capital and skill enables the cultivator to produce his corn much more cheaply, and he will apply his capital to increase and facilitate the means of shipment. My objections to this measure, therefore, are not lessened but rather aggravated by the fact, that you will not feel the injury it entails, all at once, but that, gradually and progressively, the importation of a larger and larger amount of foreign supply will be encouraged by your legislation, and will by degrees drive out of cultivation a larger and larger amount of corn land in this country (hear, hear). But it is said, that when the price of corn falls the manufacturers will obtain a great outlet for their goods, and will be able to sell them at a much cheaper rate. But how are they to sell them more cheaply than at present? How is this cheapness to be effected? If it is to be effected at all, it will be effected by a reduction of wages (loud cries of "hear"). I thought it was the favourite doctrine of the Anti-Corn-Law League—I know it is a view which has been taken by some members of her Majesty's Government, that the price of corn has nothing to do with the amount of wages. As I have said, it is anticipated by the repeal of the present Corn Law that the manufacturers will be able to produce their goods more cheaply. I do not exactly understand how they can do this without paying their labourers lower wages (hear). Now I do not mean to say that either in the manufacturing or the agricultural districts the rate of wages exactly or regularly follows the price of corn; but certainly it does not follow all the fluctuations in the price of corn. I say that wages, like everything else, are regulated by the proportion between the demand and supply. In proportion to the demand for labour, the working classes were ready to enter into competition for that labour, which would afford them the necessities and comforts of life. But the amount of the necessities and comforts of life must be ultimately measured by money; and consequently, the competition remaining the same, if a lower amount of money would procure the same amount of the necessities and comforts of life, the price of labour must fall in proportion as the price of corn falls. I do not say, however, that it will follow all the fluctuations of the price of corn. This is a most important point. It is of vast importance to the labouring population that the price of corn should be steady, be it high or be it

low. The labourer, where prices are low, has not the prudence or foresight to economise his earnings, and when the pendulum swings the other way he is too often plunged into a state of distress. If, however, the labourer's wages are to be reduced, he ought, I think, to have fairly stated the balance of advantages and disadvantages to which he is about to be exposed under this system. Take the case of a man with a wife and family of three children in the manufacturing districts. I will make a large allowance, and suppose that they consume five quarters of wheat in the course of a year. I will assume that there is a permanent fall in the price of wheat. A diminution of 1s. per week from the wages of any member of that family (and you can hardly suppose that any diminution would be less than that) more than counterbalances all the advantages he and his family could derive from a reduction of 50s. in the price of the five quarters of corn they consume (hear, hear). We are led to believe that Russia, Prussia, and the United States do not take our manufactures because we refuse to receive their corn in exchange. There never was argument less founded on fact than that. The fact is, with regard to all those countries, that at the present moment our imports from them largely preponderate over our exports to them, and the duties we impose upon their goods—aye, even upon corn and timber, are far lower than the average amount of duties which all those countries charge upon the principal articles of our manufacture which we export to them. Take the case of our trade with the United States. You may, perhaps, be surprised to learn that the value of the cotton alone which we take from the United States, in the course of a single year, far exceeds the value of all the goods put together which we export to the United States in the same period. For a period of five years the average value of our imports to the United States has been 5,700,000*l.* a year. For a period of 18 years it has averaged about 7,000,000*l.* a year. This is indeed a stationary trade. I may refer on this point to an authority which would not be disputed, that of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and I beg those noble lords, who advocate a system of reciprocity (a laugh, and cries of "hear, hear"), and who anticipate those great advantages which we are to derive from taking a larger quantity of the produce of the United States, of Russia, and of Prussia, to bear with me while I quote from this report from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to his Government, the fact that during the last six years the average value of the imports into the United States from British possessions had been 253,000,000 of dollars. The value of the exports from the United States to this country and to British possessions during the same period had been 354,000,000 of dollars, leaving a balance of 101,000,000 of dollars in favour of the United States. The noble lord then proceeded to read the report to which he referred. It stated that the imports and exports were entered at their nominal value merely, but that about 25 per cent. must be added to make up their real value. It also stated that there had been a balance upon the imports and exports in favour of the United States, during the last six years, with the exception of 1830, for the last nine years. It added, that any modification made in the Corn Law of Great Britain, permitting the introduction into England of American bread stuffs on reasonable terms, would tend materially to increase the export trade of the United States, and to afford an additional outlet for their produce. The writer of this report then goes on to expatiate on the unfriendly relations and correspondence subsisting between the two powers (a laugh). "He refers to the indissoluble links in which we are bound by commercial advantages, and he seems ready to congratulate us that the little cloud in the west seemed to have passed away (a laugh)." But the secretary goes on to say that every improvement effected in their manufacturing establishments serves to afford a better supply for the home demand, and to obviate the necessities of foreign importations (hear, hear). This, then, is to be the result of a liberal measure for allowing the importation of bread stuffs from the United States. If you flatter yourselves that by such a measure you will gain any advantage for your manufacturers, undeceive yourselves; the Secretary to the Treasury of the United States tells you that they will soon be able to dispense with your assistance, and that they will not require your manufactures. Then with regard to Russia, Mr. McGregor states, that in 1838, the total exports of that empire were valued at 11,096,000*l.*, of which 6,977,000*l.* were imported to Great Britain. The average value of the exports from Great Britain to Russia is 1,633,000*l.*, leaving a balance of 5,000,000*l.* in favour of Russia. The declared value of our imports from Prussia is 505,000*l.*, and the estimated value of our exports was 31,000*l.* You talk about a duty of 25, 30, or 50 per cent. upon timber as an extravagant and prohibitory duty. By the United States tariff the duty upon our woollens and silks is 40 per cent., upon our cotton, ale, and porter, 50 per cent.; upon coals 60 per cent., and upon paper 75 per cent.; and their duties upon various other articles of our manufacture, which are principally articles of export, range from 45 to 150 per cent., and upon glass amount to 245 per cent. But the tariffs of Russia and Prussia are equally restrictive. Mr. McGregor says that Russia prohibits the importation of every material which can be drawn by the labour of her serfs from her mines and forests, and indeed of every manufactured article. Those articles of your manufacture, the importation of which is not prohibited by Russia, are subjected to an average duty of 65 per cent., ranging upon some articles, for instance glass, to 900 per cent. Prussia imposes a duty varying from 50 to 130 per cent. And yet the argument is boldly put forward, that our protective system, which imposes a duty of about 25 per cent. upon the importation of corn, prevents us from receiving the wheat of those countries which levy a duty of 60, 70, or 100 per cent. upon our manufactures. In 1839, Dr. Bowring, who was employed by the then Secretary of State in prosecuting some inquiries on this subject, held out expectations that the head of the customs' department in Russia would entertain a proposal for a general reduction upon our cottons, glass, and woollens, provided that we established a fixed duty upon wheat, instead of the fluctuating scale. But Dr. Bowring then said that he did not find any of the authorities anticipating the introduction of their corn into England duty free. Now what had been the effect of the reductions we have already made in the duty on timber with regard to our exports of cotton to Russia? Since the alteration in our tariff our imports of timber had increased from 351,000 loads to 642,000 loads. In 1843, we exported to Russia 2,200,000 yards of cotton; now we exported only 2,000,000. We then exported 1,200,000 yards of printed cottons; now we export only 900,000 yards. Your imports of timber have nearly doubled, but your exports to these people, who deluded Dr. Bowring, have fallen off nearly in the same proportion. I suppose, at all events, that your shipping trade has improved. I have been told that British merchants will not engage in the corn trade because it is speculative. Speculation is the basis of all trade. Take off what duties you please, the corn trade must be eminently speculative, because it is dependent upon the seasons and the probable demand in this country. But it is said our merchants are too wise to engage in these speculations (hear). It is said they are unsuited to the character of the British nation. It is said that hazardous speculations, leading possibly to greater risk, and possibly to great gain, are so adverse to the character of the people of this country (loud laughter) that it is not likely any great number of persons would engage in them. And this is said of the year 1846! Well, but the timber trade is not a speculative trade. We have opened that trade. Our shipping, of course, have entered largely into that trade. Listen to a fact which is of great importance. In 1839 the Baltic trade employed 612 British ships against 566 foreign ships. In 1845 it employed 609 British ships against 1845 foreigners (hear, hear). In 1839 there were 115,000 tons British employed against a nearly equal amount of foreign tonnage; in 1845 there were only 133,000 tons British against 378,000 tons foreign (hear, hear). In 1839 there were 6016 British seamen employed, against 6300 foreign seamen; in 1845 there were 5375 British seamen employed against 17,169 foreigners (cheers). I admit that you might produce a large increase in your manufactures for a time under a system of Free Trade. It is true you might puff up your manufactures with a brief but extraordinary prosperity. But when that fails, as it will fail—when the day of difficulty and distress comes—when war intervenes—I think my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would feel much more easy, in the event of a war with the United States, if, instead of drawing four-fifths of our cotton from the United States, we drew four-fifths of it from our own territories—but, when war comes, these markets will be closed against you. You will have destroyed the home market, and when you have destroyed the home market, when the period of depression has arrived, the bitter sufferings of the manufacturers will cause a bitter feeling of reaction against those who are now deluding their unhappy dupes with the prospect of cheap wages and of cheap bread (cheers). Now, my lords, I have spoken of the home market. Don't let your lordships, and don't let the country, undervalue the importance of the home market. If you were to believe the cotton manufacturers—if you were to believe what has been put forward in another place—you would believe that two-thirds of the whole quantity of cotton goods is exported, and that the consumption of cotton goods among the population of this country only amounts to 4s. per head. I doubt the accuracy of that statement, when I find that in 1840 the consumption of the West Indies was, not 4s. per head, but 1*l.* 6s. per head of the population (hear, hear). I cannot believe, that when the West Indies consume 1*l.* 6s. per head of your cotton goods, the population of this country consume only 4s. per head. Now, I don't hesitate to state my conviction that the home market of this country is to the foreign as 40 to 17. In the year 1820 there were exported 248,000 yards of cotton made up into cotton goods. In the year 1844 there was an increase of fourfold in their total amount, while there was only an increase of one-fourth in their total value. In the year 1828 Mr. Huskisson estimated the value of cotton goods consumed in England at 32,000,000*l.* sterling, and at present 40,000,000*l.* is the lowest estimate I can form of the value of the cotton goods worked up for consumption in this country. If you take cotton, wool, silk, coals, culm, and other articles, the value of the exports of these amounts to 48,000,000*l.*, while the total amount produced is 250,000,000*l.* (hear, hear), leaving 200,000,000*l.* out of 250,000,000*l.* for home consumption. That, my lords, is the market which you are about to endanger; that is the market you are about to sacrifice in your blind zeal for the importation of foreign corn. But I am told by the manufacturers, that if we reduce the price of corn, that will be followed by an increase in the consumption. That, my lords, is not so clear, but "cheap" and "dear" are relative terms, and not absolute terms. Wheat is cheaper in Ireland than it is in England—it is cheaper in Prussia than it is in England—but from the ability of the consumer in this country it is virtually cheaper, because he has the money to pay for it, and it is therefore within his reach (hear, hear). But, my lords, it does not follow, because there is an increase in the amount of corn, that there will be an increased ability on the part of the consumer, or that the consumer will be able to command the same quantity as now. The question arises, on whom will this loss fall? I saw lately an article in a French newspaper on the probable effects of abolishing the Corn Laws in this country, in which the writer said, that although a quarter of our income would be taken away, yet that we should have some of the sweets of life left (a laugh). I shall not be satisfied with such an arrangement. Something has been said elsewhere (which I know has been misapprehended) about the difficulties of administering the government of this country—of reconciling the government of a limited monarchy, of a proud aristocracy, with a reformed House of Commons. I put by the error in the interpretation of that, and I admit the difficulties. I go further, and I admit that you ought not to legislate for a class. I admit that we ought not to legislate for a class, if that legislation is against the interests of the people at large. But, my lords, I tell you that, if you make an alteration in the social relation of the different classes in this country—if you attempt to lower any one class at the expense of another—then that you will inflict not a private injury, but a public injury to society. And, whatever the difficulties may be of reconciling the action of our mixed constitution—of keeping the balance even between a proud aristocracy and a reformed House of Commons—depend upon it those difficulties will not be less if, instead of a proud aristocracy, you substitute a pauper aristocracy (cheers). If you do, you will break down the firmest breakwater and the strongest bulwark between the proud aristocracy and the democracy which is represented in the reformed House of Commons. I do not speak exclusively of those who are generally understood as the aristocracy—not even mainly of the body which I am now addressing. I speak, my lords, of the great body of the landed aristocracy of the country, not ennobled by rank, and many of them undistinguished by great wealth. But, my lords, they and their ancestors before them have been the centres of their respective localities; they conduct the business of their respective counties; they influence the opinions and feelings of their respective neighbourhoods; they exercise a modest and decent hospitality; they preside over tenantry who possess hereditary claims to their respect and affection. My lords, these are the true aristocracy of the country (cheers). Reduce these men in the scale of society, and you will inflict an irretrievable and irreparable injury on this country. God forbid I should say that our successful manufacturers and our princely merchants should not take their place among our aristocracy; such an infusion adds vigour and strength to that class. But if you sweep away at once an aristocracy with so many members as in history, and substitute a new body of capitalists, who shall come among an unattached tenantry, with no connection connected with their name to exercise a moral influence, you will suffer an irretrievable loss. I am satisfied that never was there so great a delusion as that the loss caused by this measure will fall solely upon the aristocracy. A fall of 10s. per quarter on wheat is 40s. per acre on wheat land, and if that is accompanied by a corresponding reduction in the price of other articles, it will eat up all the rent of the land. But the fact is, the loss will fall—and they know it will fall on them, as they showed by their meeting the other day—the loss will fall mainly on the tenant-farmers (cheers). And the first step they take will be to suspend improvement, to discharge their labourers, to reduce wages, and to force their population into the manufacturing districts, there to enter into hopeless competition with the population of those districts. They will carry their own wretchedness and misery into the manufacturing towns, and will press down the wages as well of the manufacturing districts as the agricultural (cheers). I will assume the case of a landlord who is entirely unencumbered, and free from debt. I don't know whether there are any such cases (a laugh), but I will assume there is. He discharges a certain portion of his establishment, and turns upon the labour-market those whom his fortune had formerly enabled him to employ. For it cannot be laid, I think, to the charge of the landed proprietors of this country, as a class, that they are given to accumulating and hoarding wealth. So far from that, I think they will be found to spend it at least as fast as they get it (a laugh). We are told how their losses are to be made up to them, if they will only adopt the real principles of Free Trade. They are to discharge their useless and unprofitable hands; they are to employ no labourers beyond what are absolutely required to make a profit to themselves. They are to have no consideration for tenant farmers who have been on their estates for 50 years. They are told it is more profitable to have one large farm than several small ones; so they must pull down the houses of their present tenants and turn them adrift. Their tenants have no capital, they must let them go. There are 600,000 tenant farmers in the country under 200*l.* a year—at least, there were in 1814. Turn them adrift, bring their successors from a distance—bring them from the Anti-Corn-Law League (hear)—encourage them to expend their capital, and then you will be able to recover from all the effects of the injury you have sustained from a reduction in the price of corn. Perhaps you might, but the law imposes the burden upon you of maintaining all the poor of the manufacturing districts as well as your own. I have too good an opinion of the landlords to believe that they will take this advice. They will go on giving employment to the poor on their estates, for they have to deal not with stocks and stones, but with men having the same affections and attachments as themselves, and I won't believe that they will adopt the cold, calculating, and selfish doctrines of political economy and Free Trade (cheers). But if you adopt these doctrines in England—if you venture to recommend them in England—will you dare also to put them in execution in Ireland? In Ireland the bulk of the population are small farmers—hardly what we should call farmers in England; the majority of the holdings are from 1 to 15 acres. They have no capital, and very little skill. I admit they exhaust the land; they don't pay half the rent a larger farmer could. Carry your political economy into effect there, and see what would be the result. I think I have heard it advanced that the clearance system is at the root of half the evils of Ireland. But Free Trade requires it, and you must make more money. Turn them out, and when the existing generation are starved off, you may, perhaps, see your system in successful operation. My lords, he must be a bold minister who would advise such an experiment to be made, but he must be a bold as well as a hard man who would act upon it (cheers). And then to tell me that this measure has been brought in for the relief of Ireland (cheers)! England is an importing country; it may be for her benefit, but I doubt whether it is in the long run. But Ireland is an agricultural country—an exporting, and not an importing country—and if you reduce her exports by 1,500,000*l.* or 2,000,000*l.*, you do her the greatest injury. Lastly, my lords, and you will be glad to hear that, I will call your attention to one branch of the question, so important that it cannot be overlooked, and which, from the situation I lately held, I am entitled to bring under the notice of your lordships (cheers). That subject, my lords, is the effect that will be produced by the repeal of the Corn Laws and by Free Trade upon the colonies of this country. You have seen in your foreign trade how large is the amount of foreign shipping, and how small the amount of British shipping. I now call your attention to the fact that, by a return to the House of Commons, it appears that in the year 1845 there were 1,273,305 tons of British shipping entered inwards from the colonies, and not one ton foreign; while outwards there were 1,263,000 tons of British and 372,000 foreign. The colonial trade is, therefore, almost exclusively carried on by British shipping; it employs British seamen; and gives the profits of the trade on both sides to British subjects exclusively. In 1844 our exports to the colonies amounted to 14,270,000*l.* Destroy the principle of protection, and I tell you you destroy the whole basis on which your colonies rest (cheers). If you do not know the value of your colonies, Napoleon Buonaparte knew it well (hear, hear). It is by the colonial principle you have extended your arms—I don't mean your military arms, but your commercial arms,—into every quarter of the globe. It is to your colonial system you owe it that there is no part of the world where your flag is not planted—that there is no quarter of the globe in which the English language is not heard—that there is no zone in which British subjects do not recognise the sovereignty of Britain. You are to say to them in their distant homes that they are no longer to be identified with your commercial interests—that they shall not share your glories, or sympathise with you in your advances—that they shall not bear your burdens—and that they shall no longer feel that they are within the arms of your vast empire, and members of your imperial Zollverein (cheers). I think it was Mr. Cobden who said it was a system of mutual robbery. I admit that it is a mutual system, where each sacrifices something peculiar to himself for the purpose of obtaining an advantage derived from the other. It is a mutual system where each sacrifices something of his trade for the purpose of obtaining reciprocity; and I am not sure but that you will find in the end that that desire of reciprocity and of profit on both sides—that security against foreign interference, against foreign hostility, and against foreign caprice, is like selling in the cheapest market and buying in the dearest, although that difference may not be precisely explained in a money value; but the additional price which you may pay for colonial produce, and which they may pay in consequence of taking British produce, is cheaply purchased by extending your power over the wide world; by establishing in every quarter friends and allies; by having a certainty of employment everywhere, uninterfered with by foreign competition, for a vast amount of British shipping and British seamen, and thus extending and strengthening the power of this country; and I will concur with Mr. Cobden if he will substitute for a system of mutual robbery a system of mutual insurance (hear). I say then upon this system of protection is based the whole of your colonial empire; and that it rests upon far more than pecuniary grounds. I know that the political economists say, "Cast off the colonies, let them trade with you or with any other country,—give them the full advantage of Free Trade, let there be no protection." I do not doubt the loyalty of the colonies or their attachment to this country; but by this measure you do all in your power to weaken that loyalty and attachment. You grant them commercial independence, invite them to trade freely and liberally with all other nations, and you tell the emigrant who quits this country,—"From the time you leave the shores of England, though you are still in British security, you are no more to us than a Dutchman, or a Frenchman, or an American. Trade where you please, you are entitled to no favour from us; we give you no protection; we do not impede your trade with any other country you may think fit, you are just as much connected with them as with us." But, my lords, we are now upon the question of corn, and I will now apply that question to one of the most important of our colonies—I refer to the case of Canada, and of the effect upon the trade of Canada which will be produced by the passing of this measure (cries of "hear, hear"). I have heard that it is looked forward to that this will be a great boon to the Australian colonies. I do not exactly see how, at the present moment—the Australian colonies are subject to a duty charged to the extent of 5s. a-quarter upon their produce imported into this country; it cannot exceed 5s. a quarter. They have the exclusive admission to a protected British market. You are about to take that away, and the effect will be to prevent Australian corn coming into your market, for if the price of corn in this country falls more than 5s. a quarter, to that amount the colonial produce of Australia will be in a worse position than at present. But with regard to Canada, what have you done? You proposed that Canada should have admission for her produce into your protected market, and upon the faith of that she imposed a duty of 5s. upon corn and flour taken from America, you led her to improving the communication by the St. Lawrence; you lent her money for that purpose; you are now about to render that valueless (hear, hear). You are going to break the promise you made to Canada (hear, hear). You are going to destroy the trade you fostered and encouraged. Nay, you are going to do much more; you are going to destroy the improved communication of the St. Lawrence; you are going to make the port of New York the channel of commercial intercourse between this country and Upper Canada, by your own St. Lawrence. Those who know that colony know that I am speaking the truth, and nothing but that (hear, hear). It is a matter almost of indifference whether wheat grown in the western states of the union and in Upper Canada is carried to New York or Montreal. The communication with New York is somewhat cheaper and easier. The market of Montreal regulates the price of the markets of New York; but now the corn of the western states and Upper Canada comes down the St. Lawrence to Montreal, employing British shipping, and that in our own territory, because there is a differential duty in favour of its going to Montreal, and against its going to New York. But if this measure passes, that will be changed, and the corn will come, not by your own St. Lawrence, in ships navigated by your own countrymen, but through the United States; and I will tell your lordships what is the fact. There are merchants in Montreal who, in anticipation of this measure passing, are preparing to set up their establishments in New York (hear, hear). I say nothing of the effect you are producing upon the feelings of the people (hear, hear). I say nothing of the shock you will give to the loyalty of the people; but I say this, you are doing your utmost to irritate them, to break off their commercial intercourse with you, and throw them into the scale, perhaps, of a hostile state. My lords, political independence may follow from commercial independence (hear, hear). Are the United States blind to this fact? Do they not see the nature of your suicidal policy? Are your lordships aware of the bill passed by Congress one or two years ago?—that a bill was passed, actually granting a drawback to the full amount, or almost so, of the import duty upon goods going into the seaports of the United States, provided those goods were carried through the United States, and re-shipped to Upper Canada; and that a bill is now pending in Congress for the purpose of extending the import of goods from Canada, to be re-shipped to this country from the port of New York? Will that fact of the policy of the United States open your lordships' eyes to the nature of the policy you are pursuing (hear, hear)? Again, your lordships have read, or if not, I hope before you come to a decision upon this measure you will read (hear, hear) the dispatch of the Governor-General of Canada. This is the dispatch laid upon the table of the house by the Government from Lord Cathcart, who was recently sent out, forwarded to the Government here, not in his own name only, but in the name of the executive of the province of Canada. [The noble lord then read the dispatch, which was to the effect that the province of Canada was so vitally interested in this question, that it became the duty of the executive of the province of Canada to urge upon the consideration of her Majesty's ministers the necessity of a protected market for the produce of Canada, and the effect that would be produced if it were taken away; that upon the faith of the last measure expensive improvements had been undertaken, and that if that protection were removed, the ruin of the colony would follow.] I have stated the case of Canada and the Corn Laws, and having shown the effect which this measure will have upon the individual province of Canada, I will not trespass upon your lordships' attention by entering into details with respect to other colonies, or the effects which a similar course may have upon them. But there is one other point I must refer to. When we are told it is essential for the advantage of the manufactures of this country that Free Trade should be established, and that no advantage should be derived by the colonies, I presume that if you deprive the colonies of all the protection they now enjoy, you strive to repeal that Act of Parliament which compels the colonies to impose a differential duty in favour of your produce (cries of "hear, hear"). You cannot be guilty of such injustice as not to do so, feeling that protection is now mutual (hear); that one-third and more of our exports are taken by the colonies.

And now hear what a gentleman, Mr. Gregg, a member of the Anti-Corn Law League, says of the state to which British markets are exposed in competition with neutral markets. [The noble lord here read a document, in which Mr. Gregg said that we were undersold in all the staple markets of British manufacture, that the cotton manufacturers of the Swiss, the cutlery of Alsace, and the woollens of Saxony were driving us not only out of the foreign markets, but our own. That in hosiery, Saxony, with a duty of 25 per cent., sold 30 per cent. cheaper than the produce of the Leicester looms; that whilst the number of stockings in Leicester was formerly 16,585, there were now only 4040; but in Saxony their number had increased from 4090 to 25,000.] How far with cheaper food, no taxation upon the raw material, and no duty but for the sake of revenue, we might yet recover our lost superiority, is a matter of grave consideration. He did not believe that we could, either in woollens or hosiery, or even in cutlery, or the cotton trade. Under a free commercial system, the price of the raw material was nearly the same in all countries; but the advantage of labour was, in general, on the side of the foreigner, whilst machinery itself was sold in large quantities in foreign countries. The only item, then, in which manufactures were to be cheapened was the cost of production,—that was, the wages of labour. Foreign nations had reduced them, and, by lowering them here and raising them abroad, the difference might be regulated; but he doubted whether our lost market could ever be entirely recovered. With better education, with more sober habits, more frugality, with cheaper food, the people might be enabled to live much better than at present upon smaller earnings, and that was the only way in which it could be done (hear, hear). That is the language of Mr. Gregg, a distinguished manufacturer, and a member of the League. The neutral markets have failed you, and he calls upon you to try that last and desperate remedy, of cheapening food and lowering wages to recover them, and for that you are to throw open the markets which take one-third of your whole foreign exports, your home exports, which are about five to two of your foreign exports (hear, hear). You are called upon by these sapient manufacturers to damage your home market and take away protection (hear, hear). I do not think the force of folly can go further. I trust your lordships will not be led away by these fallacies and delusions, and that you will not sacrifice the home produce and colonial market (hear, hear). I am sensible, my lords, though at great length, how feebly, how unsatisfactorily I have performed my task. I know I must have wearied your lordships. I know I have in a very indifferent manner discharged my duty. But I hope at least I shall have the credit of having kept closely to the subject of discussion, and I hope, further, I have redeemed the pledge I gave at the outset, that in no observations I made would I make one remark, if I was aware of it, that would be likely to wound the feelings of any one (hear, hear). But, before I sit down, I must be permitted to say a few words to those of your lordships, and I believe they are many, who, in their hearts, go along with me in the arguments I have submitted to you, and are dismayed and alarmed at this measure as much as I am, and yet from various grounds mean to give your votes for the second reading of the Bill. I can conceive various motives operating upon the minds of high-minded and honourable men. I know there may be those who plead the authority of the House of Commons. I have a great respect for the authority of that house, of which I had the honour of being a member between 22 and 23 years. But where are we to collect the opinion of the House of Commons (hear, hear)? Are we to collect it from their collected votes? Then are we to take the votes of 1816, 1844, or 1842? When I find in 1842 a similar measure rejected by a majority of 213 (hear, hear), and again a similar measure rejected the same year by a majority of 105; and another measure rejected by a majority of 114 (hear, hear)—when I find a similar measure rejected by a majority of 256 in 1843, and again by a majority of 209 in 1844,—when I find a motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws rejected by a majority of 132 in June, 1845, and when I find that same measure of the repeal of the Corn Laws not negatived by 132, but affirmed by a majority of 98 (loud cheers) by the same men in the same house, I say this sudden conversion must tend to diminish the value I attach to the authority of the last vote of the House of Commons (loud cheers). I respect the judgment and decision of the House of Commons, but not because it is a decision of a majority of gentlemen more or less well educated and enlightened (hear). I respect their decision because it is the decision of the representatives of public opinion in this country; and if I am to take the decision of the House of Commons, I must, if I am to be bound by either decision, take that decision of the collected representation in 1842, as well as the collected representation in 1846, of the deliberate judgment and opinion of the people of this country (cheers). There are those who disapprove of this decision, but who, from a personal feeling of attachment to the Government, are prepared to vote with them. I sympathise with that feeling, but I cannot assent in justice to their course (hear, hear). There are two great interests at stake in this question, and compliment should not stand in the way out of deference to any minister (hear, hear). Depend upon it, the public interests can never be benefited by the sacrifice of your own deliberate judgment, by turning round upon your own principles for the purpose of saving an administration. My conviction is, that if you make the sacrifice it will be made in vain (cheers), for there never was a Government which permanently maintained its existence by the somewhat contemptuous support of its opponents, and by the ill disguised disgust and half-ashamed support of its allies (cheers). There may be those, my lords, who hope, by giving their consent to this measure, to put an end to agitation, and to give satisfaction to the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League. When, my lords, was an organised agitation put down by concessions extorted from its opponents? Depend upon it, that when this body shall have once tasted the cup of political power, the draught will be too sweet to induce them to relinquish it. I agree with my noble friend, that this is only one of the measures which one after the other will be the object of the Anti-Corn-Law League. Why, my lords, there is no secret made of it. I do not say that every member of the Anti-Corn-Law League enters fully into those opinions, for I believe that there are many excellent men who have joined that body with none but commercial objects, who sincerely believe that Free Trade will be a benefit to the country and to themselves, and who would withdraw if there were any attempt to carry those objects further; but recollect the origin of their complaints, and hear the language which was used at a public meeting, at which Mr. Lawrence Heyworth was in the chair, and which was held, I believe, in this town. After talking of the miracles which had been wrought by the conversion of Prime Ministers (cheers), the speaker said, "They must have something more than a Free Trade in corn." He asked why were they levying taxes in this country pressing severely on the people, and whether it would not be better to put a tax upon property, to abolish the custom-house system, and to say, "Honest traders of all nations, you may lay your stuffs here, there are no taxes and no duties" (laughter). He said further, that he would not have the friends of Free Trade relax in their exertions; they must remember that the House of Lords yet lived; that this was the stronghold of the aristocracy, where they would be struggling for something more than a commercial policy. After the settlement of the Free Trade question the people would have more time to agitate for universal suffrage (hear, hear); and if it were good for commerce to be free, it was good for man to be free also; if it were good for cotton and corn to be free, it would be good for man likewise. And now I beg the attention of the right rev. bench to what follows:—"Could they have a Free Trade in commerce without a Free Trade in religion; or could the system of commercial despotism continue the blight of this country? The Catholics and the Dissenters would demand why the church of Christ should be under the trammels of the State; and he predicted that the freedom of religion, as shown by the separation of Church and State, would be one of the glorious results of Free Trade" (loud cheers). And lastly, my lords, there is another motive which is most likely to operate with high-minded men; it is an unworthy fear and suspicion that they are acting from interested or dishonourable motives. My lords, if I were speaking to an ordinary assembly, I might warn them of the danger of yielding to such fears; but, speaking to the assembly which I have the honour to address, which cannot be unduly biased by considerations of fear, I can assert that you do not act from your personal interests. You are the trustees for far more than your personal interests; you are the trustees for your country, you are the trustees for posterity, you are the trustees for the constitution of the empire (cheers). My lords, you, each and all of you, live amongst your neighbours, by whom you are looked up to as the guides for their political opinions; from you your neighbours take the colour of their opinions and their views; to you they look, to your opinions a respectful deference is paid, and it is you who have encouraged and promulgated the opinion that for the great interests of this country agricultural protection is essential. With what feeling, my lords, with what face, having voted for the destruction of all protection to agriculture, can you show yourselves in the midst of those neighbours, who have hitherto regarded you with respect, and whose principles and opinions you have heretofore influenced (cries of "hear, hear")? They will charge you, and charge you justly, as you now charge the Government, with having misled and betrayed those who have placed their confidence in you (loud cheers). Therefore, my lords, if against your own deliberate opinions you consent to pass this measure, be prepared to abdicate the hitherto high place you have held in the constitution: if you sacrifice your own opinions to the intimidation of others, be prepared hereafter to be looked upon as a subordinate branch of the constitution, to be looked upon only as the registrars of the edicts of the House of Commons, and as the blind followers of the Minister of the day (cheers). My lords, if I know anything of the constitutional value of this house, it is to interpose a salutary obstacle to rash and inconsiderate legislation; it is to protect the people from the consequences of their own imprudence. It never has been the course of this house to resist a continued and deliberately formed public opinion; your lordships always have, and always will, bow to the expression of such an opinion; but it is yours to check hasty legislation, leading to irreparable evils; and it is yours—though the constitution can hardly have been deemed to have provided for such a contingency—to protect the people, not against their own hasty judgments, but against the treachery of those whom they have chosen to be their leaders (loud cheers). My lords, if, acting on your own deliberate and impartial opinion, scorning the degrading suspicion of being actuated by unworthy motives you follow the course which in your consciences you believe to be for the good of the country, you may rest assured that neither your country nor your conscience will condemn you. You may be conquered; you may be overbalanced in numbers; but you will not be degraded. You may fail in saving the people from the threatened evil, but you will secure the approbation of your friends and the respect of your opponents (cheers). And if, by the blessing of God, your decision on this great question shall arrest the progress of this hasty and inconsiderate measure; if you shall thus give time for the intelligence of the country to act upon the public mind; if, happily, you shall succeed in going back to a wiser course, and in adopting the too much despised wisdom of your ancestors, then you may well be proud of your position and of your conduct; then may you well be proud that you have discharged your duty conscientiously and fairly, that you have withstood the seductions of power, and that you have honestly and fearlessly proceeded to save your country from this great and hazardous experiment. The best reward, my lords, that you can have will be this approval of your own consciences in having done your duty; but there will be another reward in the approbation and the thanks of a grateful and admiring people, who will then justly exclaim—"Thank God we have a House of Lords!" (The noble lord resumed his seat amidst great cheering.)

SPEECH OF LORD BROUGHAM.

Lord BROUGHAM: I am quite aware, my lords, that I stand before you under some disadvantages ("Adjourn, adjourn"), and I certainly mean to take the sense of the house on the question of adjournment. We have just heard a speech of surpassing ability delivered at so late a period of the evening (renewed cries of "Adjourn"). My lords, I can't go on without the opportunity, in the first place, of hearing my own voice, which is necessarily preparatory to making any one else hear. (Cries again for an adjournment.) Among the many great advantages which my noble friend enjoys over me—which I need not stop to enumerate, because all who have heard his speech will acknowledge the merits which intrinsically belong to him, at all times and at all hours of the night—but certainly one of the advantages which he has upon the present occasion, purely by accident, is, that he is equal to all his other advantages put together, but that he has made a most exciting and animated, and, to a great portion of your lordships, a most successful speech, and also a very long speech—though I did not feel that it was long, or that it needed those apologies which he frequently addressed to us, yet nevertheless the clock shows that it was a very long speech—and that I rise to address your lordships not at 9 o'clock but after 12, which is a great disadvantage at all times, but more especially in this house, where we are not in the habit of having long debates. But, my lords, this circumstance teaches me to confine myself within the smallest limits possible, and to proceed without further preface to the duty before me ("Adjourn"). As I am about to address myself not to those who agree with, but those who differ from me in opinion, I must beg the favour of some portion of their attention whilst I apply myself to answering the speech of the noble lord which has given them such satisfaction. I wave with my noble friend all personal allusions; he did well, and I am sure that other speakers will follow his example; but there is one subject of a personal nature which I cannot resist mentioning—the origin of the present bill (cries of "Adjourn"). If those noble lords who cry "Adjourn" have business to do elsewhere, I think they ought to go, and leave me to get on. If they are desirous of tasting other enjoyments (loud laughter) in preference to listening to me, peradventure the house will not be the worse for their absence, and they themselves will greatly profit by the move which I have recommended (laughter). But I proceed to say a word, begging the attention of the noble lord in return for the undivided attention which I assure him I paid to his speech, which I promise him shall not be one-third the length he exacted from me. I say I proceed at once to the origin of the present measure. It is said to have been the pressure of the famine, or the supposed famine, in certain districts of Ireland. I doubt the fact of there being a general famine in Ireland; I have never heard it stated that there was a general famine there; but that a general pressure of misery and scarcity did exist in many large districts of Ireland is a fact as certain as that we are sitting debating here to-night (hear, hear). But, says my noble friend, that is no reason—that furnishes no sufficient ground, for doing away with protection, or even of opening the ports, as had been recommended. I deny the fact, as I am ready to show that it was a sufficient ground. But I beg, before proceeding further, to say that it is quite immaterial to the merits of the bill what was its origin. I might most consistently say that the Government were wrong in proceeding with the bill this year; I might consistently contend that there was no ground for the precipitancy with which it has been brought forward in 1846;—I might consistently argue that Sir Robert Peel did a rash, an indiscreet, and an imprudent act, by bringing in the measure this year; but that upon the merits of the measure, howsoever recommended, whensoever introduced, under whatever pressure, or under no pressure at all, if the measure is a sound one in itself, I am bound to give it, as an honest man, my cordial support (hear, hear). I state this to guard myself from being mixed up with the extraneous and accidental circumstances connected with the measure—and as the real and substantial ground upon which I approve of it. But I am free to admit that I see nothing superfluous, nothing unnecessary, nothing rash, nothing indiscreet whatever in the choice of the last autumn and the last winter for the first proposal of the repeal of the Corn Laws (hear, hear). For what is the real state of the case as regards the potato disease? A vast number of people, my noble friend himself admits, found themselves reduced to distress by the failure of their crop. It was not merely that their potatoes were bad, but they did not have wages to pay for their food, except the produce of their little plots of ground—the currency in which the Irish labourer is paid. Are your lordships aware what has happened since this question began? Is my noble friend ignorant of what happened since this measure was introduced into the other house? He omitted to refer to it, but he certainly must be aware that one part naturally belonging to the Corn Bill was transferred to the Customs Bill, by which foreign maize was allowed to be imported as if the Corn Bill were already passed, and we were now enjoying the benefit of it. How does this apply to answer the argument of my noble friend? Why, he says that the measure is unnecessary—that the mischief has been remedied. But how has it been remedied? Why, in order to supply the wants of the people; in order to remedy the failure of the potato crop, maize was allowed to be introduced free of duty, and my learned friend might learn from the people that they have been taught by the evidence of experience to be thankful for that food, not for their cattle merely, but for the inhabitant, for the poor peasant of the country (hear, hear). Then, says my noble friend—and there was no part of his able address which excited greater attention or louder applause, for it led away some of my friends in my own neighbourhood for a moment, but only for a moment—I say there was no part of his address which excited greater approbation than this. "What," says my noble friend, "do you do to the poor Irish peasant? Because his potatoes are useless, you take away protection from his corn, you make him sell his oats cheaper, you make the candle burn at both ends, you take away the means by which he purchases both food and potatoes, by making him sell cheaper oats." But my noble friend supplied an answer to his own argument, for he candidly admitted that he was perfectly ready to open the ports for the purpose of letting in oatmeal, thereby of course lowering the value of the Irish peasant's oats (hear, hear). I only mention this to show that my noble friend has no right to charge others—as he has lavishly done to-night both sides of the house—with inconsistency. Is he not liable to the charge himself (hear, hear)? I admit it as a charge; but he charges all around him. He says that the Ministers are paragons of inconsistency; but don't you, the Opposition, triumph, for you have as many inconsistencies to account for as they have. But has my noble friend none to account for himself? I have shown that he has been guilty of a little inconsistency in this very speech. But is there nothing else? Has he forgot the Canada Bill? I highly approved of that bill; I supported it; I objected to all the attacks that were made upon it; I defended the consistency of my right hon. friend, the author of the bill. Well, what did the bill do? It reduced the duty to 3s. per quarter, and allowed the whole American bread stuffs to come through Canada over to England, where protection was in full vigour—where it was regarded as absolutely necessary for the landlord, the farmer, the peasant, the manufacturer, and for all our institutions, and yet this bill allowed American corn to be introduced at this low duty, be the price here ever so cheap, and without reference to any sliding scale (hear). I mention this not to taunt my noble friend with inconsistency, but to show that nemo omnibus horis sapit—that no one is wise at all times; that no one who acts the part of a wise man will refuse to profit by reflective reason and further experience—and that no one on any side of the house, not even my noble friend, is totally free from the charge—if it be a charge—of having at different times advocated and proposed opposite measures (hear, hear). But the argument of my noble friend in support of the former bill is equally applicable to the present bill. Think, says my noble friend, of the increase of the population—consider how rapidly the numbers of the people augment—think how every year 300,000 or 400,000 persons are added to the number of consumers of food in this country, and that unless you bring down food to the lowest possible price you cannot hope long to feed the increasing numbers, and you cannot discharge your duty to the people. The same argument applies to the Corn Law at all times; and it is upon the ground of its applicability at all times, and without reference to accidental and temporary circumstances, that I have uniformly advocated the repeal of the Corn Laws. This leads me to come at once to the point; that is, the probable effect of the repeal of the Corn Laws in reducing prices. I wish I could take the same view of it as my noble friend does. I wish I could believe in the possibility that one-fifth part of 20 per cent. of the price of grain would be taken off by the repeal of the Corn Laws. The noble lord calls upon the supporters of the measure to say what effect the repeal of the Corn Laws will have upon the state of the markets—he requires of us that we should tell him what increase or diminution that event may produce in the course of two, three, or four years. Now, I take upon myself to say that that is about one of the most difficult problems which any one could be called upon to solve. When a change takes place in the nature and materials of our importations nothing can be more difficult than to tell beforehand what the effect of that will be. Suppose that corn be sold for 30s. at Dantzic at the time that our Corn Laws are repealed, who can undertake to say what the effect of that will be upon our corn market? Supposing it to be 30s. now, who can say how cheap it will be when the Corn Laws are repealed? To answer that question I must be able to tell the effect upon the English market, which will be produced by the knowledge in Dantzic that the English Corn Laws have been repealed. I must estimate the 5s. freight, the 2s. insurance, the 3s. other expenses, and having brought it up to 40s., I must then be able to tell what the effect of all this will be on the market at Dantzic. But though neither I, nor my noble friend, nor any one else can answer these questions, my noble friend went on to tell us that new land would be brought into cultivation, and then my noble friend talked to us of the state of the land in the Ukraine, and of the land in Hungary; and whether he knew less of the land in the Ukraine and more of that in Hungary, or less of the latter and more of the former, does not very distinctly appear; but, nevertheless, he did not abstain from telling us that these lands, of which we know so little, would come suddenly into cultivation, that there would be an immediate clearance of the lands in Hungary, and yet I venture to assert, that if my noble friend will make inquiries of any Hungarian nobleman, who may now happen to be in London, he will find that he has been reckoning without his host. The probability is that it will take much time to effect any material increase in the productive powers of the land of Hungary—that acre after acre must be slowly and laboriously brought into cultivation—that there can be no sudden clearing away of the impediments to tillage—that you cannot in one day go through all the operations of stubbing up trees, clearing roots, digging deep below the surface, sawing, burning, ploughing, and harrowing—that you cannot by a single effort divide fields, make fences, erect barns, granaries, and farm-houses—that all this cannot be done by a mere exercise of volition—that a numerous peasantry must be called into existence for the execution of such works; and be it remembered that the population of the Ukraine and of Hungary do not increase at the rate of 1000 a day, as they do in this country. Besides, a vast amount of capital will be required for effecting such great objects upon so large a scale. We know very well that in this country it requires a capital of 10l. an acre to carry on the business of farming, but how much per acre does it require to clear a primitive farm, and bring it out of a state of nature into a state of cultivation? My noble friend, however, supports his argument upon the authority of his most respectable correspondent Mr. Sanders, and upon the authority of that gentleman my noble friend told your lordships that the effect of this bill would be to cause the cultivation of 5,000,000 additional—

Lord STANLEY: No; what I said, was that in the course of three years there would be an increase of 5,000,000.

Lord BROUGHAM: That "no" is in effect "yes"—my noble friend seems to say no, but really the effect of his answer is an affirmative, and the result is that I am right and he is wrong—three years! Surely in talking of the eternal interests of trade, three years are but an instant. When we are dealing with that which has endured since the time of Henry IV., anything that depends upon a period of three years may well be called sudden—it is most sudden. No doubt Mr Sanders is a respectable correspondent, but I wish he was a little more sensible. I do not require that he should be a man of powerful intellect or large views, because he is not giving any opinion; but I am entitled to require that he should be a rational man, seeing that he speaks to matters of fact. If I am called upon to be governed by his authority, I must be satisfied that he is trustworthy. I must have no reason to suspect any lack of judgment. I must be convinced that he is able to put two ideas together; and yet when I consider the correspondence of this Mr. Sanders, I cannot repress feelings of the utmost astonishment at the monstrous stories which he tells. I will give him the full benefit of the three years and three days—a year and a day as the lawyers are accustomed to grant. Three years and three days are only an instant for purposes of that kind; and can any one believe that in the short space of three years 6,000,000 can be added to the productions of the Continent—that within that short time our markets can be overwhelmed—that we can be deluged with foreign corn, the production of the Ukraine and of Hungary. I believe nothing of the sort; I believe that the advance will be gradual; I believe that for years to come there will be no great application of capital, and therefore no considerable augmentation of supply; you must calculate not upon a great change, but upon a moderate decrease of prices, and upon a slowly augmenting supply. I by no means intend to argue that there will be a diminution of prices, though I perfectly recollect that a noble friend of mine, now no more—I mean the late Lord Spencer—held that such a change in the Corn Laws as is now proposed, would not effect any diminution whatever in the price of provisions—that was his deliberate and serious opinion; and though I have always thought that that opinion was entitled to the highest respect, like every other opinion entertained by that noble lord, I still hold that there is in it something of exaggeration, and my expectation is that in the price of corn there will be a small and moderate reduction after the passing of this bill. In maintaining this opinion, and generally in the support of this bill, I may appeal to my noble friends on the cross benches. I may fearlessly appeal to them because I know they have a great respect for a very estimable class of men, the tenant farmers. Now it does so happen that the tenant farmers are not so very apprehensive of the effects of this measure as they are said to be. I should be glad to be enlightened upon this point; but as far as my information goes there is no great apprehension amongst the tenant farmers. If they are alarmed they adopt a most singular mode of showing it, for they are every day taking farms at increased rents, and upon long leases; and when a farm is out of lease is it let at a reduction in rent? No such thing; it is let at a higher rent. My noble friend has great reason to despise my experience on this point, he having many tenants and I few; but I can assure him that such is the fact, not alone in the part of the country with which I am connected, but in all parts of the country; for in all parts I have made inquiries, and I know of nothing but instances of farms being let at an increase of rent, and of no instance whatever of land being out of lease. Now, really, if these men entertain no alarm about the Corn Laws, I think it is a duty of supererogation for us to be so much alarmed for them. If my noble friends say, "If rent shall fall, that is our look-out," then they shift the argument, but I conceive them, acting for the tenant farmers, and not for themselves. Some tenant farmers were lately asked by a connection of mine when farms were being let, if they were aware of what was going on about the Corn Laws? "Oh," said they, "we have taken all that into account, we have calculated all that, we have no doubt whatever that the measure is going to pass." (I hope they'll be true prophets.) And of those farms one was let at a rent of 70l., and the other at 10l. a year higher than before. That was in Durham. These are facts; there are many such facts; and these show that the alarm does not pervade the tenant body of farmers generally. Then, as to the argument of prices, it is one of which no one on either side can undertake confidently to speak. I should form a very mean opinion of the good sense of any man who would take upon himself to say, and who with confidence would foretell, the effect of this measure on prices. I have no opinion of that sort. We ought to speak with becoming modesty, but above all with great moderation, as to our expectations of the effect of a change in a system so long upheld (hear). Nothing, in my opinion, but a clear view that these results would be advantageous, would justify us in countenancing it; but as to the precise amount I will not venture to calculate. Wheat, not immediately, but in time, will be cheaper to a certain degree, perhaps 3s. or 4s. a quarter; but in mentioning that small amount we need not pledge ourselves to a calculation. Anything more absurd, more conceited, if I may so say, than that person is who assumes the ability, on so difficult and complicated a subject, to give the precise amount which this change will have the effect of producing, cannot be imagined (hear, hear). I am confident that the agriculturists will benefit much more by this great improvement in our laws than they will lose by a diminution in the market value of their produce (hear, hear). I look forward to this measure as almost undoubtedly certain to extend our foreign trade incalculably, and in a very short period of time (hear, hear). But before I come to that part of my noble friend's speech—and with regard to some portions of that speech they are puzzling, and require some explanations—I will say a word or two on the main argument urged in favour of the protective system. My noble friend said, quoting great authorities in support of the assertion, that the use of protection is to make this country independent of a foreign supply, and among others he quoted the late Mr. Huskisson, who said, "The great object was for ourselves to grow the corn which makes the bread of the people." There is no question whatever that the great interest of this country and of every other country, is to grow the bulk of the food of the people within the bounds of the country; and, except in one instance, I mean that of the United States' provinces, there is and can be no country under the sun in which, whatever the system of Corn Laws may be, and whether there exists protection or not, the people must not find it necessary to be fed by corn growing within the bounds of their own country. The only object of free importations must be to relieve you in years of scarcity or in the dearth of a bad year; this is a matter of absolute certainty. Why, in years of famine in this country there were never anything like 2,000,000 of quarters imported. The whole importation in 1800 and 1801 was 1,100,000 quarters each year from the whole of Europe, and if you add 200,000 quarters of corn, you do not show a very large importation. In 1810 it was 1,500,000 quarters, and why, therefore, do you wish these restrictions? And why do you say that the people of this country ought to be independent of the people of other countries for the supply of food? Oh, it is said, foreign powers may change their law, and, at any moment, close their ports and starve you. I have an answer to that in one word; I point to 1810 (hear, hear), and I say that that argument survives not the mention of that year one single instant (cheers). When did you ever see the Continent under such a power as that to which it bowed in 1810? When ever again are you likely to see it enthralled by such an iron hand as that which then grasped the universal sceptre of Europe—I may say, of the Continental world (cheers)? Do you remember what year that was? Talk to me of petty sovereigns now stopping exportation from Egypt, from Belgium, from Antwerp, from the Hague; why then, Napoleon, in his iron grasp, held, as I said before, the sceptre, not of France only, but of all Continental Europe, and do you remember the degree to which he had enforced his despotism over these states? Why, from the very centre as it were—from the heart, the pulsations of which influenced all Europe—from Paris to the millions of the world, he could send forth an edict which would shut all Europe against us (hear, hear). From the Channel to the Gulf of Leghorn, from Paris to the outermost parts of Poland, there was not one single person in authority, not a troop of horse, not a company of foot, not a custom house officer, not an excise man, who did not tremble at his name, or refused to obey his mandate (cheers). Is that likely to happen again? Did that ever happen before? And yet, what was the result of it all? Was Napoleon bent upon any single thing so much as destroying the trade of England? Was he bent upon any one project so much, was anything so dear to his heart, as sealing up our own produce, and preventing any one bushel of corn ever reaching this country? And yet the result of it was that 1,200,000 quarters, and talking also of the corn, that 1,514,000 quarters were imported into England, during that same year—1810. And not from outports, observe, where his power might be supposed to be somewhat weakened; not from Odessa where he had little influence; not from Africa, where, it may be said, he had none at all; not from Naples, where his strength was unimportant; not from Sicily, the olden granary of Rome—no: no such thing; but 39 parts in every 100 of these 1,514,000 quarters came from France itself—from thence imported into this country (cheers). The mention of that year, 1810, at once extinguished the argument. The noble lord said the protection system was supported by universal consent. He quoted our own law to show how deep a root it had taken. But if we are to go back upon old statutes, I could furnish the noble lord with many examples of as ludicrous statutes, of as absurd provisions, as he could wish to see, which the wisdom of our ancestors, to which he so eloquently referred, fixed in the statute book, and carefully preserved for our edification and amusement, if not for our instruction. The laws against forestalling and regrating were once said to be the pillar of our commercial prosperity. These are things laughed at by universal consent. But it was no laughing matter when those laws were in force. It was an offence for people to forestall and regrate, and men were punished by imprisonment for committing that offence. No man could purchase corn for the purpose of selling it again at market (hear, hear). No man could purchase corn before it came to market (hear, hear, hear). There was to be no middleman. The object was that the good, worthy, honest, tenant farmer should come to market that he might sell corn cheap to the people. The law said, "You shall buy standing corn;" and the same rule was applied in the case of hops. But, said the noble lord, other countries have the same law. Are not these, he triumphantly asks, the great countries of the world? and have they not laws for the protection of native industry? Another part of the noble lord's speech gave the answer to this argument, that notwithstanding their protection laws, they all had found it necessary, when there was a pressure on the means of subsistence, to suspend that protection law. The protection laws of Belgium, of Holland, of Egypt, were all suspended in the autumn of 1845. It was no bad or useless commentary upon the inefficient nature of any system of laws that those countries were obliged to get rid of them the moment the pinch came. My noble friend then argued that the trade of the country was not likely to be benefited by this great measure. And here I may defend him against himself (cheers); because anything more harsh, more cruel, I should say more uncharitable—nay, I should almost say unchristian (laughter), than his treatment of himself in his argument on the tariff, I never witnessed. I could not have believed that any one would have had so little bowels of compassion as the noble lord showed to himself. I pitied him. My noble friend is so great an artist that he drew himself in such colours that I pitied him. I was forced to separate the two individuals. There is one active and one passive—the party punishing and the party punished—and it is one and the same person who punishes and is punished. I wish to say one word, if not in defence, at least in extenuation, to rescue him from the clog of the imputation with which he has been visiting himself. The tariff did not deserve all the vituperation which it received; and I wish to say one word in its favour before sentence is recorded. No rational man would say that increased competition among producers tends to increase prices. By increased competition among producers you reduce prices. But the object of the tariff was to enable you to obtain cheaper goods from abroad, and to enable you thereby to send your own produce more advantageously to foreign parts. The noble lord said the tariff afforded no precedent for the present measure. "See," he said, "with all your tariff of 1842, to what it is come? What advantages do you expect from a repeal of the Corn Laws?" Very great advantage I should reply. I must refer to the argument as to the increase of seamen and the diminution of the tonnage of vessels. It is said, taking so many years before the tariff was adopted, your vessels in the Baltic trade were so much; taking a similar period since, they are so much less. The proportion was somewhere about 6,000 to 5,000. That was a very trifling diminution; and if the means of transport were made up by foreign vessels, your trade was so far extended; these foreign vessels carried your goods, and the difference before and after the tariff was made up with a vengeance; for the number indicating the increase of foreign shipping engaged in your trade after the tariff is 17,000. It is a most complete demonstration that our trade has increased. Then my noble friend called on noble lords to attend to a report of the American Secretary of the Treasury; and as I may have found an ex-secretary wrong, so I may find an actual secretary equally wrong. The statement which the noble lord read does not prove that we take less from the United States than the United States take from us. Did they get what was stated as imports for nothing? You must pay the balance in bullion, or in goods. Did we send two and a half millions of dollars to clear off the balance? No, we paid it in foreign produce. It is what is called a "round-about" trade, and is almost as profitable as a direct trade. Then we are told the same thing occurs in Russia. About 11,000,000 were imported from Russia, 8,000,000 only were exported to Russia; there was a balance of 3,000,000. Are we to believe that the Americans having made us a present of three millions, the Russians will be anxious to vie with them in giving us three millions of their goods for nothing, as if the two hemispheres were emulating the one the other—the West endeavouring to prove to the world that she is able to excel all that has been told us of Eastern gorgeousness? But we have received no such gifts from either of them. If we have not sent them our own goods, we have given them the coffee and the sugars of Brazil (cheers). But, my lords, what is my expectation with regard to the Corn Law so far as relates to foreign trade? I do not look forward to any sudden, rapid, instantaneous increase of our traffic with foreign countries; but one thing I confidently expect, that if we set the example, and remove the restrictions from our commercial code, other countries will follow the same line (cheers). We do not live in a period when any country, especially countries like France and Belgium, with constitutional governments, and Germany, which is likely soon to obtain a constitutional government—when the voice of the consumer is heard, and the opinions of the capitalist and manufacturer are consulted—are likely to remain behind; these countries, you may be perfectly assured, if you withdraw your restrictions and your restrictive line of policy, will effect a corresponding change in theirs (hear, hear). Of this also, I am certain, that you can do yourselves no kind of service by retaining your restrictions; even should the improvements of this system be postponed by other countries, you will be none the worse for it; while if your example be followed by them it will be a most important and valuable circumstance for this country. I am not one of those who take the gloomy view of the subject that Mr. Gray, the correspondent of the noble lord, has done (hear, hear). If ever I heard a statement on any occasion which appeared to be made under the influence of a prevailing bias on the mind of the man who made it, it is Mr. Gray's statement made to your lordships this evening. According to him, we are plunged into an abyss of ruin; our capitalists make no profit; our manufacturers are working at a loss; and our labourers are receiving nothing like adequate wages, because they cannot compete with the labourers of other countries. And yet my noble friend garnished another part of his speech with accounts of the great extent of our foreign commerce, and the exports of our manufactures (hear). As to the sliding scale, my noble friend spoke much in its favour, and asked, why adopt this new system when the sliding scale has operated so advantageously? My lords, that argument does not apply to me, who never approved of the sliding scale. My argument against it was always this, that the inevitable consequence of such a system was to cause a great accumulation in foreign ports, or in the bonded stores; and that our market was sure to be flooded and drenched with it just at the time when the home grower could least bear up against it. Let me here remind you that the years which have passed since 1842 were such as could not by possibility test the utility of the sliding scale (hear, hear). The true test of the sliding scale is to be found in a time of scarcity; but we have had abundant harvests since 1842—even last year was in many respects abundant, though not of such good quality as some preceding years, and it is well known that 1844 was so very prolific that three-fourths of the produce of that year are still on hand. In these circumstances no one is entitled to say that the last few years have tested the sliding scale (hear). My lords, I am no party to the follies and exaggerations I have seen prevail out of doors; I am no party to the abuse I have seen heaped on the landowners of this country (hear). I value the landed interest of this country as the great, substantial, and most important of all the interests in the kingdom. I regard the advocates of that interest, even when I differ with them in their opinions, as performing a great and conscientiously discharged duty to their country. Above all, I deny that the supporters of the landed interest in this country are only to be numbered by the landlords, and the tenants, and the yeomen, who are more immediately engaged in the cultivation of the soil (cheers). The great landed interest of this kingdom, my lords, is of power, and might, and influence enough to counterbalance all the other interests, if they were put in opposite scales the one to the other (hear). That has ever been my fixed and decided opinion. But they are not in opposite scales; for there is on the part of the landed interest, not perhaps the middling merchants or the petty tradesmen—though the tradesmen in your small towns will always be found ranged with them in all controversies in which they appear as a party—but all the great traders, and great capitalists, and merchants and mercantile men in the country, all the important public bodies, the Bank, the East India Company, the insurance companies, the railway companies, the law, the church, the army, the navy, all these bodies forming the prodigious mass of the whole power, and wealth, and influence of the kingdom,—all are found, for the most part, and in the main, and in the long run, to take part with the landed interest, as the great Conservative supporters of the institutions of the empire (loud cries of "hear, hear"). Therefore, when I have made up my mind to support this measure of Corn Law repeal, and to take away what they most fallaciously call their natural and necessary protection, it must not be thought that I wish to injure the landed interest; on the contrary, I believe I am adding to the safety and security of that great body (hear). I hold that any shilling of protection on the quarter of wheat, is a full tax of 1s. on every man in the kingdom, be he rich or poor. Though I do not think the landed interest or the institutions of the country require this protection, and that the sooner they get rid of it the better for those institutions it will be, yet I will tell the landed interest where they will find a protection for themselves and a bulwark for our institutions. I would say to them, "Si monumentum queris, circumspice," look at the talent they have exhibited in the present discussion, and then let those blush, if they are capable of that decorum, who have ever talked with contempt of the talents, accomplishments, and acquisitions of the aristocracy of this country. Reflect on the splendid exhibition of talent there has been in another place during the whole discussion; in their own ability in their best protection. And though they have failed there, as I hope they will here, in attaining the object they strove for, yet they have gained a more effectual protection for themselves, and a far better security for the institutions of which they are the chosen guardians. They have displayed talents for affairs and powers of debate which their adversaries had given them little credit for, and which their country must ever after benefit by. I think I should be guilty of public ingratitude if I did not also express my deep sense of the public virtue, prodigious power of mind, and moral courage exhibited by my right hon. friend at the head of the Government in bringing forward this measure. He has cast away all selfish, private, and personal considerations—he has disregarded his own interest in every step and stage of the process. He has given up what to a minister is, of all positions, the most to be envied—calm, unquestioned, undivided power and superiority; he has exposed himself to the most tempestuous and troubled sea the political world ever exhibited; he has given up what to an ambitious man is much—the security of his power; he has given up what to a calculating man is much—his influence and authority with his party; he has given up what to an amiable man is much—private friendships and party connexions. All these he has sacrificed voluntarily and with his eyes open, for the discharge of what he deemed a great public duty. In these circumstances he can scorn the sordid attacks and ribaldry with which he has been out of doors assailed, because he knows he has entitled himself to the gratitude of his country, and left his name to an admiring posterity as one of the greatest ministers who ever ruled this country.

SPEECH OF THE EARL OF CLARENDON.

The Earl of CLARENDON said that he did not find himself in the category of those who were so solemnly warned by the noble lord last night against giving upon this occasion a vote contrary to the opinions they had expressed in former years; for, since he had had a seat in their lordships' house, he had rarely missed an opportunity of stating what he conscientiously believed to be the evils of the protective system, and that the time was rapidly approaching when the Corn Laws must be abolished. But, as he trusted that this was nearly the last time when they would be called on to discuss this question, he could not avoid expressing the unfeigned satisfaction with which, in common with all those who desired to carry out the principles of Free Trade, he viewed a measure that would for ever, and he wished he could add at once, put an end to that system of protection, and which was brought in with all the weight and authority of a Conservative Administration. It appeared to him of little consequence what had induced the Government to propose this measure. The decision of the Cabinet was unanimous, with the important exception of the noble lord; and he might say that none regretted more sincerely than himself that those doubts which took the noble lord 48 hours to resolve were not terminated in a manner that would have remained to the country the great advantage of his services. Whatever had influenced the Government in proposing it, he rejoiced at the introduction of the measure, and almost as much in the wisdom and justice of the avowals and arguments by which those who had been hitherto opposed to such a measure had supported it in the long ordeal it had undergone elsewhere. But he could never consider that this was a party question. It was one that appeared to him to rest more upon experience and fact than the considerations of party; for, of all questions, this was one with respect to which opinion had undergone more modifications than any other during the last 30 years, as knowledge and science advanced and the number and wants of the people increased. There was scarcely any one whose opinions had not during that time undergone some change with respect to it. Could the protectionist party say they had been uninfluenced by certain circumstances? Would they take upon themselves the responsibilities of an office—an event which they knew from his noble friend on the cross bench might speedily occur (hear, hear)—and maintain the present law—or were they prepared to make any change (hear, hear). Would they say they would not now gladly accept the duty of 8s., which they scornfully rejected five years ago, as likely to lead to revolution and ruin (hear, hear). In fact, were they not threatened with some such amendment in committee? But would they throw overboard their principles and advocate not protection for corn, but for the Exchequer? He said then, that this was not a party question; and he regretted that so much time had been wasted in discussing, not the merits of the measure, for that would have been a useful and legitimate employment, but in demonstrating that this was a party question. All the opposition had been raised against the Minister more than against the measure; but all the invectives poured upon Sir R. Peel proved that he was influenced by higher views than those of party, and that if he forfeited the goodwill and support of his political friends, he did it for that which was of higher importance—his country's good (hear, hear). With famine making rapid strides in Ireland (hear, hear)—it was very well to say "hear, hear," but if those noble lords who now said so were on the ministerial bench next October, and if they received from the Lord-Lieutenant and official servants in Ireland such accounts as Sir R. Peel received last October, he defied them not to take some measures with respect to the Corn Laws (hear, hear). It was incumbent on the Government to take all human means to arrest the progress of starvation, and its attendant evils of disease and turbulence in Ireland. They might have opened the Irish ports by an order in Council, and heartily he wished they had; indeed, one of the protectionist gentlemen in the other house, who had distinguished himself as much as any one, came forward in the late debates and said that the mere apprehension of scarcity would have justified such a course. That was admitting the insufficiency of the present laws in cases of emergency; but had the Irish ports been opened? There being at that time a duty of 17s. in the English ports, with trade free between the two countries, it required little argument to show what the effect would have been. But suppose the right honourable baronet had opened the ports of the United Kingdom, and suspended the law for six months, could he have given any guarantee to restore, much less to maintain, the law at the expiration of that time (hear, hear)? In the present state of public opinion in this country—and there was none who could dare to disregard public opinion,—such a guarantee could not have been adhered to. Could any Government precipitate a conflict which was the only description of civil war which the present manners and civilisation would admit of, and which was not the less mischievous on that account? The noble duke on the cross-benches, and others, had declared that the measure took them and the whole party by surprise (hear, hear); but if they were blind to the intentions of Sir R. Peel the country were not, for they saw the direction in which he was steering for the last four years. For his own part, he must take occasion to say, that he never could comprehend how any statesman of acknowledged foresight and experience, or how any political leaders who must have known that a speedy return to power was theirs, could have maligned the motives and misrepresented the conduct of the late Government, and could have denounced that policy of Free Trade which they knew must be soon adopted. It had always been incomprehensible to him how any one could have done this consistently with common sense and common honesty (loud cheers). Since, however, the present Government had been in office, they had had the power to do good, and they had an opposition without the will to thwart it. For the last four years Sir R. Peel had spoken a language which was perfectly intelligible, and which could not have been mistaken by those not willing to deceive themselves ("hear, hear," from Earl Stanhope). He did not know that the noble earl had during those four years expressed any confidence in the Government.

Earl STANHOPE had certainly felt no confidence at that time or since.

The Earl of CLARENDON: Then Sir Robert Peel had spoken a language which was perfectly intelligible to the noble lord, if not to others. Was it to be conceived that when he broached a broad commercial principle applicable to colonial asses (laughter), to drugs, to gums, and to fruits, that it was not to include the food of a daily-increasing and always underfed population (hear, hear)? Notwithstanding the important statements of Sir James Graham, who, from his official situation and from his remarkable industry, was so great a master of the statistics of this country, as to plenty and cheapness being the real foundation of our prosperity, the agricultural party, with the exception of the noble lord (laughter), doubted to the last moment, and then stood agast, and raised the cry of "Protection to native industry," not, be it observed, of protection to agricultural industry—another proof of the change of opinion, for he recollected when the noble duke stood up in that house, and declared that if the present Government dared to meddle with agricultural protection, he and his friends would reject them, as he had done their predecessors: but now protection to agriculture was too exclusive, a more comprehensive cry was necessary, and the cry was raised of "Protection to native industry." But in that comprehensive sense native industry did not want that protection, and it repudiated alike their new-born sympathy and their worn-out legislation (loud cheers). The manufacturers of linens and of cloths did not require it; and though from boots and hats and other articles all protection had been withdrawn, the manufacturers found that they had suffered no harm, and they had the maxims to come forward and avow it. He said that there was not an instance in which they had withdrawn the protective system in which they had produced a disadvantage to the producer or the consumer. He entirely agreed that the interests of all the different classes of society were identical; but, if those interests were to be identified with, or to be embodied in, protection, he denied their identity. He denied any one to prove that the condition of the labourers had been improved by protection. The noble duke had drawn a pathetic picture of the air and scenery amid which the labourers performed their work, but he had not said a word about the wages paid in the south of England.

The Duke of CLEVELAND lived in the north, and not in the south.

The Earl of CLARENDON.—But he had not said a word about the labourers' wages in the north; of the quality of their food, of their moral or social condition, of their hopeless life of toil, or of the impossibility of their saving anything. To know their state he need only to remind noble lords of the evidence given by medical witnesses before Parliament two years ago, that with few exceptions the large mass of the labourers of England were miserably underfed, and that this was the reason why they could not perform a good day's work. He thought it impossible to show that the labourer could sink lower in the social scale, and he therefore could have no interest in protection. The next person who was protected was the tenant; and he admitted that some, who had not skill, money, or education, and who took 200 acres or 300 acres of land, as they would do a public house, and who had no more reason for being farmers than for being jewellers, might want protection to save them from their own incapacity. The arguments used for protection were always to make progress wait upon ignorance, and were as valid against the competition of home-grown corn as of foreign, and would be equally in favour of the spade over the plough, and the distaff over the spinning-jenny; but, with the good farmer, the man of intelligence, and capital, and industry, who did not obstinately adhere to the system and the implements of his forefathers—who considered the discoveries of science and reaped the profit of his own skill,—with such a man, he said, that competition would only do what it did in the case of all other articles—promote a healthy stimulus (hear). But it was supposed that they were to be inundated with a flood of foreign corn, and some imagined it would come on the waves of the ocean, and be delivered gratis at every man's door. It seemed only necessary to picture a plain in some distant part of Hungary or Poland, and it was at once invested with the power of growing 25 quarters to the acre to be delivered in 24 hours for a mere trifle at our own homes, without any remembrance of the inveterate habits of bad farmers and antiquated instruments, or the badness of the roads, or the want of transport; but when they had the example of Ireland at our own doors, governed by our own laws, infinitely less burdened with taxation than ourselves, with every facility for becoming the storehouse and the granary of this country, and when they saw a large portion of that country still waste, and affording annually a less and less supply, he said, with such an example before them of the difficulty of changing the habits of the people, they might have been spared a reference to the bugbear of inundation (cheers). But suppose that all at once there should be this inundation, the tenants could not pay so much rent, there must be a reduction, and this, in his opinion, was what would come of this groundless and hypothetical notion of a reduction of prices. He did not impute any selfish interests or motives to any one, but his own conviction was, that this was a landlord's question, and no one's else. To their honest and conscientious alarm they owed all the opposition to this measure, and all these lamentations. Not a word had been heard in that house when the import duty on linen and cotton and wool, and hats and boots, was reduced, and when the export of machinery had been allowed, and those changes which had been in accordance with the policy of this country for the last 20 years were adopted. All knew that the British lion was not then roused, and that the British sun did not then set for ever (loud laughter). It was only when corn and cattle, and hops and apples, were touched that they had heard of men denounced for abandoning their duty, and told that if they had been in India they would have all run away. The reason why he said that those fears were groundless and hypothetical was, that in consequence of the improvements in the science and practice of agriculture of late years, although the price of wheat had fallen 50 per cent., the rent had increased 16 or 17 per cent.; so that the price of wheat was no test of the production of the land, or of the rent which would be paid to the landlord. Although he admitted that at first some of their lordships might be very great sufferers, yet there was no panic in the country. No stimulus had been wanting to create it, but all the efforts had fallen still-born, whether made in or out of Parliament, at meetings, in the press, or at that great focus of alarm, No. 17, Old Bond-street (cheers), and notwithstanding the petition presented by the noble duke or the provincial assembly of very worthy men who were well paid for spending an agreeable day in London ("No, no"); but at least an assembly of such men who came to pass a day in London gratis, whether their expenses were paid or not he could not tell, did not constitute a panic. They could not set off such a meeting against the four months' discussion on the measure. There had been no proof of a panic from the farmers selling their stock or discharging their labourers, or of the tenants stopping improvement, notwithstanding their complete ruin, which had been so studiously explained to them; they did not throw up their farms; on the contrary, they renewed them, and land, notwithstanding the certainty of its being turned into waste, would most unaccountably fetch the accustomed price (loud cheers); nay, if any of their lordships would publicly announce that he would sell his estates for two or three years less than the present market price, the difficulty would not be to find a purchaser, but to select from the competitors for the property by whom he would be next week assailed (cries of "hear, hear"). Either the apprehensions were groundless, or there was good ground for them. If they were groundless, and if there was no reason to expect an inexhaustible supply of corn at a low price,—if it would be the same as in the Channel Islands, where with a power to select their own time for importation the average price was, in Jersey 50s., and in Guernsey 48s. to 50s.,—if the British farmers were as a body the most skilled farmers in the world, and if we had as good a climate and fertile a soil as any other, for in no other country in the world was the same quantity of wheat produced (hear),—if we had a better breed of cattle, better roads, and better markets, and cheaper labour for the quantity of work done—and that had been proved by the English labourers employed abroad in the construction of railways, who received double the wages of foreign labourers, and yet the capitalists found that they did more than double work;—if there were all these circumstances in our favour, how could the profits of agriculture or the rent of land materially fall? Or, suppose the price of corn to fall 10s., as his noble friend opposite calculated, what was this but saying that except for the existing law, the people would obtain their corn 10s. a quarter cheaper, and that they were laying a tax in that proportion on the consumer, not one farthing of which went into the Exchequer, or into the pockets of the landlords, but which was consumed in the increased cost of production, and was just as much wasted as if it were cast into the sea? He entertained a very strong persuasion that the working man would be very little grateful to those who made him lay out all the produce of his industry in the purchase of mere necessities, and permitted him to expend nothing in the comforts, still less in the refinements which a civilised state of society furnished (hear). It seemed to be the great argument of the protectionists, that the producers of corn would derive great advantages from a continuance of the old system. Did any impartial and intelligent person suppose that an exclusion of foreign corn would have the effect of preventing a diminution in the value of land? It was notorious that land did not offer a better investment than any other mode of employing capital. The rents of land and the profits of agriculture yielded a very insufficient return for the capital devoted to those pursuits, and yet the laws which were intended to regulate production and to protect industry were passed by and for the landed interest. Still that interest made but little progress. No class came so often before Parliament for relief as did those who were engaged in the cultivation of land; none made so many and such piteous complaints; yet noble lords called upon Parliament to keep up a system which experience had shown to work so ill—a system of which no one could guarantee the continuance for three years. For such a system the aristocracy of the country placed themselves in a condition of great disadvantage, in lieu of occupying that position to which their wealth, character, and influence justly entitled them. For the sake of maintaining such a system they exposed the country to infinite uncertainty and confusion, while they exposed themselves to the hostility of those powerful associations which the wealth, the activity, and energy of the middle classes enabled them to form. It had been said, and he quite concurred in the opinion, that we ought to meet hostile tariffs with Free Trade. Sooner or late all negotiations with foreign countries upon such a subject must fail. Whenever treaties were entered into, it generally happened that in the long run one party or the other conceived that they were overreached. Whichever happened to yield to that persuasion immediately entertained an irresistible desire to break through the terms of the treaty; and that state of feeling led to never-ending disputes, and often to hostility; therefore he entertained a strong conviction that all nations would act prudently if they did that which was best for themselves, without too minutely inquiring whether other countries observed the strict rules of reciprocity. If the Governments of other countries acted upon unsound or illiberal principles, that was no reason why the people of England should not buy in the cheapest, and, if they pleased, sell in the dearest markets. If England did what was wise and prudent, other countries would soon follow her example. The recent history of our commercial intercourse with Germany appeared to him in a remarkable degree to illustrate and confirm the doctrines for which he had been contending. When the Zollverein commenced, in 1833, our exports to Germany fell to a very low point. In 1839, when our commercial policy underwent a change, our exports to Germany rose to 4,800,000*l.*; and in the year 1844 those exports rose to between 6,000,000*l.* and 7,000,000*l.* He would remind them also of our intercourse with France. When the revolution of 1830 took place in that country, there was a proposition for revising the commercial relations of France and England. He was one of the commissioners appointed by the Government of that day to arrange the terms of the treaty then about to be formed, and he was bound to say that the French Ministry were quite as eager as the representatives of England could be to conclude a treaty upon the fairest terms; but the result was not satisfactory, and our exports to France did not amount to 500,000*l.* till an alteration in the tariff took place, and then they rose until at length they reached 2,600,000*l.* The same principles, though in a different form, applied to Spain and Portugal. Their laws were absolutely prohibitory, yet British manufactures were to be found in those countries cheap and abundant. Prohibitions were vain, the smuggler always took care that wherever there was a large demand there should always be an abundant supply. In Switzerland, in Belgium, in the United States, the same rules were found uniformly to apply. The Emperor Napoleon, with all the means and appliances which he possessed, was not able to check the progress of the contraband trade, and it was even thought that his attempts to do so contributed to his downfall. In this country, with all the power that the Government possessed, we were not able to prevent the operation of the contraband trade. Formerly we could not do it in the case of silk, and now it is found to be equally impossible in the case of tobacco. The only way to put it down was to render the trade of the smuggler unprofitable, and it was highly encouraging to those who earnestly desired to witness the triumph of Free Trade principles, that at the present moment there was a Free Trade League in Paris with a duke at its head. It was well known that in the American Congress it had been proposed that no duties should in future be imposed, except for the purposes of revenue; and it was quite evident that the tendency of all public opinion must be towards a free intercourse between all nations. Restrictions upon trade were rapidly crumbling away, and would soon be forgotten amongst other antiquated systems. To promote Free Trade was to carry into effect the law of God. Freedom of commercial intercourse was a policy which gave and received the best guarantees for the preservation of that most inestimable blessing, peace. The present measure appeared to have been brought forward, not only with reference to our foreign policy, but also with regard to our domestic position, at a most favourable moment. He conceived it to be a measure founded upon the true interests of all classes as well as upon a comprehensive view of the varying circumstances and complicated interests of this great country (hear, hear).

SPEECH OF EARL GREY.

Earl GREY rose to resume the debate. He proceeded to say that the subject before the house had been both in and out of Parliament—in speeches and in pamphlets—so long and so fully discussed, that their lordships might be of opinion that no new argument could be now brought forward, and that they were anxious, therefore, to bring the debate to a close; and were it not that he had for many years taken a deep interest and an active part in the discussion of the question, he would have stood aloof in this, probably the last, battle to be fought betwixt Free Trade and monopoly. One of the reasons, however, which influenced him in rising was the feeling that a great impression had been made on their lordships by the speech which they had listened to on the first night of the debate, from the noble lord the late Secretary for the Colonies, whose absence, from what he heard of the unfortunate cause of it, he very greatly lamented. He had listened to the speech in question with as much attention and delight as any of their lordships. His arguments were put with so much skill, and clothed in language of such extreme beauty, that for upwards of three hours he rivetted the attention of every noble lord who listened to him, and made listening to him—very different to what listening to many others was—not a labour, but a delight. He (Earl Grey) knew that some of the arguments in that speech had already been answered, especially by his noble friend who sat behind him. But it seemed to him that there were still portions of that speech to which it was requisite that their lordships' attention should be particularly called. He was not vain or presumptuous enough to suppose that he was fitted to enter into the lists with his noble friend, but he had such confidence in the power of truth that he believed that even in his (Earl Grey's) feeble hands the cause which he advocated might be sufficiently recommended to their lordships, and that he should be able to show to the satisfaction of the house that in some most important points of his noble friend's speech his noble friend was mistaken. Through the whole course of the debates it had struck him very forcibly that noble lords opposite had avoided an explicit avowal of that which he took to be the main object and aim of the Corn Laws. He thought it was clear that the real aim of those laws, and the object really intended by them, was to secure what was called a remunerating price for corn, or, in other words, to raise the price of food for the people by artificially restricting the supply (hear, hear). If, as he ventured to submit to their lordships it was, this was the real object of all these laws, it was one which required strong arguments to prove its expediency. Unless some very cogent reasons could be advanced for it, it must naturally be concluded that it was not scarcity and dearth, but plenty and cheapness in the food of the people which was to be desired. But although the proof of the necessity of raising the price of corn lay, as he thought, at the root of the matter, he must say that throughout all the speeches which their lordships had heard in opposition to this bill it must have struck them that the opponents of the measure had to a great extent evaded this question. There had been an attempt made to show that upon other and different grounds protection was necessary, and in particular, most of the noble lords who opposed the bill had told the house that the great object of the Corn Laws was really to secure a certain supply, and to save the empire from the great danger of depending on foreign nations for a supply of the most necessary article of national subsistence (hear). Without meaning any offence, he hoped he might be permitted to say that it was unfortunately out of his power to regard this as anything more than a colourable argument. Let him ask their lordships what they would say, supposing similar arguments under similar circumstances were urged by others. Would those noble lords who now defended the Corn Laws give implicit credit to such arguments? He would suppose, for instance, that the cotton manufacturers of this country, instead of manufacturing for the whole world, manufactured for this country only. He would suppose, also, that foreign cotton manufactures were virtually excluded by high protecting duties. Now, if the cotton manufacturers of this country were to come to their lordships' house under such circumstances, and say, "Oh, do not repeal those duties, or in the event of a war the population will be left without shirts and without gowns," he wanted to know whether their lordships would feel perfectly convinced that it was their disinterested alarm for the welfare of the consumers of cotton in this country which induced them to clamour for a continuance of high protecting duties. Would their lordships consider that these representations were made out of a just regard to the interests of the consumer? He must say, therefore, that he was a little incredulous, whether that which had excited so much enthusiasm at the protectionist meetings, and had attracted such crowds to Willis's Rooms that the noble dukes on the cross benches had been obliged to divide their forces, was a mere apprehension that at some future time our supplies from abroad might fail, and that, as a consequence of that failure, prices might rise to an extravagant height. He could not help suspecting that it was rather an apprehension of having too much corn now, and too low prices at the present time, than of having at some future time too little corn, and that corn too dear. Taking the latter apprehension, however, to exist in the minds of those who advocated a Corn Law, the groundlessness of the fear had been completely established by his noble and learned friend (Lord Brougham). His noble and learned friend's reference to the undoubted fact that Napoleon, in the height of his power, was not enabled to prevent the corn which was wanted in this country from coming into it, was conclusive on the subject. If they wanted further proof, he would refer their lordships to what had been said by his noble friend the late Secretary for the Colonies. His noble friend had contended, that it was one of the boldest and most laughable of paradoxes to maintain that competition did not tend to make articles cheaper. He (Earl Grey) on the other hand maintained that it was just such a paradox to assert that security for a certain and cheap supply of corn was not to be found in extending as widely as possible the sources from which supplies could be obtained, and by sweeping away artificial restrictions. Utterly rejecting then, as he did, the notion that this law was to be maintained, if it should be maintained, for any other purpose than restricting the supply and enhancing the price of corn, he would ask if this was a fair and legitimate object. His noble friend who sat behind him, had said that upon a bare calculation of the amount to which prices might be expected to fall when the Corn Laws were repealed, the existence of a Corn Law could not be considered as imposing a tax of less than 10,000,000*l.* sterling upon the people of this country (hear, hear). This charge was double the amount of the income-tax, and double that of the malt-tax, and it was imposed, as his noble friend justly observed, not for the purposes of the State, for not one farthing came into the Exchequer, but for the imaginary interests of a particular class. He said the imaginary interests of a class, because he really believed that the landholders themselves shared greatly in the evils which the existence of a Corn Law produced. Their lordships had been told, however, that this statement was an unfair representation of the fact, and that admitting that the price of corn was raised by a Corn Law, and admitting also that the payment of a higher price for food would in itself be a burden to the working classes, still they were not really injured by the protection which was given to agriculture, because the effect of the existing law was to keep up the wages of labour in the same proportion as it raised the price of corn. This was the great argument used by his noble friend who spoke on Monday night. Now, it was clear that in the first instance, at all events, an increase in the price of food was a tax on the income of the working population, and therefore, before they determined to maintain the law on the ground that the labouring classes were compensated for this tax by a corresponding rise in their wages, they ought to be very sure that this was the fact. This point, however, which lay at the root of the matter, was very lightly passed over by his noble friend. His noble friend argued that if the prices of corn were reduced, wages also would be brought down, and the labouring population would be no gainers whatever by the reduction in the price of food. That was certainly a very easy way of disposing of the question, but it was not satisfactory to his (Earl Grey's) mind, and his noble friend had made an admission in the course of his speech which seemed to him (Earl Grey) to lead to a directly opposite conclusion. His noble friend admitted that wages did not vary year by year with the price of corn. He said that in cheap years the labourer had no doubt a temporary advantage; and that as in dear years wages did not instantly rise in a corresponding ratio with the price of corn, he was for some time a considerable sufferer. The experience, however, which they had in the last few years was perfectly decisive on that question. He would compare the years 1833, 1834, and 1835, when corn was plentiful, with the years 1839, 1840, and 1841, when it was dear. In the first of these triennial periods trade was good, there was a great demand for labour, and wages were consequently high. In the years 1839, 1840, and 1841, trade was slack, there was very little demand for labour, and wages were low. The condition of the country at that time was too recent, and made too great an impression, to require him to dwell upon it. There could be no doubt that the difficulties experienced in these bad years could be easily accounted for. When corn rose to a very high price, every family throughout the kingdom was obliged to spend a larger portion of its income on food than was the case in other years. There was, therefore, less of available income for other purposes. There was less demand for clothing, less demand for tea and sugar, and less demand for manufactures. The trade of the manufacturers and the merchants fell off, and consequently there was a general diminution of their power of employing labour, and a general diminution in the power of production. His noble friend admitted this to be the working of high prices for corn, and he (Earl Grey) wanted to know what ground there was for supposing that any difference would occur if high prices became permanent instead of temporary. He believed that if the price of food was permanently high the result would be the same as that produced by occasional high prices, namely, that less employment would be given, leading of course to low wages. On the contrary, if low prices prevailed, industry was better employed—there was a great demand for labour, and wages rose. This was the conclusion which he thought they had a right to infer from simple reasoning; but the correctness of that reasoning was borne out by the fact that when their lordships looked to other countries, where there was permanent plenty and a low price of food, unless there were some countervailing circumstances, wages were invariably high. A noble earl who had spoken on the other side had said that wages were not regulated by the price of food, because, although in America and Australia, where food was cheap, wages were high; yet in Poland, where food was also cheap, wages were low. Poland, however, was not a fair instance to cite, as that country was kept down by misgovernment, and the unhappy social condition of its population; but he would challenge the noble earl to mention any country in the world, beginning from Canada, to Australia, where there was a small population in proportion to the extent of territory, and where food was cheap, and good order and good government prevailed, where wages were not also exceedingly high. This was an acknowledged fact, and the reason why wages were so high was simply on account of the abundance of food, which obliged employers to compete for labour instead of finding that which took place in this country, where labour was compelled to compete for employment. The Corn Laws in this country inflicted on us a double disadvantage, for while they enhanced the price of food, they depressed the rate of wages. He observed that a noble marquis denied that conclusion, but he hoped that if there were any defect in the chain of reasoning by which he had arrived at that conclusion, it might be pointed out to him before the termination of the debate. If such, however, was really the operation of the Corn Law on the condition of the labourers, that fact in itself ought to be conclusive. As a Christian legislature, if they were only satisfied of that fact, no other argument ought to be necessary to induce them to sweep away these restrictions altogether. When he looked at the condition of the labourers in this country—when he saw the frightful condition to which the agricultural labourer was reduced in Dorsetshire, Wiltshire, and other counties—when he knew how low their remuneration was even in other more favoured counties—and when he knew that the working of the Corn Law was at once to depress wages and to raise the price of food, it was of no further use to argue the question. Taking what he assumed to be the case as true, it was of no use for noble lords to come down to the house and state at what very low prices large quantities of foreign corn might be introduced into this country. Noble lords might excite panic and needless alarm by making such declarations; but supposing them to be right in their views upon this part of the case, though he believed them to be wrong, and assuming that the price of corn would fall to the extent which they supposed, then the wrong done to the labourer was only so much the greater. While he stated this, however, he must at the same time say that he thought it a great evil that any such panic should be created. It was well known that, in 1842, those who were called "the farmers' friends" did the farmers very great injury by their predictions of what would take place. The farmers, many of them at least, were gulled by prophecies of the great fall which would take place in the price of meat, and they were induced to rush to market, and get rid of their property for less than it was worth; and he believed that at this moment the country was still suffering from the effects of that panic (hear, hear, hear). He hoped, therefore, that no panic would be created, and he was happy to find from all the information which had reached him, that it was not likely that any such panic would be excited. He found that land was never better let, and never sold better than at the present moment (hear, hear). He believed that the demand for draining tiles was at this moment particularly active, and so great was the desire to use them that, when a kiln of draining tiles was known to be ready, there was quite a competition among the farmers of the neighbourhood to obtain them. He thought that in this the farmers and occupiers of land showed much judgment. He believed that all the calculations which had been made of the price at which corn could be sold in this country, if protection were taken away, were made without proper data; and while upon this point he could not help adverting to a statement made by his noble friend (Lord Stanley) who spoke on Monday night, and which had been furnished to his noble friend by a high practical authority. His noble friend told the house that there were two cargoes of wheat at Liverpool, which his correspondent had purchased at twenty-three shillings and sixpence a qr. Now, as this statement seemed to him to be a specimen of those which had been made upon this part of the question, he would read a short extract from a letter which he had received from Liverpool:—"It is perfectly true that Lord Stanley's correspondent holds two cargoes of wheat, imported from the Danube, which cost him the price named in his letter. The natural inference is, that wheat can be shipped from the Danube at 14s. per quarter, free on board. Nothing, however, could be more fallacious. The cargoes in question were ordered in 1844 from Ibrail by a house in Manchester, by whom they were sold at a loss of 10s. per quarter. The original cost was about 33s. per quarter, including freight; but (thanks to the glorious uncertainty of the sliding scale) they were too late to be released at the lowest point of duty in that year, and were sold to the said gentleman at 23s. 6d. Now, to adduce this as any evidence of the shipping prices of wheat is equally absurd and unfair. As well might railway shares, selling at 50 per cent. discount, be adduced to indicate cheapness of construction. As regards Hungary, and other countries contiguous to the Mediterranean, Lord Stanley's ideas of their capabilities of supply are a mere chimera."

Under 35s. per quarter, free on board, for middling qualities of wheat, I venture to say we shall get no additional supply of any magnitude from that quarter. Freights thence, too, are nearly double, compared with freights from the Baltic. To return to Lord Stanley's correspondent, I may mention that he actually bought yesterday a cargo of red Wismar wheat, just arrived, at about 45s. per quarter, which, allowing 10s. for duty, charges, and profit, would make it stand 55s. per quarter free. This, at all events, proves he has no great practical fears of the effects of the new measure, however potent his theoretical may be. Lord Stanley wished to make it appear that wheat could be imported from the Danube at 14s. per quarter; the present price is 25s., which may appear low enough; but it is wheat of the most inferior description, mixed with rye and black seeds, and not within 15s. per quarter of the value of good Dantzic wheat, besides which it often arrives so heated as to be unfit for bread" (hear, hear, hear). It appeared, therefore, that taking into consideration the risk of heating, and the quality of the corn, wheat could not be brought into this country and sold at a lower price than that which British wheat now bore in the market. He thought that the result of former predictions of the same kind ought to teach those who were interested in the land how little reliance ought to be placed on such predictions. He would take, for instance, the case of wool. His noble friend had said that wool was a strong case in point, and that as the price of that article was very much relied on by the Free Traders, he would show how the price had been affected by the reduction of the duty. His noble friend then took the prices of wool in the years immediately preceding the removal of the duty, and the prices of wool in the years immediately subsequent, and endeavoured in this way to show what had been the effect of a removal of protection. But what were the real facts of the case? The duty on wool was reduced just at the time of the panic in 1833. After that time the trade and commerce of the country declined considerably, and the price of wool went down like the price of other articles. For some years the price remained low, and he remembered that in 1828 there was a committee of that house moved for to consider this subject by his noble friend the noble duke (the Duke of Richmond) who sat on the cross benches. A great number of farmers were brought before that committee to show that wool was then at a ruinously low price. These parties proved, with great minuteness and detail, what advantages the foreign producer of wool had over the home grower, and they stated that the low prices which had already been experienced were nothing to what was coming, and that when there was Free Trade in wool, prices would fall to a ruinous extent. Parliament was wise enough to listen to those apprehensions, and what was the result of that wisdom? The result was that in one or two years after the alteration was carried into effect wool recovered, the price rose, the manufacture improved; and from that moment to the present wool was one of the greatest articles of agricultural production (hear, hear, hear). The noble duke (the Duke of Richmond), he perceived, shook his head at that statement; but he would remind the noble duke that although a good deal of wool was produced in Sussex, yet there was also a great deal of wool produced in Cumberland, so that he (Earl Grey) had an excellent opportunity of becoming acquainted with the facts of this case; and he could state that from 1828 up to this time wool had maintained a good price, and was higher than it had been before the removal of the duty (hear, hear). If, then, the predictions as to the loss which was to result from a free competition in the case of wool had not turned out to be true, were they not justified in supposing that the predictions as regarded the probable effects of the proposed change in the Corn Laws would be equally fallacious (hear, hear)? When the tariff was under consideration, the greatest possible apprehensions were entertained by some as to the effect which the permission to introduce foreign cattle was calculated to produce upon the price of corn. It was stated that if stock were allowed to come in from foreign countries free from duty, the effect of such an alteration would be virtually to repeal the Corn Laws, for the same agricultural produce which could be produced cheaply in foreign countries could be sent into this country in the more portable shape of fat stock. That argument would be very forcible and well founded if corn could in reality be produced so cheaply in foreign countries as those who relied on the argument presumed. If such were the case, cheap agricultural produce could indeed be introduced in the more portable shape of fat sheep and oxen. They all knew that the apprehension as to the effect of the reduction of duty on stock, as regarded agricultural produce, was quite fallacious, and had now altogether passed away. His noble friend (Lord Stanley), in his speech on Monday night, dwelt very forcibly upon the argument which had been used by some, that the present high price of cattle was owing to the tariff; and he (Earl Grey) must remark that notwithstanding the fears which were entertained, four years' experience of the tariff had altogether disproved the assertion that the introduction of foreign cattle would have the effect of lowering the price of cattle the produce of our own country. If it were capable of producing any such tendency, it might have produced it at the end of four years at least to some extent; and yet within the last year the supply of cattle from abroad was not sufficient to check the tendency to a rise in price which prevailed in our own markets, whilst the few thousand head of cattle exported from Germany had produced a sensible effect upon the markets of that country, so that in many of the German towns the price of the fat stock was within a small degree as high as in this country. Similar apprehensions had been indulged in with respect to the reduction of the duty upon flax; and, in fact, of all the important articles of agricultural produce which were included in the tariff. But although flax was more valuable in proportion to its bulk than corn, yet subsequent experience had proved that the British growers of flax had no just cause of fear from foreign competition. His noble friend (Lord Stanley) had asked those who were in favour of the removal of restriction on the importation of corn, what advantage would come of it, if, as they stated, it would not considerably reduce the price of bread? His noble friend thought on that occasion that he had reduced the advocates of Free Trade in corn to a dilemma from which they could not escape. It seemed rather a probable argument in the beginning, but if they looked closely to it what became of it? It was quite fallacious. For his part, he (Earl Grey) did not assert that there would be a great fall in the price of corn, and he was one of the advocates for the removal of restriction. He did not think it would cause as low a price as 36s. per quarter, which they all had witnessed in the last week of December, 1835, nor did he think it would produce as high a price as 81s. 6d., which corn had reached, as their lordships would recollect, in the week ending the 11th of January, 1839. But this he expected, that whilst neither that high price or that low price would be the natural result of the alteration in the law, an average price would be produced by it, but not greatly lower than the average of the last twelve years, and that the price of corn would invariably fluctuate within narrower limits than it does under the present system. The fact of its fluctuating less would be in itself a most important advantage, for it would be admitted on all hands that great benefit would arise from a more steady price. One of the greatest advantages which a civilized country could possess over barbarous countries was its power of preventing those great variations in supply which barbarous countries were apt to suffer from, the latter having at one time a superabundant supply of the necessities of life, and suffering the utmost distress at another period from a deficient supply of food (hear, hear). Civilized countries, by the natural operations of commerce, enjoyed very great advantages as regarded the steadiness of supply. By those natural operations of commerce, mercantile men, for their own interest, would buy corn in cheap years for the purpose of selling it in dear years; and according to this beautiful system, if it were not interfered with by law, the prices would be to a great extent regulated, the alterations would be checked, and the suffering which must result from an insufficient supply would be removed without injury to any class (cheers). The wholesome operation of this system we had prevented by our own interference, by the operation of an artificial law. It appeared from evidence before the agricultural committee of 1836, that at a former period, when a different state of the law rendered dealing in corn less hazardous than it is at present, there was usually in this country a stock on hand of six months' consumption; but such had been the effect of the law of 1815, in rendering the corn trade hazardous, that the usual stock on hand now at the same period of the year was a fortnight's consumption. What had caused that? It was caused by a law which rendered the trade in corn a sort of gambling transaction (hear, hear). His noble friend had stated that some of the agricultural distress which was complained of under the operation of a system of protection was to be referred to abundant crops in particular years, and the consequent effect upon prices. Why was it that farmers had exerted themselves to such an extent as to exceed the demand that would be profitable? It was because high prices had been artificially stimulated, and excess of consumption thus became a cause of agricultural distress. So long as the country depended on its own supply there must be a chance of agricultural distress; but if the supply were more regular, if a steady trade were established in corn, then in cheap years the freight of corn from foreign ports would be much higher in comparison to the price of corn than it would be in dear years, and therefore, there being less inducement to exportation from foreign ports in those years, there would be the greater inducement in the home market to take our home produce instead of foreign corn, so that under such a system the farmer would be compensated for the fall in price by the greater sale of corn than usual; for he (Earl Grey) would not go the length of saying that corn would not be cheaper in years of abundance, even after this measure was carried (hear, hear). Another advantage, and one of, in fact, incalculable importance, would be, that there would be an immense increase in the consumption of corn on the part of the people of this country; for no one would, he was sure, deny that a portion of our population consume at present much less corn than it was desirable that they should consume (hear, hear). Every one would admit that the labourers of Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, who at present consume more potatoes and less bread than it was desirable they should consume, would be benefited by being enabled to consume a greater quantity of food than they consume under the existing law (hear, hear). He knew that one gentleman, who advocated the Corn Laws, had stated that millions rejoiced in potatoes; but he (Earl Grey) believed that they would rejoice more in the substitution of a description of food mainly composed of corn (hear, hear). He (Earl Grey) was of opinion, notwithstanding that statement, that those millions would rejoice far more in a food consisting more of bread and less of inferior articles of consumption, than that which they can under existing circumstances obtain. He had described some of the advantages which were to be expected from a Free Trade in corn. A steady trade, which it was calculated to produce, would secure constant employment to the manufacturer; and those engaged in manufactures would thus become greater consumers of corn and cattle than they are at present. And what would be the effect of that increased consumption of articles of agricultural produce? The effect would be, that an impulse would be given to the farmers to produce more cattle than they do now; and he need not tell their lordships that the foundation of every attempt to improve agriculture was to enable the farmer to keep a larger amount of stock, and that if the farmer had encouragement to keep more stock, he could produce corn cheaper (hear, hear). The direct effect, therefore, of this increased demand would be to cause agricultural improvement, and he believed that agriculture—which might now be regarded as almost in its infancy—would, under these improved and favourable circumstances, advance with a rapidity of which we had now but little notion (cheers). This was one of the advantages which he anticipated from the proposed alteration in the law, and it was an advantage which, he was convinced, could be obtained without any sweeping away of tenantry, such as had been described by the noble duke (Richmond) on Monday (cries of “hear, hear”). He (Earl Grey) should be as sorry as the noble duke to witness any such sweeping change in the tenantry of the country as the noble duke anticipated from this measure, if carried into effect; but he felt that no such change would be required, for the farmers were disposed to improve the cultivation, and, as his noble friend had remarked, the effect of foreign competition could only be felt by degrees. The cultivation could therefore be improved and extended to meet that foreign competition. His noble friend had said that some time would elapse before the foreign competition could come into effect; but he (Earl Grey) thought it rather an advantage that the progress of the competition should be gradual, and that the increased cultivation abroad for this market should be accompanied by an increased cultivation at home—a cultivation which would have all the benefit of the skill and energy of our farmers (hear, hear). Amongst the causes which would operate to improve our agriculture, he would mention a change in the law to facilitate the conveyance of landed property as one that was calculated to do a great amount of good if carried into effect. Under those circumstances he was of opinion that the removal of protection would afford the strongest possible encouragement to improved farming, and increased production; and their lordships were all aware, from their acquaintance with the subject of the cultivation of land, that improved farming implied more employment to labour (hear, hear, hear)—that by higher farming the employment of more hands on the land, and their employment more continuously, were necessarily implied (hear, hear, hear). Part of the evidence before a committee moved for by a noble friend of his was to the effect that the farmers in the south of England were obliged, in order to keep down the poor rates, to employ more hands on their land than under other circumstances they would be inclined to do, but he (Earl Grey) would undertake to say that there was no farm in England on which every man now employed—aye, and more than were now employed—might not be employed with profit and advantage, with a better demand for agricultural produce (loud cheers). [A noble lord remarked that the increased employment would require increased capital.] All that was required in order to make capital flow towards the improvement of the land was to remove the uncertainty caused by the present system of protection (cheers). It appeared to him that any one who soberly and deliberately considered the subject, would see that the effect of the measure now before them would not be to throw land in this country out of cultivation (hear, hear). He was so far from supposing the effect of the measure would be to throw land out of cultivation, that he thought they might date a new progress in the cultivation of land from the removal of protection (loud cheers). Another anticipation which had been indulged in as regarded the probable effects of the measure, was a fall of rent, and that too was an anticipation which he did not expect to see realised. What was it, he would ask, to which they owed the value of landed property in this country? There was infinitely better land than 50 out of every 100 portions of this country in the prairies and wilds of America, which might be bought at 2s. 6d. an acre; and what was it which made our land, that was so much less fertile, so much superior in value to that land in America (hear, hear, hear)? It was the existence in this country of a large, an industrious, and a rich population (hear, and cheers). That and that only it was which gave value to the landed property in this country, and it was only consistent with common reason to suppose that anything which went to increase the national wealth, and develop the national industry, and increase the prosperity of the realm, would also increase the value of landed property (hear, hear, and cheers). His noble friend (Lord Stanley), in his speech on Monday night, adduced the case of Ireland, which being an exporting instead of an importing country, would necessarily suffer a great deal from the proposed measure. He (Earl Grey) could show their lordships that no part of the United Kingdom would gain so largely from the passing of this law as the sister kingdom; but he had already gone so largely into the question that he would not enter upon the subject of its probable effect upon Ireland at that stage of the bill, and he would now direct the attention of their lordships to another point, which had been dwelt upon very forcibly by his noble friend on Monday night. The noble lord produced a great impression on the house by describing the effect which this measure would be likely to create upon the condition of our colonies and upon our interests as connected with the maintenance of our colonial possessions. That was a subject of very great importance, and he (Earl Grey) was so impressed with the high value which ought to be laid on the preservation of our colonial empire, that he believed if this law would shake the security of that empire, or its connection with the mother country, it would deserve the gravest consideration before they agreed to repeal the present system of protection. He, however, entertained unhesitatingly the conviction that, so far from being a disadvantage to the colonies—so far from having a tendency to weaken the ties which unite them to us, the adoption, in the largest sense and in the most complete manner, of the principles of commercial freedom, was the policy of all others, which was best calculated to strengthen those ties (loud cheers). His noble friend had asked, that if the colonists were told that they were no more to this country than Frenchmen or Dutchmen, what inducement would they have to wish to be united to this country? To that he (Earl Grey) would answer, that his noble friend should recollect that by this measure it was not proposed to apply the principle of the removal of restriction to the colonies exclusively, but it was merely intended to apply to them a principle which we proposed to apply to ourselves (hear, hear). Would any one say that Cumberland and Yorkshire would be treated badly by this measure because we did not leave them a protective duty (hear, hear)? If our own counties, then, were to be treated in the same manner by this bill as the colonies, then the colonies had no reason to complain. He could understand how some persons in the old country, where there was a great competition for employment, could be induced to take a narrow view of the subject, and thus be could see how it was that many persons had been induced to form the opinion that protection was an advantage, and that it was not wise to let in foreign goods to compete with our home market, but with respect to the colonies there was no such difficulty as that competition for employment (hear). On the contrary, in every one of our own colonies, the great difficulty was to find sufficient labour to develop fully its natural resources; and if the effect of the proposed system should be to divert labour in the colonies to its natural and most productive channels, instead of to artificial and unproductive channels, there could be no doubt that it would be an advantage to our colonies (hear, hear). Could any one doubt that Canada was poorer now than she would have been if there never had been a protective duty in favour of her timber (hear, hear)? If, instead of letting into our markets bad timber, when we could have had good, we had never adopted that system, Canada would be better off; and the same principle would apply to all our colonies. The colonies had received no advantage from protecting duties, whilst in many cases those duties had been directly injurious to them. The West Indies had suffered from not having been allowed to get their necessities in the cheapest market, or to send their supplies in the cheapest form to this country. They gained nothing by protection, and as regarded the effect of commercial dependence in strengthening the ties between the colonies and this country, he would put it to their lordships whether the system of commercial dependence had in reality strengthened the ties between the colonies and the mother country. Did they not all know that jealousy, arising from that commercial dependence, had produced that American war, which ended in the loss of those extensive colonies to the Crown of this country (hear, hear)? He would not say that in their present state of importance those states would have been kept in dependence on the British Crown; but they might have parted from us in a different manner, and without leaving any feeling of jealousy towards the mother country, if it had not been for commercial dependence (hear, hear, and laughter). He was rather surprised that his noble friend, in the course of his speech, touched on the colonies for an illustration; for he thought that the principle with respect to trade which he had adopted towards the colonies was not, to say the least of it, very fortunate. Under that policy the corn of Canada was allowed into this country at a nominal duty, whilst that advantage was not given to any other colony. That advantage had been given to Canada almost avowedly because it had been recently in a state of rebellion, but it was refused to those which had been always obedient and loyal (hear, hear, and cheers); and he (Earl Grey) thought that such a course of policy was calculated to excite a spirit of disaffection (hear, hear). His noble friend asked, if we were to have no advantage in the markets of the colonies, of what use were they to us? He would be permitted to say that such a mode of argument was rather defective. It was those who defended protection who were to prove that it was good; but how did they prove it? They said that if they did not keep up protection they would lose the colonies. They said they kept the colonies by a protective duty, and they then turned round and said, if they did not keep up protection, of what use were the colonies? That was a specimen of what was called arguing in a circle. He believed that the connection between the colonies and the mother country was a mutual advantage, requiring no such support to maintain it. In our colonial empire we possessed friends and allies in every quarter of the globe—we had thus a large population in various parts of the world, possessing great natural resources, united heart and soul with us, ready to take part with us in all our conflicts—and thus we maintained in each possession a garrison of the cheapest kind, whilst they gloried in the security of being an integral part of the greatest and most enlightened, and most civilised nation upon the face of the earth (hear, hear, and cheers). They gloried—and he knew that they felt it as a glory in calling themselves British subjects, and in having their interests and rights protected by the power of this country, which was ready to be called forth to maintain their interests when it was required (hear). He believed that if they pursued a liberal policy in other respects towards the colonies, by extending to them the dearest rights of Englishmen, the privilege of self-government, and not needlessly interfering in their domestic concerns—that if they adopted a sound policy, politically as well as commercially, they would bind them with a chain which no power on earth could break. His noble friend told their lordships that this country had encouraged Canada to expend large sums of money in the improvement of their navigation, and that we had encouraged Canada to impose a duty on wheat from the United States; he said that this had been done on the faith of the Corn Law, and he asked would it not be unjust to the Canadians to alter that law on the faith of which they had acted? His noble friend described the route for commerce by Canada, and through the United States, and after detailing the effects which he anticipated from this measure, he asked what chance would the Canadians have to compete with the United States if this law were carried? The noble lord continued: Now I want to know what are the feelings of the Canadians themselves upon the subject, for surely that is an important point (hear, hear). My noble friend says “hear, hear.” Now I hold in my hand a newspaper containing a report of the debates in the Canadian Assembly, which I will presently read. Her Majesty’s Government, when they determined on repealing the existing Corn Laws, addressed the Canadian Legislature, saying that they were at liberty to repeal the duty of 3s. a quarter on American wheat, which at our instigation they had imposed (cries of “hear, hear”). Accordingly a measure for the repeal of that duty was submitted to the Canadian senate, on which occasion it happened that a motion for reporting progress was carried, and that was assumed to be a declaration on the part of the Canadian Assembly that they were altogether hostile to the measures of the Government. What, however, was the fact? It seems that that amendment was carried, almost under a misapprehension, from the parties not exactly understanding the effect of the vote; for a few days afterwards, when the consideration of the subject was resumed, and a vote was to be taken, the result was very different. I have read the speeches on the subject, and instead of finding them characterised by a tone of despondency—instead of crying out against the injustice of this country—instead of lamenting the ruin to which they were to be liable, the utter destruction of their great public works, and of their commercial interests, I am happy to say that, by the majority of that assembly, language far more manly and more creditable was held. They say, “As England will no longer give us protection, let us see if we can’t do without it; and as the first step, let us repeal this duty on American corn. We can grow corn cheaper than America” (hear, hear). One gentleman says that he has been over to Buffalo, and that he finds corn there always 8d. or 6d. per bushel dearer than he can afford to give in Upper Canada. Another says, “Our public works were never in a more promising state, and when they are completed we shall enter with great advantage into competition with America. The locks upon the Erie canal are much more numerous and more expensive in working than those upon the St. Lawrence. We can then not only carry our own corn, but the corn of the western states through the St. Lawrence, cheaper than the Americans can carry it by the Erie canal” (hear, hear, hear). When they came to divide upon the question, I find those who are in favour of repealing the duty, who have no fear in the success of Canadian energy and Canadian enterprise in opposition to American are in a majority of 45 to 27. The resolutions were carried by that majority, and the Canadian assembly determined on admitting American corn for passage through their country to England (hear, hear). But, my lords, my noble friend said something more. My noble friend said that this was treatment so unjust to the Canadas, that he thought it was calculated to shake their feeling of loyalty to the British Crown. I confess I heard that language with great regret; because I think he prophesied a diminution in the strength of those ties which now unite the people of Canada to ourselves in such a manner as almost to imply that they would be justified in disregarding our claims upon their loyalty (hear, hear). But, my lords, in the same week in which the Canadian assembly had been discussing the effect which the change of our commercial policy would produce, a militia bill is brought under their consideration, and with your permission I will read to the house a passage from a Canadian newspaper, containing a summary of what passed on that occasion:—“Dr. Taché made an admirable speech—temperate, argumentative, and well-timed. No appeal was made to party feeling, no attempt to enlist sectional prejudice. It was a speech which will raise the character of the honourable gentleman immeasurably in the opinion of all who heard him. It would be well for Canada if such addresses were more frequent—if measures of such importance were always taken up in the calm, deliberate manner that this has been, and with a disposition on both sides of the house in endeavouring to make a perfect measure. After stating the objections which he had to certain clauses, Dr. Taché concluded by suggesting that the bill should be referred to a special committee.—Mr. Lafontaine followed and treated the question in the same admirable spirit; he agreed in the suggestion of Dr. Taché, and hoped it would be complied with; he assured the Attorney-General that every aid which could be given by that side of the house would be freely afforded to perfect a measure of such importance to the country.—Mr. Draper, after some remarks from other members, moved to refer the house to a select committee, which was carried unanimously.—Thus the bill, which has been looked upon as one over which the great battle of the session was to be fought, has virtually passed through the house without an angry word. We congratulate the country on the event of last evening: the members on the Opposition benches acted in a manner which did them honour, and entitles them to the thanks of the country. We feel convinced that the conduct of the French-Canadian members has done very much to create a better feeling between them and their fellow-colonists of British origin. No man who saw the demonstration of last evening could feel a doubt, that in case of need, they would be found shoulder to shoulder with the Anglo-Saxon in defence of our territory and the honour of the British crown.” These are the effects of our commercial policy in weakening the ties between the two countries (hear, hear). The result then, my lords, of these considerations is in my mind sufficient to prove that the passing of the bill now before your lordships is imperatively required in justice to the great mass of the people of this country; whilst it also proves that by adopting that course we run no risk of inflicting the slightest injury or any interest, either colonial or domestic (hear, hear). I believe that none of the great interests of the empire will be exposed to the slightest risk by passing this bill; but on the other hand, I believe that by rejecting it you will run serious hazards, and incur great responsibilities. I would remind the noble duke (the Duke of Richmond) that at an early part of this evening, when the petition of the merchants of the city of London was presented by the noble earl, he asked a very significant question, “How many of the signers of that petition are holders of bonded corn?” Do you not think that we all know the inuenudo conveyed by the question (hear, hear)? But I wish to ask whether, if we reject this bill, my noble friend’s example will not lead those who think themselves injured by this bill to ask how many of your lordships are owners of land. I do not believe that consciously any of your lordships are actuated by personal motives; but after what has been said by my noble friend, I believe that when you impute to others interested motives, interested motives will in their turn be imputed to you (hear, hear, hear). And I believe though you are not yourselves conscious of it, yet that unconsciously you are influenced in your decisions by the effect which you believe this bill will have on the interests of the owners of land; it is not in human nature that it should be otherwise. And, though I admit that the noble duke was justified in putting the question which he did, yet I ask what effect will be produced on the public mind if we, an assembly of landowners, reject this bill, the more especially after the manner in which it has come up to us from the lower house (hear, hear, hear). My lords, I trust before you take a course which seems to me so full of danger that you will reflect a little on what the practical consequences of this measure will be. As men of judgment and experience I am sure you will not act with the view of gratifying mere passion or temper; that you will not inquire into the changes of the Minister who has introduced it; but that you will consider before rejecting this bill, what practical advantages to yourselves and to the nation will result from your adopting such a course (hear, hear). What are those supposed advantages? Do you believe that you can maintain permanently the existing Corn Law? Looking at the events of the last few years, I ask, will any one of the three noble dukes, now on the cross benches, say they believe it possible that by any combination of circumstances the existing Corn Law can be much longer maintained? [An affirmative “hear, hear” from the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Cleveland, and the Duke of Buckingham, and general laughter.] I think my noble friends stand nearly alone in that opinion (“No, no,” from several noble lords). I can only say that the noble earl who spoke on Tuesday with great animation, and at great length on this subject, stated that he for one did not look to the permanent defeat of the proposed measure. He expects that some alteration of the Corn Laws will be carried. All he looked for was what he called giving the country “breathing time” (hear). If by giving the country “breathing time” it is meant that we should allow an interval for reflection, that an appeal should be made to the country, I confess that that seems to me one of the greatest misfortunes that could happen. A dissolution of Parliament at this exciting time—town arrayed against county—the angry passions that will be excited—the suspension of industry and trade—the absolute paralysation of all the enterprise of the country that must exist during that mighty contest—are all these, the inevitable consequence of a dissolution, to be desired, if after all the result is still to be the passing of this bill (hear, hear)? The result, however, would not be precisely the same, for I believe the consequence would be the passing of a bill for the immediate and entire repeal of all duties. But we are not to look to maintaining permanently the existing Corn Law; let me ask the noble lords whether they do really believe that by throwing out this bill they could obtain anything of a compromise, on the principle of a fixed duty for example, which I know has been thought of? My noble friend the other evening threw out many hints in order to catch the parties who are in favour of that measure, and my noble friend said it would be inconsistent for those who had before supported a fixed duty to vote for the present bill. I disagree with my noble friend; I have myself supported a fixed duty. In 1842 I thought that a fixed duty would, on the whole, be the best settlement of the question that could then be proposed, and I then urged its adoption; but not with a view to protection, for I have uniformly, and on every occasion, objected to the whole principle of what is called protection. At that time, however, I thought that a moderate fixed duty was advisable for one reason, because I thought it would produce a little perceptible effect on the price of corn, whilst it would afford a considerable revenue; but chiefly I thought it advisable because I regarded it as a reasonable compromise, because I believed that it would give us, some years sooner than we could hope to obtain it by other means, the practical advantages which I saw from Free Trade, and that it would avert the great and most injurious struggle which I foresaw. But, even at that time, when I was advocating a fixed duty, I took the liberty of warning those gentlemen who were then supporting the Government that they were supporting a measure which must necessarily lead at no very distant day to entire Free Trade. I told them that if they desired a fixed duty the days and hours when a fixed duty could be accepted were rapidly passing away—that they must close with the offer as it was made, for that if that measure were not quickly conceded, such a settlement would in my opinion be impracticable (hear, hear). That anticipation was correct. If you had passed a moderate fixed duty in 1842, it would have been accepted by the country; but I am firmly persuaded that if Parliament were to pass such a measure now, the country would not be satisfied. Agitation would still continue; and, as one deeply interested in land, there is nothing which I should so much deprecate as the legislature now sanctioning a measure for a fixed duty. The consequence would be a continuation for some years longer of the agitation which has of late been going on, and which, I believe, of all things is most deeply detrimental to the landed interest (hear, hear). But even if such a measure were likely to be accepted by the country, let me ask how is it to pass through Parliament? By what party can a measure for a fixed duty now be carried? Certainly not by the existing Government, for we know that they pledged themselves within the last week or two to consent to nothing of the kind. The whole tone of their declaration has been that a fixed duty is perfectly out of the question—that protection might be right, but that the alternative was between protection, as it then existed, and Free Trade—that to make corn the subject of mere taxation, to impose a duty on food for mere purposes of revenue, was a proposition to which they never would assent (hear, hear). Then the great party who is opposed to them, will they do it? My noble friend, who with such distinguished ability conducts that party in the other House of Parliament has publicly declared that in December last he was prepared to form a Government on the principle of the immediate and complete repeal of the Corn Laws. Can he, then, and those connected with him, take up a measure, after that declaration, which has been rejected by the present Government as not going sufficiently far? We all know that my noble friend is the last man in the world to listen to such a suggestion (cheers). To expect him to come forward and propose a measure for a fixed duty now is altogether irrational and improbable (hear, hear). Then there is a third party, as they call themselves at least. There is my noble friend who made so eloquent a speech on Monday night, and the noble duke on the cross bench—are they prepared to form a Government and to propose that measure? I should think, after the very severe language which they have held in the course of the last few weeks on the subject of inconsistency, deserting pledges, eating words, and so on, that they would be the last persons so to come forward; and but last year the most prominent members of that party declared that they never would consent to it—that Free Trade itself even was a less abomination in their eyes (cheers). Then there is nobody to propose it, and I really think that all idea of a fixed duty may at once be consigned to oblivion. I thought that if adopted at the proper time, and at the proper season, it would not have been a bad settlement of the question; but that time and that season having passed, you must decide between maintaining the law as it now stands, or the more complete measure of reform which is opposed to it (hear, hear). My noble friend (Lord Stanley) on Monday night warned us against the dangers of concession, and referred to ulterior measures which a speaker had alluded to at a League meeting.

Lord KINNAIRD: It was not a meeting of the League. Lord GREY continued: I am reminded that it was not a meeting of the League: whether it was or not is quite immaterial. I believe no man will attempt to defend all the speeches which have been made by all the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League. For my own part, I should certainly be very sorry to do so. I quite agree that the speech in question was a most absurd speech, and that the speaker referred to most vicious measures—to measures which, I trust, will never receive the sanction of Parliament (cheers). I am also prepared to admit that the existence of the Anti-Corn-Law League is a very great evil. I say it is a great evil—but let me not be misunderstood. Do not suppose that I mean to throw any blame on those individuals who are at the head of that body, for I have no hesitation in saying, however the declaration may be received in this house, that, in my opinion, this country owes a debt of gratitude to the leaders of that body, and more especially to Mr. Cobden (hear, hear). I say that to him, to his genius and to his indefatigable energy and perseverance—not to Sir R. Peel, not to that party in Parliament with which I have the honour of being connected, but to my honourable friend, Mr. Cobden, are we indebted for the achievement of what I believe to be one of the most important measures with reference to the future welfare of the British people which ever received the sanction of Parliament (hear, hear). To him we should feel indebted. He has achieved this triumph by means altogether unexceptionable. There has been no appeal to physical force, no threatening displays of great multitudes of persons collected together. (A noble lord: Because he couldn't get them.) The noble lord says "because he couldn't get them." I attribute it, however, to a different cause. I believe it was because Mr. Cobden thought, and thought justly, that the proper way of acting on the opinion of Parliament was through the opinion of the nation. All his efforts have been addressed towards converting the opinion of the nation—towards teaching both farmers and manufacturers what the real interests of the community upon this subject were; and, my lords, considering the time in which this great change of opinion was attempted, I must say that his success appears to me almost miraculous (hear, hear). But still I say that the existence of the Anti-Corn-Law League is an evil; and I believe if you were to ask Mr. Cobden himself, he would tell you that he was of the same opinion. It is an evil, because such a body never can exist unless it is created by a strong feeling amongst a large proportion of the people that wrong and injury are being inflicted on them (hear, hear). It is, I believe, only a monster grievance which could have created such a formidable organisation as the Anti-Corn-Law League. But I agree with my noble friend (Lord Stanley) that, once created, the redress of the grievances complained of will not destroy in all quarters the desire to maintain that organisation. The noble lord, with the happy language peculiar to himself, said that the cup of political power was too sweet when once tasted to be readily relinquished. That is perfectly true, and no doubt there will be a great anxiety amongst many members of that body to keep up their formidable organisation, and to apply their powers to the carrying of other measures. It is consistent with all past experience that such should be the case. But what, let me ask you, is the inference you ought to draw from that consideration? Is it that you should keep up the grievance which has created that formidable power until the present sense of wrong, aggravated by disappointment, forces concession from you? The inference which I draw, my lords, on the contrary, is, that you ought with the least possible delay to repeal this law; and I may observe, in passing, that one great objection which I entertain to a portion of this bill is on account of the delay in adopting it; and if in accordance with the forms of Parliament we had the power of amending bills of this nature, I should certainly have liked to have altered the three years' provision; for that "rag of protection," as it was aptly termed the other evening, is only calculated to afford an excuse for those who wish to keep up the Anti-Corn-Law League—a power which, if kept up, it is not impossible we may see directed to other and more dangerous purposes (hear, hear, hear). My noble friend (Lord Stanley), in the course of his speech on Monday, went on to say, that if we consented to pass this measure, we must be content in future to be regarded as a subordinate part of the constitution—as the registrars of the edicts of the House of Commons. But my noble friend went on in the same breath to describe, in most beautiful and glowing language, the real purpose of this house. "My lords," he said, "if I know anything of the constitution and the value of this house, it is that it should interpose a wholesome and salutary obstacle to rash and inconsiderate legislation. It is to protect the people against the consequences of their own imprudence. It is not, my lords, it never has been, and never should be, to resist the expression of continued and deliberately-formed public opinion—to that your lordships have always, and I trust always will, bow; but it is yours to check the progress of hasty and irreparable legislation." In those words my noble friend, with his usual happiness of expression, detailed most accurately our proper place in the constitution of the country. As he told you, it is our office to check the progress of hasty and irreparable legislation, but not to oppose ourselves to continued and deliberately-formed public opinion (hear, hear). It is therefore of the deepest importance that we should discriminate between the cases. That we should distinguish accurately when the desire of the country for a change in the law does proceed from a hasty and inconsiderate passion for alteration, and when it rests on a continued and deliberately-formed opinion. It is of the deepest importance that we should accurately distinguish between these two cases, because if we make a mistake, if under the notion that we are opposing hasty legislation we do set ourselves against deliberately-formed and rational opinion, it is perfectly clear we must give way, and that by so giving way we seriously stake and impair our proper authority and power in those cases in which they really may be exercised with advantage to the country and to the constitution. In this case, then, it is your duty to determine whether the desire of the people, as represented by the votes of the House of Commons, is founded on a deliberately-formed opinion, or whether it is the cry of hasty and inconsiderate legislation. Let me ask you, what are the symptoms by which we are to judge? Let me remind you, in order that you may form an opinion on this point, which lies at the very bottom of the decision which you are this night to come to—let me remind you what are the symptoms which lead to the inference that the desire of the nation rests on a continued and deliberately-formed opinion. I will remind you, then, that the principles on which this bill was formed were first brought under the consideration of the public so long as eighty years ago, when the first edition of Dr. Adam Smith's immortal work was published, in which he laid down, with a force of reasoning which the experience of succeeding years has fully justified, that it was wise and just to emancipate commerce from all artificial restrictions. It was not long in working conviction in the minds of all theoretical men; every political philosopher in every quarter of the globe was soon found adhering to that principle; but it was long before those engaged in the practical affairs of life would concede it—before practical statesmen and manufacturers and farmers would consent to admit the validity of the doctrines of Adam Smith. But at length they did begin to yield—the authority of those maxims of commercial wisdom which had long been received as infallible by philosophers in their closets, began also to be recognised in the councils of the nation; at first in a hesitating and timid manner, but still a silent and gradual advance was being made to their consummation. As discussion went on, as the good effects were experienced of the partial measures which had been founded on those principles, more and more converts came over (cheers). In Parliament and in the country, every succeeding year showed an increase of strength to that great cause of truth and of reason (hear, hear). In my own recollection of political life how vast are the changes which I have seen on this subject! Nineteen years ago, when I first voted on these questions in the other House of Parliament, in favour of a very timid application of Free Trade principles,

I have voted in very small minorities; in minorities as small as 15, and never, I think, greatly exceeding 50; whilst those who were for out and out protection, who resisted the Corn Law of 1828 almost as strongly as the proposed measure is now resisted, doubled us and trebled us in the divisions, so powerful was the extreme agricultural party in that day. We now see that year by year, from that time to the present, the strength of the party in favour of the bolder and bolder application of the principles of Free Trade has been gradually increasing; and in the last few years, though we have still had large numerical majorities arrayed against us in divisions, yet no man who attended to the debates in the other House of Parliament, no man who looked at the signs from which to judge of other men's feelings, could have failed to foresee symptoms of the rapid approach of that event which has now arrived. Our opponents spoke in the tone of men who felt conscious of defeat, like men who felt that their struggle could not longer be maintained; and last of all we see her Majesty's Ministers themselves coming forward and manfully avowing a complete change in their own opinions, a complete adherence to the doctrines of Free Trade (hear, hear). Severely as they have been censured, I, my lords, give them credit for that avowal. I have no doubt it is a sincere and an honest avowal (hear, hear). There is no reason why it should be otherwise. Their party interest and their personal feelings would have led them, consistently with their sense of public duty, to have maintained their former opinions; and when I find them unable to do so, it is, I say, indeed a strong proof of the irresistible current of public opinion (hear, hear). You may say the reasons that they have assigned for the change are altogether inadequate, that the potato famine is a delusion, and that there is nothing in the state of affairs to justify such a measure. You may say the arguments which they use are precisely the same arguments which they themselves had so often combated. You may say all this, but I do not think you will inquire what were the motives which led those gentlemen to hold other opinions on former debates. I do not wish to inquire whether it was a want of foresight or a want of moral courage to avow opinions which, though unpopular, made them in 1839 and 1841 still the advocates of protection. Whatever opinions we may form upon this point, it is impossible any rational man can doubt that the change which they have now avowed is sincere (cheers)—and that they feel the repeal of the existing Corn Laws to be required by the best interests of the country (renewed cheers). And I say their adopting that opinion, their coming forward to advocate it, and their sacrifices for it, is a convincing and a striking proof of what is the state of public opinion on this question. Out of doors are precisely the same symptoms (hear, hear, hear). Do we not remember that out of doors at one time the merchants and manufacturers of this country were as strongly in favour of protection as the agriculturists are at this day? Were they not the main originators of the whole protective policy (hear, hear, hear)? They, I believe, are perfectly willing to admit the fact. This great mistake in our national policy is far more attributable to the mercantile and manufacturing interests than the agricultural, and when I first came into public life this was the general state of public opinion. I remember Mr. Huskisson being regarded as a public enemy in the great seaport towns in the north of England, and the repeal of the discriminating duties on foreign shipping being considered as something like treason to the best interests of the country. From those very towns, in the present session of Parliament, I have presented petitions praying your lordships not only to pass this bill, but to abolish all protective duties whatever (cheers). Such, my lords, are the symptoms of the desire of the nation for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and it is not a desire for rash and hasty legislation, but it is the continued, the deliberately formed, and the rationally expressed public judgment (cheers). These measures, I say, are the symptoms of it, and public opinion being so, it is not according to my noble friend's own admission, wise in this house to disregard it (hear, hear). My lords, that you will not disregard it, and that you will pass this bill by an overwhelming majority, is no less my firm and confident expectation than it is my fervent and earnest hope (cheers).

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER BY ELIHU BURRITT TO A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT.

Worcester, Mass., U. S., April 27, 1846.
* * * * * May heaven, and all who hope for heaven, bless you and Brotherton for lifting up your voice in the House of Commons against the upreaching blasphemy of war, when the vote of thanks to the army of India was moved. There was more of true courage and heroism in that act than in all the deeds of violence that have reddened the plains of India this year. And a new heroic age has opened upon humanity, in very deed, when the spirit, not the sign, of the cross must create a new order of knighthood, which shall perform such deeds of Christian chivalry over the sepulchre of the gospel of peace, as to rescue it from the Saracen selfishness and sophistry which have sought to stain its love-breathing leaves with human blood, and put its message-trumpet into the iron lips of war. Is it too much to suppose that no songs sung on earth are such music to Satan's ear as the Te Deums performed in Christian churches for victories on the battle-field? It seems to me that he would delight to pitch the tune of such songs with his hell-fork every day in the year; for his kingdom will prevail in the hearts of men so long as he can induce Christians to ascribe the glory and success of war to God, rather than to the devil. Had the devil been burnt in effigy at the end of every battle as the instigator of the butchery on both sides, and the throne of God left intact by the bloody-handed abominations of professing Christians, that great deified cannibal, War, would have long ago been exterminated from the abodes of men. O, what a terrible libel on the God of love and Father of mankind to ascribe the issue of these Indian battles, or any other waged on earth, to His presence and aid and spirit!

I long to see the day when the statesmen of your country and mine shall apprehend the destiny of the Anglo-Saxon race as indicated by Divine Providence; when they shall see clearly that that race is one people in the most social elements of unity; and that they are set apart from all other nations as God's peculiar people, in which all other tribes of men will not only be blessed, but absorbed; that they are to fill the whole earth with the light of Christianity and civilisation; to fuse mankind into one race and brotherhood, until all the inhabitants of the earth shall speak the English language. When they shall fully perceive this, and know that the consummation of this glorious destiny depends upon their dwelling together in unity, and labouring together in unity, surely they will never let the idea of war enter their hearts. War between the two countries thus related to each other, to God, and humanity! As well, far better, might the Siamese Twins talk of going to war with each other, when the death of one would destroy the survivor. The ligament that binds us together is more vital than the one connecting that singular pair of human beings. The rest of the race would bleed out of its inmost heart, if our two nations should lift up the sword against each other. Banished for ever be the thought of war between us, for we are brethren. There is room enough, and to spare, and to fill, for us all. The whole continent of humanity must be Siamised, and not an English or an American life can be sacrificed for territory. When FREE TRADE shall be ushered in to sweep from the face of the earth the mountainous ranges of prejudice and nationality, which have made enemies of nations, there will be no questions of disputed territories to embitter them; no narrow-minded policy to feed international jealousy, or dam the currents of fraternal and commercial intercourse. The smallest nation may then say, "the whole boundless earth is ours, where we may buy and sell, and trade in the commerce of good will, without any to make us afraid." If, by Free Trade, England should lose Oregon, and even Canada, she would gain in the United States what would be worth to her a dozen of these countries. For one, I regard Free Trade as the commercial barbing of the Millennium which shall beat all swords into ploughshares, and spears into pruning hooks. Even in anticipation of the partial triumph of this gospel economy, in the opening of your ports to corn and other productions of our great West, the warlike people of that region are even now fulfilling that blessed prophecy in a degree. They are beating their swords into ploughshares, and driving those ploughshares deep into their Eden soil, inspired with the hope of feeding the British. I devoutly hope that the coming seedtime in that vast region of unequalled fertility will be a seedtime of better feelings towards Great Britain. I cannot find words to express my sense of the importance, to humanity at large, of annexing that fat universe of land to your crowded shores, by opening your ports to its produce. The moral influence of such a measure, on the labouring people of both countries cannot be meted out in words. There are thousands and thousands in that region of our country, living in the rudest state of civilisation, with regard to every article of furniture, dress, and the other comforts, and elegancies known to a cultivated society, while, at the same time, they are surrounded with breastworks of golden corn and wheat. On the other hand, are there not thousands and thousands of ill-fed labourers in your country, pining amid fabrics that would adorn princes—articles of clothing and comfort, which, if exchanged for food, would fill our great West with the paradise of comfortable homes, transformed from the floorless log-cabins of Western wheat-growers! What an effect it would have on the morals of your manufacturing population, if the fountains of American food should be broken up, to feed them from our granaries! * *

REPRESENTATION OF LANCASTER.—Mr. S. Gregson, jun., has announced himself a candidate for the representation of this borough, when a vacancy occurs. In his address, Mr. Gregson avows himself "an advocate for the abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws; for progressive reform, and for all those Liberal principles which promote universal education, and secure to all the enjoyment of civil, religious, and commercial freedom."—Leeds Mercury.

THE MILK TRADE WITH LONDON.—A striking illustration of the creative effect of railways upon the trading resources of a district is manifesting itself along the course of the Eastern Counties line. The neighbourhoods of Romford, Brentwood, &c., places the inhabitants of which would probably, not many years ago, have laughed at the idea of sending their milk to the metropolis, now carry on a very considerable and daily increasing trade in that article. Persons in traversing the line can hardly fail to have seen, at the stations referred to, a number of huge canister shaped tin vessels, used for the purpose of transit; and these having a van specially appropriated to them, the milk reaches London in prime condition. At Chelmsford, one extensive grazier at least is preparing to enter into the same trade; and we should not be at all surprised to find parties at Colchester, and other towns upon the line, following the example, as there is very little difference in the expense of conveyance, as far as the railway is concerned, for long or short distances. This promises a complete revolution, not only in the price, but the composition and quality, of the above extensive article of consumption. When each railroad from the grazing districts into London, shall have become "a milky way," there will no longer be the temptation, which at present exists, to resort to artificial ingredients; and people—even milkmen, will be content to leave the manufacture of their commodity to the proper artificers—the cows.—Essex paper.

THE ISLAND OF LABUAN.—At a meeting of the directors of the Manchester Commercial Association, held at their offices, York Hotel-buildings, King-street, on Thursday week, the proposed cession of this island by the Sultan of Borneo to the British Crown, free of all charges, was the subject of consideration; and it was unanimously agreed to memorialise Sir R. Peel, as First Lord of the Treasury, expressing their regret that her Majesty's Government had not availed themselves of so liberal an offer, and praying that Government would accept it, as a step highly important in connection with our commerce to China and the East. We believe that a similar memorial has also been agreed to and forwarded from the Manchester Chamber of Commerce. This island, though small, being not more than about six or seven miles across, is rich in vegetable and mineral products, and would be of immense value as a coal station and a harbour of refuge. It possesses rich beds of coal and iron, and immense quantities of growing timber, fit for the purposes of marine refitting. It is most advantageously situated near the mouth of the Borneo river, and in the track of our steamers between Singapore, Ceylon, and Hongkong, and the other ports of China; and it would fill up the chain of our marine communications in the eastern archipelago. Those interested in the subject will find some particulars of the island, its situation, and productions, in the recent work of Captain Keppel. We ought to add, that it is just off a district of Borneo, a considerable tract of which has been granted by the Sultan to an Englishman, named Brooke, who now exercises vice-regal powers over it.—Manchester Guardian.

In instructing others we improve ourselves; he who is engaged in the tuition of others acquires a proficiency in his attainments, of which he was not previously conscious.—Chinese Saying.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.—
M. JULIEN'S CONCERTS D'ETE. (FOR ONE MONTH ONLY.)
M. JULIEN has the honour to announce that emboldened by the success of his Winter Series of Concerts, and flattered by the kind and liberal patronage now for several years bestowed on his exertions, he has determined on organising also
AN ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS D'ETE.
That portion of the year termed the London Season attracting as it does Artists of the first eminence, from all parts of Europe to this Metropolis, offers great facilities to an undertaking of this nature; while the congregation of VOCAL as well as INSTRUMENTAL talent will afford an opportunity of imparting novelty to the Concerts D'ETE.
Of these advantages it is M. JULIEN'S intention to avail himself in every possible way, and to present his Patrons with a SHORT SERIES of CONCERTS, embracing both VOCAL and INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC of a First rate order, and at such a reasonable charge as to allow all classes to enjoy the Entertainments.
The Concerts will commence on Friday, June 12, and in due course full particulars will be announced. Advantage will be taken of the Season to arrange a NEW FLORAL DECORATION, and every arrangement made which can add to the attractions of a Popular Amusement.

In consequence of the great length to which our report of the debates in the House of Lords has extended, we are obliged to defer our notice of Mr. Torrens McCullagh's Industrial History of Free Nations till next week.
We are compelled to omit the Subscription List until next week.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Friday Evening, May 29, 1846.

At five o'clock in the morning of Friday, May 29, 1846, a day which will ever be memorable, not only in English annals, but in the commercial history of all civilised nations, the debate on the second reading of the Corn Bill in the House of Lords was brought to a close. The division insures the speedy triumph of truth and justice. There appeared—

MAJORITY OF PEERS PRESENT—TWELVE.

MAJORITY OF PROXIES—THIRTY-FIVE.

TOTAL MAJORITY—FORTY-SEVEN.

The most original in character, and the most profound in philosophy of all the speeches yet delivered on this great question was undoubtedly that of Earl Grey. His arguments for legislative change were derived from the immutable laws of social existence; and in his analysis of these laws he exhibited the strict severity of science united to the graces of eloquent diction. His rhetoric was his logic; his instruction was his persuasion. There was no part of his address which at all approached declamation, save his warm eulogium of the League and Mr. Cobden. To the agricultural body he furnished not merely consolation, but hope; he pointed out the absurdity of their fears and the groundlessness of their alarms. The imaginary Tanbolls and visionary prairies, where harvests sprung without labour, and corn might be had for the asking, which Lord Stanley had shown to his hearers in a brilliant series of dissolving views, melted away under his exposure, as the pictures of the magic lantern are effaced on the admission of the light of the sun. His examination of the true policy which ought to be adopted by a parent country towards its colonies, was conceived in the philosophic spirit of Bacon, and expounded in the lucid logic of Paley. It was indeed a speech, not to be heard, applauded, and forgotten, but to be "marked, learned, and inwardly digested." While it expounded the past, it illuminated the future. It was a chart which laid down the rocks and quicksands to be avoided, and at the same time pointed out

Each beacon light
For pilots to hold course aright.

Lord Ashburton succeeded in perplexing both himself, his hearers, and his readers. The Corn Law was originally as odious and strange to him as the cuckoo's egg is to the sparrow, when first discovered in the nest; but having failed in the first effort to throw it out, affection grew up during the process of incubation; and when the brood was hatched, the attachment for the ugly intruder proved to be greater than the love for the natural offspring. Lord Ashburton went beyond the sparrow in affection for his cuckoo; he even adopted its peculiarities, and gave the wearisome iteration of note, which is at first pleasing, soon scarcely tolerable, then vexatious, and finally unendurable. In fact, without intending a pun, Lord Ashburton was "beyond Baring."

Lord Lansdowne spoke as a practical statesman, exhibiting more animation than he has recently evinced in debate. His exposure of Lord Ashburton's followers was triumphant, but rather too merciless. The delicate question of a fixed duty was only raised to be abandoned, with a little amiable regret for the hopelessness of its ever finding acceptance.

A tumultuous contention, not very usual in the House of Peers, ended in the Earl of Essex assigning his reasons for conversion, and Lord Beaumont professing his adhesion to perversion. Lord Dalhousie expounded the commercial and statistical reasoning on which the ministerial measures are founded, and the Duke of Wellington concluded the debate by simply, but sternly, stating the circumstances which had rendered the repeal of the Corn Laws a political necessity.

We believe that this division and majority may be regarded as final. The Standard-Herald and Herald-Standard join in a solo-duet of despair, and the Morning Post exhibits the graceful sorrow of a lady-like gentleman. We, however, feel too much pleasure in witnessing the interment of the Corn Law to quarrel with the antics of the few mourners that follow its hearse.

PUBLIC MEETING AT HULL.—A crowded meeting took place here on Monday last, called in pursuance of a requisition from merchants, shipowners, &c., to petition the Lords for the speedy passing of the measure now before them. We shall give a full report of it next week.

COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE.

The accomplishment of Free Trade will be one of the most remarkable events, not only in the history of the British Empire, but of the civilised world. No movement so important, so effective, and so successful, has ever been before witnessed by mankind. Those who possess the zeal, integrity, prudence, and ability this great triumph is due, will be recognised as the benefactors of mankind to remote generations.

It is a duty, then, which we owe to the world and to posterity, to preserve some PERMANENT MEMORIAL OF THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE;—that deliberative and executive body, which has achieved more by moral force, than has been accomplished by associations that included physical strength and political power. For this purpose arrangements have been made with Mr. HERBERT, R.A., to paint a including Accurate Portraits, not only of the Principal Leaders, but of those less prominent Members, whose indefatigable labours during the whole course of the movement have entitled them to public gratitude. It is proposed that this shall be engraved by a first-rate artist, on a large scale (31 by 22 inches), and that the copies shall be sold at such a price as to place within the reach of persons of moderate fortune, a monument of the mighty movement by which monopoly was overthrown, and the cause of just establishment, without any remembrance of outrage or violence to lessen the enjoyment of so glorious a victory. The principles of universal peace have been established by their own practical development in peaceful agitation.

In order to accomplish this great work of Art, on a scale and in a style worthy of the subject it is designed to commemorate, those who are interested in its production, are requested to communicate to Mr. AGNEW, Printseller and Publisher, Manchester, the Class of Engraving for which they wish to subscribe.

There will be three Classes of Engravings from this great Historical Picture, at the following prices:—

First Class Proofs, Ten Guinea. Second Class Proofs, Seven Guinea. Third Class Prints, Three Guinea.

On the 1st and 15th of each Month, every Part containing Four highly-finished Portraits, price One Shilling.

DENTISTRY.

227, Piccadilly, between Regent Circus and Haymarket, London

E. GIDNEY, formerly of New York, but for the last 16 years extensively known in Manchester and its populous neighbourhood, as the American Dentist, in consequence of his health requiring a change to a milder and drier climate, has selected the above premises, as very central, and convenient for his professional business, where he renders his best services to all who may desire the faithful and safe advantages of his art. His practice will embrace every necessary operation for the improvement and preservation of the human teeth. He regulates deranged teeth, and removes all causes incidental to their destruction, or that may deform the beauty of these important organs.

Mr G. never uses any of the various cements, pastes, or succedanea, which are all more or less of the same nature, being based upon amalgams of quicksilver (mercury) with other coarse metals, their use being wholly prohibited for filling teeth, and justly considered bad practice, by the American College and Society of Dental Surgeons; but he fills decayed teeth with the very finest gold, so as to preserve them free from pain for life. Nor does he excise or cut off the growth of painful teeth when they should be extracted, but he remedies effectually with ease destroys the nerve when exposed and painful. His experience and advantages in artificial substitutes are equal to any in the profession.

Mr G. considers it strictly professional, and will, under a conviction of its utility, adopt the practice of calling upon and consulting with his patients, after the hours of business.

His circular containing regulated charges, and brief information, respecting the advantages and utility of his profession, may be had through post when required. Hours of business from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, Exclusively used at Guy's, St. George's, St. Thomas's, the Westminster, and other hospitals, and at the Manchester, Bristol, Brighton, and other inland cities, may be procured in every locality at 4s. per bottle, protected by the patent metallic capsules, embossed "Betts's Patent Brandy, 7, Smithfield Lane," or at the Distillery, their only establishment, at 16s. per Gallon, in bulk, or at 18s. in the bottled bottles, in quantities not less than 2 gallons.

BEARD'S IMPROVED COLOURED PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTRAITS so highly coloured by all the leading journals, are taken daily, from Nine till Six, at 34, Parliament-street, Westminster, 85, King William-street, City, and at the Royal Polytechnic Institution, Regent-street. The brilliancy and warmth of tone gained by the patented and new method of colouring add materially to the excellence of the portrait. "The portrait stands out in bold relief, clear, round, and life-like." Licenses to exercise the invention in London or the provinces granted by Mr. Beard (sole patentee of the Daguerreotype), 95, King William-street, City.

GEORGE and JOHN DEANE, SADDLERS and HARNESS MAKERS, invite attention to their Gig, Tandem, and Carriage Harness, manufactured on their own premises, by workmen of much experience, and under the direction of foremen of superior ability and skill. Their leather is invariably the best first-rate London leather, the furniture is also of the best town manufacture, and G. and J. Deane warrant that the productions of their manufactory cannot be surpassed for beauty, strength, and cheapness, by any other house. Horse clothing made to order, of the best and seasonable wood. Deane's London-made whips, and all articles for stable and travelling use, in large variety. No. 2, Arthur-street East, opening to the Monument, London-bridge.

BERDOE'S WATERPROOF OVER-COATS, for the SUMMER.—The reputation of these well-known garments has been so long established, that they now need no other recommendation. For quality, workmanship, style, a quiet, gentlemanly, and respectable appearance, lightness, convenience, moderate cost, durability, and especially for being really waterproof (and not so in name only), they are unquestionably still unrivalled, notwithstanding the numerous competitors their well-known extensive sale has produced. By Royalty, and a long list of Noblemen and Gentlemen of the highest rank and title, they have long been patronised. Made only by W. BERDOE, Tailor, and Over-Coat Maker, 68, Cornhill north side, and shortly at 96, New Bond-street.

JONES'S £4. 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES

warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week, are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset-house. They combine the truth of a mathematical instrument with the elegance of an ornament of taste. On receipt of a Post-office order for 1s. above the price, a Watch will be sent by post, and the balance of the purchase money retained on watch work, sent free for a 2d. stamp.

LUXURY IN SHAVING.

JOHN GOSNELL and CO'S AMBROSIAL SHAVING CREAM (Patronised by Prince Albert). This inestimable Cream possesses all the good qualities of the finest Soap, without the disagreeable smell, and is made from the purest and genuinest materials. It is a white, pearly silvery appearance, produces a creamy lather, which will not dry on the face, and emits in use the delightful fragrance of the almond.

In Pots, price 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., &c. Perfumers to her Majesty, 12, Thorne King's-road, Lombard-street, London. Manufacturers of Combs and Brushes of the best quality, and on the most approved principles.

BOTANIC WATER and BEAR'S GREASE.—When the hair is becoming thin and falling off, the only effectual remedy, besides washing the head, is the use of the two above-named articles, applied alternately.—The botanic water to cleanse the roots from dirt, and as a stimulant, and the bear's grease as a nourisher. If any further evidence was required of the virtues of bear's grease for renovating and preserving the hair, Mr. Cuttin's account of the quantity used, and the length of hair obtained by its use, will be sufficient. North American Hair Oil, a sufficient answer.—ROSS and SONS, 119 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, who first introduced the use of bear's grease in this country, and who fat and kill the animals, recommend the public to purchase none other but with their names and address printed on the pot, or the label, as they are obtaining a spurious article. All vegetable oils applied to the hair are worse than useless.

ROWLAND'S DENTON, or PEARL DENTIFRICE.

A White Powder for the Teeth, compounded of the Choicest and most Recherche Ingredients of the Oriental Herbal; the leading requisites of cleanliness and efficacy being present in the highest possible degree. It bestows on the teeth a pearl like whiteness and frees them from tartar. Imparts to the gums a healthy firmness, and gives the breath a grateful sweet odour and perfume. CAUTION.—A ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton Garden, is engraved on the Government Stamp, which is affixed on each box. All other Denton are FRAUDULENT IMITATIONS!

TAKE NOTICE.—The Establishment of E. MOSES and SON will be closed on Whit Monday, June 1st, and re-open Tuesday Morning, June 2nd.

THE NEW HOUSES.—GREAT SENSATION.—

"It is really surprising to see what is done By the public in favour of MOSES and SON. Not only do thousands, with wondering eyes, behold the gigantic Establishment rise, but thousands on the thousands in multitudes press To purchase E. MOSES and SON's summer dress. The public seem bent on a noble endeavour To study E. MOSES and SON more than ever. And why this astounding amount of success? Because, in return, they are studied in dress. Would torrents of patronage constantly flow, If the public did it not at advantages?—No! In price, and in style, and in variety, too, E. MOSES and SON have resolved to out-do: And that's why the public have thus done their part By MOSES and SON at their mighty new Mart."

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE CORN BILL IN COMMITTEE.

It has cost us upwards of seven years of incessant agitation to abolish the sliding scale. Had the Corn Law been in the shape of a fixed duty, one-half the time and labour would have repealed it. There is something subtle and plausible in the "scale," with its apparently humane fall of duty to meet the rise in the price of corn, which recommends it to weak minds; and then it assumes the character of "protection," so captivating to the ignorant! The clever monopolist who first christened the Corn Law with the name of protection, added several years to its life. One-half the labours of the League has been expended in proving to the consumers that the "scale" is really a bread tax. That once accomplished, half our work was done. The national conscience revolts at the idea of levying a tax upon the first necessary of existence. The instinct of justice calls out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to try any and every other source of revenue—to tax easy arm-chairs, great-coats, opera-glasses, or whatever he likes, so that he keeps his fiscal hand off the people's bread. The men who invented the "scale" understood this, and they enacted the last, and only Corn Law, which this country will ever tolerate. The protectionists were right in 1841 when they denounced a fixed duty as indefensible, and repudiated it as the certain prelude to total abolition. "The fact is," said the Quarterly, in June, 1841, "that neither Lord John Russell, nor Mr. McCulloch, nor any one else, contemplates for a moment the maintenance of a fixed duty; and the proposition is therefore neither more nor less than a wicked and delusive fraud." We all remember the exclamation of Lord Winchelsea, in reference to the proposed 8s. fixed duty, "For God's sake don't tax the people's bread!"—a sentiment loudly cheered in the House of Lords, and re-echoed from many a hustings at the general election of 1841.

Well, after all, we are still told by parties from whom we should have hoped better things, that a fixed duty would have been the proper settlement of the question—that it was want of statesmanship that prevented such an adjustment, which would have been highly satisfactory to the leading mercantile interests, &c. &c. These pleaders for a fixed duty forget to give us the arguments by which it is to be sustained,—a task which they kindly leave to the Minister who is to form a bread tax administration. Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, and Sir James Graham, the three ablest statesmen of the day, decline the undertaking. They know that in the present enlightened state of public opinion, and with the national interests concentrated upon the question, it would be impossible to defend in argument the proposition of a fixed duty. They know that the subject has been so discussed, sifted, and exposed in all its bearings, that it could not be evaded, or put upon any other than the broad issue of justice to the great mass of the people. They know that not only the intellectual conviction of the country, but its moral sentiment, and religious feelings, are against any tax upon bread; and, even if their own minds were not made up to the impolicy of a fixed duty, they would be unworthy of the name of statesmen if they attempted to enforce any fiscal arrangement of the kind against the will of the great majority of the people.

We know not whether a serious attempt will be made to perpetuate a duty on corn. If so, we should like to see the arguments of Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham, upon the working men's case, answered by the noble lords who support the amendment in committee. They must be prepared to disprove the proposition that the wages in the manufacturing districts vary, as a rule, inversely with the price of bread; that when corn is moderate in price, the demand for labour increases, and wages rise; and that when corn is excessively dear wages decline, owing to the falling off in the employment of labourers. They must also be able to disprove the Prime Minister's assertion, that the wages in the agricultural districts do not advance in the same proportion with the rise in the price of bread. They must likewise be ready to discuss minutely that vital question to the great mass of the working people, of the bearing upon their incomes of a tax upon bread, which forms so disproportionate an item in their expenditure as compared with the easier classes of society—a question, by the way, most fearlessly analysed by Sir Robert Peel in one of his ablest speeches.

Let noble lords, before they commit themselves to a fixed duty, be prepared to meet these arguments; for they may be assured that from the moment the "scale" is abandoned, and a permanent tax is substituted for it, the whole controversy will be narrowed to a very small compass, and that it will turn mainly upon the interests of the working millions. We should be very sorry, for many reasons, to see the question referred back to the country, by an adverse vote in committee; sorry for the lords themselves—for the interests of commerce, which would be temporarily suspended, and for the inconvenience to the business before Parliament. But we should not dread the result, so far as the interests of Free Trade were concerned; for a more hopeless contest for our adversaries we could not desire than that in which would be arrayed on one side the landed aristocracy, on the other the great body of the people, and the question at issue to be, whether, in spite of the recommendation of the Crown, and the will of a majority of the House of Commons, a tax should be imposed, at the instance of a few proprietors of the soil, upon the food of an entire nation. We reiterate the opinion we expressed in our last, that a majority of the peers will see the impolicy and injustice of attempting any mutilation of the Government measure.

THE "TALENTED" GENTLEMEN BELOW THE GANGWAY.

Notwithstanding the prevailing sentiment of delighted satisfaction with which we view the triumph of last week, we must confess that certain incidents of that ever-memorable passage in our Parliamentary history have occasioned us considerable uneasiness. The Corn Law is as good as gone, despite

Lord Stanley's brilliant and vigorous advocacy of protection in its integrity, and Lord Brougham's neither brilliant nor vigorous championship of commercial freedom; but we cannot conceal from ourselves that other perils yet beset the state. We are afraid that both these noble lords have but too effectually contributed—we must do them the justice to believe, without malice prepense—to burden the country with a new grievance, only second in oppressiveness and powers for mischief to the sliding scale itself. It is impossible to suppose that they really meant any harm by their high-flown panegyrics on the "talent" with which the flag of protection has been hoisted in a certain well-known quarter of the House of Commons. But they should have reflected on the responsibilities that attach to the lightest words of genius. They should have remembered that irony is sometimes apt to be taken au sérieux. For our own part, we much fear that the gentlemen below the gangway will swallow the compliment which these eminent critical authorities have so indiscreetly paid to their recently developed oratorical abilities, and that the stimulant thus administered may prove of disastrous potency in eliciting future exhibitions of that peculiar description of mental accomplishment. Once let it be imagined, that the juvenile statesmen, who have been "put up," or have put themselves up, during the dreary discussion of the past months, to gain time by their unconscionable length of dull speechification, to regard themselves as regularly enrolled among the talking men of the House of Commons, and that a grateful and admiring public will no longer be satisfied to accept their silent services—and all we can say is, Heaven help the country, and the men who do the country's business!

As it really is not desirable that the sort of inflection which Parliament and the public have lately had to endure should be drawn into a precedent, and made a permanent accompaniment of British legislation, we are anxious to apply what corrective we can to the unthinking and ill-judged eulogies passed by Lords Stanley and Brougham on an oratorical "talent," any further displays of which must be deprecated by every patriotic mind. We beg, therefore, to assure the gifted and "talented" gentlemen under the gangway, that the country, so far from being rapt in admiration of their Parliamentary and statesmanlike abilities, is, to this hour, in peaceful ignorance of the precise nature of those phenomena which have called forth the Stanley and Brougham panegyrics. Their speeches remain, and are likely to remain to the end of time, unread. The world knows nothing of the protectionist oratory of the year 1846, except that it has abstracted a certain number of hours, days, and weeks from the working portion of the Parliamentary year. Even the Dryasdusts of other generations, who shall busy themselves with compiling English history out of Hansard, will take to skipping when they come to that volume. We may add, in general, that the description of talent for which the gentlemen in question have obtained so melancholy a notoriety, is decidedly at a discount. We are living just in those times in which the mere mechanical faculty of word-stringing, irrespectively of truth and soundness of principles, accuracy of facts, and cohesiveness of logic, is least respectable in the eyes of a busy and earnest people.

After all, this "talent" is a very sorry sort of thing. Whether we take the test of cost of production, or of exchangeable utility, nothing can well be cheaper. Any Harrow or Eton boy could talk prose by the hour, with as few offences against Lindley Murray as Mr. Newdegate is in the habit of committing. Any Newmarket man—only cram him well—would make as good a show with his facts and figures, as the noble head of the protectionist Government that is to be—or that was to have been—and vindicate for himself a proud intellectual equality with the statesmen of stable mind, who

"Of bets, not taxes, learnedly debate,
And guide, with equal reins, a steed or state."

And we can assure Mr. D'Israeli that it does not need his order of genius to make a bad logician and a bungling statistician. The comparison will, we fear, be disagreeable to the accomplished author of "Coningsby," but truth compels us to say, that Mr. G. P. R. James—if we may judge from his superlatively silly displays before the Kentish squires—might qualify himself for all the duties of the philosopher in ordinary to the landlords, with no greater amount of mental labour than he is in the habit of expending on his familiar trimestrial task of writing an historical romance in three volumes post octavo.

The fact is, these men's "talent" is infinitely indebted to their destitution of all useful political knowledge. Their ignorance is a marvellous help to their loquacity. A certain vivacious garrulity is the privilege of political youth and inexperience. There are advantages in coming new to a subject. Our statesmen below the gangway have found talking easy, simply because they had not the remotest conception that the whole question had been settled long ago. It would have been a sad damper to their eloquence to have known, that the controversy which they fancied was just beginning, was, in fact, just finished. Most conveniently for themselves, they have commenced their political education too late in life to be aware, that what is new to them is old to all the rest of the world—that the sophisms which they think philosophy, are merely effete absurdities which people are tired even of laughing at—that Adam Smith, and the League, and public opinion, and thirty years' experience, have already brought the matter to a point at which nothing more remains to be done than to clothe a foregone conclusion in statutory form. When our elderly young gentlemen attain—if they ever do attain—to years of political discretion, they will look back with amazement on the exhibitions of pert and presumptuous nescience which signalled their Parliamentary boyhood.

ONE GLANCE MORE AT THE DEBATE.

The transcendent importance of the event which we had last week the satisfaction of recording—presaging, as it does, the early and final consummation of our labours—will probably be felt to detract materially from the interest that would otherwise attach to the three nights' preliminary debate; and our readers perhaps may be little disposed to accompany us in any retrospect of Parliamentary speeches, however excellent and valuable in themselves, at a time when words are so soon to be exchanged for deeds, and all speeches and speaking are about to merge in one great fact. Still, we must pause for a moment on the two principal speeches of the closing night of the discussion—those of Earl Grey and Earl Dalhousie. Of their very remarkable ability we need not say much;—that which especially strikes us is their happy practical adaptation to the very useful purpose of reconciling the minds of all classes of the community, and in particular of the agriculturists, to the approaching legislative change. The noble lords whom we have named stamp that change, by anticipation, with the characters of permanence and legitimacy. They show at once its inevitableness and its beneficence; and thus extinguish in the mind of every intelligent agriculturist not merely the hope, but even the desire, of that most desperate of all impossibilities—the resuscitation, in some remote and unknown futurity, of a dead and buried Corn Law.

Nothing could be more effective than Earl Grey's exposition, towards the close of his speech, of the true character of that public opinion to which the Upper House is about to give legislative sanction and embodiment. The noble lord showed, with admirable force and clearness, that the present public opinion in favour of Free Trade possesses, in an almost unexampled degree, those attributes of fixity and deliberateness, in which even Lord Stanley recognises a moral authority, that statesmen and Parliaments must bow to. It has nothing hasty or passionate about it. It is rooted in science, and has grown with experience. It has grown slowly, too; yet with a steadiness that has been without reaction—almost without intermission. Eighty years ago, Adam Smith convinced the philosophers, and the philosophic statesmen, of the wisdom and justice of freeing commerce from artificial restrictions. After a while, convictions began to reach the practical statesmen, who, at first cautiously and timidly, yet with an ever-increasing clearness and confidence, announced the maxims of commercial wisdom, and applied them to the current exigencies of commerce and the state. From year to year the process went on—experiments provoking discussion, and discussion justifying and inviting experiment—the sphere of conversion gradually widening, and embracing new classes of the community. Of late, the work has advanced with immensely accelerated speed. National distress and fiscal impoverishment necessitated a more earnest, a more comprehensive, and a more thorough going investigation of the sources of the Wealth of Nations. Agitation popularised philosophy, and brought home to the many the convictions which individual research had imparted to the few; until, at length, disowned alike by official intelligence and by public opinion and morality, the vicious system of protection had nothing to stand on but the bare fact of possession, and the merest touch was sufficient to bring it to the ground. A public opinion that can give such an account of itself as this, is palpably irresistible and irreversible. It must have its way—and what it does is done once for all.

Lord Dalhousie's argument takes us, by a somewhat different route, to the same practical conclusion. This public opinion is irresistible, not merely in its force and universality, but in its truth. Free Trade ideas rest on "the authority of facts." They have on their side "the history of the commerce of this country"—and, "more especially, the commercial history of the last thirty years—above all, that history since the adoption of the tariff of 1842." Never was a principle subjected to a greater number and variety of experimental tests, or verified by a more copious and demonstrative induction. Take the woollen trade, or the cotton trade, or the linen trade, or the silk trade, or the iron trade, or the shipping and timber trade—they all tell the same tale;—"not only have they not flourished by reason of the principle of protection, but they have flourished as that protection has been removed—nay, more, they have flourished still more in proportion as the protection has been withdrawn." We abstain from the superfluous task of following the noble lord through the details of fact and argument, with which he so amply elucidated this now familiar truth. His speech will already have been read far and wide through the country, and have produced its natural effect on those who conceive themselves more immediately interested in the great legislative act now on the verge of completion—convincing every agriculturist, who has a mind susceptible of conviction, that there is no sort of reason for a "panic," that nothing is to be feared from any "inundation" that lies within the bounds of physical and commercial possibility; that agricultural industry must be prosperous in a country which commands the largest capital, the best labour, and the best market in the world; and that, of all delusions, the absurdest is that of fancying that land and its produce can lose their intrinsic value in a country that has added one hundred thousand to its population, during the four months that we have been discussing the safety and desirableness of letting in more food.

It is, on every ground, highly satisfactory, that the moral effect of the division of last week has been sustained and enhanced by expositions so clear and decisive of the inevitableness and the beneficence of the legislative revolution now on the point of consummation. The agriculturists are plainly given to understand, that it is not Sir Robert Peel, or Lord John Russell, or the House of Commons, or the House of Lords, that repeal the landlords' Corn Law—but the irresistible course of opinion, events, and national experience. And they will, we doubt not, cheerfully accept a necessity which is as benign as it is irreversible and place themselves in intelligent harmony with the new and improved conditions of their lot as a section of the great industrial community of Englishmen.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.

We are glad to perceive that Mr. Milner Gibson has given notice of a motion for the immediate abolition of all discriminating duties on sugar. Such a measure is the natural complement of the repeal of the Corn Laws; and the failure of the sugar crops in the British West Indian Islands renders the necessity for enlarging the field of supply so obvious, that we cannot guess by what arguments the proposal can be resisted. We prefer Mr. Gibson's form of motion to that of Lord John Russell; the latter proposes—first, to equalise the duty on slave and free labour sugar; and, if successful in that step, then to provide for the prospective abolition of the distinctive duties between foreign and colonial sugar. The noble member for London divides into two measures that which the honourable member for Manchester proposes to effect by one; and he unnecessarily introduces an incidental discussion on slavery, not likely to prove interesting to the house or profitable to the nation. In fact the distinction between slave and free labour sugar is a piece of such patent hypocrisy that it is hardly necessary to attempt its exposure; but there is reason to fear that a sham battle on this point may divert attention from the insidious attempt to continue protection to a petted branch of colonial produce for some time longer. Mr. Gibson fairly meets the real evil, Monopoly, for the overthrow of that will bring down hypocrisy in its fall. He assails the key of the enemy's position, for when that is taken, all other points will be abandoned; while Lord John Russell wastes time and force in a strong demonstration against an untenable outpost.

The West Indian interest, as it is called, has sought strange alliances in its decadence; it has even sought the favour of the great object of its former vituperation, the Anti-Slavery Society. But when everybody knows that the cry against the use of slave produce is the veriest sham that was ever used to delude a people, why should we assail the pretext rather than the principle which that pretext has been assumed to hide? Lord John Russell gives to this hollow pretence a factitious importance by making it the subject of a substantive motion; but it is merely extraneous matter which has crept into the discussion between Free Trade and protection to divert attention from the real issue. Mr. Gibson has acted with his usual manliness in passing over this hollow pretence altogether, and proposing a motion which will raise a debate on what alone is the true question to be decided. The League has taken the same position with regard to sugar which it originally took respecting corn; it never entered into a discussion of the relative merits of a sliding scale or a fixed duty, because it protested against all forms of protection; and it will not tolerate any discriminating duties on the import of sugar, whether the protection be complicated by a hypocritical distinction between free labour and slave produce, or whether the differential duties stand in the simple nakedness of protection.

A GREAT FACT.—On the 7th ult., at Furness, Derbyshire, a respectable farmer of that place summoned a few of his neighbours to witness the christening and turning out to grass of three heifers, to which he gave the names of Cobden, Bright, and Wilson, amid the applause and approbation of his surrounding friends and servants. We live to improve.—Manchester Guardian.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE
SESSION OF 1846.

Twentieth Week, ending Saturday, June 6.

While the news of the great victory achieved in the House of Lords, on Friday morning, on the second reading of the Corn Law Repeal Bill, was yet booming in the public ear, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was making a significant commentary on the Richmond-Bentinck predictions and affirmations. It is no part of our present business to inquire where Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Goulburn have found their diminution-of-duty principles. It may be that Sir Robert Peel would have reformed the tariff in 1842, if no such document had been in existence as Mr. Hume's Import Duties Committee Report, drawn up in 1840. And it may be that Mr. Goulburn would have made precisely the same financial statement he did on last Friday, drawn solely from the results of the reform of the tariff in 1842, even if the Anti-Corn-Law League had not been in existence, or a fixed duty had never been proposed. These things are at once possible and improbable—but we take no note of them. We have only to deal with facts; and the one great fact is before us, that Mr. Goulburn, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in the performance of the important annual duty of opening the Budget, did, on last Friday afternoon, make a most gratifying and cheering Free Trade speech; and yet the name of this same Mr. Goulburn has been, in by-past years, associated with ideas of monopoly and exclusiveness. It is honourable to individuals to see them, in their old age, yielding to the demonstrations of fact and experience; and it must afford a thoughtful and a grateful pleasure to all thinking minds to see how strongly as well as steadily public opinion sweeps onwards.

The contents of the "Budget" had all been anticipated by Sir Robert Peel, when he developed his Corn and Customs scheme, at the commencement of the session. We knew, that, notwithstanding the reductions of duties which had taken place last year, there was a large surplus of revenue over income. We also knew that in consequence of the great reductions proposed during the present year, as well as the contemplated increase in the 'army, navy, and so forth, any anticipated surplus for the ensuing year would be very small. So far there was but little novelty in the financial statement which Mr. Goulburn made. But his review of the results of the financial policy commenced in 1842 was exceedingly interesting; and though this led him into some laudation of the existing government, and, by consequence, into a depreciation, rather insinuated than asserted, of its predecessors, we pass all by, for the sake of the results. It has been supposed that, in thus bringing under review the whole commercial policy of the Government, Mr. Goulburn was acting on the premonitory intimation of "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward." That may be so, but the effect of the exposition has been to raise a strong feeling of regret in the commercial world, that such excellent "men of business," and first-rate financiers, should be under the necessity of contemplating retirement from the responsibilities of office.

It will be recollected that after the division on the second reading of the Corn Bill on Friday morning, the House of Lords adjourned for the Whitsuntide holidays. But the House of Commons met on Friday evening, the chief business being the financial statement. The house having gone into a Committee of Ways and Means,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer made his annual financial statement. He was anxious to do so before the house separated for the holidays, in order that during the approaching leisure there might be time for considering the one general view he now presented. It would show how successful has been the financial policy of the Government, and dispel any apprehensions of difficulty which might remain as to the effects of reduction of duties.

The first point was that of income and expenditure. Last year, a revenue of 49,762,000*l.* had been anticipated; the actual amount which had been received was 51,250,000*l.*, independently of the China money. This great increase in the revenue of last year was a striking evidence of the beneficial effects of a reduction of duties. A great diminution had been accomplished during last year, yet the Customs, the Excise, the Stamps, and the Post-office all exhibited a large increase, beyond the anticipated receipts; and, notwithstanding the loss to the revenue from the reductions, there was a surplus of income over expenditure of no less than 2,350,000*l.* This afforded a striking proof of the elasticity of the resources of the country; for the only important branch of income which had declined was the property and income tax, the slight falling off in which had been caused by repayments.

Notwithstanding the additional great reduction of duties proposed during the present year, the experience of the past enabled him with confidence to anticipate the future. The results of their previous reductions taught him that he might take the anticipated loss in the Customs at two-fifths of the duties to be repealed, and set down the amount to be received from that source at 19,300,000*l.* But as, notwithstanding the uncertainty caused by the delay of the Government measures, there was every indication of continued prosperity, and the reports from the revenue officers at all the outposts were very satisfactory, he would advance his estimate, and set down his expected revenue from the Customs during the next year at 19,500,000*l.* It was to be borne in recollection that though the measures of the Government were not yet passed into law, the reduction of duties was in actual operation, under the Treasury order. In the Excise a very large reduction had also taken place during last year, yet the revenue from it fell short only by 100,000*l.* from what it was when the auction, glass, and other duties were in full operation. He would take the excise at 13,400,000*l.*; the stamps at 7,400,000*l.*; the property tax at 5,100,000*l.*; the post office at 850,000*l.*, which with other items, and 700,000*l.*

of China money, will render the anticipated income for the ensuing year 51,450,000*l.* The expenditure, if taken at the same amount as last year, would be 49,400,000*l.*, which would leave a surplus upon the year of 2,200,000*l.*—a sum nearly as large as the surplus of last year, notwithstanding the great reductions which have been made. But the expenditure for next year is considerably increased. Our public establishments were increased, which would nearly absorb the surplus. The army and navy are augmented, the specific additional charges for which he stated, which, with other extra expenses, will reduce the 2,200,000*l.* to 776,000*l.*, the main portion of which will be derived from the 700,000*l.* of China money.

The system which had brought about our present financial prosperity was begun in 1842, soon after the present Government entered on office. Previously there had been a great deficiency, which had been attempted to be supplied by increased taxation. This having failed, resort was had to a revision of our prohibitory and protective duties, and the result was striking. In 1842 the balances in the Exchequer were only three millions. In 1846 they amounted to eight millions, the specific increase during these four years being 4,798,000*l.* Then, during these four years, there had been a considerable diminution of the capital stock of the funded and unfunded debt. The total amount of these two descriptions of debt, the funded and unfunded, in 1842 was 792,209,000*l.* In 1846 it was only 785,115,000*l.*, being a reduction in the capital of the debt of seven millions and a half sterling. The deficiency bills have also been reduced by 4,133,300*l.* In addition to these two sums, by which the capital of the debt has been reduced by eleven millions, the interest and charge for the debt had been abated by the annual sum of 800,000*l.*, the amount in 1842 being 29,597,000*l.*, and in 1846 28,129,000*l.*; while another prospective reduction has been effected of 625,000*l.*, which is to come into operation in 1854, making the total annual reduction thus amounting to 1,500,000*l.* Exclusive of the prospective reduction, it might be alleged that the China money had mainly assisted them to accomplish these results. The amount thus received had been 3,323,000*l.*, from which had to be deducted the expense of the war, 2,050,000*l.*, and the opium compensation, 1,270,000*l.*, leaving only a sum of 3,000*l.* actually available from this source in aid of the Exchequer. But the benefit derived from reduction of taxation was not to be measured by the mere amount of the duties reduced. Since 1842 the present Government have imposed the Property and Income-tax, which, with some small Excise duties, makes an annual amount of taxation imposed of 5,600,000*l.* But during the last four years Customs and Excise duties have been remitted to the extent of 8,206,000*l.*, which leaves a balance of taxation reduced of no less than 2,582,000*l.* It might be said that good harvests had brought about the present favourable condition of the people. He did not undervalue the beneficial influence of good harvests. But to the commercial and financial policy pursued by the Government, he contended, ought to be mainly attributed the present aspect of the country. Reduction of duties and increased consumption, improved the revenue, diffused comfort, and extended trade, the effects of which were displayed in increased deposits in the savings banks, the diminution of crime, the diffusion of education and of religious instruction. Instead of building fifty churches during a century, we built fifty in a year. These results were obtained without any derangement of any great national interest, but by proceeding gradually. He hoped we would go on as we had begun, and cautiously and gradually diminish the burdens of the people.

Several speakers criticised the statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, especially Lord George Bentinck and Mr. Hudson, who vainly attempted to throw discredit upon them. But it was of no use—there the facts were, without gainsay or contradiction.

The House of Commons adjourned from Friday till Friday; but the House of Lords resumed its sittings on Thursday.

In the House of Lords, their sittings were resumed after the recess, on Thursday. Lord Stanley introduced the subject of the Canadian Address, which afforded Lord Dalhousie an opportunity of refuting the absurd calumny that he had knowingly misrepresented the sentiments of the Canadian legislature. Lord Stanley gave notice of his intention to direct the attention of the house to this address, which, however, it is probable that the next packet will show to be a matter wholly unimportant.

The second reading of the Customs' Duties Bill was then moved by the Earl of Dalhousie, who admitted that the measure was not a perfect scheme of Free Trade, but such an approximation towards it as considerations of revenue and of existing interests enabled them to make. At the same time, he said the Government were fully convinced of the unsoundness of the principle of protection. The present bill, as our readers may recollect, proposes the abolition, or the considerable reduction, of the duties on linen, cotton, woollen, silk, and metallic manufactures, on butter and cheese, on spirits and timber, and so forth.

The Duke of Richmond entered his usual protest, and made his usual amendment, but did not divide the house. He is, however, going into committee on the bill, to raise the silk question, by moving that the Spitalfields' weavers be heard by counsel at the bar against the proposed bill for lowering the silk duties.

The Earl of Wicklow deplored the removal of protection from the linen manufacture of Ireland. Lord Ashburton traced our periods of stagnation to the Currency Bill of 1819, and said that trade and commerce could never be secure, so long as they were at the mercy of every new crotchet in the head of Sir Robert Peel. Earl Grey spoke a few sensible words for Free Trade, of which the bill was an instalment; and Lord Montague took a similar view, and refreshed the memory of Lord Ashburton, by quoting from the celebrated petition of the city of London, in favour of Free Trade, which, in 1820, was presented by a Mr. T. Baring, who supported the petition with a speech! It was evident that Lord Ashburton did not relish the reminiscence.

The bill was read a second time, their lordships rising in time for dinner.

DEBATE ON THE SECOND READING IN THE LORDS.

We here present the reader with a full report of three speeches for which we could not find room in our number of last week:

SPEECH OF THE MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE and the Earl of EGLINTON rose together; but the call for the former prevailing, the noble earl gave way, and the noble marquis proceeded to address the house. This debate having now arrived at its third night, which would also, most probably, be its last (loud cries of "No, no," from the cross-benches, and of "Yes, yes," from other parts of the house)—he would take the liberty of offering a few observations on the great question now under consideration; but their lordships might rest assured that the length of his observations would not be such as to prevent them from coming to a decision that evening, if they had already determined on doing so. His noble friend who had just sat down (Lord Ashburton) need not be alarmed by the apprehension that he (the Marquis of Lansdowne) intended to trouble him or the house with any remarks having reference to that awful subject, political economy—a subject of which his noble friend appeared to have an especial horror (a laugh). It was not his noble friend, however, who first discussed its horrors. Lord John Russell, 26 years ago, when a young man, and before he had as yet held office under the Crown, characterised it as "an awful subject" then, and after sitting for such a long series of years in Parliament, he had declared that he considered it "an awful subject" now. On this formidable topic he would not, therefore, touch. He had risen, however, for the purpose of also assuring his noble friend, that following his precept rather than his example, he would studiously abstain from entering into that which his noble friend had promised not to touch upon, but which he had, notwithstanding largely dilated on—the question of the burdens on land. He (the Marquis of Lansdowne) would dismiss from his consideration this subject, which was in itself an immense and important one, but which, however, was not essentially connected with the present debate in any other sense than this, that whereas it was fit that justice should be done to the consuming classes in this country; it was also fit that at proper seasons justice should be done to the proprietors of land (hear, hear). This was the opinion which he had always held upon this subject; and it would be in the recollection of his noble friend, that he (the Marquis of Lansdowne) had never asserted it more strongly than at the present moment, when he thought it possible that he might have some influence in directing or advising the proceedings of their lordships' house. He would implore of their lordships, however, to dismiss from their minds the question of the burdens on land, and to fix their attention on the consideration, in its intrinsic merits, of what his noble friend (Lord Ashburton) had very properly described as one of the greatest questions, if not the very greatest that had ever been submitted to their notice (hear, hear, hear). That question which had for years engaged public public attention—which had for years been the subject of debate and discussion in Parliament and out of it—which had been canvassed for such a length of time in every town and village of the country—assumed a somewhat new aspect as it presented itself to their lordships' consideration, for now for the first time it came before them in the shape of a bill which had been taken under the special charge of her Majesty's Government, and which had been sanctioned by a majority of the other house. His noble friend who had just sat down, and the noble lord who addressed the house with such eloquence on Monday night—he meant the late Secretary for the Colonies—had said that against the decision of the House of Commons, recently come to and communicated to their lordships, he would set the decision of the House of Commons in 1842 (hear, hear). In fact, he said that he could set the House of Commons of 1842 against the House of Commons of 1846. But surely this was no fair mode whereby to dispose of such a question as the present. Unless it was to be supposed that the House of Commons became senile, infirm, and incapable of rational conduct in the fourth or fifth year of its existence, he could not understand on what ground the early decision of that house, arrived at in the days of its youth and inexperience, should be preferred to its maturer and more deliberate counsels (hear, hear). Another noble lord who addressed the house on Tuesday evening, and who had thought it necessary to apologise for doing so, though he had displayed a degree of talent which would entitle him to be heard with attention at any time—had been so rash as to say that the majority on this question in the House of Commons, though a clear one, was not a clean one; but he would take the liberty of inquiring of the noble lord whether he pretended (and if so, on what ground?) that the former decision of the Commons against the repeal of the Corn Laws was more clean than the more recent one in favour of that repeal (loud cheers)? Could a decision be ever arrived at by either house of Parliament to which could be attached that degree of importance which the decisions of the legislature ought to command, if it were to be required that those decisions should in all cases be come to without the exercise of any authority or influence brought to bear on the great mass or body of the persons composing the deliberative assembly (hear, hear, hear)? It would be foolish and irrational to make any such requirement, for in all assemblies of men the leading minds must ever exercise great influence and authority (hear, hear, hear). It was not for their lordships to enter into an examination of the motives which had influenced the House of Commons, when, by a large majority, they sent up to them for their concurrence and approval this bill, intended to settle a most important and difficult question. The noble lords opposite had thought fit voluntarily to reveal the circumstances under which and the occasions on which of late years their private meditations had differed from their public votes (hear, hear, and a laugh); but, although they had in the exercise of their private discretion thought proper to make these revelations, he did not think he had any right to urge them to give information on such points. He protested against dragging either them or their supporters to the confessional. It was enough for him that they had altered their minds. He was to take the decision of the House of Commons as he found it, and he received it as the emphatic declaration of the people through their representatives (hear, hear). Thus much on the subject of the majority. And now, before entering on the commercial view of this question, he wished to say a few words on two points, on both of which his noble friend had touched, and which were to be regarded as separate and distinct, and as preliminary to the general consideration of this question. The first of these was one to which the noble lord the late Secretary for the Colonies had attached much importance—this country's independence of foreign nations in the supply of food, and the political danger which he feared would arise from the admission and constant importation of foreign corn into this country. The noble and learned lord on his left (Lord Brougham) had most triumphantly exposed the fallacy and utter groundlessness of any apprehension of danger on this score, by referring to the great historical fact, which no one had ventured to impeach, namely, Napoleon's utter inability (notwithstanding all his gigantic influence was exerted towards that end) to prevent England from having a foreign supply of corn during the war (hear, hear). Despite of all his exertions, foreign grain poured in enormous quantities into this country during the war; and were it not that the fact was so, the price would have been 150s. a quarter instead of 105s. (hear, hear). As it was, there was great scarcity during the war, but had it not been for the foreign supply, there would have been absolute famine, so that a reference to our history in war-times, so far from showing that it was unsafe or inexpedient to rely on a supply from foreign ports, proved the very opposite fact. The fact was that if, from political considerations, dependence on foreign countries was to be avoided, it could only be avoided at the expense of the farmer, who must be made to grow more corn than he could sell in one year, in order to secure a supply for another (hear, hear). This being obviously the fact, he was, he confessed, not a little surprised to find noble lords standing up to maintain that the sliding scale was the system which was best calculated to ensure security on this point. Why, if there ever was a law so contrived as to expose the country to the danger of political animosity, it was the law of the sliding scale (hear, hear). In the case of fixed duty or Free Trade, there would be always a regular growth of corn in other lands especially designed for this country, and the home-growers could make their arrangements accordingly; but the sliding-scale system was fraught with the most dangerous results; for when there was scarcity in England it proclaimed the fact all over the world, and that was the moment for foreign nations—supposing them to be animated with no very friendly feelings towards England—to step forward and say, "You are suffering from scarcity; now, we will stop your supplies, and reduce you to starvation" (hear, hear). So it was clear that if there was any system which left us more than another at the mercy of the foreigner, it was the sliding-scale system (hear, hear). There was another point he would allude to. The opponents of the present measure appeared to be haunted by the apprehension that a considerable alteration in the social system of this country must ensue as the consequence of the repeal of the Corn Laws (a laugh). Nor was this strange idea confined alone to the occupants of the cross-benches, nor indeed exclusively to this country, for he had it on high authority that an eminent personage in a neighbouring country had pronounced a glowing eulogium on the right honourable baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government for having undertaken to cause a revolution in the social system of England (laughter). He thought it extremely doubtful whether the right honourable baronet would be inclined to regard this as a compliment, for most assuredly nothing could be more remote from his intention than any such purpose (hear, hear, hear). The only constitutional change that could by any possible contingency be involved would be the imputed diminution of respect and consideration to the landed proprietors, but even this apprehension was unfounded and absurd. Let the regulations of society as to commerce or manufactures be what they might, there would always attach to the possession of land an importance which would give to the landed proprietors not more power than they ought to have, but their just and legitimate position, and a preponderating influence in the affairs of government and legislation (loud cries of "hear, hear"). Many appeals to experience and testimony of the past had been made by the opponents of this measure; but it appeared to him that they entirely overrated, and indeed misunderstood their pretensions in this respect. He would not go so far as to say that he altogether approved of this measure in all its bearings (loud cries of "hear, hear," from the protectionist peers); but this he would say, that those who were friendly to the general principles on which this bill was based, and thought them wise and salutary, were the men who founded themselves on experience (hear, hear). Whatever may be urged on the score of political economy, this at all events was certain, that those who were friendly to the principle of this bill were emphatically the men who relied upon experience, and that it was those who maintained the protective system who were supporting theorists (hear, hear). Whatever restrictions on commerce had been introduced into the legislation of this country were so many experiments, and all these experiments had failed, and were ultimately abandoned without any attempt being subsequently made (vide the case of wool) to restore them, or call them into renewed existence (hear, hear). And he begged their lordships to consider, when this commercial policy was called the system of our ancestors, that there never had been a fixed system at all. The barometer of commercial policy had always pointed to change, and if it was to be deemed a part of and bound up with our institutions and religion, our institutions and religion could not have been the same for these twenty years. Look to every change that had taken place in the course of the last thirty or forty years, and the effect of those changes in respect of wool, of silk, and of hops (hear, hear). His noble friend who had quoted Mr. Huskisson would remember that one of the first and ablest efforts of that statesman in the way, not of maintaining, but of destroying protection, was the doing away with the duty on silk (hear, hear). And when that wise man made the attempt to do that, who had been his opponent? His noble friend (hear, hear), who had thought Mr. Huskisson a most hard-hearted man for not duly weighing the misery he was inflicting upon the large part of the population he was throwing out of employment. Mr. Huskisson said he might be called hard-hearted, but he would persevere, and persevere he did. What was the result? Instead of 2,000,000 lbs. of silk, 6,000,000 lbs. were manufactured (hear, hear). Did his noble friend find in this an instance of the value of the system of our forefathers? Did it appear that large bodies of labourers were dependent upon the system of protection, when the effect of this change was not only to preserve a large number of them, who could not otherwise have subsisted, but to call many into existence (hear, hear). The case was the same with respect to wool. He would not weary their lordships with the figures, but those who had paid attention to the subject knew that there had been an immense increase. As to our shipping, which had been dwelt upon as an instance of the mischief attending the removal or relaxation of our commercial system, what were the facts? His noble friend had surely read from the wrong paper when he drew the inferences he had with respect to shipping. In 1820, the tonnage in the ports of England was 2,648,593, and in 1832 the number of tons entered inwards—and the numbers entered outwards bore a proportionate increase—was 1,936,000. In 1845, the number of tons was 3,669,000. And this was called a diminution of tonnage in England under tariff relaxations. Could anything be more decisive as to the state of the shipping interest? and until other figures were brought to confute those he should assert that the shipping interest was never more prosperous. He cared not that the tonnage in other countries had increased also (hear, hear). God forbid the effect of any of our systems should be to diminish the trade of any country on the globe! On the contrary, he regarded it as an additional source of satisfaction, that if our tonnage had increased, that of other countries had increased even in a greater degree (hear, hear). He accepted it as a benefit, and he considered that both the one increase and the other was conducive to the wealth and prosperity of all (hear, hear). In 1785 Mr. Pitt introduced commercial propositions relative to our trade with Ireland, which were founded upon the principle of liberty of commerce. But then, as now, there had not been wanting persons who saw in the adoption of such resolutions nothing but ruin and destruction. At that time, Colonel Stanley, a near relative of his noble friend the late Secretary for the Colonies, came forward and presented a petition, which he enforced with a speech stating in common with the petitioners, who prayed to be heard by counsel at the bar in proof of their allegations, that what was about to be done would put the finishing stroke to the cotton manufacture in England. And what was this proposal which excited so much alarm? The admission of Irish flustians and cottons (hear, hear, hear). The petitioners declared, that if once those productions were admitted, there would be an end of the English cotton manufacture. The resolution, however, was carried into effect, and to this day Ireland, unfortunately, did not produce cotton manufactures for her own use, while the English cotton manufactures had doubled, nay quadrupled, quintupled, which proved how little it was dependent upon protection (hear, hear). The next year came on the commercial treaty with France, which was debated in their lordships' house in a form he could have wished the present question to have before them—that of a resolution, by which Mr. Pitt afforded to their lordships an opportunity of alteration, of which they were now deprived. In that debate, an individual of high eminence, of great knowledge, and scientific attainments, whom he (the Marquis of Lansdowne) remembered in early youth, he meant Dr. Watson, Bishop of Landaff, put forth this notion of protection, and told their lordships that they were overturning all the experience of their ancestors by this treaty of commerce, and like the late noble Secretary for the Colonies, the bishop read the preamble of an act of the reign of Charles the Second, which said—"Whereas, it is universally known that the wealth of the country is disappearing, and ruin is advancing, from the money sent out of the country for the purchase of French wines" (hear, hear, and laughter). That was the experience of our ancestors, to which reference had been made, and revering as he did the experience of our ancestors upon the great principles of the constitution and government under which we lived, believing that our ancestors had laid that government upon the surest and most certain foundations, and had contributed thereby to the greatest happiness and prosperity of the country, he could not extend his respect to a principle such as that which they had thought fit to apply to our commercial policy. If his noble friend at the head of the Board of Trade would look through all the papers and memorials which, from time to time, had been presented to that board, he would find that the commerce of the country had encountered more dangers and hair-breadth escapes than had ever fallen to the lot of any voyager-adventurer, not excepting Sindbad the sailor himself. Never had an alteration or improvement been adopted, but commerce had been represented as standing on the brink of a precipice, whence it would presently be hurled to the bottom. Nevertheless, after a few years, it had always been found placed on a higher eminence than before, and further out of the reach of danger and difficulty. He therefore confidently repeated his opinion that experience was against and not for protection and prohibition. Nothing could lead him to believe that the British farmer, with all the advantages of increased knowledge, and the easiest possible communication, with the certainty of a growing population around him, was dependent for his prosperity upon the sickly atmosphere of protection (cheers). His noble friend had quoted Mr. Huskisson for the purpose of gaining the sanction of his name to the maintenance of the prohibitory system for the production of the land; but it was to be wished when his noble friend told their lordships that he had not only quoted the opinions of that statesman in 1815, but in 1826, that his noble friend had not entirely suppressed his opinions of 1830. But as his noble friend had quoted Mr. Huskisson, he (the Marquis of Lansdowne) must be permitted to read a remarkable sentence or two contained in the last speech that statesman ever made (hear, hear), and then he would leave their lordships to decide whether his authority would be quoted in favour of a prohibitory policy:—"Our Corn Laws, however expedient to prevent other evils in the present state of the country, are in themselves a burden and a restraint upon its commercial and manufacturing industry. Whilst the products of that industry must descend to the level of the general market of the world, the producers, so far as food is concerned, are debarred from that level. If the price of sustenance—that is, the price of those particular articles which we never export and are frequently compelled to import—be materially dearer here than anywhere else, that dearness cannot be shifted to the articles which we do export. It must fall in the way of deduction either upon the wages and comforts of the labourer, or upon the profits of those who afford him employment" (cheers). After that quotation, from the last opinions of Mr. Huskisson, it would be most extraordinary to him to hear the authority of that statesman claimed for the maintenance of the Corn Law. The opinions of the farmers had been referred to, and whatever his noble friend might say of the farmers of the south, there were hardly any persons better informed, more long-sighted or more intent on acquiring the means of forming a correct judgment than the Scotch farmers (hear, hear). He held in his hand a list of lettings which had taken place last year in some of the most important places, at an advance varying from 10 to 25 and 30 per cent. (The noble marquis here read the list, but in so low a tone as to be inaudible in the gallery.) Again, they were told that the system of protection was good for other things, and therefore must be good for the cultivation of the soil. We had the experience of a now very important article—that of flax. That was formerly protected, but the protection was in a great degree removed in 1824, and was finally and entirely removed in 1842. At that time memorials to the Board of Trade, petitions to Parliament, depositions of members of Parliament to the Treasury abounded, to represent all the injury that would ensue from the withdrawal of protection. What had been the effect of the measure? The produce of Irish flax in 1841, before the withdrawal of the last protection, was 25,000 tons; two years after the protection had been withdrawn it was 36,000 tons (hear, hear), so that unprotected flax had extended itself with the most unaccountable rapidity, in spite of all the terrors and fears which the removal of the protection had inspired. He took from the evidence of Mr. Blake, a very intelligent witness, examined by Lord Devon's Commission in its inquiries in the north of Ireland, these questions as to flax: "What is the state of the country as regards the cultivation of flax?"—"The cultivation is daily becoming more prevalent." Mr. McCulloch was afterwards asked whether he considered flax a remunerative crop, and he said that of late years it had become a remunerative crop (hear, hear). Then he had the evidence both of figures and of persons staying in the country, the best of all evidence, that the withdrawal of protection was immediately followed by the increase of cultivation in the case of flax. Perhaps some noble lord would tell him that the increase was owing to the protection of the linen manufactures; but that would not do, for the protection was withdrawn from them in the same year, and our linen manufactures were left to compete with the foreigner. Then he said he concurred with Mr. Huskisson, not in those earlier opinions which his noble friend had quoted, but in his later opinions which he omitted to quote, that the Corn Laws, as declared in the last speech pronounced by him in 1830, were an impediment to the progress of commerce and manufactures, and ought to be repealed (hear, hear). He did maintain that the speculations of calamity founded on the removal of past restrictions had completely deceived those who entertained them, and that they had been succeeded by an immense increase in the prosperity of the country. Those persons who had entertained these apprehensions, and denounced those reforms as dire calamities, if permitted to revisit this country, would, with undoubted confidence in their own predictions, have rushed to scenes which they would have expected to see reduced to desolation:

"Desertosque videre locos, litusque relictum," but would have found them the flourishing seats of industry and wealth. His noble friend, the late Secretary for the Colonies, had told them there was a danger of too great prosperity of manufactures; but how had the agricultural community reached the prosperity it now enjoyed, but through the agency of manufactures? They were told last night that too little was said of the importance of the home market to the manufactures, and that it was to that the manufacturers ought to look. He had recently read a historical account of the county with which his noble friend the late Secretary for the Colonies was immediately connected—that of Lancashire, which well illustrated this subject. He knew nothing peculiar in the circumstances of that county, which might not equally apply to the whole kingdom. In the course of the last 150 years, the property of the county, as a whole, had been advanced 6300 per cent., while the property of the agricultural parts had been advanced in the time 3500 per cent. Now, he would ask their lordships, had not the manufacturing parts advanced 6300 per cent., if it would have been possible for the agricultural parts to have advanced 3500 per cent. (hear, hear)? One was the effect of the other; the increase in the value of landed property in this country depended, and would depend on the greater increase in the manufacturing property of the country. He therefore said it was short-sighted indeed not to consider that the manufacturing interest was entitled to its part in the universal prosperity of the country (hear, hear). Many seemed to consider manufacturing prosperity as a kind of unhealthy reptile, which the state physician was to keep down, and not to encourage by allowing it to obtain the cheapest food in the cheapest market. Others of their lordships entertained opinions favourable to a fixed duty. He (the Marquis of Lansdowne) had never dissembled his opinions as to a fixed duty; he had omitted no fit occasion to state his preference for a fixed duty as a mode of settling this question. He thought that this would have been preferable, first because he was unwilling to impair the revenue of the country; he was for it, because, if adopted on a moderate scale, it appeared to him consistent with a very large import of foreign corn, and furthermore with the freest intercourse with foreign nations (hear, hear). He was not ashamed to say that he was for it also, because wishing that in all great changes the sentiments and feelings, and even the prejudices of large bodies of men should be consulted, it had appeared to him that the adoption of such a duty would naturally conciliate such an amount of support from those who constituted what was called the landed interest, as would enable a settlement to be adopted which might be considered equally satisfactory to others as to them (hear, hear). These were his opinions, and if he had the settlement of this question in his hands at present, these would still be his opinions (hear, hear). But the question he was now called upon to answer, and must answer to himself, was, whether, in voting in committee for any amendment calculated to have that effect, he should not be, in fact, nominally voting for such an amendment, but really voting against the settlement of this question (hear, hear). He could not disguise from himself that whether the forms of the two houses of Parliament were or were not what they ought to be, yet, after the sentiments expressed by the right honourable gentleman at the head of her Majesty's Government, possessing a great though diminished influence in the other house of Parliament—after the letter written in November last, but to which he (the Marquis of Lansdowne) was no party, by his noble friend the member for the city of London—after the general sentiments expressed in favour of the change in doors and out of doors—he was obliged to conclude that the effect of such an amendment being to throw out this bill, it would be followed, not by a fixed duty, but by a bill of a totally different description (cries of "hear, hear"). Under these circumstances, looking, as he was bound to do, to the practice of the constitution, and finding the practical inference confirmed by the speech of his noble friend the late Secretary for the Colonies the other night, who directed the whole scope of his argument quite as much against a fixed duty as a sliding scale, and studiously took the high ground of protection, not of revenue, for the purpose of letting them understand how little they had to hope from him as to the enactment of a fixed duty under that influence; after these circumstances, and having deliberately reflected on the consequences that might be expected to follow a different line of conduct, he had finally determined, for the purpose of obtaining a settlement in this country, to accept the bill as tendered by her Majesty's Government (hear, hear). His fears and hopes as to the result of the bill as connected with the fall or rise of the price of provisions in this country, were neither up to the apprehensions entertained on the one side by the noble lords opposite, nor up to the equally exaggerated expectations entertained on the other as to the great increase of cheapness. He thought the way in which the bill would answer the objects of its framers, and be productive of great and lasting beneficial consequences to this country would be by a gradual and certain extension of commerce, placed on a solid foundation (hear, hear). The increase of the linen trade, and the much greater amount of flax grown, was an instance of the manner in which it might be expected to operate; extension of commerce would contribute to the wealth and prosperity both of the land and trade of this country, so that at the end of a few years, they would not be able to determine which benefited most. He had every confidence that the exertions of the British farmer would save him harmless from the effects resulting from any small decrease in the amount of the price of grain that might for a time ensue. He could not undoubtedly adopt the political economy of a man who was one of the greatest ornaments of this country, who, in one of his most beautiful poems had declared, "That trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay,

As ocean sweeps the labour'd mole away."

Though he was inclined to adopt the sentiment of the two following lines, and apply them to the farmers and the landed interest of this country:

"A self-dependent power can time defy,
As rocks resist the billows and the sky."

(cheers). In that confidence he felt himself bound to give his vote in favour of the measure proposed to them by her Majesty's ministers (cheers).

SPEECH OF LORD DALHOUSIE.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE.—I am sure your lordships will do me the justice to believe that I am entirely sincere when I say, that in rising to submit to your lordships the reasons which induce me to give my vote in favour of the second reading of this bill, and to bear my share of the responsibility of proposing it, I do so under a deep and unfeigned distrust of my own capacity to discharge the task which devolves upon me. I should labour under a feeling of still stronger discouragement, were it not that I venture even now to hope that I may receive at your lordships' hands a continuance of that kindness and indulgence which for many years your lordships have invariably shown me (hear, hear). I should not have contested with the noble baron the right to occupy the attention of the house, were it not that there was an understanding (the noble duke will bear me out) that I should follow the noble lord who had sat down. [The Duke of Richmond.—"After the noble marquis spoke, it was right that a protectionist should answer him; your lordships have already heard, that though the noble earl was once a protectionist, he is not so now."] "I hope the house will not permit itself to lose its good humour; I can assure your lordships that nothing whatever shall fall from me calculated in the slightest degree to increase the feelings of impatience, and I hope the house will not be offended if I say of discontent, which it is too apparent prevail among your lordships. In the course of the debate here and elsewhere it has divided itself into two parts; one of these has reference to the merits of the measure itself, and the other to the conduct of those by whom it has been brought forward; and there have been said things which it is, no doubt, hard to listen to and galling to bear. I am not about, either on the part of myself or of my noble friends by my side, to offer any complaint upon that subject. We cannot help being conscious, that however strong are our own convictions of the expediency and the necessity of the course we have pursued, the introduction of the measure by us cannot but have created feelings of mortification in the minds of those with whom we have hitherto acted, and I at once admit that we have no right to be quickly sensitive to the natural expression of that feeling (hear, hear). I assure your lordships again that, if I can help it, not a word shall fall from my lips calculated to increase any animosity which may at present exist (hear). My noble friends, I am sure, will not be inclined to think that I misstate the case when I say that a large proportion of that which has been stated by them was stated previously in the brilliant and comprehensive address delivered by the noble lord the late Secretary for the colonies. I am sure that they will not think it flows from any disrespect to them, if I direct myself chiefly to his speech, which was so comprehensive, as a whole, and which, in my opinion, placed the matter on those grounds on which alone I think it is expedient this question should be considered. The noble lord gave his opinion, not only on this bill, but submitted to the house his views on the whole commercial policy of the country. He stated that he objected to this bill because he wished to sustain protection to native industry. Now, the bill which is submitted to your lordships, and in which is proposed a change of the law, is based on precisely the opposite principles, and it is in defence of that proposed change that I now address your lordships, for I feel bound to maintain the opinion I hold, that the principle of protection is altogether unsound (cheers). I believe that the principle of protective duties is unjust to the consumer, by raising the price of the article he purchases, and in the long run in no degree beneficial to the producer (hear, hear). I found that opinion, not merely on the teaching of political economists, for it has not been impressed on my mind with a fearful and irresistible weight by that which my noble friend (Lord Ashburton) has referred to this evening, as that "awful thing" political economy (a laugh); but I have derived this opinion from an examination of the history of the commerce of this country—and the authority I shall to-night quote is the greatest of all authorities—I mean the authority of fact (hear, hear, hear). I maintain that the history of our commercial legislation,—more especially of the last 30 years, and, above and beyond all, the history and course of our commercial legislation, which the noble lord the late Secretary for the Colonies the other evening referred to so much in illustration of the tariff of 1842,—affords demonstration of the truth of the doctrine I have just laid down (hear, hear). Permit me here to address to the house a few words personally relating to myself. In making the statement I do now with respect to the principle of protection, I say nothing at variance with the sentiments I have ever expressed in this house (cheers). During the three years I have conducted a portion of the public business of the country, not only has nothing been said by me adverse to the opinion I express now, but that opinion itself has always been held and expressed by me (hear). It has been my lot to express this opinion amid the dearest and duldest silence of noble lords on this side of the house, while it received the cheers of the noble marquis and the noble lords who usually agree with him on the outside of the house (hear); when noble lords beside him were shaking their heads at the doctrine which he put forth, while noble lords opposite nodded acquiescence (hear). The noble lord proceeded to say, that upon occasions when he was called upon to bring forward any liberal measure in that house, the noble duke on the cross benches, if he supported the motion, did so not because he loved the sentiments of the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, but because he abjured and hated them in some degrees less than he did those of his noble friend's opposite (hear). During the 11 years he had been in public life he had not in any one case expressed an opinion adverse to that which he now held on this question. He had the honour of a seat in the other House of Parliament for an agricultural constituency, the county of East Lothian, and never to them on the hustings or elsewhere had he uttered a word adverse to his present principles. He never gave a vote on the Corn Laws but one, and that was for a diminution of duty, and a relaxation of protection (hear). He asked pardon for thus occupying their attention with matters personal to himself, but as that debate had turned so much on inconsistency, he thought it due to himself to say thus much (cheers). It would be unpardonable in him at that late hour of the night, and in the temper of the house, and after the fatigue it had endured, to proceed at any length to illustrate the views he held upon this question; but he did feel strongly the extreme importance of not permitting the speech of the noble lord (Lord Stanley) on the commercial policy pursued by her Majesty's Government to go unanswered. He would not go into details, but would touch merely on two or three of the points urged by the noble lord. But he had stated to their lordships that he rested wholly on facts for the principles he entertained, and was prepared to go into the question and to deny that the commercial prosperity of this country had risen from the operation of protection, and in this he agreed with Lord Liverpool, who was not usually quoted by noble lords opposite on such a question as this, but who had said he thought it more than doubtful whether the prosperity of the various trades, woollen more particularly, had not existed in despite of, and not in consequence of protection (hear, hear). He was prepared to combat the statements of the noble lord, on the authority of Mr. Greg, and to assert that with respect to the woollen, cotton, linen, silk, iron, and, indeed, every branch of trade in the country, not only did they not flourish by reason of the principle of protection, but that they flourished just as that protection was removed. Nay, more, that they flourished all the better in proportion as that protection was removed (cheers). His noble friend had adverted to various points in the tariff of 1842, and he made certain statements as to the price of wool and timber, and ships in the Baltic trade, and guano ships, the whole tendency of which was to impugn the effect of that tariff, and to show that protection to native industry ought to be continued. The noble lord then went on to say that he remembered his noble friend had two years ago remarked on the great increase on the importation of butter, and he had stated the other night that that increase was owing to the duty having been lowered; but there were two reasons why that effect could not be traced to the reduction of duties. The first was, that the duty had not been lowered; the second was, that the importation had not increased (a laugh). He should endeavour to say nothing respecting the statement of his noble friend (Lord Stanley) which ought not to be said in his absence. One of his noble friend's statements was that his right hon. friend (Sir Robert Peel) had made it his boast that the tariff of 1842 had had the effect of increasing the prices of articles, and that he argued that increased competition tended to raise the prices of articles. Now, his right hon. friend had made no such statement. His right hon. friend said that, notwithstanding the alarm that was expressed that the tariff would have the effect of lowering prices, those prices had not been lowered, and he distinctly stated that the result was not owing to the operation of the tariff, but that he mentioned it only to show that the apprehensions that were felt at that time had not been realised. What had been the effect of protecting wool with reference to the price? In 1819, when the duty of 6d. a lb. was imposed, the price was 1s. 4d., which had fallen, under the operation of protection, to 10d. in 1826. He had by him a paper which had been laid on the table containing the prices and quantities of wool from 1818 to 1845, and the return was made so extensive in order to comprise three different rates of duty. In 1818 the duty was 3d. a lb.; in 1819 it was 6d. a lb., which it continued till 1826, when the duty was lowered to 1d., and that duty remained until 1844, when it was finally abolished. Now, when the duty of 6d. a pound was proposed, those who urged that a protective duty was necessary were distinctly told that it would have the effect of lowering the price, for that foreign wool was essentially necessary for combination with our own wools in the manufacture of cloth, and that the demand for home wool would diminish if foreign wool were rendered so much dearer, and that the price would accordingly fall. The price when that duty was imposed was 2s. 6d., the importation of foreign wool being about 17,000,000lb. During the continuance of the high duty the importation fell from 17,000,000lb. to 14,000,000lb., and the price of home grown wool fell to 1s. 4d. The consequence was that our woollens were entirely excluded from the markets of the Continent, and in fact from that hour to the present the woollen trade had never wholly recovered from the blow then inflicted upon it. His noble friend would have found, if he had looked a little more closely into the subject, that the price had begun to revive upon taking off the high duty of 6d. a lb., and had continued to increase up to 1834, when it was 1s. 3d.; that was to say, the price was as high with an importation of 42,084,247lb., as when the importation was only 17,000,000lb. The price was now 1s. 4d. Whether, therefore, his noble friend had in the case of wool made out his position that on lowering the duty on importation the price fell, he would leave to their lordships to consider, the price having been 2s. 6d. under a low duty in 1818, and having fallen to 1s. 4d. under the operation of a high duty. Then his noble friend had said, "Look to the case of timber; you lowered the duty on foreign timber in 1842;" and then he put it to his noble friend at the head of the Woods and Forests to say whether the prices of Crown timber sold in England had not to a considerable extent fallen. Now, he (the Earl of Dalhousie) held in his hand a return, not of a single sale of timber, but of the contracts of the whole of the British navy. The price of oak timber from Tuscany in 1841 was 12l. 4s. 6d.; in 1845 it was 10l. 14s. 8d. Dantzic oak in 1841 was at 14l.; in 1846 it had fallen to 12l. But the price of English oak in 1841 was 12l. 14s. 6d.; in 1842, 12l. 14s. 4d.; in 1843, 11l. 1s. 4d.; in 1846 it was again 12l. 14s. 6d., showing that the operation of the reduction of duty had not been to lower prices. Those were the contract prices.

The Duke of RICHMOND: My noble friend was speaking of sales of British timber.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE resumed by saying that the question was, what was the contract price? Now, the conditions and circumstances were precisely the same in the four years to which he had referred; and whatever had operated on the price in 1841 had had precisely the same effect in 1846. His noble friend (Lord Stanley) said, "See what you have done with the shipping interest: the number of British ships employed in the Baltic timber trade in 1839 was 612, whilst in 1845 it had fallen to 609; the number of foreign ships was 566 in 1839, and in 1844 it was 1845." He (Lord Dalhousie) did not deny that there were more foreign than English ships employed in the timber trade; but their lordships should bear in mind that those ships were of small capacity, and unfit for any other purpose; they were kept afloat by the cargo they carried. However, the whole amount of our shipping trade generally with the Baltic had not diminished. In 1842, which was the first year of the tariff, the British ships employed in the Baltic amounted to 3519, with a tonnage of 613,000; and in 1844 the number of British ships was 4424 (being an increase of about a thousand), with a tonnage of 818,000, being an increase of 200,000 tonnage (hear, hear). So much as respected the trade with the Baltic. Perhaps their lordships would permit him to read an extract which must have greater authority than anything he could say, inasmuch as it consisted of observations stated at a business meeting, and related to affairs in which the interests of the parties present were concerned. At a late meeting of the dock companies at Liverpool, the chairman said that some surprise had been expressed at the increase of 100,000 tonnage talked of some time since; but he now had to deal with an increase, not of a hundred thousand, but of hundreds of thousands; the increase in six months, from June to the 31st of December last, having exceeded that of any previous period, inasmuch as it showed an increase of 600 vessels and 209,409 tonnage over the corresponding six months of the preceding year (hear, hear, hear). Now, what were the expectations of these parties under a relaxation of the protective laws? The chairman proceeded to say, that in proportion as they afforded accommodation, in the same proportion they would draw trade to the port of Liverpool; and supposing that at no distant period the rates of duty on other foreign productions, which were now virtually excluded, should be modified, it would not be in the power of any man to divine, whenever those duties should be reduced, what accommodation would be required at the port of Liverpool, which stood in the pre-eminent position of having 203 acres of dock with 15 miles of quay-way (hear, hear). After this would their lordships say that the tariff of 1842 had been injurious to the shipping interest (hear, hear)? With respect to the number of ships employed, his noble friend (Lord Stanley) took a return on the table, and said that up to 1832 there had been a biennial increase of tonnage amounting to 180,000, whilst in the two years after the tariff the increase had only been 17,000 tonnage. That was true; but there was an explanation of the circumstance, which was this, that during the four years from 1839 onwards, there was an immense and inordinate speculation in shipping; and in consequence of that, application was made for a duty to be laid on colonial shipping, and a committee was appointed in the other house to inquire into the subject. That was the reason why the tonnage appeared to be so small in the two years referred to; but if they compared 1843 with 1845, instead of comparing 1842 with 1844, they would find that, instead of there being an increase of 17,000 tonnage only, the increase was 126,684 tonnage (hear, hear). He now came to the other branch of the subject to which his noble friend had adverted—protection to corn. His noble friend had stated to their lordships in the first place that he had high authority to adduce on this point, and he mentioned the names of Chatham, Pitt, and Huskisson. Now, he (Lord Dalhousie) entertained, quite as highly as any noble lord could do, reverence for the wisdom of our ancestors; but, with reference to Lord Chatham, for instance, it was utterly impossible that, unless he had possessed the faculty of omniscience, he could have expressed an opinion with respect to the fiscal and social relations of the present day (hear, hear, hear). On questions relating to the immutable laws of the liberty of the subject Lord Chatham's opinions were unquestionably of paramount importance; but upon a question respecting the regulation of commerce, it was utterly impossible that Lord Chatham, or any other person could have foreseen or anticipated the state of things which now exists (hear, hear, hear). Then with respect to Mr. Pitt, it was impossible for anyone who adverted to the proceedings of Mr. Pitt in 1787, or who read his speeches, to doubt that if he had lived now he would have been the foremost to advocate the policy which had now been submitted to their lordships, and to bring the whole weight of his vast influence and his gigantic talents in carrying this policy into effect (hear). Mr. Huskisson lived at a later period, and did not therefore lie under the disability to which he had referred. But he (Lord Dalhousie) appealed to him—he called his voice from the grave, in order to show that the course now pursued by the Government in the circumstances of the present time, and in the present condition of the country, was exactly such as he, if he had lived, would himself have pursued. (Here the noble lord quoted the sentiments of Mr. Huskisson). He begged to adduce to their lordships, as another authority on this subject, a noble lord whose name he was sure would be received with the greatest respect, as that of a man of the deepest sagacity, of enlarged experience, and great and varied powers of mind—he meant the late Lord Lauderdale. That noble lord was as strong an advocate of the Corn Laws as anybody; but he advocated them solely because he thought, that while protection was extended to other interests, it ought not to be withdrawn from agriculture; and he distinctly indicated his opinion, that as soon as protection was removed from other articles it should be removed from agriculture also (hear). A noble lord (Lord Ashburton) who sat beside him, repeating a statement which was made on the preceding night, said that they were going to do that which no country on earth ever thought of attempting to do—namely, establish a free trade in corn; and he asked them to solve the question what they were to do in cheap years, when the ports of this country were the only ports open to the importation of foreign corn. His noble friend (Lord Stanley) had cited all the countries of Europe, from Turkey round to Sweden, stating that each and all of them had a Corn Law; and that statement had been repeated to-night. Now, it was quite true that each and all of them had a Corn Law; but what sort of Corn Laws were they? Were they anything like the Corn Law in this country? No, they were nothing like it (hear, hear). There was none of them imposed for the sake of protection, and none of them whatever excluded foreign corn in the years to which his noble friend had referred (hear, hear). He (Lord Dalhousie) held in his hand a statement of the various Corn Laws in Europe, which he would read to their lordships. In Turkey there was a duty upon corn of 5 per cent. ad valorem. In the Danube provinces of Turkey (which he begged their lordships to bear in mind were the corn-growing provinces), the duty was 3 per cent. ad valorem, and there was no point which the population of those provinces held with greater tenacity than their right to have the duty at 3 instead of 5 per cent (hear, hear). How his noble friend could draw any argument in favour of protection from this source he declared he could not see. The Papal states of Italy admitted corn free when the price was 48s. per quarter. In Sardinia there was a duty of 5s. per quarter. In the smaller Italian states there was a duty of 3s. per quarter. In Tuscany the duty was a mere fraction. In Greece it was 2d. a quarter, and in Austria 3s. per quarter; and he begged their lordships to observe that Austria, possessing the rich provinces of Hungary, Transylvania, and Galicia, nevertheless in the ports of Venice, Fiume, and Trieste granted admission for the importation of foreign corn free of all duty.

Lord ASHBURTON remarked that Trieste was a free port.

Lord DALHOUSIE (in continuation) replied that he was quite aware of that; but that the corn was imported into the interior free of duty. In Spain and Portugal there was a total prohibition; and here he wished simply to mention one fact as showing what was the advantage or disadvantage of this description of protective duty on corn. The fact rested on the authority of official papers before their lordships, and it was this, that from Portugal and Spain corn could be purchased in the port of New York at 4s. 6d. per quarter, and brought back for sale into Spain while wheat was to be had on the plains of Castile at 1s. 6d. per bushel, but which was entirely useless, because from the high cost of carriage it was impossible to bring it to a part where it could meet a profitable sale; Belgium had a sliding scale, but free importation was allowed when wheat was 33s. a quarter. A similar regulation was adopted in Holland. In Mecklenburgh a duty of three per cent. was levied; in Hanover 6s. a quarter; and in Denmark 3s. a quarter. The duty levied in the places he had named ranged from three to five per cent. In Russia, a duty of 14s. a quarter was imposed on the importation of wheat. But were these countries in the habit of regulating their duties upon the system advocated in that house? No; and it was unnecessary to go further back than the present year to show the course they pursued. One of the earliest steps taken by the Government of Holland this year was altogether to suspend the Corn Laws (hear, hear). In Russia also—hermetically sealed Russia—the duties on the importation of corn were altogether removed; and in Belgium the Chambers were convoked in order to remit for a year the duties on corn. What analogy was there, then, in the course pursued by these countries in favour of a permanent protecting duty upon corn? What was the cause of their suspension of the importation duties? Did it arise from any great failure of the corn crops? No; but from the very same cause which had been treated with such distrust and discredit in that house—the failure of the potato crop (hear, hear). And yet some noble lords believed it would have been possible for her Majesty's ministers to have come down to Parliament and have asked the corn consumers of Great Britain to grant a sum of money to relieve the distress of the Irish people, while at the same time they maintained a duty of 11s. a quarter upon wheat (hear, hear). There was no alternative between that course and the suspension of the Corn Laws for a time; and he would ask whether, in the face of a suspension of the Corn Laws in other countries, if such a suspension had been adopted in this kingdom, it would not have been utterly impossible ever to attempt to restore the Corn Laws to their former position (hear, hear, and cheers)? It had been asserted that the main object of a Corn Law was to prevent a country from being dependent upon foreign supplies of corn; and the permanence of the law of 1842 had been advocated on the ground that, under the operation of that law, this object had been attained. It was said that the quantity of corn produced in this country was keeping pace with the demands of the population; and a noble friend of his stated that the importations of corn for the last 20 years had averaged 1,700,000 quarters per annum; while, during the last year, it had only been 305,000 quarters. From this circumstance the inference was drawn that of late years our dependence upon foreign supplies had been diminished; but they could not draw a correct inference from an average extending over so long a period as 21 years. The only way of arriving at a satisfactory result was to take an average, so far as they could, for equal periods. He held in his hand a return of the importations of corn into this country from 1791 to 1840, from which it appeared that in the first 10 years, from 1791 to 1800, the importations were 94,000 quarters; from 1801 to 1810, 555,000 quarters; from 1811 to 1820, 420,000 quarters; from 1821 to 1830, 534,000 quarters; and from 1831 to 1840, 908,000 quarters. Now, in the five years from 1840 to 1845, partly under the operation of the new Corn Law, the average importation had been 1,807,000 quarters annually, of which 1,583,000 quarters had been admitted for consumption. In 1843 the total entries for consumption were 990,000 quarters; in 1844, 1,026,000 quarters; and in 1845, 305,000 quarters. It was, therefore, evident, upon the face of these returns, that the importation of foreign corn was increasing, and that the existing law did not render us independent of supplies from other countries (hear, hear). Now, he would ask their lordships to consider for a single moment this question of dependence upon foreign countries. What single trade, or art, or employment of life was there with respect to which they were not almost hopelessly and entirely dependent for supplies upon foreign countries (hear, hear)? Let them take the case of the woollen trade. There was not one of their lordships who was not dependent upon foreign supplies for the coat he wore (a laugh). Nay, there was not one of their lordships' footmen who, if they were to propose to become independent of foreign supplies of wool, would not give warning to-morrow (laughter). But were they less dependent upon foreign supplies with regard to the cotton manufacture? His noble friend had stated that the total annual imports of cotton wool into this country amounted to 721,000,000 lbs. Did not this fact show how entirely, and almost hopelessly, they were dependent upon foreigners for their supply? So it was with respect to silk. They could not even carry on a war or fire a shot without being dependent upon foreign supply for the articles used in war (hear, hear). This country was dependent upon her exports and imports for her revenue, and she was therefore dependent upon foreign nations for the maintenance of her credit. From 1812 to 1814 they were at war with the United States, from which this country drew her supplies of cotton. Would it not have been death and destruction to them if the United States had stopped the supply of cotton to this country? But that had not been the case. The China war was another example, and our supplies of tea during the period of the war were greater than in any year preceding. The same principle would govern other nations with respect to corn. If we were dependent upon them for our supplies, we could get what we wanted, notwithstanding they were at war with us, as had been the case during the war with Napoleon. But then his noble friend said "Look at the price!" Why, 10 years back the price was as high as in any of the years his noble friend had quoted. The price, too, had no effect upon the argument, which was, that if we were at war with other countries we could not obtain supplies of corn. During the course of the war in which we were engaged with the whole of Europe, large imports of corn came in every year. Even in 1810, we had importations from France itself, and he maintained that, if this country again required foreign supplies, those supplies would be got. The Government had been reproached for not stating what, in their opinion, the price of corn would be under the new system (hear, hear). He was not prepared to answer any demand so unreasonable—(cheers from the Opposition, and ironical cheers from the cross benches)—as to say what the actual and specific price of corn would be. He would also respectfully ask their lordships whether they were quite entitled to demand that information from him? Would they have been prepared in any given year, under the present system, to say what the price would be in the year following? It had been stated that, during the last 21 years the average price of wheat was 57s. But what consolation was it to the farmer to be told what was the average price during a series of years, if it had been racing up and down the scale during that period? In one year the price had been 58s., in the next it was 39s., in the next but one it was 64s., and in the next 57s. How could their lordships, when there had been such fluctuations under a system the boast of which was that it prevented fluctuation, ask him to name a specific price?

The Duke of RICHMOND.—Go to the last bill.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE said, that if he did not mistake, the noble duke had predicted precisely the same effects from the consequences of the bill of 1842 as he now prophesied from the operation of the present bill.

The Duke of RICHMOND said he never did anything of the sort. He did not vote for that bill, but he probably should have done so if he had happened to have been in the house.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE thought the noble duke had voted against that bill, but it was immaterial for the purposes of his argument. The present law had proved to demonstration that the whole system of averages was a fiction (cheers). The noble lord had boasted of the great fixedness and steadiness of price that had followed the law of 1842. The average price of the last year, 50s. 10d., had also been pointed to as a proof of the abundance of corn in this country. He maintained that that price of 50s. was no index whatever to the actual price of corn; it was only an index to the inferiority of the quality. He held in his hand a return of the prices at the different market towns, not of the lowest prices, but of the highest average towns and the lowest. In the year 1845, which was an abundant year, the highest price in January was 55s. and the lowest 40s.; in the next month the difference was from 55s. to 40s.; in the next, from 55s. to 38s.; and in the next from 54s. to 39s. In November of the same year, the difference was from 68s. to 48s.; and in the week ending the 29th, from 69s. to 38s. In January, 1846, the difference in the first week was between 69s. and 41s., in the next 67s. to 40s., and in the next 71s. to 42s.; and during other periods of the same year, the difference, instead of ranging at near 15s., as in former periods, was as much as 25s., 26s., 29s., 30s., 31s., 32s., and so on, while on the 28th of March it was between 69s. to 32s., or a difference of 37s. In the face of these facts to talk of equalising prices by means of this law was a gross fallacy. He had also the further evidence of the contract price from the Victualling office for the years 1843, 1844, 1845, and 1846. In January, 1843, the price of red wheat was 2l. 9s. 3d.; in January, 1844, 2l. 17s. 10d.; in 1845, 2l. 6s. 10d.; and in February, 1846, 3l. 5s. 5d.; and in other kinds there was a price varying from 3l. 7s. to 3l. 11s., in the face of the professed object of the law, which was to produce an average price of 50s. He therefore altogether repudiated the idea of attempting to fix a price. He was disposed to agree with Earl Spencer in his opinion that everything as regarded price would remain as nearly as possible where it was, and that the advantage of the measure would consist in the steadiness of trade, and the encouragement which the agriculture of the country would derive from the increased stimulus given by Free Trade to our manufactures. One false notion seemed to pervade all the arguments on this question,—it was that there should be an enormous importation of foreign grain under this measure. Whence was this supply to come? It seemed to be generally assumed that Germany, Denmark, Poland, Russia, some Austrian provinces, and the United States, were the countries from which the grain was to come. But noble lords who entertained those apprehensions never attempted to state in what quantities this grain would come, and where it was to come from. Mr. Jacobs, in 1828, visited the countries in the north of Europe, and reported that they could not send to this country a larger quantity than they then sent. In 1842, another gentleman was sent to the same countries to make the same enquiries; the result was embodied in the consular returns, and it was there stated that the whole amount which those countries could send to this country was 2,200,000 quarters of grain. There was nothing whatever to contradict, not the general assertion, but the facts stated by that gentleman to show that no great quantity could be imported into this country at all. He (the Earl of Dalhousie) perfectly credited the statement of the noble lord opposite as to the virgin soil and fertile plains that might be brought into cultivation in various countries in Europe. He did not dispute that there were millions on millions of acres on which corn might be raised; but what was their value if the corn was not attainable. As well might noble lords point to the plains of South America, where thousands upon thousands of cattle were roaming about. There was no doubt of the capacity of those countries which were so dreaded; there was no doubt of the abundance; but distance rendered the capacity and the abundance unavailable. He would not fatigue their lordships with calculations as to trade and carrying charges. With regard to the produce of Germany, and of Hungary, which found an exit northward, it went by rivers, which in winter were frozen and in summer were dried up. That which found an exit southward was transported in bullock-carts a distance of 250 miles by a very tedious mode of conveyance, raising the charges to a very high amount. So that, though in those countries the produce was large it was totally useless. The same was the case with Spain; no country could be more fertile; but though corn could be got at a very moderate rate in Castile, yet before it could have been brought to the market of South America, as mentioned in Mr. Jacobs's report, the price it would have reached rendered it unavailable for the purposes of supply. In the Continental countries of which so much was said, cultivation was carried on by serfs; neither they nor their landlords had means for improving agriculture; their implements were of the rudest kind; and he did venture to think, that nothing had been stated by any noble lord to invalidate the testimony of the official documents to the fact that the quantities of corn introduced from those countries would be extremely limited, and that the price at which they could be brought was above anything that would yield such a return as to encourage importation. Their lordships had heard it stated the other evening, that 5,000,000 of quarters would, in three years, be brought into this country, purchased where the corn was produced at a price of 14s., and of excellent quality. He would not read letters to their lordships; but he would lay before them documents infinitely more authoritative, namely, actual bills of sale. He held three of these in his hand in reference to cargoes of grain imported from Galatz. They were purchased in the abundant year, 1844. They were not detained in warehouse, yet on each transaction there was a loss to a very great extent. They were sold on account of Mr. R. Gardner, Manchester. The first was purchased on July 29, 1844, and the price paid was not 14s., but 23s. 9d. per quarter. They were sold in bond on October 25, and the balance of loss was 10s. per quarter. Another cargo purchased in June, 1842, for 23s. 9d., was sold on October 12, and the balance of loss was 14s. 11d. per quarter. A third cargo purchased about the same time with the others for 18s. 9d. per quarter, was sold after a similar interval, when the balance of loss was 12s. 3d. per quarter. There were the invoices sent to him by a gentleman of high respectability, with whom he was, indeed, personally acquainted; but they bore evidence on their face of their value, for the agents in the transaction were Messrs. Baring Brothers (hear, hear). But supposing there was a large importation, it was not an entire surplus. The population was increasing, and it was as much as they could do to find supplies. And abroad the same necessity would be felt. If they grew for themselves, they could not grow wheat to send it here. In the course of 10 years the population of the different countries which were regarded with such apprehensions had greatly increased. Such was the case in Russia, Norway, the German States, and all the others. The population of Prussia had increased from 12,000,000 to 15,000,000. In Austria it increased, between 1820 and 1840, from 31,000,000 to 37,000,000. But there was another consideration which had not been fully dwelt upon in this debate with the weight that ought to be attributed to it, and that was, the increase of our own population (hear, hear, hear). There had been a total failure of proof to show that they could adopt fresh land to meet the wants of the increased population, or that they could increase the produce of that land for the same purpose. (The noble earl then referred to a report of the Sanitary Commission to show that the additional extent of territory annually required to meet the wants of the increasing population would be much larger than the counties of Leicester, Nottingham, Hereford, or Cambridge). In the last 30 years there has been an increase of 15 per cent. in the population, or of 300,000 a year. Did their lordships realise the fact that, since this bill now under consideration was introduced to Parliament, there were 100,000 souls and upwards more to feed? Was it in their power to increase the produce of the country in the same proportion (hear, hear)? No proof of that had ever been attempted (hear, hear). He did not believe that that immense increase of supply would take place; but if it did, would it meet the increase of population that was constantly going on (hear, hear)? Before he left this part of the subject he would direct their lordships' attention to the question of supply from the United States. He knew that it was usual to trace the United States as an unbroken and inexhaustible source of food. Such, however, was not the experience of past years, nor was it the opinion in the United States themselves. The wheat-producing states were limited to certain districts of country,—they were all in the extreme west, and, consequently, whatever was produced there could not reach this country from their own ports except at a large charge. Let them trace what had been the increase of supply in that country for a considerable number of years. He had the official tables of the states before him for the period from 1791 to 1840, and, although it appeared that the increase in produce had been enormous, as was admitted, yet the increase of population had been concurrent; and it appeared that now they had for export a smaller amount than they had 50 years ago. In 1790 the population was 3,900,000, and the wheat exported to foreign countries amounted to 4,700,000 bushels, being 28 per cent. of the whole produce. In 1820 the population had risen to 7,000,000, and the amount of wheat exported was 4,000,000 of bushels, being 14 per cent. of the whole produce. In 1840 the population had increased to 17,000,000, and the amount of wheat exported was only 12½ per cent. of the whole produce, or only half what it was formerly. That was the amount of wheat exported by the United States; and yet they were not without markets, for the markets of Cuba, of the West Indies, and of South America were open to them. Their lordships would see, then, that with the increase of population that was going on in the United States, the increase of produce would be required there. But there would be nothing like the enormous exportation that was expected from them into this country. Again, the prices of New York ruled at about 40s., and in addition to that there would be the cost of carriage before it could reach this country; so that, the same as with respect to the Continent, the expectation of an enormous importation was most unreasonable. But then it was said, "Why try this experiment in this great country?" It had been tried here before, and had perfectly succeeded; for from 1770 to 1791 we had practically and entirely Free Trade in corn. No doubt taxation at that time was not so heavy as now (hear, hear), but it was distinctly stated by writers of that period that it did weigh heavily upon labour here as compared with labour on the Continent. At that time we could grow corn cheap enough to export it to foreign countries; but what was the case in those years? Was the agriculture of the country in a depressed condition? By no means. On the contrary, large quantities of land were taken into cultivation. From 1766 to 1769, 300,000 acres were taken in, afterwards other large quantities, and high prices for that time ruled extremely low, varying from 41s. to 60s. In like manner they had tried it in other parts near their own doors. In Jersey they had had a Free Trade in corn, and the prices had ruled little, if at all, higher than prices here. He knew that noble lords would turn round and ask if they did not increase the supply, and did not anticipate a diminution of prices, why they proposed this change (hear, hear)? The Government did not propose it because it would reduce prices, but because it would give a stimulus to trade, and set in motion the industry of this country, and provide the fullest means for agricultural employment. The noble duke shook his head, but he remembered last year, when he received deputations with respect to the railways, that with respect to each of the railways in the centre, or from the sides of this country, noble lords set forth the advantages it would afford for an easy and rapid access to the manufacturing districts (hear, hear). In the districts of Derbyshire this benefit was to be the access to Manchester; in the districts of Lincolnshire or Goole (laughter) it was still the access to manufacturing population; in Argyll and Dumfries it was an easy access to Fleetwood, and so to the manufacturing districts; and if in Ireland there was still the same burden of the song, the access was to be to some port whence they could reach Liverpool, and so the same manufacturing districts in England. Why was there this yearning after the manufacturing districts (hear, hear)? Because the manufacturing districts were the great markets for the agricultural. Every loom they stopped in Manchester stopped half a dozen ploughs in some agricultural part of the country (cheers). There could not be a closer connection between all these districts than was shown by the reports of committees and the statements of members of Parliament. Unless the manufacturing interests were in a state of prosperity, there was depression in the agricultural districts. Whatever promoted a demand in the manufacturing districts, acted as a stimulus in the agricultural districts also; and, therefore, in addition to the wish to impose no restriction on the free importation of the food of the people, the Government were convinced that this measure would be attended with none but good results to all classes, and would confer equal benefits on all districts, and hence it was that her Majesty's Government ventured to propose it to their lordships' attention (loud cheers). The noble baron near him (Lord Ashburton) had adverted to the colonial interests, and had asked whether they had anticipated the effect of this alteration of policy on the colonies, and he asked of what use were the colonies if they did not afford a protected market for our manufactures? He (the Earl of Dalhousie) ventured to think that the colonies would be of advantage to us if there were not a compulsory market. But the question raised by the noble lord was no longer open, the colonial system to which he referred had been broken long ago. In the West Indian colonies it was only in 1842 that under the presidency of his noble friend the late Secretary of the Colonies there was a free importation of many articles which previously came from Canada, and had since come from America, and in other colonies the maximum rate of differential duties on all articles, with few exceptions, such as tobacco, were only seven per cent.; which were nothing as compared with the rates which used to be in existence under the old colonial system. So far from forcing upon the colonies these protective duties, the constant struggle of this country had been to prevent the colonies from imposing greater differential duties than this country approved, and no part of the duty of the Colonial Office gave more trouble than sending back these acts imposing the higher differential duties. Therefore, the colonial system, as it used to be called, existed no longer. What, then, was the state of facts as to the alteration they were about to make? He thought that if his noble friend the late Secretary of the Colonies were in his place, he would bear him out in saying that the only articles on which the change would act injuriously were timber and corn; and of corn there was the most grievous complaint. His noble friend said that they were about to ruin the political connection and the whole of the navigation interests of the colonies if this measure passed. But with respect to corn, what was the amount of the carrying trade? The loss would apply only to the corn of the United States, which, by being ground into flour in Canada, acquired the character of colonial produce, and was admitted at 1s. duty, and to the corn the produce of Canada herself (hear, hear). He held in his hand a return of the American corn thus brought through Canada; and from the 11th of October, 1843, to the 5th of January, 1844, the quantity was 618 quarters; from the 5th of January, 1844, to the 5th of January, 1845, it was 43,860 quarters; and for the year ending the 5th of January, 1846, it was only 24,490 quarters. Inasmuch as 24,000 quarters was the quantity imported by Canada, in the course of the year, it must be obvious, that anything affecting such an amount could produce no very serious result. But some stress had been laid upon the dispatch received from Lord Cathcart, which was dated the 28th of January, 1846. Now that dispatch did not contain, by any means, the most recent intelligence received from that colony. Lord Cathcart in writing that despatch, stated that he wished to lay before her Majesty's ministers the views entertained by the executive Government of Canada, and that he wrote in great haste in order to save the post. That statement surely showed very clearly that the opinions conveyed in that despatch had not been very deliberately formed. There had, however, since that time been a despatch received in this country from Canada, dated the 26th of March last; that was written after much deliberation, and after the House of Assembly had calmly discussed and considered the intended measure which was now before their lordships; and at the time to which he referred an address to the Crown was agreed to by the House of Assembly in Canada, the sum and substance of which was, that they wished the duty to which they were liable of 1s. on every quarter of grain, should be changed into 1d.—that what was considered in this country a nominal duty of 1s. should be changed into that which they really considered to be nominal duty—namely, 1d. In their address they set forth that as one of the just claims of the province. Now he would ask their lordships if that could be said to bear any appearance of alarm. It was also not unimportant that he should call the attention of their lordships to the views entertained on this subject by the leaders of the two parties. Mr. Prince, the leader of the Ministerial party, stated that he had unbounded confidence in the loyalty of the inhabitants of the province; and he confessed that he did not view the proposition of her Majesty's Government with any feelings of alarm—he saw no cause whatever why they should despair; and that, for his part, he had always been a supporter of Free Trade. Mr. Baldwin, the leader of the Opposition party, said that he wanted no foreign interference; that he was proud of the connection which subsisted between Canada and the mother country; and he believed that, though England had formerly treated Canada in the manner that a step-mother treats the family over which she is placed, yet now he rejoiced to say that Canada began to receive better treatment at the hands of the mother country, and that there seemed to exist in England no disposition to oppress her colonies. On these points, then, it was evident that the leaders of the two parties were agreed. He hoped that the house would now permit him to mention two other colonies: he meant Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In the former of these, when a proposition was made for improving the defences of the colony, the colonists at once proposed that their whole revenue should be taken for that purpose; and in New Brunswick it was proposed that, in addition to a sum of 12,000*l.*, which had been assigned for the purposes of defence that should not only be applied to those objects to its fullest extent, but that the whole ordinary revenue of the country should be taken for that purpose also, in order that their connection with the mother country should be maintained in its fullest and most perfect condition. Although he had never held any office in these colonies, yet he had long resided in them, and he possessed connections and means of information which enabled him to speak upon these points as it were from his own knowledge. He could confidently say, with respect to them, that there was no want of loyalty in these quarters. For their attachment to the mother country, he could safely pledge his head, if such a pledge were good for anything. He entertained not a shadow of doubt that they would now be as ready to stand by the mother country in matters of mere pecuniary interest, as they had formerly been to shed their blood as evidence of their attachment to England. He had touched briefly upon various points, and even in that brief way not upon as many as he should have wished to notice, feeling as they had devoted so many hours to the discussion of this question he ought not to take up much more of their time; but there was one point on which he did not wish to remain altogether silent, he referred to the charges of treachery which had been brought against the Government with reference to their present measure. He would admit that it would have been infinitely better if the proposal of the measures now before them had come from another quarter; and he believed every one of his noble friends around him would echo him in saying that they had witnessed with sincere regret the unsuccessful attempt made by the noble lords opposite to form a Government. When, however, that attempt proved unsuccessful, when the servants of the Crown were called upon to give effect to their own convictions, the treachery would have been in taking any course different from that which they had taken (hear, hear). Their lordships might abuse her Majesty's servants with change of opinion—with vacillation; they might arraign them for those crimes before the bar of public opinion; but even when all this was granted, their lordships would not be justified in using the word "treachery" (hear, hear). No man rated higher than he did the necessity of governing such a country as this by party; he recognised as fully as could any man the obligations of party; but he recognised higher obligations still. He had not the honour of a seat in the Cabinet at the time a decision on these measures was come to; but he was not on that account desirous of repudiating the responsibility of adopting them. He would not, he could not be called upon to state the course which had been of that Cabinet, he would have taken; but he ventured to think they could not find any proportionate degree of responsibility between the First Minister of the Crown, who originated a measure, and his colleagues in subordinate capacities by whom that measure has been approved. Of he recognised no such distinction of responsibility; and if it were ever his fate to be placed as member of a Government, with the alternative such as that placed before his right hon. friend before him, either of adhering to a party, or giving effect to a faithful and solemn conviction, he should pursue the course pursued by that Minister (hear, hear). He was bound to adhere to his party, he was also bound to do his duty. It were a thousand times better that one should walk the earth branded as a traitor to party than that one should live with the consciousness, which under such circumstances would be felt, of having, while adhering to party, been, if not in the eye of the law, at least in the court of conscience, a traitor to the sovereign he was bound to advise, and a traitor to the responsibility he had assumed (cheers). He would meet the obloquy he would submit to the penalty, but he would give free counsel to the sovereign he served, and would act for the best interests committed to that sovereign's care; and when he had done that, he should bow to the indignation of his party, but he should also stand upright before a higher tribunal (cheers). One word he would add in reminding their lordships of the consequences of a rejection of this measure, and of the blessings which would arise from an instant adoption of it. He did not wish to be understood as appealing to their fears; he knew that would be the last human emotion which could affect the conduct of the House of Peers; but he did venture to appeal to their prudence and to their justice; he appealed to their prudence that they would not, without an earnest deliberation, reject a measure which came to them backed by the recommendation of a large majority of the representatives of the people (cries of "No" and cheers). And he appealed to their justice that they would not, as had been by some recommended, fixedly resolve on maintaining a fiscal policy, the effect of which was, and always must be, to inflict an injury upon the many for the benefit of the few (cheers). He adjured them to search closely their hearts before they decided; he adjured them to test closely the arguments offered for such a maintenance; he entreated them to dismiss prejudices, if any such there were, and to satisfy themselves that, when they acted, they acted solely and only for the public weal. Should they so act, he awaited confidently the result of their deliberations. He truly believed that if they adopted this measure they would, ere long, look back with marvelling, at the time when they doubted what would be its effects; and he was equally certain they would look back with satisfaction to the assent which they had given. They would look back with satisfaction, because they would then feel they had done all that in them lay to remove a reproach from this legislature—one which added new bitterness to the bitter cup of adversity; that they had done all that in them lay to smooth poor poverty's rugged path, to mitigate the primeval curse; and that they had done all that in them lay to soften the hard fate of those whose lot it was to earn their bread in the sweat of their brow (great cheering).

SPEECH OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

The Duke of WELLINGTON: My lords, I cannot allow this question to be put, and your lordships to decide upon it, without addressing to you a few words upon the vote which you are about to give. My lords, I am aware that I address you under many disadvantages. I address you under the disadvantage of appearing here as a Minister of the Crown, to press this measure upon your adoption, knowing how disagreeable it is to many with whom I have been constantly in the habit of acting in political life, with whom I have been living in the utmost intimacy and friendship, with the greatest satisfaction to myself, and upon whose good opinion I have always relied; and I am happy to say I have hitherto enjoyed it in no small degree (hear, hear). I have already, in this house, adverted to the circumstances which gave rise to this measure. In the month of December I considered myself bound in duty to my Sovereign not to withhold my assistance from the Government, and not to decline to resume my seat in her Majesty's Councils. I accordingly gave my assistance to the Government of my right hon. friend the First Lord of the Treasury, knowing, as I did at the time, that he could do no otherwise than propose to Parliament a measure of this description—may, my lords, this very measure, for this is the very measure stated at the Cabinet previous to the period at which it resigned early that month. My lords, it is not necessary that I should say more on that subject. I am perfectly aware that I address your lordships at present with all your prejudices against me for having advised that course—a course which, however little I may be able to justify it to you, I thought myself bound to take, and which, if it was to do again to-morrow, I should take again (loud cheers). I am in her Majesty's service, bound to her Majesty and the Sovereign of this country by considerations of gratitude of which it is unnecessary for me to say more to your lordships (hear, hear). Possibly it may be true, and it is true, that in those circumstances I should have no relation to party, and probably party ought not to rely upon me. Do so, if your lordships think proper; but I have stated to you the motives on which I have acted. I am satisfied with them myself, and I should be exceedingly concerned if any dissatisfaction remained in the minds of any of your lordships. I am perfectly aware that I have never had any claim to the confidence which your lordships have placed in me for a considerable number of years. Circumstances have given it to me,—in some cases the confidence of the Crown, in others the zeal with which I have endeavoured to serve your lordships—to promote your lordships' views, and to facilitate the transaction of your business in this house. I will not omit, even on this night—possibly the last on which I shall ever venture to address to you any advice again—I shall not omit giving you my counsel as to the vote which you should give upon this occasion. My noble friend (Lord Stanley), whose absence I lament, and who addressed you a few nights ago, urged you in the strongest manner to vote against this measure, and told you, in terms I certainly cannot imitate, that it was your duty to step in to protect the public from rash and inconsiderate measures passed by the other house of Parliament, and which in his opinion were inconsistent with the views and opinions of the public. My lords, there is no doubt whatever it is your duty to consider all the measures that are brought before you; and it is your right to vote upon them as you think proper, and most particularly to vote against those that you think rash and inconsiderate. But I beg leave to point out to your lordships, that it is your duty to consider well the consequences of any vote that you give upon this subject—to consider well the situation in which you place this house. Nay, it is the duty of each to place himself in the situation of the house before he determines to give his vote, and to consider what would be, under all the circumstances, the consequence if the house were to follow the course he may be about to do on this occasion. This is a line of conduct which has been followed before. I myself once prevailed upon the house to vote for a measure against which it had pronounced positive opinions by former votes. I pressed on them to take a course different from that which it had taken on previous occasions (hear, hear). I beg of your lordships to look a little to the measure upon which you are about to vote; and the consequences likely to follow from a rejection of that measure. I ask your lordships to look at the manner in which this measure has come before you, and consider what is likely to follow from your rejecting it. My lords, this measure was recommended by the speech from the throne; it has been passed by a majority of the House of Commons, consisting of more than half of the House of Commons. My noble friend has said in the course of this debate, this vote of the House of Commons is inconsistent with the original vote given by the same House of Commons on this same question, and inconsistent with the supposed views of the constituents by whom they were elected. My lords, I do not think that is a subject which this house can take into its consideration; for, first, we can have no accurate knowledge of the fact; and, in the next place, whether it was a fact or not, this, my lords, we know, that it is the House of Commons that has passed this bill; we know that the measure has come up to us passed by a majority of the House of Commons. That we know by the votes of the House of Commons. We know, too, that the measure has been recommended by the Crown (murmurs), and we know that if we reject this bill, it is a bill which has been agreed to by the two other branches of the legislature, and that the House of Lords stand alone in rejecting this measure. I beg to remind you, my lords, that you ought not to take a position on which you cannot stand, on which you can do nothing. You have great influence on public opinion; men have great confidence in your judgment; but separately from the House of Commons, you can do nothing; and if you break your connection with the Crown and the House of Commons, you will then put an end to the functions of the House of Lords (laughter). My Lords, I ask you to reflect what must be the immediate consequence of your rejecting this bill. It appears to me very clear that whatever may be the result of this debate in this house, the object I had in view in resuming my seat in her Majesty's Councils will not be attained if your lordships reject the bill. I conclude that another Government would, in that case be formed; but, do noble lords suppose that this measure, or some other measure of the same kind, will not be proposed by the next Administration that can be formed? Do you mean to reject the measure a second time? Do you mean that the country should go on discussing this measure two or three months longer? But then it is the object of noble lords that Parliament should be dissolved (cheers from the protectionist benches), and the country have an opportunity of considering about returning other representatives, and seeing whether or not another House of Commons will agree to this measure. Now, really, my lords, if your lordships have so much confidence as you appear to have in the result of other elections and the exercise of public opinion on this question, I think you may venture to rely on the elections which must occur in the course of little more than 12 months from this time, according to the common course of the law; and you might leave it to the Parliament which will then be just elected to consider of the course which it would take upon the expiration of the bill now before you, if it become a law, which is to last till 1849; you might, I say, trust to Parliament to take it into consideration at that time, without interfering with the prerogative of the Crown, by advising the Crown to dissolve Parliament as the immediate consequence of rejecting the bill. Now, my lords, by rejecting the bill, you have the option of having immediately another bill brought before you that you will have to pass or reject again; or, by passing the bill you will have the election in a short period of time, and you may then again appeal to the new Parliament, if you think proper to do so, because the bill will expire in 1849.

CORN LAWS.—In Huntingdonshire, the parish of Leighton contains 2770 acres. The owner, who possessed the whole parish, died in the autumn without a male heir, leaving the estate to be divided amongst his daughters. The rents were undoubtedly low; in consequence, the trustees employed a surveyor, who was a stranger to the county, to make a new valuation, which raised one tenant 200l. per annum, another 70l., another 100l., and so on, raising the whole rental from about 3000l. to 4000l. a year, in the very face of Corn Law repeal. The tenants complain, but consent to remain; they are respectable men in all the relations of life, but the evil genius of monopoly warped their otherwise good conduct; they could not enjoy the good fortune of their low rents, with clarity to those tradesmen who refused to sign the protection petitions, and from whom they not only withdrew their own custom, but endeavoured to persuade others to do the same. Another farm at Bussmead, which for 16 years let for 21s. per acre, was lately re-let to a respectable tenant at 28s.

It has been officially noticed from Berlin that all further discussion respecting the tariff of the Zollverein will be postponed until the decision of the British Parliament on the repeal of the Corn Laws and the new commercial tariff be known.

THE BUDGET.—COMMERCIAL FINANCE.

(From the Economist.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his budget last night. In doing so upon this occasion, it was divested of much of that intense interest which in the last four years has always attended the budget, in consequence of Sir Robert Peel having entered fully into an explanation of the reductions contemplated in the present year, in his speech at the commencement of the session. Mr. Goulburn, however, imparted considerable interest to his statement, by taking a general review of the financial changes of the last four years, dwelling upon the principles on which they had been made, and showing the general result which had attended them.

In the first place, Mr. Goulburn compared the estimates made a year ago with the actual produce of the revenue, which have been as follows:

Revenue estimated last year.	Actually received.
Customs.....	19,500,000
Excise.....	12,500,000
Stamps.....	7,250,000
Taxes.....	4,200,000
Property tax.....	5,200,000
Post office.....	700,000
Crown lands.....	150,000
Miscellaneous..	250,000
China.....	49,750,000
Total receipts	52,009,000

The expenditure has been altogether 49,659,000l., leaving an excess of income above expenditure of 2,350,000l. The next subject to which Mr. Goulburn went, was the estimated produce of the various branches of revenue in the current year, ending 5th of April, 1847. The produce of the customs in the past year was 19,765,000l. The duties on the articles reduced or repealed in the present session amount to a sum of 1,041,000l. Mr. Goulburn, however, has learned by experience, that in the event of a reduction of duties, the loss to the revenue does not exceed two-fifths of the sum given up; the remaining three-fifths being made up by increased consumption of the articles reduced, and of other articles. But he has so much confidence in the prospects of the country, and in the consumption of the current year, that he only reduces the income of last year by a sum of 205,000l., instead of 1,041,000l., as the probable loss. In this he has been guided by the flattering accounts received within the last six weeks, since the reduced tariff came into operation, of the receipts at several of the outports, among which he mentioned Liverpool, Hull, Newcastle, Leith, Port Glasgow, and Dublin.

Mr. Goulburn's estimate of the income and expenditure for the current year is as follows:

Income.	Expenditure.
Customs.....	19,500,000
Excise.....	12,500,000
Stamps.....	7,400,000
Taxes.....	4,230,000
Property tax.....	5,102,000
Post office.....	850,000
Crown lands.....	120,000
Miscellaneous.....	250,000
From China.....	70,000
Total.....	51,652,000

Leaving a surplus of only 776,000l. With a similar apparent surplus last year, Mr. Goulburn stated that the result had so greatly exceeded the estimate that he entertained the greatest confidence he would be agreeably disappointed, in finding at the end of the current year a much larger surplus than the estimate shows; and this confidence was based on the result which had been experienced by the policy pursued since 1842, in abolishing all duties which were prohibitory, and reducing such as were protective.

Mr. Goulburn then passed to a general review, or summing up of the experience of the country on all the measures which had been introduced since 1842. In 1842, duties were reduced or repealed on five hundred and eighty-two articles; in 1843, on seven articles; in 1844, on four articles; and in 1845, twenty-one articles were reduced, and on four hundred and forty-eight articles the duties were repealed. In the present year, the measures which have already passed the House of Commons, reduce the duties on one hundred and twelve articles; and repeal the duties on fifty-four articles. In the whole period in question—in the five sessions beginning with 1842, and ending with the present—the duties on seven hundred and twenty-seven articles have been reduced, and those on five hundred and one articles have been entirely repealed—articles, too, which have nearly all, though some to a lesser and others to a greater degree, affected the condition of the great masses of the people, either in their food or clothing, or in the supply of those great staple articles of raw material which are so essential to the manufactures, and consequently to the industry of the country.

Considering the great reductions thus made in the customs and excise duties, Mr. Goulburn was anxious to show that the experiments which the Government had made in this wise and enlightened course of financial legislation, by which commerce and industry had been so much benefited, had not in any degree impaired the general state of our finances, or added to the permanent debt of the country. On the contrary, the success of these Free Trade experiments had been so great, that notwithstanding the great reductions, every test which could be taken of the financial condition of the country showed that it had rather been improved than impaired.

The first test which Mr. Goulburn applied, was the amount of balance available, and at the command of the Government, on the first of January, 1842, and the first of January, 1846, which was as follows:

Balance available, January 1st, 1842	3,650,000
Balance available, January 1st, 1846	8,450,000
Difference....	4,800,000

Nor had the debt of the country been added to in order to increase the balance in hand, or to make up the deficiency caused by the reductions which had taken place. In 1842, the whole debt of the country, funded and unfunded, was as follows:

January 1st, 1842.	£
Funded debt	77,531,000
Exchequer bills	19,678,000
Total debt.....	795,200,000

And at January 1st, 1846, it was	£
Funded debt	756,715,000
Exchequer bills	18,400,000
Total debt.....	785,115,000

Showing a reduction of about 7,000,000l. in these branches of the public debt due at this time. But, besides this, the average amount of deficiency bills, for money borrowed from the Bank, amounted in the four quarters of 1842, to 6,183,000l., while the same in the average of last year amounted only to 2,029,000l., showing a further reduction of the debt of the country to the extent of 4,153,000l., making a total reduction of the whole debt, between 1842 and the present time, of more than eleven millions.

Not only had these reductions been made in the national debt, but a further reduction in the permanent annual charge of that debt, even in a greater proportionate degree, had also been effected. The charge for the debt in 1842 and in 1846, was thus compared by Mr. Goulburn:

Interest	24,444,000	23,620,000
Terminable Annuities....	4,490,000	4,400,000
Management	100,000	93,000
Interest of Exchequer Bills	890,000	456,000
	29,924,000	28,429,000

Thus showing a sum of more than 1,500,000l. already saved in the annual charge on the debt, besides a further sum of 625,000l., which is also secured in the reduction of interest; but which will not take effect until the year 1854; the whole making a saving, effected in the annual expenditure on the debt, of 2,125,000l., besides a reduction on the capital itself of 11,000,000l. Mr. Goulburn stated that it might be supposed by some, that the large amount of money received from China had contributed to these improvements in our general finances. Such an idea would, however, be erroneous; for although the sum of 3,350,000l. had been received from this source, yet of that 2,050,000l. had been expended upon our establishments in that country, and 1,270,000l. had been paid to the owners of the opium which had been seized, as compensation; so that nearly the whole of that sum had been exhausted in these ways.

Mr. Goulburn then made a comparison between the entire amounts of taxes imposed during the period in question, and those which had been repealed. The statement was as follows:

Taxes imposed.	Taxes repealed or reduced.
1842 to 1846....	5,624,000
Balance	2,563,000
	8,197,000

Thus showing that taxes to the amount of 2,563,000l., had been repealed during the period in question; in excess of those which had been imposed.

The right hon. gentleman expressed the greatest satisfaction in being able thus to bear the testimony of his own experience to the extraordinary efficacy of the principles of commercial legislation which this country has adopted during the last five years; by which the springs of industry had been relieved, the commerce of the country set free, the people rendered prosperous and contented, and by which the finances of the country had improved in so remarkable a way. It will surely be impossible for any foreign Government or people to peruse this statement, and to see the extraordinary effects which our Free Trade policy has produced—to consider, moreover, the numerous evidences of the improved condition, physical, social, and moral, of the population of the country, by which these changes have been accompanied, without feeling the strongest inducement to follow our example. It will be by such means that the benefits of our policy will become known and adopted by other countries. These statements are well calculated to give the most ample assurance to the most timid and the most doubting of the safety of the Free Trade policy, in which, thank God, we are now safely embarked.

GREAT PUBLIC MEETING IN HULL TO PETITION THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—On Monday evening a very numerous meeting, convened by the Mayor, was held in the Town Hall, to petition the House of Lords to pass the Corn Bill. The meeting was called by his worship in pursuance of a numerous signed requisition from merchants, shipowners, tradesmen, and other inhabitants of Kingston-upon-Hull. On the platform were, besides the Mayor, Mr. Alderman Thompson, H. S. Bright, Esq., Mr. Alderman Atkinson, Mr. Alderman Brownlow, Henry Levee, Esq., John Hall, Esq., — Taylor, Esq., Mr. Alderman Cookman, Joseph Jones, Esq. (ex-Mayor), Messrs. Town Councillors Wilkinson, Sisson, Dr. Gordon, Richardson, Ashton Cox, Mr. W. H. Holdsworth, Rev. E. Higginson, Rev. — Shannon, John Petchell, Esq., E. F. Collins, Esq., Mr. Hodgson, surgeon, &c. The Mayor was unanimously called upon to preside; and the meeting, which ultimately became crowded, was addressed by Mr. Alderman Thompson and several of the gentlemen whose names appear above. The resolutions were duly proposed and seconded amidst much cheering. A letter was read by the Town-clerk, from Sir Walter James, dated 11, Whitehall-place, and regretting his unavoidable absence, but expressing his entire concurrence in the object of the petition. Towards the close, the meeting was very ably and eloquently addressed by the Rev. James Aspinall, rector of Althorpe, Lincolnshire, who, on rising, was received with loud cheers, and who, in the course of his speech, expressed his satisfaction that the question of the Corn Laws was now beginning to be "especially and peculiarly regarded as the working-man's question." We regret, that neither to this speech, nor to the proceedings generally, will the crowded state of our columns permit us to do justice. Mr. Wilkinson concluded the proceedings by moving the adoption of the petition, to be forwarded to the Earl of Dalhousie for presentation, which was agreed to. The Mayor, after receiving a vote of thanks, declared the proceedings closed.

A SCENE FOR THE DUKE OF RICHMOND.—When the news of the third reading of the Corn Bill arrived at Forfar on Monday, every face wore a smile of congratulation. The bells were rung; music gladdened the streets; a quarter loaf marked price 4d., with a very nice-looking bacon ham marked 2d. per lb., were paraded on the top of a pole, as specimens of what might be expected were the Corn and Provision Laws abolished. And we believe oatmeal is selling a penny per peck lower than it was last week.—Montrose Review.

PASSAGES FROM THE LIFE OF AN ENGLISH FARMER.

PASSAGE IV.—The Amended Poor Law, when it was new.

It was a warm day in June,—one of the days on which maidens who have butter to make, make it in the morning and go out to wash it at the springs, with dew on their feet; a day when the mowers of the new hay rise with the birds, when birds are up before the sun; a day when June hastens before the day is done to the wheat that's green, and looks for young ears, and gives them dew to drink; and finds them again in the morning, and dries them and makes them strong enough for the hot sun, which, by God's command, must, for the sake of men and women and children hungry, be as hot as wheat can bear, to hasten on the harvest,—it was a day when June gives her freshest greenness and her coolest breezes to those who deserve them best,—the workers, who go soonest out in the morning; a day when the luxurious, idle, and indolent of all conditions, who lie late abed, come out to pant for breath, and to be broiled in a sun which is up high, and hot, in the performance of other duties than that of caring for their comfort and their skin; a day when, happy ordinance of Nature, even the mower in the fields is relieved by his violent exercise and his perspiration from the languor that afflicts the idle.

It was on such a day that Mr. Hurst said to his men that they would all be required in the afternoon and the evening to wash sheep; that they would begin sheep-shearing next day; that all the flock would need washing, but those that grazed on the hill where the sand holes were would more particularly, as they had stained their wool by rubbing against the red sand. And he said two of the men and some of the boys must go at once and make a dam across the stream, stemming the water deep enough to take a man up to the middle, or nearly, but not deep enough to drown anybody standing on his feet.

It was on this same day that the venerable Adam, ten years older than when we saw him first, and now past all work but to rock the cradle of the fourth generation—a future Adam of the fields—was sitting on the bench under the honeysuckle porch of his cottage, winking his aged eyes as if he slept, yet not asleep. He said to Mr. Hurst who was passing, and who stopped for a few minutes to speak with him, "Ees, master; it be God that gives the weather; it be well for we that the hand of man does not hold the wind, and rain, and sunshine; it be well for we that we ha'n't to go to the parish for the showers and the shining sun, master; now that they have made that new law. I have been trying to understand the grounds of it; but I be'n't able to see through it. I have tried it with Scripture; but I can find no Scripture for it; no, all Scripture be right against it. I have even tried to forget that I am the poor man, and have put myself in the place of the rich man; yet I cannot see why this law should be as they have now made it. It be seven miles going and seven miles coming, and I have been twice, once this week and once the week before, at what they call the board of guardians; all that way, ill able to go; and I sat on the door steps four hours until they called me in; and then they said I must give up everything I am possessed of to them, and go into that great new house. Oh, master, what terrible things some of them as have been in and out again tell of that union house. They are put to work and to their virtuals like soldiers to drill. The unions, they say, are to have all masters out of the army and from the men-of-war ships as have been used to severity over other men; and they say we be all to be drilled and punished if we do not obey the word of command. And I do not doubt it; for him as they have got to this union came out and gave orders not to sit on the steps of the door, and orders for this one to come in, and that one to stand aside, just like as we used to hear the drill-sergeants speak in the time of the local militia and the volunteers. It be a very hard case, master, for they as have worked a long life like I, and went, as you know, when I need not, for I was above age, and offered to be a volunteer at the time of all the fright about Boney. It be a hard thing when they would not drill me then because I was too old, though I was young enough to have the spirit to defend my country, that thirty years after, when I am old in spirit and body both, they are going to put me into the hands of a severe man, chosen because he has been a breaker in of men in a barrack-yard; to break me in now in my old days to what they call strict discipline; to learn me and poor old Sarah who have lived in this cottage, man and wife, nine-and-forty years come Michaelmas, and brought up a family in honesty and the fear of God—to 'sunder we whom God did join together, that we may live apart and meet death in our old age each alone, to deter, for they say that is it, to deter other poor creatures from coming on the parish. I never believed, Mr. Hurst, it could have been true. When they spoke about mending the old law, they never said a word about this, as I heard on, never a word."

"No, Adam; nor did I know what kind of new law it was to be when I complained like many other farmers of the old one. Here am I now leaving this farm where I and my fathers before me have been so long—obliged to leave it because I have not submitted quietly to imposition; here am I with my last crop in the ground, with men working to me, all brought up to work by me and my father, all of them good workmen!"

ADAM—"Good masters get good men."
MR. HURST—"It may be so. At any rate I have good men here, and I do not expect to find as good where I am going. Now one of the worst, if not the very worst, parts of the old Poor Law is preserved in this new one, indeed the most mischievous part of the old law; I mean that which prevents me from taking the people who work for me now, or any of them, or even you yourself, Adam, with me to another parish out of this union. This is a great hardship both to me as a farmer, and to you all as workmen. I must submit to employ such as I find in my new parish, be they good or bad, and leave my best hands here to my successor in this farm, be he a good master or a bad. This is one of the evils which I see the agriculture of England suffering under; and I must confess that since our young squire has run in debt as he has, and the management has got into the hands of the lawyers, I see many things more which I did not once think to be so detrimental to a farmer, as I do now. Since the squire has mortgaged Berry estate, the game has been let with the mansion and park, as you know. New sets of game-keepers have been put over us, and that which was disagreeable before is now a pest. I have stood out against it, and here is the consequence,—at six months' notice I am obliged to leave Berryhill. I begin to think that both farmers and their farm men need some different kind of laws than any we have now, or else not so much law as we have now. I am grieved, more than I can tell, that I had ever signed a petition against the old Poor Law; but I had no thought of such a change being made as they have made. To deny an old worn-out man and woman, like you and Sarah, relief, until you give up and part with all your old furniture, and that you must even then go into a place ruled as the House of Correction is ruled, to deter others, is indeed grievous. I hope we may yet prevent this. It is that 'cold-hearted,' new-fangled doctrine, called political economy, that has led to this new law."

As old Adam had perhaps never heard of political economy, or, like many others who use its name, knew nothing about it even if he had heard of it, he could not make any remark upon it in response to Mr. Hurst. We shall, however, take this opportunity to make a few remarks on this popular error, that of charging the oppressive clauses of the New Poor Law on the principles of political economy.

In the first place, nobody supported those provisions of the Poor Law which have severity in them, and which are intended to deter the poor from seeking relief, more zealously than the landed gentry and landed nobles, in Parliament, who make it their boast that political economy is neither believed in nor understood by them. They, as their ancestors, the feudal barons and knights of chivalry, who deemed it derogatory to acquire literary education of any kind, even the ability to write their names,—boast now, in the same spirit, that the merest elements of political economy are a mystery to them. The time will come when their boast of being ignorant of political economy, at the very time they are sitting as political legislators, will be looked upon as evidence of intellectual barbarism, as truly as the declaration of the Norman knights, that they were not dishonoured by not having learned to write their names.

But even where persons professing to be political economists supported the cruel clauses of the Poor Law, it is no more a proof against those principles which they professed to believe in, than was the cruelty of the inquisition by one party of believers in religion, and the enactment of penal laws against that party by another, a proof that religion justified the inquisition of Rome or the penal laws of England.

The principles of political economy are as true and unerring as the principles of gravitation, attraction, or repulsion in natural bodies, if political economy is freed from political superstition. There never has been any legislation unmixed with what we may call political superstition. The present Free Trade measure is a step towards it, yet it is not more than a step upon the threshold.

PASSAGE IV. CONTINUED.—The Sheep-washing.
Mr. Hurst said again, that he hoped some plan might be devised to prevent Adam from incurring the terrible calamity of breaking up his old home and going with his aged wife into the union house, to be separated worse than by death and the grave—to be separated in life in a grave, alive. And then he asked if Adam would take his staff in his hand and walk up the dell, and sit down on the knoll by the green birches, and see the sheep washing. He believed that Adam had never once been absent from a sheep-washing at Berryhill since the year he was born; and as this would be the last they would have in Berryhill while he was farmer, he would like to have it in all respects like the sheep washings of days gone by.

And Adam took his staff in his hand and went up the dell above the pool to the knoll where the bushes grew, and sat in the shade and looked down upon the sheep-washing, as did other old people, and all the young children not engaged below. It made the old people young again; every one of them declared that, and they even rebuked some of the more timid of the young ones for not going to help; they, when they were young, never stood looking on. See how the young tugs, that had never been washed before, were breaking away.

At which all the youngsters—the very youngest that could toddle alone—ran to bring back the young sheep that were running away without being washed; the boys that were helping to swim the sheep along the pool to the men who stood in the deepest place got out and ran; the dogs barked and ran; the young women who came to look on, and be very timid in going near the edge of the pool, though they knew well they would be, before the evening was over, pursued and caught, and brought back and soused in the pool according to the custom of sheepwashings—they ran to bring back the fugitive sheep; and the shepherd called to them all to keep back, his dog would do more than the whole. But dogs, and children, and boys, and women, and sheep that would not be turned, went out of sight up the dell, each making their own noise, the sheep and the shepherd's oldest dog being the only parties to the uproar really in earnest; the rest in part or wholly in fun.

Meantime the more sober three-year-old wethers were brought forward from the corner beneath a crag where they were awaiting their turn. The shepherd, who knew best how to lay hold of them, introduced them to the water. He did it thus:—He got a wether by the long wool of the neck, and by the shoulder and fore feet. He lifted his fore feet from the ground, and stood astride over him, and made him walk on his hind legs to the water's edge. The wether did not like it, and did not go willingly in; but when he really was in, and felt his hind part getting wet, he made a bold spring, such as would overturn a man that was not prepared for it, into the water. Here two men stationed for the purpose caught him, and his only struggle was to get further into the pool, and further from the shepherd who put him in. But as soon as he was afloat and off his feet, he quietly resigned himself to be washed, which was done by a man standing beyond the two men, who held his head above water by the wool of the neck, and guiding him by the shoulders, which were below water, kept him thus on end for half a minute or more, rolling and plunging him to the left and to the right.

This man then, the shepherd having another ready, turned this wether over the water to another man who, like him, stood three and a half or four feet deep. This man held the sheep in the same way, and in his turn gave him to another man a yard or two farther in the pool. That man treated him in the same way, and gave him to a fourth, and perhaps a fifth, who at last pushed the drenched sheep to shore on the opposite side, where he climbed his way up the low bank dripping and in silence until he saw those that had gone before him dripping also. They greeted him and he greeted them, and then he turned round with them to watch the others, and salute them with the language and sympathy of sheep as they came out of the water in their turn.

Then the flock of tugs was brought back, and they were washed one by one the same way as the wethers. And beer and bread and cheese, were handed across the water to the men who stood in the pool, for they declined to come out to get it. They said to stand in the water for a long while was not so bad as to come out and go in again; and the old people who now came down to the side of the pool said that was true; and some of the young ones said the best way to keep from cold was to be wet all over; and they had no sooner said so than one of them was pushed in, and laid hold of by the men who had washed the sheep, and dipped deeper even than the sheep. And the young women threw water from the bank over the men in the pool to wet them; and the men came out to catch the women, who in their turn ran, and screamed as they ran. And some of them were caught and carried back—the oldest matrons there, the grandmothers and great-grandmothers of the village telling the young men that it was well done, only to be gently with it. And no onlooker thought wrong of it; save, perhaps, some very young child, whose eldest sister or aunt it was that struggled in arms which were too strong for her, and put her in the middle of the pool. And there was more cases than one where three women, or four or five, would pursue and get hold of one man, and carry him and throw him into the water, and some of them roll over on the top of him, where they might have been drowned but for the more grave of the old people, who drew them out again.

If anybody ever took cold at such a time the case was rare. Still rarer was it that such rough sport produced ill-humour. On this occasion so joyous was every one, they forgot even that this was Mr. Hurst's last sheep washing; and old Adam, after he had gone home and had his supper, and said family prayers, confessed that until he was on his knees beseeching heaven for grace and mercy to himself and all men, he had forgot even the union workhouse, and the barrack-yard drill-sergeant who was set to be master of it. But at the solemn hour of family prayer solemn thoughts came back upon him, and he prayed fervently that he and his might be delivered from that great oppression in their age of helplessness—the oppression of the men who were possessed of riches, strength, and injustice.

Happy morning was it in Berryhill next day, when Mr. Hurst mounted his horse and rode to the market-town, six miles distant, to meet the agent of the estate and the solicitors of the mortgagees, who had written to him to meet them there, to see if they could not make a new arrangement to keep him as tenant of Berryhill. And when he returned and said the farm was again his, if he chose to take it at an advance of rent, the people were still happier, for Mr. Hurst had said often before that he would rather pay a higher rent than leave it, provided only the same was kept within bounds. He had been told that day that prices, which had lately risen, would rise farther and be maintained; that the Conservative party was gaining strength in Parliament; confidence would not be shaken again as it had been in 1835, and prices would not fall as the Whigs had made prices fall. The only thing required now of the farmers was to support the efforts of the Tories to put down the Whigs.

Mr. Hurst was not clear upon this doctrine, either for or against it. But within a few days of giving in his new offer for Berryhill, news came that the King was dead, and a general election was pending, and Mr. Hurst was called upon by all that was valuable to a farmer and to the labourers of the farms, to the landed estates and to the nation at large, to assist those who were now contending to rescue England and the young Queen from the counsels of "Whigs and destructives."

Mr. Hurst's sheep-shearing was not yet done; his ewes were still to shear when this political sheep-washing began—an immersion of one party by another far more uproarious and far from being so harmless as that at Mr. Hurst's pool in the dell.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

Dickens is preparing, with his wife and family, for a tour to Constantinople.

THE DUKE OF BEAUFORT; HIS TENANTS-AT-WILL, AND M.P.s-AT-WILL.

At Badminton, in Gloucestershire, the "stable talk" has been the Duke of Beaufort may, before the year is out, remove one of his huntsmen from the upper end of the servant's hall, and put one of the kennel boys in his place. At present, if we may believe the Monmouth correspondents of the London daily press, both the "stable talk" and the "table talk" is, that the duke will remove from the representation of Monmouthshire his brother, Lord Granville Somerset (a practical business member of the Commons, and supporter of the Free Trade Government), and put in his place his nephew, Captain Edward Somerset, a young military officer. In the "table talk" it is not doubted that the duke will try to do it, and will do it if he can; but it is doubted that he can. In the "stable talk" it is not doubted for a moment by any one that the duke can do it and will do it. Why should it be doubted? Does not Bob, who pumps water and sweeps the yard, order Bill, who is only a boy in the kennel, to do what he thinks kennel boys should do, namely, whatever pumpers may declare to be law for kennel boys? And do not the under grooms condemn Bob to obedience at the pump? And does not the upper groom send, or say he will send, the under ones far deeper down than where the pump water comes from, if they doubt the justice of his law, and power to give law and enforce its execution? And is there not the coachman and the huntsmen above the upper groom, and the master of the hounds above them, who is yet only to the duke what the smallest moon of Jupiter is to the sun?

"Stable talk!" Such heresy never entered the head of man or boy in Badminton as to doubt that Lord Granville Somerset must submit to be removed, and have his place filled by Captain Somerset, if the duke wills that the places in his family establishment shall be so altered. Nor is the creed of the stables more exact than the creed of the farmyards. The faith of Badminton, in Gloucestershire, is the faith of Ragland, in Monmouthshire. The man who, at the Badminton stables, is as the seventh of Saturn's moons to the sun, has not all the horses, and dogs, and men, and boys in their several gradations at command, on pain of twitch upon nose, or whip upon flanks, or kick upon buttocks, more effectually for obedience than the man at Ragland, the Jupiter himself, has the command of the "independent electors" who inhabit the Ragland property.

"Table talk," however, has it that the Ragland property, extensive as it is, may not overbalance the electors in other parts of the county who will support Lord Granville Somerset; and those who talk thus deny the right of the Duke of Beaufort to give to the county members of Parliament-at-will as he gives to his estate tenants-at-will.

But the subject has, since these remarks were written, gone beyond the talk of either stables or tables. Public meetings have been held in Monmouthshire, and men to whom the public of that shire raises its head and opens its eyes and its ears have spoken. One of them, Mr. Dowling, has said:

"Time has shown Lord Granville Somerset the fallacy of what is called 'Protection': he has seen the delusion of the dogma that the rate of wages is regulated by the price of food. He is no doubt aware of the hollowness of the cuckoo cry of protection to native industry—a protection which renders the tillers of the soil a most piteous and suffering race, prostrate and famine-stricken."

So say the speakers who are on the spot to see the tillers of the soil of Monmouth. But even at the distance of London we were not uninformed of the condition of the tillers, at least, of the soil of Ragland. As the following case will show, some of those who should be ashamed of the agriculture of Ragland, and of the subjugation of its agriculturists to a bondage disgraceful to Englishmen, have been at some pains to force themselves upon public notice; that is, so far as man's injustice to his fellow man is likely to engage public notice.

Sometime in December last, the correspondent of a London morning paper wrote, and his writing was published in the paper, that a tenant on the Duke of Beaufort's estate in Monmouthshire had, during several years, made improvements on his farm, until it had become noticeable amongst other farms for neatness, cleanness, and productiveness; but that the Duke's steward had increased the rent to a very considerable amount; that the tenant thus lost the profit of his improvements before he was paid for them; and that, in a county so badly cultivated as Monmouth, and so needful of better cultivation, this tenant had been made a terrible warning to others to remain as they were, and not attempt to produce more corn and feed more cattle.

The name of the tenant was not mentioned, nor even the locality of his farm pointed at. But it seems a Mr. Ford, was at once named as the man, by the duke's agent; and accordingly, Mr. Ford at once got notice to quit his farm. The agent also wrote angry letters to a Monmouth paper, explaining, or attempting to explain away the facts, as applicable to Mr. Ford; but in reality strengthening their applicability.

Meantime, Mr. Ford employed a Monmouth solicitor to prosecute the London paper, for damages sustained by him in being dismissed from his farm; and the London paper in turn took legal counsel, as to the extent of its responsibility for damage done,—as damage, and a grievous amount of it, had certainly been done to Mr. Ford, by the duke's agent.

Herein was involved a curious question of "protection to agriculture;" and the more so, that Mr. Ford got his dismissal from the farm he had been improving at the very time the duke's son was at the hussings at Gloucester, in opposition to the Government supporter, Mr. Francis Charteris.

Not less singular was it that on that night when the Marquis of Worcester made his maiden speech in the House of Commons, in favour of protection to agriculture, and strongly condemnatory of all persons and parties who would not protect and cherish the farmers, the mail-bag from Monmouth was on its way to London, containing a letter which set forth in bitter terms the ruin which had come upon the writer's (Mr. Ford's) family, by his dismissal from the farm, and demanding redress from the London newspaper.

Mr. Ford had denied emphatically that he had given the correspondent the information; which I have reason to believe is not only true, but that the correspondent had never seen Mr. Ford, and did not know his name. Yet, though a man of honour and integrity Mr. Ford was not believed; and though an agriculturist whom the duke and duke's agent, and duke's heir to boot, should have cherished and held in his farm for the good of the estate, even if he wished to go away, he was dismissed as a scullion of the kitchen would be dismissed if dishonest, and without a character, or with a bad character—such as would prevent him from getting another farm.

Of the human insect whom the duke arms with such a sting to wound while it extracts honey, neither its own nor its master's, I say nothing. It is the public principle as affecting public property, the agriculture of the county, of which we have note to take. The Ragland estate in Monmouthshire, which is of very great extent (giving a rental of 50,000*l.* a year, though in a deplorable state of waste), has not the advantage of the duke's presence, as he usually lives at Badminton, in Gloucestershire, when not in London. But even in Gloucestershire, though the tenantry have the advantage of speaking to him personally to tell their wants and wishes, he is an obstructor of good agriculture, and not a promoter of it. It is in the region of his fox-chase that the Whitefield example farm is situated. There, a poor dairy farm, fit only for fox-hunting, as most of Gloucestershire still is, bearing inferior grass, foul weeds, feeble crops of corn, employing two men, one boy, and two women to 232 acres at low wages; affording the farmer a bare living; paying with difficulty 200*l.* per annum of rent; being worked with a capital barely amounting to 700*l.*; there, on that same farm, the working capital is now above 4000*l.*; the rent is double what it was before; the assessment to the poor rate triple what it was before; the wages paid six times what was paid before; the produce of the farm such, that all these increased charges are paid, and a handsome profit left to the farmer. Yet there, living in a country of pauperism, amid farmers always in distress, with this example farm before him, the Duke of Beaufort sees nothing in it worth notice from him, save that it impedes the fox-chase.

And yet his Grace of Beaufort meets his Grace of Richmond at the consultation of protectionist peers, and stands pledged, so the Post says, to oppose by vote and influence the measure which is to remove that thing called protection to agriculture—that agriculture which he himself does not protect who alone has the power. And now he is to remove the member at-will as his tenant-at-will is removed, because the member believes that monopoly is not protection.

When recently at Whitefield farm, I expressed surprise at seeing so many cattle feeding at the stalls, Mr. Morton, who is now tenant of the farm, said "Yes, the number is great for the acreage of the farm, comparing it with what we see elsewhere; but we shall feed more cattle still, and extend all our operations when the Corn Law is repealed."

REUBEN.

FREE TRADE AUTHORITIES CONVERTED INTO ADVOCATES OF MONOPOLY.—Mr. Cayley, M.P. for East Yorkshire, and tract-writer for the Central Agricultural Protection Society, had the hardihood in one of his publications to twist and torture Adam Smith, the great champion of Free Trade, into an advocate for protection. The stupidity or the fraud having been exposed, Mr. Cayley had the temporary grace to retract and apologize in a letter to the Morning Post; we say temporary, because the hon. gentleman has since repeated his fault in the House of Commons. In a like spirit Mr. D'Israeli has cited Mr. Mill as being an opponent of Free Trade, and the Morning Chronicle has set the question at rest by the following quotation from Mr. Mill's "Essays on some unsettled questions of Political Economy":—"A prejudice appears to exist against the theory in question, on the supposition of its being opposed to one of the most valuable results of modern political philosophy, the doctrine of freedom of trade between nation and nation. The opinions now laid before the readers are presented as corollaries from the principles upon which trade itself rests. The writer has also been careful to point out that, from these opinions, no justification can be derived from any protecting duty, or other preference given to domestic over foreign industry. But in regard to those duties on foreign commodities which do not operate as protection, but are maintained solely for revenue, and which do not touch either the necessities of life or the materials and instruments of production, it is his opinion that any relaxation of such duties, beyond what may be required by the interests of the revenue itself, should in general be made contingent upon the adoption of some corresponding degree of freedom of trade with this country by the nation from which the commodities are imported."—Liverpool Mercury.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—Dr. Ryan has been giving a most instructive and interesting lecture on the process of diving and submarine operations. The lecturer divided his subject into two departments; considering—first, the physical difficulties attending upon diving; and secondly, the means suggested by the ingenuity of man for the purpose of overcoming such difficulties. Under the first head, Dr. Ryan gave a most clear and concise view of the theory of respiration, which he aptly termed the most important act of our existence. He remarked that respiration was so important, that in Holy Writ life and breath are synonymous terms. Witness the expression, "And God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life." In Latin, the connection between life and breath is shown in the words spiro and spiritus; and, in the Greek, the first and last act of a man's life is expressed by a word composed of Alpha and Omega, the first and last letters of the alphabet. The Doctor then proceeded to explain the action of the oxygen of the air in converting venous into arterial blood, and also pointed out that the venous blood could not circulate through the arterial system without becoming a most deadly poison. He described asphyxia resulting from suffocation, and demonstrated that the cause of that condition was the prevention of the passage of oxygen into the lungs in order that the blood might be arterialised. Dr. Ryan then proceeded to show that man was formed merely for breathing a gaseous atmosphere, and that although water contained air, yet man could not separate it for respiratory purposes, as fishes do. He then gave some most interesting details, describing the diving dress, and proving that unless the head and chest of the man were protected by the protruding helmet, the weight of the water would prevent him using the muscles of respiration; for the Doctor stated that if the chest exposed half a square foot of surface at the depth of 15 feet, the weight on the chest would be 450 lbs. The learned Doctor concluded his admirable lecture amid loud applause from a most crowded audience.

AGRICULTURE.

THE LATEST CONVERT.

It is a good sign of the times that the only real organ of the farmers, the Mark Lane Express, has declared in favour of Free Trade. We wish it had been done earlier, for an unequivocal expression of opinion on the part of farmers would have prevented the retention of a modified protection for three years, which we foresee will be used in various ways against the weal of the farmer. The following passages in the leading article of the Express, on Monday, represent very closely the tone of opinion amongst the farmers, who very generally say the apprehensions which have been expressed are groundless. After referring to the debate and division in the House of Lords on the second reading of the Corn Law Bill, and stating that the result left scarcely an opening for doubt as to the success of the Government measure, the writer says:

"Having arrived at this stage of the proceedings, when we consider, in point of fact, that the Bill must become law, and when we contemplate the extraordinary change of opinion which has taken place upon the question of the Corn Laws, we are disposed to ask ourselves—and we think that all who regard the repeal of those laws as fraught with injury to British agriculture, should ask themselves the same question, 'Is it not possible that we may have been mistaken in our views?'—may not our apprehensions be groundless?" We must, for our own part, confess that circumstances are daily occurring, which lead us to doubt whether the results will be of such a serious nature as has been anticipated."

Referring to Lord Londonderry's frank avowal that his adherence to monopoly was simply an adherence to his party leaders, without having himself formed any defined or intelligible opinions on the subject, the writer remarks:

"Now the noble Marquis is no orator; but we very much doubt whether he has not assigned the true cause of the change which has taken place. 'Not able to form an opinion of their own,' noble lords and honourable gentlemen have taken the opinions of the Premier and the Duke of Wellington. Can we suppose that individuals placed in their high position have any other object than the general good of the country in view? Can we imagine that they would adopt a course opposed to the opinions of a large and influential class of the community, without being well advised on all hands? And if so, seeing their position, their ability, their means of acquiring information, and capability of arriving at a sound conclusion, and further, the support they have acquired from the landed interest itself, have we not reason to ask ourselves, 'Is it not possible we may have been mistaken in our views?' A comparatively short space of time will furnish the answer."

Perhaps there is nothing which has more disgusted the manly and intelligent minds of the British middle classes with the monopolists than the anile scoldings and coarse abuse of Ministers by the monopolist leaders. Every man who thinks at all puts this question to himself, "What possible motive can Sir Robert Peel have but the general welfare?" And the answer does not exalt the Richmonds, the Bentincks, and D'Israeli in his estimation. We do not hesitate to say that there never was a party of public men towards whom the great body of the British community entertained so much contempt as towards the monopolist party in Parliament.

The course of the farmers is now plain. Let them treat the ravings of protectionist politicians as of about the same value as the promises of their exploded Corn Laws; let them rely upon their own exertions for success in farming, and quietly but resolutely demand from their landlords the security of long and rational leases.

It is not probable that any real attempt will be made in the next Parliament to alter the law now about to be enacted; but it is by no means unlikely that during the general election sundry monopolist lords and squires will talk largely upon the subject; and if the prices of grain happen to be low, they may divert farmers from considering what are the public questions in which they are really most interested. It does not matter that the promises of the squires refer to impossible things, inasmuch as landlords have been promising, and farmers believing in impossibilities for the last 30 years; these things will be attempted. There are many questions on which the squires, ambitious of representing the counties, would not like farmers to ponder and act according to their own convictions. We therefore caution the farmers beforehand against attributing prices, should prices be low, simply to the change in the law. That the effect of that change on the market has been anticipated is clear from the following account of the state of the corn market in the Mark Lane Express review of Monday last:

"Whilst the weather continues auspicious for the growing crops we shall probably have no great change in prices; but any circumstance tending to create a feeling of uneasiness respecting the result of the harvest would, in all probability, give an impetus to the trade. Such may at least be inferred from the generally firm tone sellers have maintained at the leading markets held during the week, under a combination of circumstances by no means calculated to impart confidence to wheat holders."

The range of prices during next year will depend upon the coming harvest. The prospect of that harvest is at present favourable. The great heat of the last few weeks will go far to recover the wheat plant, which previously was somewhat feeble; and should the summer prove a hot one, there will certainly be an abundant produce. Now, should that happen, let the farmers mark and distinguish how much of the reduction in price has been brought about by good crops, and how much by the alteration of the law; and let them form their own conclusions and act upon them without reference to the clamours of the protectionist landocracy.

FOREIGN COMPETITION.

"The agricultural community have been more frightened than hurt."—George Robins.

If farmers have not been frightened, it certainly has not been the fault of their "friends," who have stuck at nothing likely to produce the most extravagant alarm in the agricultural mind. But the fright of the farmers has for the last two or three years been a very shadowy affair, which none but the Parliamentary monopolists have been able to perceive. That there has been a very infinitesimal portion of fear is, however, possible; and that the eloquent and practical George Robins may have been perfectly right, when, in describing "An Elizabethan Villa, a Manor, and five farms in Warwickshire," he said "the agricultural community have been more frightened than hurt."

On the other hand, the eloquent and impracticable Lord Stanley has been labouring with more zeal than success in trying to persuade the Lords and the farmers that they are not half enough frightened, and that they are about to be most seriously hurt. His lordship's, "Tamboff" story, has made all persons of average intelligence and information very careful in taking Lord Stanley's facts as real facts. His lordship's forte is not in that direction; his facts and figures are very like figures of fancy. And he seems to have met with a congenial mind in some Liverpool corn merchant, from whom he produced a letter. On that letter Lord Stanley, in the House of Lords on Monday night, founded the following statement:

"I received this morning a letter from a gentleman, who described himself as the head of the oldest firm in Liverpool engaged in the corn trade, and he writes to inform me that he holds in bond two cargoes of red wheat from Dantzic which cost 14s. a quarter. The freight to Liverpool was 9s. 6d. This gentleman then gives us his deliberate opinion, that if the measure now before their Lordship's House passed, we shall, after the expiration of three years, be annually in the receipt of five millions of quarters of foreign wheat, and probably more—but that would depend upon the seasons and the demand here—at a price between 35s. and 40s., the duty being 1s. a quarter."

If this wheat in bond has any real existence, all that can be said is, that Lord Stanley's correspondent ought to be thankful for a good bargain. If the story be real, it is impossible to say what peculiar circumstances, or combination of circumstances, have induced that particular transaction; but to cite it as a specimen transaction is simply ridiculous. On turning to the review of the foreign corn trade published in the Mark Lane Express, on the same Monday evening, we find that at Dantzic:

"The best samples of old high-mixed were then held at 51s. to 53s., good qualities at 48s. to 49s., and other sorts at prices varying from 44s. to 47s. per qr. Vessels to load wheat for London might have been chartered at 3s. 9d. to 4s. 3d., and to Liverpool at 4s. 6d. to 5s. per qr."

And at Rostock and Stettin wheat would cost 45s. and 46s. a quarter, which in London, in bond, would not be worth more than 46s. and 47s. a qr. Such being the state of the Baltic markets, of what possible use, as a guide to form a general inference, is the Liverpool corn merchant's isolated bargain? Lord Stanley's present Tamboff, the country of his imagination, from which unlimited supplies of corn are hereafter to be obtained for next to nothing, is Hungary. "The plains of Hungary are, by the application of skill and money," to be the source of that "inundation" of corn the monopolists affect to apprehend. Now all this is lamentable trifling. Lord Brougham answered the monopolist admirably upon this point. After reminding him that the opening our market would have the effect of advancing the price of wheat abroad, his lordship said:

"Now, would their lordships consider what was involved in the operation of clearing the soil for the growth of corn? They must cut down the trees—they must grub up the roots—they must saw them in pieces—they must get rid of them in some way or other before they could convert the land into arable soil. They must farm the land; they must enclose it; and barns and granaries must be constructed. Now, he would stop here to ask if all this could be done without people—without workmen to carry these operations into effect? And did their lordships think that the population would increase just because we wanted them? Did they suppose that they increased at the rate they did in this country—at the rate of a thousand a day? But that was not all. Capital also was required. Where was that capital to come from? It was estimated in this country that, properly to cultivate a farm, a tenant required to be possessed of capital at the rate of 10*l.* per acre. How much, then, would be required for the clearing of a farm? Why, less than 40*l.* or 50*l.* per acre would not do that. What could be expected, then, from the cultivators of the Ukraine, the Danube, or the interior of Poland?"

Now this is the practical view of the subject, which will at once satisfy farmers, and all who practically know aught of the cultivation of land, that any great increase of grain on the Continent of Europe can only be the result of many changes, occupying a long period of time. The only practical risk to the farmer arises from the three years' postponement of absolutely Free Trade. It is not impossible, indeed, it is not improbable, that at the cessation of the duty in 1849, a larger accumulation of grain may be thrown upon our market than it can absorb, and which will happen from over estimating its capacity. But that will be only a temporary, though perhaps a severe loss to farmers. That loss, however, be it what it may, must be placed to the account of the "farmer's friends."

That the price of wheat, under Free Trade, will not be far from that which has been the average in the Channel Islands, 47s. a quarter, all evidence on the subject renders probable. The extravagant statements of the monopolists are absurd.

In order to dispel any unfounded alarm on this point, we recommend farmers to read Mr. T. F. Salter's "Rough Notes of a Farmer during an Agricultural Tour through Russia, Prussia, Denmark, and Sweden, in August, 1842." They will there find, upon the authority of a Norfolk farmer, that the power of Russia and Prussia to supply corn has been greatly overrated, and "that the inhabitants neither possess the skill, the knowledge, or the means, of injuring the British farmer."

We have no doubt that when the trade in corn becomes free, completely free, there will be a sufficient and constant importation to prevent the price rising to an exorbitant rate; but if the price be much reduced, it will be effected by the increased growth of wheat in this country, the result of the stimulus to husbandry given by Free Trade. The tale about the unlimited foreign supply is a mere buggaboo story, which nobody believes, not even those who tell it.

SHADOWS OF COMING EVENTS.

While the Richmonds and the Dentincks are bellowing forth prophecies of the ruin of farmers and the deterioration of husbandry, it is impossible to take up a periodical devoted to agricultural topics without perceiving that, whatever may be the other effects of coming free trade, one immediate and important one will be to stimulate the farmers to increased activity and more energetic pursuit of their business. Now we all know what is the result of such exertions. And it is from the incidental remarks of writers on rural topics that these conclusions are to be drawn, at least as much as from direct remark. A correspondent of the Mark Lane Express, writing upon the subject of "landlord and tenant arrangements," remarks that tenants can now properly call upon their landlords for new and more liberal arrangements, and adds:

"There can be no doubt now that a new Corn Bill will become the law of the land. Neither landlord nor tenant can honestly affect to believe that the existing Corn Laws can last three months longer."

He thinks no man must be surprised if the price of wheat for the next ten years shall rule below 40s. a quarter, and that the improved farming now so much recommended will do at least as much to keep down the price as importations from abroad. He, therefore, calls the attention of the farmers to the absolute necessity of securing leases. He says:

"Taking it for granted, however, the tenants may live by greater sacrifices and exertions, what security have they at present that they shall reap the benefit of these sacrifices and exertions? A yearly tenant at will has nothing to depend upon but the good opinion and just consideration of his landlord. But that landlord may be a speculator—may get involved—may have nothing but those "good intentions" with which a certain place is said to be paved, or—he may die. How then? The heir, successor, or mortgagee, may wish to make as much as he can of his newly acquired property; and this he may think he can best effect by turning the present tenant out. What security has the latter that he will not? What inducement, therefore, has he to improve, enrich, or extend his farm?"

And no landlord can feel it to be any imputation on him, that a tenant, under the new state of things, should ask for a lease:

"You may believe—and you may tell him you believe that he will never disturb you while he lives; but life is proverbially uncertain; and surely he will not wish you to be at the expense of insuring his life to the extent of the capital you desire to invest in his land. Without such insurance, or a sufficiently long lease, every farthing you invest may be lost to you, though it will go to others. Parliament does not seem disposed to pass any law to protect or to compensate tenants. All the Corn Laws they have hitherto passed have been for the benefit of landlords, and used as excellent excuses for demanding rents greatly beyond the prices they really promoted. Farmers, therefore, must individually protect themselves. Every tenant farmer can (surely without offence) in this altered state of things, ask for a lease. What honest reason can any landlord allege for not granting one?"

The Corn Bill will probably be carried in a few weeks, and from thenceforth farmers must expect their prices to be only higher than the Continental prices by the cost of transport; that is the opinion of the writer whose remarks we have quoted; but does he, therefore, believe, as the Duke of Richmond says he believes, that farmers are, therefore, about to withdraw their capital from the soil? Quite the contrary. He says:

"How, then, when tenants are increasing their expenses by improvements, with the certainty of decreasing their prices by foreign competition, can any just and reasonable landlord refuse to them a lease with covenants recognising and providing for their rights? In less than a week the Lords may be expected to give a conclusive indication of their concurrence with the Commons. Every tenant farmer at will should then look to his landlord for a lease, at terms, and with covenants, fitted to the altered state of things. If they do not make the attempt now, they will find it much more difficult, and likely to be much less successful, next year than this. The three years' small duties are obviously carried on to prevent present abatement of rents; but if a tenant can get a lease for 7, 14, or 21 years, he can justly and strongly argue, that during the larger portion of his holding he will be altogether unprotected by the law, and ought, therefore, to be the better considered by his landlord."

We have repeatedly said that it is not so much reductions of rent the tenants require as secure tenures, and relief from landlord-imposed burthens. Now the remarks of the writer, a protectionist, show that the immediate effect of Free Trade will be to bring both landlords and tenants to the conclusion that it is no longer for the advantage of either party that the thriftless practice of yearly tenancies should continue. We have all heard a good deal of the superiority of Scotch over English farming; but from the following passages we extract from a letter addressed by a Scotch farmer travelling in England, to the editor of the Galloway Advertiser, it appears that the differences are chiefly those which arise from the difference of tenures:

"When you asked me to report on English farming, I believe both of us thought that my report must be all against English farming, particularly in this and other central counties, when compared with Scotch farming. We were both very much mistaken. In passing hurriedly through these central counties of England, as we have formerly done on our way to London, we see little of the details of farming, and form our opinion of the state of agriculture chiefly from the great clumsy waggons, the heavy and inefficient ploughs, and the expensive misapplication of horse-power, which meet our eyes on all sides, and which we hastily conclude must belong to an age of prejudice and general ignorance. But these are only the outside defects of the machinery; and a minute examination of the farms leads to a very different conclusion as to the details of English farming. I hesitate not to say, that the farming in many parts of Warwickshire is, as good, or better, than in Wigtownshire or Ayrshire—though it is much in the same way as I would say a man is a good walker if he beats another on a road, at a great cost of physical power, although loaded with his great-grandfather's boots, which happened to weigh each a hundred-weight."

And he adds:

"I do not mean to say that an English farmer is able to pay more rent for his farm than a Scotch farmer would do—quite the contrary; but he grows better crops on the same quality of land, feeds better, raises more manure, puts on more compost, keeps his land more clear from weeds, and his houses, farm roads, and fences, in better order; so that, in my opinion, the English farmer only requires to throw off his grandfather's great cumbersome implements to beat us both in neat and profitable agriculture."

There is no doubt that the English farmer has great advantages of climate, and often of soil, over his brother farmer north of the Tweed; and the only advantage the Scotch farmer has—and it is an enormous one—arises from his long and rational lease. The Scotch farmer says:

"The great hindrance to profitable English farming is the unwillingness of landlords to grant leases for a term of years. To a Scotch farmer it appears wonderful how much some tenants have expended under so discouraging a system; but the general and only possible result of short leases is to check improvement—to cause draining and other expensive improvement to be either neglected or imperfectly executed; and no inducement is held out to the great body of farmers to forsake the clumsy implements and expensive system of working of their fathers, the effect of which would be to put all the profits of the change into the pockets of their landlords within a year or two after the improvement is adopted. A great part of their clay lands are undrained, and, on the very best managed farms, the draining is quite inefficient—the drains being perhaps 36 feet asunder, and only two feet deep, where they should have been placed at every 16 or 18 feet, and 2½ feet deep."

The wetness of the land from insufficient draining, forms an excuse for the misapplication of horse-power, both in ploughing, and in the use of heavy waggons instead of one-horse carts. So he threshes out his corn with great and unnecessary expense:

"The English farmer suffers a great loss, both in the cost and dispatch, in preparing his grain for the market, from the want of threshing machines; and this evil is not reduced by occasionally hiring a clumsy, ill-constructed machine, which is done even on farms of a considerable extent. In Scotland, and even in the north of Ireland now, almost every farm of 100^l., or even 80^l. rent, has its well constructed threshing machine, drawn by two horses, if water power is not at command, completed at an expense of 30^l. or 35^l., or, with winnowing-machine attached, a few pounds more. The English farmers must adopt this improvement; and they, or the labourers, need not fear that they will find every economy to the farmer produces increased employment and benefit to the workman."

By increased accommodation for keeping cattle, and the use of much of the straw—with linseed, let us add—for feeding them, instead of using it all for litter, the English farmer would be much benefited.

The writer thus adverts to the coming abrogation of the Corn Laws:

"I blame the English farmer for unnecessary expense or extravagance in his management, and the Scotch farmer for unwise economy in many things, or niggardliness, and to cure our mutual faults may yet take some time; but there is a spirit abroad now which will, I have no doubt, tend to the improvement of both countries. An Englishman, for odd work, might bring neatness and order to our Scotch farms; and the alarm among English landlords on account of the proposed change in the Corn Laws will force them to grant leases, and tend to a more economical management on the part of the English farmers. If a Warwickshire farmer can work his farm with half the number of horses he now employs (as I am convinced he could do), here would be a source from which he could draw security for a very considerable fall in the price of grain. If such were to be the result of the change in the Corn Laws, the possession of a farm for a lease of nineteen or twenty years would certainly lead to such safe means of realising profit. The great objection is the expense of purchasing new carts and ploughs, and the difficulty of getting workmen to go heartily into the change."

Now all this indicates anything but an intention, on the part of farmers, of giving up cultivation in despair at the prospect of foreign competition.

Again, a "salesman," writing to the Mark Lane Express upon the subject of complain's made by some farmers of the manner in which sales of stock are sometimes conducted in Smithfield says:

"I beg to recommend in future that the feeders of cattle and sheep will send their cattle or sheep by rail; for by sending a certain quantity, small in number, the feeder or owner of them is entitled to a ticket to come up to Smithfield and return again free of expense. By coming to Smithfield with their stock, they would then judge for themselves the salesmen who sell cattle that will bear selling twice on the same day, in the same market, at a profit; and they would then know the value of salesmen who are judges of the real value of the cattle they sell. If they did so, the best salesmen would find their value in Smithfield as well as the cattle; and it would not be as now is the case, that ignorance and assurance would be a sufficient capital to start a salesman—to please the easiest and most contented race of mankind who do not even think for themselves, but leave it to other people to think for them. Should Sir Robert Peel's measure be carried in the House of Lords, the feeders of cattle and sheep, to pay their rent, &c., must take out a licence to think, act, and speak for themselves, or they cannot keep pace with the times, and must make place for wiser and more thinking men."

Here the stimulating effects of Free Trade are distinctly recognised. That farmers are, as a body, quite equal to the emergency, we have always maintained; we wish we could say the same thing of the landlords. The great impediment to improved husbandry really lies in that quarter.

GAME VERSUS FARMING.

A correspondent of the Mark Lane Express observes that the game presents one of the greatest difficulties to a satisfactory arrangement of the terms between landlords and tenants; and we believe that when the Corn Laws are abolished, game and the Game Laws will be the chief obstacle to good and profitable farming:

"Of all the features involved in the question of tenant right, there are few, if any, more difficult of general adjustment than that of game-killing and game-preserving. Incomings, outgoings, repairs, courses of cropping, and so forth, ought all by comparison to be easy indeed of arrangement, for the very simple reason that they all pull one way, all increasing the profits, and, we may very naturally add, the pleasures of those concerned in properly determining them. The game, we repeat, has no moral recommendation of this kind, though it still holds an influence over the fortunes of the farmer that contains some good, and which consequently should cause us to hesitate before cutting it away altogether. The curse of Ireland, they tell us, is the absentee landlord; and once do away with or deny the land-owner's right to the game, and the curse of England might not improbably correspond with it."

The notion that game preserving is necessary to induce any landlord, whose presence is worth a rush to his neighbours, to reside in the country, is altogether preposterous; but that game does present a matter difficult of adjustment between landlord and tenant, is most true, and we fear it will continue to do so, until the force of public opinion shall have compelled the landowners to abandon game-preserving as a barbarous and demoralising practice.

The writer seems to imagine that there can be a moderate preservation of game, such as existed many years ago, when farming was in a rude state, and there was more wild land in the country than at present. He says:

"The English gentleman, on the one part, shall be content with finding game sufficient for himself and his friends, without supplying his poultry; and the English farmer, on the other, shall provide for him as sportsman without condemning him as landlord. With moderation in the supply and the demand, the tenant may farm without loss, and the owner sport without complaint.

"Over or modern game-preserving affects and injures the tenant farmer in two ways: it lowers his profit, and deadens his spirit. Even allowing that full compensation is given for the mischief occasioned—a fact granted, by the way, that we should think was not realised one time in twenty—even admitting this, the 'give and take' must surely pass in a most unsatisfactory manner."

We think this moderate supply is not what landowners who preserve game would care for. They want a large head of game for a battue; or they would rather give up the game to their tenants; and it is thus we hope that battue shooting, and the game preserving it induces, are evils which will ultimately cure themselves. At present game is an evil of great magnitude. If the squirearchy would preserve their influence with the farmers, they must give up the game:

"The great support of the gentlemen of this country has been the yeomanry, and never perhaps had they more need to depend on them than they have just at present. The benefit, however, cannot come all one way, but must rather be met and joined in step for step from either side. One of the first of these steps, we repeat, must be made with the fashion of preserving game; an amendment, we trust, that may once again cause a good landlord and a good sportsman to sound as much the same thing."

As farmers, we look forward to the day when game shall have ceased to exist in the cultivated districts.

BREAKING UP PREJUDICES AND PASTURES.

The most absurd prejudices are entertained by the landowners of England against breaking up pasture land. At least, one-half of our permanent grass lands would pay more to the tenant, as well as the landlord, when converted, if properly converted, into tillage. We are glad to see that farmers' clubs are discussing the subject:

"HARLESTON FARMERS' CLUB.—May 6th.—Subject, 'The breaking up of old pasture lands; its advantages and the best process.' Resolved:—That it is highly desirable to break up a large portion of the heavy land pastures in this district, thus adding to the sources of labour and increasing the produce of the soil. That thin paring and burning the flag is the best process of converting such lands into tillage, spreading at least two-thirds of the ashes on the new soil, and carrying the remainder, if desirable, on to the old tilled lands. The club not only considers that the first should be a root crop, for which the ashes will be an excellent preparation, but recommends that the succeeding crop or crops should be roots also. Aware of the prejudice which most landlords entertain against the breaking up of old pasture land, it is believed that making it compulsory to crop new lands with roots for the first two or three years (for the growth of which they are so well calculated) will tend to diminish their objections, and be at the same time advantageous to the tenants, as the manure from the extra root crops will be more beneficial to the old lands than the manure from the extra straw crops would have been, and the whole farm will be thus improved instead of impoverished. Draining and claying in the interim will prepare the land for the corn crops at the expiration of the limit, and by breaking up annually a portion only of the pasture intended to be converted, the whole will come regularly into course with the old ploughed lands. It is believed that permission thus given to break up inferior pasture land will encourage good farming amongst the tenantry, by increasing the fattening of cattle and reducing the stock of cows, which it is well known, as they are generally kept, impoverish the land as much as cattle and sheep improve it."

KISSING.—Dow closed a sermon on kissing with the following quaint advice:—"I want you, my young sinners, to kiss and get married; and then devote your time to morality and money-making. Then let your homes be well provided with such comforts and necessities as piety, pickles, pots and kettles, brushes, brooms, benevolence, bread, charity, cheese, faith, flour, affection, oider, sincerity, vinegar, virtue, wine and wisdom. Have these always on hand, and happiness will be with you. Do not drink anything intoxicating—eat moderately—go about business after breakfast—loungue a little after dinner, chat after tea, and kiss after quarrelling; then all the joy, the peace, and the bliss the earth can afford shall be yours, until the grave close over you, and your spirits are borne to a brighter and a happier world."

The Parliamentary Punch, Le Charivari, has been, by superior order, prohibited from being read in Vienna; all copies destined for that capital being seized in the frontier post-office.

REVIEW.

The Industrial History of Free Nations. By W. T. McCullagh, Esq. London, Chapman and Hall.

The obvious disproportion between the title of these volumes and their contents,—the limitation of the Industrial History of Free Nations to a comment on the connection between the political state and economic conditions of the Greeks and the Dutch,—has led many to stigmatise the work, very harshly and very unjustly. They say that in the ancient world the Greeks had neither the monopoly of industry nor of freedom. The Tyrians, the Carthaginians, the Campanians, and others, have left at least traces of their existence in commercial history; while in modern times, the municipalities of Catalonia and Languedoc, the free States of Lombardy, the federated cities of the Rhine, the Hanseatic League, to say nothing of Genoa, Florence, Venice, and other republics, had as glorious an industrial history as Holland, and an equal claim to rank among free nations. The source of these mistaken objections is the title, which certainly does not express the object of the book. The author includes nationality, independence, and self-government in his notion of freedom; and his main object appears to be to prove that the most inclusive spirit of commerce is not inconsistent with the most exclusive spirit of nationality. It was perhaps for this reason that the author limited his attention to the Greeks and the Dutch, because of all industrial races they were the most signally remarkable for nationality and localisation of government.

It is to the exclusive nationalities arising from the multitude and small size of the States into which the Hellenes were divided, after they had established their supremacy over the Pelasgi, that our author ascribes the growth of the industrial arts in Greece. The theory is eloquently stated, but sufficient care has not been taken to distinguish mere concomitancy from causation.

"As the lava of conquest began to cool, and to split into unconnected masses, between each rift the indigenous popular industry sprang up, and gradually sheathed many of the rugged forms into which the Hellenic flood had congealed with a Pelasgic verdure. Thus in Samos, where from an age exceedingly remote many descriptions of useful labour had been carried on, the ancient spirit of inventive toil revived. There, we are told, did Rhæus and Theodorus, in the seventh century B.C., perform the curious feat of moulding shapes in clay; which Debutades, an artificer of Sicily, having improved upon, found that he could render applicable in the way of ornaments for the roofs of houses, and even for embellishing the summits of temples. These figures were sometimes stained with various dyes—madder being particularly mentioned among the colouring stuffs employed. It was discovered also, by experiment, that certain kinds of clay were suitable to particular purposes; and the valuable art being once applied to ordinary uses, it gradually became to the Samiotes a permanent and extensive source of profitable occupation: vast quantities of earthenware being annually exported to distant countries, as well as to the other states of Greece. They had several rivals among their neighbours, more especially at Corinth, whence we are told that Eucheir and Eugrammus, two skilful potters, emigrated to Etruria, and so introduced the knowledge of their art among that tasteful people. In the isle of Cos, likewise, a description of porcelain, exceedingly thin and fair, was manufactured; exquisite vessels, shaped on the wheel, were fabricated at Erythra; and Sicily claimed the pre-eminence in works of alabaster. All these emulously laboured to maintain each their own reputation for some peculiar excellence of composition or design; and the proof that no monopolising discouragement ever fell upon their free and honourable competition is unconsciously afforded by Pliny, when he states that in his late time each of their productions was so highly valued, that it paid the merchants to import them into Italy, and even to more distant countries, where the same manufacture was carried on, but in somewhat less perfection. Can any one in the least degree conversant with the history of such inventions entertain a doubt that to this free competition of successive ages was attributable the perfection of skill and fertility of design which, even in the fragments that have escaped the wreck of classic civilisation, fill us with delight and admiration? Imbued with the traditional taste and skill on which success in any art, but more peculiarly in that of design, necessarily depends, the Samiotes applied themselves, moreover, to manufactures of gold and silver. In these they soon attained celebrity. Traffic with Asia, if it had not as yet rendered the precious metals very abundant, supplied at least sufficient materials to those who made vessels of ornament, or for sacred uses. Among the articles most highly prized in the palace of the Persian king was a cup wrought by the Samian Theodorus; and numerous shrines in Greece contained specimens of his highly valued workmanship."

The policy of the Corinthians receives its full meed of praise, but their connection between public festivals and commercial exchanges was no Greek invention. From the remotest ages, trade in the East was connected with religious observances, and the greatest national temple was the most frequented of national marts.

"Whatever the faults of their colonial system may have been, the domestic policy of the Corinthians was, in most things, pre-eminently wise. They seem to have very early understood their position, and how it might be turned to most advantage. Though the traffic overland between the Peloponnesians and the Continental Greeks could not at first have been very extensive, it was every year increasing, and all of it necessarily passed their gates. Of the importance of rendering this intercourse safe, they seem to have been fully conscious, as well as of the best means of encouraging it. Instead of exacting oppressive tolls, which from their weaker neighbours they were strong enough to do, and of which we should infallibly have heard abundant complaints, had they thought fit to attempt it, they sedulously strove to augment them by more legitimate expedients. They greatly extended, if indeed they did not actually found, one of these national festivals or games, the influence of which on the manners and habits of the Greeks it is, perhaps, impossible adequately to estimate. Of these there afterwards were many originating in various circumstances and commemorative of different events. All of them partook, more or less, of the character of religious celebrations—all presented splendid and ennobling spectacles to the popular sight—all tended, in a high degree, to the political fusion and nationalisation of the heterogeneous tribes who were thus periodically induced to come together; and, finally, by all of them were inestimable benefits conferred on every species of inventive industry. They were festivals; but they were likewise fairs. They were termed Public Games—panegyres—as expressing that they were the common opportunity for worship and relaxation to all who were privileged to take part in them; and even the fury of war was suspended during the period of their celebration, and the truce, which permitted enemies of yesterday to meet in safety at the Isthmus, was religiously observed. They afforded places of resort for business men—halls of exposition for ingenious men—theatres of trial for ambitious men.

"To attribute to the originators of any of these festive reunions political or commercial foresight sufficient to anticipate all the important uses which they served, would be, no doubt, an error. But it is one thing to plant a tree near your dwelling in the belief that it may one day help to shelter its isolation, and another to foresee that its destined growth will eventually overshadow your home with its luxuriant foliage, and eminently contribute to make it an object of envy and admiration. Those who explain great events or influences by postliminous prefaces full of deep designs which their authors (never) had in view, perplex and mar the best lessons history is capable of teaching; but we may err in the opposite extreme: in the life of nations one naturally leans to the belief that what appears to have been done systematically, was done with continuous, though perhaps infected purpose; and when we find early, though comparatively scanty, fruit upon the branches, it is hard to think that the planting and primary culture were without design.

"An idea certainly prevailed among the ancients that several of the most celebrated panegyres were deliberately instituted for the united purposes of festivity and trade. Iphitus is said to have 'founded the games and fair of Olympia' in a certain year which is named. The precise year may be doubtful, but there is no doubt whatever of the mingled character of these memorable festivals; and the national importance attached to them is sufficiently indicated by the well-known fact of their institution being recognised as the Grecian era, and their periodical recurrence as the universal measure of Grecian time."

Parts of Solon's legislation appear to us extravagantly overrated. We are surprised to find so enlightened a writer vindicating the exclusion of resident aliens from the rights of citizenship. The experiment of separating freedom of trade from the exercise of municipal and constitutional rights was long tried in Ireland; it was indeed the favourite policy of the Orange ascendancy. A similar course has been recommended in the United States by what is called the "Native American party," but we did not expect to find it advocated by a Free Trader. To us, the cry of "Athens for the Athenians," as of "Ireland for the Irish," does not appear one whit more rational than the cry of the "Oregon for the O'Regans."

"To this end was the fundamental principle laid down, that all men, of whatever race or clime, were free to trade at Athens; and so long as they obeyed the laws and complied with the easy stipulations annexed to their condition as 'resident aliens,' they might compete with the native-born citizens of the state in every branch of trade. The enlightened policy which thus boldly sought to attract and attach foreign enterprise and skill as an inexhaustible stimulant to native industry, appears no way inconsistent with the political reserve which guarded the public offices and municipal privileges from foreign intrusion. A broad distinction lay between the rights of citizenship and those of resident alienage. The freedom of trade demanded the one, a young and self-distrustful nationality insisted upon the other. The time came when civic rights also were made accessible to foreigners by easy forms of naturalisation; but at no period does the policy of encouraging the competition of foreign skill appear to have been doubted."

Hitherto we have found a little to censure as well as much to praise; but we can quote the account given of the Athenian Corn Laws with unqualified approbation:

"Popular tradition said, that during a season of scarcity Cærops had imported corn into Attica from Sicily and Lydia; and the practice was certainly a very ancient one. As population increased the supplies of foreign grain became every year more indispensable; and at no period of which written history has cognisance were the Athenian people independent of foreign corn.

"The physical circumstances of the country in fact rendered this inevitable. The total area of the Athenian territory, including the adjacent isles of Salamis and Helena, which early came to be considered integral portions of the realm, is estimated at about 874 square miles; and the average population in prosperous times may be taken at 500,000 persons of all ages and conditions. Of these about 200,000 dwelt within the walls, in the city properly so called, or in the suburban quarter, near Piræus and Munychia. For the annual wants of this population 3,000,000 measures of corn are calculated to have been requisite; and the produce of their own fields seldom exceeded, and often fell short of, two-thirds of this quantity. From one-third to one-half the daily bread of the Athenians, therefore, of necessity came from abroad.

"Nor was this the consequence of any disfavour shown to agriculture, or of its practical neglect. Solon took infinite pains to better the condition of the industrious classes among the landowners. He gave a legal remedy for injuries done by trespass; he secured a right of use to all who dwelt within a certain distance of fresh springs,—no trivial benefit in a land where supplies of water were exceedingly precarious; and his celebrated enactments for the relief of estates from incumbrances, though questioned on other grounds, possessed at least the merit of stimulating and securing the improvement of the soil. By every means he sought to increase agricultural produce, not with the vain hope of rendering the domestic supply of corn equivalent to the demand, but because he perceived in native agriculture a natural and certain source of national health and mercantile prosperity. Far from desiring or designing, by artificial means, to keep down the demands of population to the native supplies of food, or deprecating commercial progress when it outstripped the tortoise pace of agricultural improvement, Solon proposed a variety of measures, the avowed scope of which was inseparably connected with a more rapid increase of population. He believed that the more skilled, industrious, and intelligent hands the city contained the better. If the country could feed them all, well; if not, they could provide themselves with subsistence elsewhere. Egypt, Sicily, and the inexhaustible realms washed by the Euxine, would be only too glad to supply the domestic deficiency; and they were capable of doing so had the demand been a hundredfold greater.

"But the policy of Athens, Solon clearly saw, was to give every possible facility to the introduction of foreign corn. He went even farther, and rendered it compulsory on all ships that entered Piræus laden with corn to discharge two-thirds of their cargoes there—so great was his anxiety that the cost of the necessities of life should, under all possible contingencies, be kept down by an abundant supply. It is easy to condemn such a restriction on commerce;—at least it must be admitted to have been intended in favorem vite.

"Let us now glance briefly at some of the results of the system. Agriculture steadily improved. The estates, liberated from the palsying grasp of usurious mortgage, became better distributed in course of time, and small properties cultivated by their owners multiplied. The national importance of this was well understood by the statesman of after years. It rendered invasion more terrible: but it rendered its success hopeless.

"As for the apprehension that population would outstrip production, or production over-supply the wants of the population, we are happily spared, in Grecian history, all dissertations upon that score. If any fears of the kind ever arose, they were speedily dissipated. The impetus given by trade to population reacted upon industry by a constant augmentation of demand. Instead of trying to make corn grow upon light soil never intended by nature for the purpose, the science of the Greeks was applied to discovering to what better uses it might be turned. Nor was it unsuccessful. Improvements, which no wheat crop would repay, apparently became common. Every species of gardening, both for ornament and use, was popular. Planting of every kind was carefully attended to. Vineyards and olive-yards were formed wherever it was practicable. The richer lands still yielded wheat and barley remuneratively, nor does it appear that the total quantity grown at home diminished. But the general demand kept far ahead of the domestic supply; in Demosthenes' time, there was no state in Greece which consumed annually so much corn; for the great object of securing always a plentiful supply of provisions at a moderate price was gained. Periods of scarcity sometimes recurred, but they were rare, and almost without exception the result of long-protracted war,—a cause, we know, sufficient to create them in exclusively agricultural, as well as in commercial countries. There is no proof, however, that corn was ever so scarce at Athens as it was in Rome during Hannibal's occupation of Campania. So long as Athens was at peace the price of food could never rise exorbitantly; and, except on one or two occasions of utter and unforeseen discomfiture in war, her people knew nothing of the privations which are caused by inadequate supplies of food.

"With regard to exports, the policy of Solon was different from that pursued regarding importation in a few remarkable points; although, upon the whole, their practical weight is hardly appreciable when set against the general freedom of Athenian industry. In the paramount anxiety to secure cheap provisions and to render their price more equitable, Solon departed from his own principles of free sale; and, lest provisions should at any time become too dear, declared that their exportation might lawfully be restrained. It comes easy to us to call this a blunder; but let us remember that at least it was no selfish one—that its intention was humane—that in nine years out of ten it was wholly inoperative, inasmuch as the importations of corn were immense; and that when it did come into force, its operation could only have been to prevent the agriculturists from turning a period of general dearth to unusual and exorbitant gain."

We can also recommend the able account given of the commercial treaty between the Etrurians and the Carthaginians.

The nature of the contest and of the subsequent alliance between the aristocracy of property and the aristocracy of wealth is thus described:

"Wealth, which had been recognised as an alternative qualification for rule, admitting of infinite degrees, those who were upon a social level with their neighbours, and who yet felt short of the arbitrary wealth-mark of worth, naturally resented an exclusion which was much less venerable, and, perhaps, less intelligible at the time than that of the original geneocracy. It seemed a deeply-rooted instinct of the Greeks to resist the exclusiveness, whether social or political, that was based on the mere possession of money, far more inveterately than that of a dominant race. They had submitted unresistingly to the one for ages; but there is scarcely an instance where the distinctions of caste were broken down and a narrow pecuniary limit substituted instead, that discontent and further changes did not ensue. The exclusion that was absolute and insuperable was less mortifying to popular self-love than the barrier it had seen overpassed by a few, and which it was unwilling to confess beyond its own capacity to surmount. Where no hope is, there is no ambition—no social clambering—no political chagrin. It is the bitterness and envy of secret discontent that undermine proud systems and corrode the sanctions of authority, which may more safely rob a hundred than affront one: for mortified vanity is a more implacable rebel than the keenest sense of injury or hatred of oppression. Popular theories arise to give disaffection form and plan; but it is not the speculation of the wise or the plot of the ambitious rulers have most need to fear. Social heart-burnings are the true seeds of revolution; and the popular leader can do little more than watch their ripening.

"Meanwhile the increase of city-states, by stimulating invention and trade of every kind, had undermined exclusive power. The conquering race had hitherto enjoyed almost a monopoly of land, the only species of property once existing. Industry created various new descriptions of property, trade found ways of bartering them; and art, lending her inventive aid, devised means of transferring still more rapidly and easily the largest or the smallest portions of them. To the establishment of the towns, more particularly of the colonies, and to the regular intercourse kept up between them, has been attributed the introduction of coined money among the Greeks."

Here we must pause, at least for the present. But we cannot conclude without protesting against the spirit of exclusive nationality which it is the main purpose of these volumes to recommend. Greece teaches the very opposite lesson to that which our author has deduced from its history. The exclusive nationality of the republics may have acted as a stimulus when commerce and trade were in their infancy. But this very emulation had a tendency to degenerate, and did degenerate, into commercial jealousy and a grasping spirit of monopoly. What Greece wanted was centralisation, some point of unity where the separate interests of the petty states might be co-ordinated to the common good. Municipal Governments are bad imperial governments; they are always directed in a narrow and corporate spirit. We have only to look at the Parliamentary reports to be convinced that small corporations have been infinitely more corrupt than larger bodies. It is a mistake to suppose that a controlling central power interferes unnecessarily with local government; on the contrary, it gives strength to municipal institutions by preventing the evil of mutual interference. There is a sickly sentimentality of patriotism which serves as an excuse for selfish policy; we regret that it has appeared to receive some countenance from an author whom we respect, for the spirit which it inspires is not national, but provincial; the exclusiveness it cherishes is less productive of love than of hatred.

JOSEPH HUME AND COLONEL THOMPSON.

On the 19th May, 1829, Mr. Hume moved in the House of Commons that in lieu of the then sliding scale there should be imposed a fixed duty of 15s. per quarter on wheat, 12s. on barley, and 8s. on oats, and to diminish this duty 1s. per annum until it wholly ceased. He showed the great increase in employment which would arise if this alteration took place:

"In this country there are now one million of persons who, at the present moment, are ready to produce whatever might be sold to those who would purchase it; and yet this million of persons, consisting of men, women, and children—who, I may remark, by the by, are frequently brought too soon to labour, and kept too long on it—these men, women, and children are in want of employment; why should they not have it, when we could, at any hour of the day, send out the produce of their labour and exchange it for food."

He denied that the Corn Law was of any benefit to the farmers, for whose advantage it was professed to be passed:

"He denied that the landed interest was benefited by this restriction. Certainly, if there was an average crop, the landed interest, by its monopoly, might be able to raise the price of corn a few shillings; but if the crop were bad, the foreign corn would rush into the market, and destroy the farmer by the fluctuations which it would cause in price; and if, on the contrary, the country were blessed with a plentiful harvest, for two or three years successively, it would be an actual misfortune to the farmer, because for a time the price had been kept, by artificial means, above the average price of Europe. This being the case, he thought that he had a right to contend that the advantages of the farmer did not equal his losses. The fact was, that the interest of the farmer was perfectly distinct from that of the landlord (hear, hear)—and it was the landlord only that could be benefited, because it was his interest to keep up high rents (hear, hear). The only drawback upon the farmer would be in the event of his having a long lease; but he nevertheless held, that by the alteration proposed no material change in the price would take place; and that at present the agricultural interest was actually starving the population of the country without benefiting itself."

Mr. Huskisson and Lord Althorp were amongst the 154 members who opposed the motion, and there were only 12 who voted for it. Had it been carried there would have been a gradual and not very rapid diminution of the duty, but oats would have come in free in 1837, barley in 1841, and wheat in 1844. This ought to be recollected to the credit of Mr. Hume. At that time we recommended that the people should be instructed, and we pointed out a NEW TEACHER:

"Mr. V. Fitzgerald, in reply, accused Mr. Hume of having described the Corn Laws as nothing less than a tax imposed for the sake of the agricultural interest upon the industry of the country, and repelled the charge with as much indignation as he could have shown had he really believed it to be unfounded. The equality of prices since the passing of the last act was, with the Honourable President of the Board of Trade, abundant proof of the excellence of the present Corn Laws, and of the impolicy of any alteration; and as only twelve members were found with Mr. Hume, and one hundred and fifty-four with ministers, no hope can be entertained of any amelioration of this part of the starvation code during the present session. The continued distress of the manufacturing districts, for we anticipate no immediate improvement, and its certain extension to the agricultural districts will, however, force the subject upon the attention of Parliament next session. In the meantime let there be a wholesome 'agitation' throughout the country. Let every man who knows anything of the mischievous operation of those laws, endeavour to enlighten his neighbours, and let all who wish to be informed lay out sixpence on the 'Catechism of the Corn Laws,' which meets every fallacy which has been adduced in favour of their continuance."

In a short time subsequent to Mr. Hume's defeat, the TEACHER was effectively set to work in this vicinity. We printed 4000 copies of the "Catechism," and presented them to our readers; and no doubt to that distribution much of the superior knowledge of the Corn Law question which, from that period until now, has been manifested in this district, may be attributed. Ten years afterwards the League gave national utterance to Colonel Thompson's terse argument; and, under Cobden's leadership, we have now the prospect before us of a release from an oppression of a third of a century's duration.—Manchester Times.

The people of Coventry and the neighbourhood have been completely swindled out of their money by a party of vagabonds, who announced a concert under royal patronage, tickets 5s. each, and just before the commencement, bolted with the receipts.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Friday Evening, June 5, 1846.
THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND THE SILK WEAVERS.

Among the most amusing incidents in the last struggle of monopoly is the new-born zeal of the Duke of Richmond for the silk-weavers of Spital-fields. His affection for them is so excessive, that he devised their grievance before he proclaimed their wrong. No sooner was the Agricultural Trades' Union formed at 17, Old Bond-street, than its titled leaders, like the Jacobin Club of Paris, sought to fraternise with some of the lower Trades' Unions in the metropolis; and for this purpose they sought the acquaintance of the fag end of the Chartist in the classic regions of Bethnal-green. Sticks and strikes have not been of late very profitable; Chartist clubs have become niggardly to their secretaries, and suspicious of their treasurers; the potentates of Lubberland found that supplies began to flow in scantily from their dupes, but when streams of beer and clouds of tobacco were opened to their vision by the protectionists, they eagerly accepted a treat to be purchased on the easy terms of grumbling and discontent. The sun of aristocratic patronage shed its radiance on the Parliament of the pot-house, and produced a growth of speeches and petitions redolent of the soil in which they had their birth. The pewter and the pipe became powerful patrons of protection; muddy ale prepared the way for muddle-headed argument, and puffs of smoke appropriately typified the evanescent nature of the oratory they accompanied. Glorious was the alliance between dukes and dustmen, Buckingham and Billingsgate, Stanley and Shoreditch, Richmond and Rag Fair. Even the delicate Morning Post was infected with the new passion; Jenkins deserted the opera for the beer-house, and preferred the oratory of Sherrard to the notes of Grisi. Grave reports were given of these meetings; they were honoured with the same dignity of lead which had been previously reserved for aristocratic outpourings at agricultural dinners, and it must be confessed that they were equally worthy of such weighty reward. Mrs. Harris protested that the titled monopolists of Old Bond-street were recognised as the only true friends of manufacture by the unionists of the Cat and Bag-pipes; Mrs. Gamp declared that the voice of the operatives of England was heard only through the medium of delegates assembled at the Pig and Whistle. The farce was amusing, for it deceived nobody; not even the managers and the actors themselves. Speeches and signatures were no unpleasant accompaniments to smoking and drinking; and the union at Old Bond-street paid the tavern bills, in the hope of thus cheaply averting the payment of the more formidable bill presented by the nation.

It never was worth while to expose so shallow a delusion; the Chartists themselves only pretended to be dupes for the sake of the liquor, and they often whispered their surprise at the credulity of those who supplied the treat. They were well aware that no real sympathy existed for their condition in the halls of Stowe or Goodwood, and that nothing but the desperation of a bad and beaten cause could have led to a recognition of their existence at the Conservative Club. But they found it profitable to practise on the easy faith of the protectionists, whose belief was the slave of their desire, and they soon discovered that they might give any account they pleased of their demonstrations in the remote east, without the slightest chance of detection in the western halls of Bond Street. The agitation which only made itself heard by the clatter of the pint pots was represented to the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham as a popular movement second only to that which carried the Reform Bill; and the pipes of tobacco were said to inspire as much legislative wisdom as the smoking of the calumet was supposed to confer on an Indian Sachem. Surely such a development of power and intellect was cheaply purchased by a few ounces of short cut and a few gallons of porter.

Patent and palpable as such a delusion is, the Duke of Richmond entertains such extravagant notions of the gullibility of his order as to propose that the petitioners of the pot house should be heard by counsel at the bar of the House of Lords.

“What cannot craft effect in ducal minds,
When flattery soothes, and when ambition blinds?”

The Duke of Richmond, however, has as good a claim to be a manufacturing oracle as those whom he supports to pass themselves off as representatives of any manufacturing interest. Thirsty Chartists and turbulent Unionists do not represent the artisans of the metropolis, much less the industrial classes of England. Their modest demand to be heard by counsel savours strongly of the inspiration of old beer and Old Bond-street. It would be worth something to discover the original author of so bright a suggestion. The only difficulty in the matter is, to discover who would be the counsel's clients. But on this subject the duke himself could best enlighten us, for both counsel and clients would find that their existence dated from 17 Old Bond Street.

We know not on what day the Duke of Richmond will vouchsafe us the rich treat of fun which the presentation of this modest petition will afford. The Customs Bill has been read a second time without a division, which may be taken as proof that no further attempt will be made to offer active resistance to the ministerial measures; and it may be that his grace will abandon the cause of the petitioners, to prevent any inquiry into the origin of their petition.

GREAT HISTORICAL PICTURE OF THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE.—It was an admirable idea of Mr. Agnew, to project an historical picture of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League, including portraits, not only of the principal leaders, but of the less prominent members, whose indefatigable labours have contributed, in no small degree, to the success of the cause. As the League Council is too large a body to represent even a tithe of its members, we understand the plan is to be to select the more distinguished members of the Council resident in Manchester and the immediate neighbourhood, and then to invite each large town to nominate, as its great local champion in the cause of Free Trade, some individual whom his fellow-townsmen and Free Traders deem worthy of this distinction. Arrangements have been made with Mr. Herbert, R.A., the artist who painted the picture of the “Independents asserting Liberty of Conscience, in the Westminster Assembly of Divines,” to paint a large picture representing the Council of the League in conclave, in the Council Room of the League, Newall's Buildings. We understand that Mr. Herbert is now in Manchester, for the purpose of collecting materials for this picture. He will take drawings of the room, and during his stay here, we believe, will take several portraits of the more prominent members of the council resident in Manchester. Yesterday, Mr. Cobden gave him a sitting, and from what we know of the perseverance, energy, and enthusiasm of Mr. Herbert—himself a zealous Free Trader—we doubt not that he will produce a picture of great historical interest, including portraits of many of the men who have done so much to maintain the bloodless struggle, and to achieve the peaceful triumph of the principles of Free Trade in Great Britain, in this our nineteenth century.—Manchester Guardian.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, JUNE 1.—The weather, for the last three weeks, has been uninterruptedly brilliant, and nothing could be more promising than the present appearance of all the crops on the ground. The supply of English Wheat this morning is short, and a fair proportion of it was taken off early at last week's prices; but later in the day the inquiry flagged, and the market closed rather in favour of buyers; but quotations are not altered. Bonded Wheat is not inquired for. Barley, Beans, and Peas all in short supply, and the prices are unaltered. Oats also come sparingly to hand; and the trade is very dull, though we do not quote lower prices.

We are informed that the ladies of Leeds have procured 3000 signatures to a memorial addressed to her Majesty, praying for the enactment of vigorous laws with a view to the suppression of infamous houses, and the removal of a system of profligacy by which thousands of young females, are annually sacrificed.—Leeds Times.

Dr. Johnson compared plaintiff and defendant, in an action-at-law, to two men ducking their heads in a bucket, and daring each other to remain longest under water.
By the ancient laws of Hungary, a man convicted of bigamy was condemned to live with both wives in the same house; the crime was, in consequence, extremely rare.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

IF SIR ROBERT PEEL BE OUT-VOTED, WHAT THEN?

The atmosphere of the "political circles" is still thick and heavy with rumours, and "reports of rumours." The spirit of party intrigue and negotiation is still busy, with an activity that makes it as necessary as ever that the country be wakeful and alert. To this hour, there are men who talk darkly of "adjustment." And circumstances, to which we need not more particularly allude, give them a sort of encouragement. Questions are now before Parliament, in which it is highly probable that the Government may be placed in a minority; and it is very possible that this may happen before the Corn Bill passes the House of Lords. It is superfluous to add, that the mere surmise of Ministers being defeated, and of such defeat being followed by its usual consequence—a resignation and a crisis—tends to embolden the protectionists to delay, mutilate, and destroy the Free Trade measure.

It becomes, then, a question of capital importance—a question on which the Premier and the country must be ready with an instant and decisive answer—If Sir Robert Peel be outvoted, WHAT THEN?

We say, without a moment's hesitation or reserve, Sir Robert Peel will keep his faith with the Queen and the people. "When the time comes," he will be prepared with practical evidence of that "sincerity" of which he has so emphatically dared the proof. He will not run away, and leave his work broken off in the middle. There will be no resigning. SIR ROBERT PEEL STAYS IN OFFICE, COME WHAT WILL, UNTIL HIS CORN BILL SHALL HAVE BECOME THE LAW OF THE LAND. He stays in office, though he were "defeated," as they call it, every night in the week. Nothing can happen between now and the passing of the Corn Bill that can in the slightest degree impair his powers, or relax his responsibilities with reference to that Bill. Under any circumstances, or combination of circumstances that may arise, Sir Robert Peel is and remains the Free Trade Minister of the empire until Free Trade reach the statute-book. In any event, he will be true—true to the people, who, during five weary and anxious months, have given him so earnest a support, and so quiet and assured a confidence—true to the great public rights and interests with which he has so manfully identified himself—and true to his own name and fame as a public man. Come what will, Sir Robert Peel is Prime Minister of Great Britain until the bill for the total abolition of the bread tax receives the Royal assent. The "political circles" may set this down as a fixed thing.

A position, however, so novel and peculiar as that in which the Premier would be placed by a defeat in the House of Commons, pending the progress of the Corn Bill in the Lords, would need to be reinforced by the strongest, loudest, and most unequivocal expressions of the national will. Sir Robert Peel must not be left to fight our battle alone. The people will have their duty to do, as he has his. In the event which we have indicated as not unlikely to arise—not unlikely to arise before we next address the public—it will be incumbent on the country, without one hour's loss of time, to stir itself from one end to the other, and, by public meetings, and memorials from every town in the United Kingdom, to show him that there is intelligence enough, heart enough, and energy enough in the people of Great Britain, to stand by the Minister who stands by them.

We shall be very glad if it turns out to be needless. Very possibly, when we next address our readers, it may be to congratulate them that the bill is fairly passed, and that all is over. But there is no knowing. We only say, LET THE COUNTRY BE READY—ready to speak and act on the instant—ready so to speak and act as to put the "political circles" in prompt and full possession of the great fact, that SIR ROBERT PEEL IS AND REMAINS FIRST MINISTER OF THE CROWN UNTIL THE DAY AND HOUR OF HER MAJESTY'S ASSENT TO THE BILL FOR THE TOTAL REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.

MR. THOMAS DUNCOMBE AND THE LEAGUE.

"It was well known to the country, and it was well known to Ministers, that Free Trade in the abstract was not popular with the great operative classes in this country (elchers from the protection benches), who looked upon this contest between the agricultural and manufacturing districts with perfect apathy and indifference; they considered it a sort of 'pull baker, pull devil' conflict, though he must at the same time say that the baker was rather most of a favourite (laughter). Why were they so indifferent to what he believed would ultimately tend to their benefit? Because they had not believed, and they did not believe, that the great capitalists of this country really were favourable to them, or took a deep interest in their welfare (hear)."—Mr. Thomas Duncombe's Speech, June 5th.

"Defend us from our friends," says the old proverb, and well may the operatives of this country utter the sentiment when they read the above. We are on the very eve of the abolition of the greatest legislative wrong ever inflicted by the powerful few upon the suffering millions. A long, arduous, and glorious struggle is about to be crowned with victory. A proud triumph awaits the peaceful victors, and Mr. Duncombe asserts that the working class shall have no part in the honour! He says the operatives have been opposed to their own industrial emancipation—that they have looked on with indifference, whilst others have fought and paid for liberty to them to eat and live. Is this true? If so, what willing self-abased slaves must they be! Is this so? Then what amount of wrong and injustice may not, with impunity, be inflicted upon the operatives of this country? If it be true that the middle class has, alone, and without the aid of the operatives, wrested the bread tax from a dominant party in the state, then what need has that class to care for the co-operation of the operatives in any future struggle? If it were true, is it wise in Mr. Duncombe thus to stamp the working class with the brand of slavery, and to give the middle class the sceptre of absolute power? But it is not true. We know not how often we may yet have to intrude upon our readers, for our work is nearly done; but we will not let this opportunity pass of putting on record our protest against the libel which the above extract contains against the working-men of this country, who have not been opposed as a class to the Free Trade movement. All the clear-headed and sound-hearted portion of the operatives have been favourable to our cause. They have signed our petitions, and formed the great proportion of our public meetings. Mr. Cobden has often said, that, in his open air meetings, held three years ago in almost every county, he always reckoned upon the hand of every man in a fustian jacket or round-frock being held up in his favour.

True, the League has, from its very birth, been bitterly opposed by a fanatical party of Chartists, headed by Mr. Fergus O'Connor out of doors, and represented, as they tell us, by Mr. Duncombe in Parliament. The organ of this party, the Northern Star, has fought the battle of the bread taxers more zealously than the Morning Post itself. Truly did Mr. Bright, with manly straightforwardness, observe that:

"He would tell the hon. member this, that however oppressive to the operatives the Corn Laws might have been, they would never have been repealed either by him (Mr. T. Duncombe) or his associates out of the house, who had been all of them the greatest enemies of repeal. He told the hon. member that those parties with whom he was found at public meetings out of doors had been the greatest enemies of the repeal of the Corn Laws (cries of 'Name'). Let the hon. member read the public reports of those meetings, and they would find out the names. He (Mr. Bright) stated the fact, and he meant to maintain it. He would only add, that the hon. member did not represent the opinions of the working classes when he said that they were apathetic on this question, and though he might have succeeded in inflaming the bad passions of the working classes within his sphere, he (Mr. Bright) would warn him not to call himself the representative in that house of the working classes in Lancashire and Yorkshire."

In answer to the cries of "Name," we will mention a few only of the most prominent and active of these tools of despotism:—O'Connor, Leach, McDowall, Pitkeithly, Nightingale, O'Brien, Marsden, Bairstow, Cooper, Harney—some of whom, to our knowledge, and as we are ready to prove, were well paid for their opposition to the Free Traders. Nor would it be difficult to show where the money came from. Let one fact suffice. In June, 1841, on the occasion of a great open air Anti-Corn-Law meeting being held in Stevenson-square, Manchester (in answer to the taunt of the Duke of Richmond that no public meeting could be held against the Corn Law), the monopolists made a great effort to upset the meeting. Every Chartist leader of any notoriety was brought to Manchester, from places as distant as Leicester and Sunderland. The most prominent leader and fugleman of the opposition was Mr. Charles Wilkins: Doctor Sleight and he moving and seconding the amendment to the Free Trade resolution. On that very morning Mr. Wilkins cashed a cheque for 150*l.*, drawn by the Duke of Buckingham, at Jones and Loyd's bank. At that meeting of ten thousand working men, the Chartists were driven off the ground. Blows being exchanged, and blood spilt in the fray, the aim of the Chartist party to create confusion was so far gained; and the moral effect of the demonstration was effectually marred. For more than three years, in the beginning of our agitation, every public meeting called by the Free Traders was subjected to outrages of a similar kind by the followers of O'Connor; and, yet, Mr. Duncombe indulges in the following taunt in his reply to Mr. Bright:

"He had had invitations to attend League meetings, but he had always set his face against what were called 'ticket meetings' (hear, hear). He had invariably stated that he would attend any meeting in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws, provided it was an open and public meeting; but he had always declined to assist in any of those repeated attempts at genteel comedy on the boards of Covent-garden, or to join in tumbling with certain gentlemen at Sadler's Wells (cheers from the protection benches). An attempt was accordingly made by the League in Finsbury to call him (Mr. Duncombe) to account for not going and tumbling with them at Sadler's Wells; but he explained his reason satisfactorily. He had no objection to meet the working classes on any public occasion, but those gentlemen of the League would not submit to public opinion ('hear, hear,' from the protectionist benches)."

Nobody knows better than Mr. Duncombe that, at the time to which he alludes, his friend Mr. O'Connor had issued his fiat that every Anti-Corn-Law meeting should be "upset," and that there was then a gang of his fanatical followers always ready, at all hazards, to do his bidding. Mr. Duncombe knows that an open air Free Trade meeting then would have begun with an amendment for the Charter, to be followed with a row, and ended probably in a fight, which would have been very pleasing to the monopolists, but not so gratifying to the League. The Free Traders took refuge in tea-parties and ticket meetings from the violence and tyranny of the Chartists. Influential men, ladies, and dissenting ministers frequented those meetings, and gave to them a moral force which compensated for the want of numbers. And we now thank heaven that it was so! Our labours have been somewhat prolonged, but the triumph of truth has been more complete. The fortitude of the men who had charge of that truth has been tested, and proved not unworthy of the cause in which they were engaged. Above all, we are thankful for the obstacles thrown in the way of multitudinous demonstrations, because it compelled us to rely solely upon appeals to the reason and feelings of our countrymen, and to discard for ever all dependence upon even the semblance of physical force. We do not grudge the time and labour which it has required to win the minds and consciences of the people to our cause. The process has been slow, but sure. Had we carried the question of Free Trade by a coup de main in 1839, we should have wanted that guarantee which we now possess for the permanent triumph of our principles.

We have been tempted to refer to our past trials and exertions, solely with a view to the vindication of the great body of intelligent working men from the injurious stigma cast upon them by the member for Finsbury. We have never confounded the few Chartist leaders, and their noisy and fanatical followers, with the operatives as a class. In the days of their greatest strength, we knew that the partisans of O'Connor were a contemptible faction; and, from the moment that they hoisted the colours of the monopolists, we predicted that every working man of honour and intelligence would abandon their ranks. And so it has since proved, in the utter disruption of their party, and the infamy which clings to the character of its leaders. But whilst we thus put on record our honest vindication of the operatives as a body, let us add a word of advice. They must learn to repudiate the men who flatter only to betray them; and to suspect the motives of those who insult them with fulsome praise, and array them against the rest of society. We tell the working class that they are powerless to effect any legislative or constitutional changes in opposition to the will of the middle class. We tell them that the electors of this kingdom can carry every just and necessary reform, in spite of any opposition which interested or dishonest men may array against them. The constituencies can and will repeal the Corn Law. It is possible that Free Trade may yet be referred to the test of a general election. It is quite possible that the protectionist cheers which greeted Mr. Duncombe in the house, and were re-echoed in the monopolist press, when he asserted that the working men are opposed to the repeal of the Corn Law, may encourage the Lords to mutilate the Government Bill and compel a dissolution. We know not what the object of the member for Finsbury was in making the declaration, but it was calculated to embolden the flagging courage of the peers, and produce an adverse vote. If so, let the toiling millions be prepared, by cheering on the electors to their willing duty at the hustings, to prove that they are not the willing slaves described by Mr. Duncombe, but that they, like their fathers in 1815, are conscious of the foul injustice inflicted upon them and their families by the Corn Law, and no less determined now than then to aid in the emancipation of their own honest industry.

Observe, too, the false and humiliating position in which this insulting theory of Mr. Duncombe's places the working classes, as a political power in the country. He makes them out to be absolute cyphers—as insignificant as they are stupid. They have none of the honour of the repeal of the Corn Law. It is not, in any respect, or to any extent, their doing. They owe it all to other people. They got their rights, by way of boon, from Sir Robert Peel and the aristocracy. One of the greatest questions of the age—a working man's question, too—has been settled without the working men. In one of the grandest legislative revolutions of modern history, the working men of England have had no part—they have only looked on, folded their hands, and sulked. The whole thing has been done, not by them, but for them. The middle classes, the upper classes, the manufacturers, the merchants, the squires, the farmers, the shopkeepers, the dukes—all have had their opinion and their say, one way or the other—all have made themselves heard, seen, and felt—all have done something to forward, or to retard, this mighty national act—only not the working men. They have neither helped nor hindered. Their moral, social, and political influence has been nil. And this from a man who puts himself forward as the champion of the working men's right and title to govern the empire! It must be confessed that Mr. Duncombe well earned his "cheers from the protection benches," and amply merited the gratifying and creditable distinction of being "honourably friended" by Lord George Bentinck.

THE TEN HOURS' AGITATORS AND THE LEAGUE.

Having in the previous article balanced accounts with Mr. Thomas Duncombe and his Chartist allies, we may as well proceed to settle a somewhat similar score with the "short time" party. In the course of the late discussion on the Ten Hours' Bill, it was stated by Mr. Cobden, that the men who agitated in favour of that measure had always been opposed to Free Trade, and had frequently interrupted the League meetings. The delegates who were in London, watching the proceedings in Parliament, most of whom are new names to us, assuming that the charge was levelled exclusively at them, held a meeting, and protested that they had not interfered with the meetings of the Free Traders. One of the speakers declared with great naïveté, unconscious of the two-edged argument he was using, that he had incurred great obloquy with his friends for having supported the Free Trade agitation. They passed a resolution, at the same time, censuring the conduct of Mr. Cobden, and declaring that he had promised them that if they would support the Free Trade agitation, he would agitate for a Ten Hours' Bill. The censure must be borne; the latter assertion is of course a pure fiction, as everybody who knows how resolutely Mr. Cobden has repudiated, as a fundamental principle of the League, every kind of alliance, compact, or understanding, with any other association, must readily believe. We have his authority for saying, if a more specific denial be necessary, that there is not a shadow of foundation for the statement. The delegates were equally at fault when they took to themselves a charge which must be borne by other shoulders besides theirs, and extended over a period long antecedent to the present victorious era of the League.

Mr. Cobden's argument was simply this: that the advocates of the Ten Hours' Bill acted upon a principle totally at variance with the views of the Free Traders; that they did not look to extended markets for increasing the demand for labour and raising wages, or to the removal of monopolies for diminishing the cost of the necessaries of life; that they seemed to believe that Parliament had the power to maintain wages and profits by merely restricting the amount of production; that acting upon this principle, the leading advocates of the Ten Hours' Bill had always, honestly as he believed, opposed Free Trade, and the operatives engaged in that agitation had opposed and interrupted the League meetings. Now the simple question between the delegates and ourselves is, Can they refute one of these statements? Who and what was the first great apostle of the Ten Hours' question? Why, Mr. Sadler, the consistent and strenuous upholder of the Corn Law, and every other restriction on trade. To a famous speech of his, at Whitby, in 1829, in favour of commercial monopolies, we are indebted for the first production in defence of Free Trade by the author of the Catechism on the Corn Laws. Had it not been for Michael Thomas Sadler's advocacy of "protection," the world might never have been edified and charmed by the pen of Perronet Thompson. Mr. Sadler's disciple and successor is Mr. Oastler, the self-styled "factory king." We are spared the trouble of going back to his early speeches, or the "Fleet Papers," for his opinions, for within the last month he has published a stout defence of the Corn Laws in the columns of the Morning Post. Lord Ashley supported the Corn Laws until the League, in spite of his hostile votes, had decreed their "destiny;" and the most ardent champions of the Ten Hours' Bill in the present House of Commons are, Mr. Banks, Mr. Colquhoun, Mr. Ferrand, Lord George Bentinck, and the rest of the "gentlemen below the gangway." Amongst the manufacturing capitalists, we do not know one advocate of the Ten Hours' Bill who has not been a supporter of the Corn Law. Mr. Fielden, it is true, has voted for Free Trade, but in public and private he has spoken against it.

Turn we now to the operatives engaged in the agitation. We don't mean the delegates during the last debate, mostly new men, who found a majority of Free Traders in the house. But what has been the course pursued by the party during the long struggle of the League? Almost to a man, the leaders have laboured to perpetuate the Corn Law. At the general election in 1841, they ranged themselves under the banners of the monopolists; and in Yorkshire they contributed their quota to the defeat of Lords Morpeth and Milton. In almost every manufacturing town of Yorkshire and Lancashire they were the dissentients at the Free Trade meetings; and Bradford, Huddersfield, and other places can bear testimony to the violence with which their opposition was characterised. Everybody remembers the celebrated interview between the short-time delegates and the newly-installed Ministers in 1841, when a long address, penned we believe by Mr. Oastler, was presented to the members of the then protectionist Government, the main object of which appeared to be to disparage the principles of Free Trade. We have forbore to mention names. The individuals to whom we refer may have acted from honest motives. Mr. Cobden says he believes them to have been in earnest; and we have no proof, as in the case of certain Chartist leaders, that they were bribed by the monopolists. Besides, we were willing to "let bygones be bygones;" and have only been driven to recur, in this and the preceding article, to the proceedings of either Chartists, or Ten Hours' advocates, by the indiscreet attacks made by Mr. Thomas Duncombe and the delegates upon the League and its leaders.

If, after our labours are ended, an impartial writer should give a history of the League, he will do us the justice to applaud our rigid devotion to the one object in view, to the exclusion of every extraneous topic. We have avoided every controversy but our own—even those questions, which, partaking of an economical character, might have been without much violence brought within the range of our discussions. We have carefully eschewed all allusions to strikes, turn-outs, and short-time bills. If it be true, as Mr. Thomas Duncombe is fond of alleging that we represent only the manufacturing capitalists, they have not at all events instructed us to use our pages in opposition to the pretensions of the operatives. In this hour of our strength, when every word we utter is invested with a moral weight, derived from long, arduous, and consistent efforts in a great and just cause, we shall preserve the same strict neutrality upon the agitation for the Ten Hours' Bill. We offer no opinion upon the agitation, but concede to others the right which we claim for ourselves, to unite together for the promotion of any legal object. We cannot, however, shut our eyes to the fact—the protectionist papers and the speeches of the protectionists will not permit us—that we, the Free Traders, are accused of being the advocates of twelve hours of work, while the supporters of the Corn Law assume to be the friends of ten hours. We maintain, on the contrary, that the Free Traders are the real promoters of short hours of toil.

Why do men work at all? Simply to possess the necessities and comforts of life. What is "protection?" A law to raise the price of bread, sugar, coffee, butter, cheese, &c. Again, men work for money wages. Wide markets increase the demand for labour, and raise money wages. But what is "protection?" Restricted markets. Here is "protection" at work with a double-thonged whip, to compel the operative to work longer hours than necessary,—first, to make up for diminished money wages, caused by the restricted demand for his labour; and secondly, to pay the increased price for his bread, sugar, &c. Is there any fallacy in our argument? We protest, before heaven, we believe it to be as demonstrably true as that two and two make four. And, so believing, we, as Free Traders, say to "the gentlemen below the gangway," remove your burden of "protection," and let us see whether the working man, when free to choose, will work longer hours than are necessary to procure him those necessities and comforts which he deems essential to his healthful existence. But, instead of this, what is the proposition of the "protectionists?" Why, to add another thong to the whip, by cutting off two hours a day of the working man's labour, or one-sixth of his earnings. We protest that we cannot, with all our charity, regard the men as wholly rational, if sincere, who propound such a scheme. There is no other way of dealing with it but by borrowing a phrase from a letter addressed by Colonel Thompson to the working class upon the subject: "Feel every man," says he, "for his tail, who, after shutting up your markets, and raising the price of your provisions, offers you as a compensation a Ten Hours' Bill."

The time will come, and it will not be long in coming, when the operatives will regard the Free Traders as the only pioneers in the path which is to conduct them to lighter hours of labour.

THE STABLE SCHOOL OF STATESMANSHIP.

As a high authority has warned us against the folly of expecting to gather "grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles," we scarcely feel entitled to complain of the sporting lord's violations of Parliamentary decency. Tattersall's is not generally accounted a good school of the proprieties; the morals and manners of the turf have never stood high in public estimation; and men whose ideas, tastes, and whole cast of thought and sentiment, have been formed by familiar association with horse-jockies will, naturally enough, give indications of a thoroughly stable mind. We have no right to wonder that Lord George Bentinck's Parliamentary exhibitions evince a mean, malignant, and vulgar nature. We cannot affect to be surprised that the hero of Newmarket and Epsom addresses the House of Commons in "language seldom heard in that house—language which it would be better for the character of that house, should not be heard—language which is better suited to some other arena." Such flowers of rhetoric as "baseness and dishonesty," "treachery," "treason," "guilt," "janissaries," "renegades," and "kicking out her Majesty's Ministers," come with a sort of propriety from a person who has put himself through that very peculiar description of intellectual and moral training which has formed this man's mind and manners.

What we do wonder at is, that in an assembly which is generally understood to be composed of gentlemen, this kind of language should find admirers. It is not Lord George Bentinck's speech of Monday night that surprises us, but the "cheers," the "loud cheers," the "immense cheering," the "vociferous cheering," the "vehement cheering," and the "most vehement cheering, that lasted for several minutes," with which, according to the newspaper reporters, this piece of coarse and stupid raving was received by that not very inconsiderable section of the "gentlemen of England," known to the world as "protectionists." We beg to tell those who made themselves parties to this most pitiful and disgraceful exhibition, that the unmannerly trash which they are spiteful enough, or silly enough, to admire, can hurt none but those who utter it, those who approve and encourage it, and those who show a disposition to profit by it. If any party in the House of Commons feel itself aggrieved by anything in Sir Robert Peel's conduct, it would be but common prudence to find some other way of showing it. Breaches of the decencies and proprieties of legislative discussion only damage those who commit them. The protectionists may rest assured that Sir Robert Peel loses nothing in the respect and regard of the country by being made the victim of outrages that revolt the public sense of decorum. The great inquest of public opinion will be slow to entertain an indictment which has all the appearance of having been framed by a maniac.

If the protectionists are really of opinion that Sir Robert Peel has "lost the confidence of every honest man, in the house and out of it," there is a simple way of testing and verifying that opinion. Nothing is easier than to move a vote of "want of confidence" in Sir Robert Peel. Until that be done, all the rest is mere brawling, which produces no other impression on the public mind than disgust and contempt, coupled with a lively gratitude to the Minister who has boldly delivered himself and us from the dominance of such a faction. In the meanwhile, nobody cares about what is said or done by men who, as they are without responsibility, are beneath criticism. Of course, neither Sir Robert Peel, nor Sir James Graham, nor any other man occupying the position of a Cabinet Minister, will condescend to meet attacks so utterly devoid of every ingredient of moral weight and dignity. It might not, however, be amiss were there some among Sir Robert Peel's "base and renegade" supporters who would give themselves the trouble to mark the contempt in which they hold men imbecile enough to impute "baseness" to those who have become "renegades" from error to truth, and from wrong to right.

THE 20TH JULY.—The advocates of political and commercial progression are requested to notice, that to be enabled to exercise the elective franchise at the next election, the Reform Act requires the payment of the assessed taxes and the poor rates on or before the 20th July. This compliance with the Act of Parliament is of paramount importance, it being within the range of possibility that an attempt may be made to restore commercial restriction, and to resuscitate the Corn Laws.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.—We understand that the amendment to the ministerial sugar resolutions which Lord John Russell submitted to his friends on Saturday, proposes that the distinction between free-grown and slave-grown sugar shall forthwith cease, and that the protecting duty imposed on foreign sugar shall be gradually diminished, so that in five years all sugars shall be admitted on equal terms.

PROTECTIONIST REVENGE.—On Wednesday last, the annual meeting of the Bedford Level was held at the Shire Hall, Ely, under the presidency of the Earl of Hardwicke. After the usual routine business had been transacted, the meeting proceeded to elect the officers of the corporation for the ensuing year; and the protectionist party attempted to oppose the re-election of the Duke of Bedford as governor, but without success, as it was carried by a majority of 24 to 12. They were, however, subsequently more successful in their opposition to Earl Fitzwilliam, who was rejected as a conservator by a majority of 22 to 14. It was publicly declared by Lord Hardwicke and others, that the recent votes of the Duke of Bedford and Earl Fitzwilliam on the second reading of the Corn Bill were the sole cause of the invidious course pursued towards them.

THE PROTECTIONISTS.—We understand that there was a strong muster of peers, members of Parliament, and others of the protectionist party, at their rooms in Bond-street on Tuesday morning, when it was fully resolved to oppose to the uttermost the Corn Law Abrogation in the Lords' Committee; and hence, we presume, the alteration in the notice of the Duke of Buckingham, which, on Monday last, was to move in committee to omit in the first clause the words "until January 1, 1849," the effect of which would have been, if carried, to perpetuate the reduced sliding scale; whereas the noble duke now proposes to omit all the words in the first clause, after the words, "in the schedule to this act annexed," which, we need hardly say, would have the effect of doing away with the measure altogether.

CORN LAW REPEAL.—On Monday the upper portions of the town were thickly studded with flags, expressive of the approbation of the inhabitants on the second reading of the Corn Law Repeal Bill in the House of Lords. It was intended to have perambulated the town in the evening with music and banners, but that idea was ultimately abandoned for another, which contemplates a demonstration at the final settlement of the measure more worthy of the important change which it is intended to commemorate. We hear that delegates from the more extensive workshops and different manufacturing establishments are already making arrangements for the contemplated manifestation—Perth Advertiser.

Cucumbers are now imported in considerable numbers from Holland.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Twenty-first Week, ending Saturday, June 13.

Although the legislative proceedings of the past week have been of some importance, they had no connection with our own great question until Thursday night, when the debate on the Corn Bill was revived in the House of Lords. It is true, that the Poor Removal Bill has been attempted to be made one having the appearance of punishing the manufacturing districts for the crime of having given employment to the superfluous and starving portion of the rural population, whom neither landlords nor Corn Laws could supply with sufficient work or food. But we cannot take any part in a discussion turning on whether or not a question of humanity and social policy is to be degraded into a party one, or rather into one of the most miserable faction. For what can be more miserable than the spirit displayed by Mr. Banks and Mr. Thomas Duncombe in this matter concerning the removal of the poor?

The Poor Removal Bill, it will be recollected, is one of Sir Robert Peel's subsidiary measures. It gives to individuals who have had an industrial residence of five years, in a town the option of obtaining relief (when they become chargeable) in the locality where they reside, instead of compelling them to return to their own parish, wherever that may be, in which they have a claim of settlement. Mr. Evelyn Denison moved and carried an instruction that the bill shall provide for a change from parochial to union settlements. Sir James Graham supported the proposition, remarking that there were 14,500 parishes, and only 620 unions, so that the change from parochial to union settlements would be a great benefit to the working man, by enlarging the sphere for his labour. The bill is accordingly to be altered, in order to effect this object.

On Saturday there was a meeting of the friends and supporters of Lord John Russell, at his house, at which a resolution was agreed to, of opposition to the Irish Coercion Bill. The bill came on for second reading on Monday night, when an amendment was moved for the purpose of throwing it out. The debate went on, with very little of novelty, unless divers unsuccessful attempts to "count out" be so considered. Late in the evening, Lord George Bentinck rose. For violence and vulgar brutality we never heard his speech surpassed—not even by Ferrand, in his wildest "devil-dust" days. But his violence and his vulgarity were surpassed by his unblushing avowals. A short time ago, Lord George Bentinck declared that his principles of protection did not lead him to protect the "midnight murderer and the broad-day assassin," and charged those who delayed the measure as being responsible for all the blood that might be shed in Ireland. To gratify the party, and satisfy his own notions of propriety, Sir Robert Peel proceeded with the first reading of the Coercion Bill, to the chagrin of the Free Traders, who saw the Corn and Customs Bills delayed, and possibly imperilled. Now comes this lord, with the odour of the stables, the manners of the turf, and the language of the ring, accuses Sir Robert Peel of delay, and says he will join with anybody, on any question, in order to "kick out" the bill and Ministers together.

We are glad that the Whig party feel the awkwardness of defeating Sir Robert Peel by the aid of Lord George Bentinck and his kind. The division on the Coercion Bill, on which it is expected that Ministers will be placed in a minority, has been postponed, in order to allow the Corn Bill to be somewhat more advanced in the House of Lords. Then, we suppose, Sir Robert Peel will be defeated, as he and the Duke of Wellington were defeated at the close of 1830, by a combination of furious Tories with calculating Liberals.

Times, however, are now changed. Then, the Wellington-Peel administration was ousted for resistance to the demands of the people; and the leaders of the Whig party stood high in the confidence of the country, and came into office in order to develop a great scheme of policy. Now, the crime of Sir Robert Peel is yielding to popular necessity, and popular will; and it is generally believed that the Whigs have no policy to develop.

In the House of Lords, on Thursday, there was an amusing discussion on the presentation of a petition from Cheshire, in the course of which the Marquis of Londonderry was accused of having permitted Mr. Bright to be returned as Member for Durham. The noble marquis denied the charge, but declared that at Durham Mr. Bright had made the very best speech ever heard in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws. "But," he added, "I am not responsible for that!"

The stage at which the Corn Bill stood was that of going into committee.

Upon this motion being made, the Earl of STANHOPE rose to oppose it, and to move that the bill be committed that day six months. He regarded this measure as more important than the Reform Bill, considering the magnitude of the interests involved in it, and the serious consequences which would inevitably result from it. The noble earl maintained that no proposition was ever submitted to the legislature which had been so feebly and miserably defended, and he proceeded to show the false assumptions upon which it was in his opinion founded, especially the pretence of an imminent danger of famine in Ireland, which could be averted by no other means. After noticing the inconsistency of Lord Ripon's conduct upon the question, the noble earl passed to that of Sir Robert Peel, taking for the text of his commentary the eulogy bestowed upon him by Lord Brougham; and asked what man, after past experience, could repose any confidence in the political integrity of Sir Robert Peel? Yet they were expected—upon his authority—upon the ipse disgrace of one of the rashest Ministers that ever governed a country—to reverse a system which had subsisted for centuries, and under which this country had acquired unparalleled prosperity. Why was this principle of Free Trade applied to corn alone at the end of three years; why was it not applied generally to all manufactures? Let us have either the fullest protection for every branch of British industry, or no protection at all (hear, hear, hear). This bill might bring ruin upon millions, especially those who had no other resource but their industry; and yet those who introduced it had not even formed to themselves any definite ideas upon two of the most important elements of the question—first, what was a remunerating price to the British grower; secondly, the probable price of foreign corn. After exposing the fallacy lurking in the promise of a “large loaf” held out by the advocates of a measure, the avowed object of which was to reduce the wages of the labourer, and insisting upon the heavy losses which this experiment would inflict upon the owners and occupiers of land, Lord Stanhope showed that rent was no element in the question, for if all rent were abolished, the price of the four pound loaf would not be diminished $\frac{1}{3}$ d. The argument of the Prime Minister, that, because we had a large amount of debt and a high taxation, commodities should be cheap, was irrational, absurd, and contradicted by the experience of all ages, which showed that where wages, and profits, and prices were low, the most oppressive and despotic monarch could not raise a large amount of taxation. His lordship contended that the tenant farmers, whom he vindicated from the imputation of deficiency of skill, would be unable to continue upon their farms if this bill passed, and must be driven into destitution and despair; and he reminded their lordships of the popular commotions of 1830 and 1842. If this measure were really inevitable, it had become so from the base, sordid, and pusillanimous conduct of those who had supported a measure which in their conscience they condemned; and the effect of this unwise concession would be to render the conflict between the agriculturists and the manufacturers fiercer than ever, for to talk of this being the end of agitation was absurd; it was the commencement of a long train of evils. It had been suggested that their lordships must pass this bill, because it had been proposed by the Ministers, and agreed to by the House of Commons. Such an unconstitutional doctrine had never before been proclaimed in that House; if it were true, the independence of that house was at an end; its legislative functions were useless, nay, injurious; and there would be a general cry throughout the country for its abolition. It was the duty of their lordships to reject this bill if they wished to preserve their political existence, and unless they desired to dismember the British empire, disorganize the whole country, and surrender all its institutions to immediate destruction.

The Earl of ESSEX, with some warmth, complained of the imputation of “base and sordid motives” to those who had supported this measure, which called forth a short explanation from Lord STANHOPE.

The Earl of RADNOR said that he hoped to produce such arguments as would induce the house to pass this bill without alteration. As to the apprehensions of the noble earl, he did not lay such stress upon them as he would have done if he had not heard the noble earl in former years make similar prophecies, which had not been fulfilled. For himself he had nothing to explain, for he had uniformly supported similar measures; but he could find other motives than baseness and servility for those who had altered their opinions. Neither was it his duty to say anything in support of Sir R. Peel, who had friends enough in that house to defend him; but the insinuations against the right hon. baronet were unfounded, for what motive could he have had in proposing this measure, and making great sacrifices for it, except the most honourable (hear, hear)? But when a charge was made against an hon. friend of his (Mr. Bright) for what he might have said at Covent Garden, he thought that, with the provocation given, persons might have used expressions which could not in cooler moments be justified. As an example of the abuse used against his friends, he might refer to a report in the Times of a meeting in Dorsetshire, in which it was said that Mr. Cobden “was properly called the Devil, for he was the father of lies.” And the expression of his hon. friend as to putting an end to the domination of the hereditary peerage, and overwhelming in it the dust, alluded only to the domination with which the aristocracy was standing up for the Corn Law, which he (the Earl of Radnor) maintained was most unjust. But then it was said that agitation would continue; he must say this was not the first time agitation had prevailed; it had prevailed on other occasions, but none would prevail unless the good sense of the people went along with the object. That was the case with respect to Catholic Emancipation, and that was the case with respect to this bill; and, if the League should continue agitation for an improper purpose, it would no more prevail than agitation now prevailed for the repeal of the union (hear, hear). Next, it was said that the bill was founded on theory, and in practice could not be successful; but theory was only tested by practice, and if practice did not prove it to be good the theory was bad; theory was only the rationale of practice; but those who supported the protectionists were the wildest theorists. For 30 years they had in theory promised to benefit the farmers, and yet in practice they had never done so. The practice had proved that their theory was bad: they had been carried away by the word protection, and nothing else. In fact, the sliding scale men were the wildest theorists that had ever been seen in England; while the principles of Free Trade wherever they had been tried had been found perfectly successful in practice. The noble duke had dwelt upon the effect of this measure on the small tenantry, and he had told the house that he had on one of his estates tenants of that class whose families had been on the land for 450 years, and he had asked why he should be obliged to turn them off the land; but it struck him (the Earl of Radnor) that these small tenants, whose ancestors were serfs to the ancestors of the noble duke, had not thriven much under a system of protection, for they were probably at present little better off than the serfs, their ancestors. Then he did not see why the noble duke should turn them off the land in consequence of this measure. If the country generally was benefited by it, these persons would be sharers in the common good. At any rate the noble duke had no right to wish to be charitable to them at the expense of the people of England (cries of “hear, hear”). It was said that we could not contend, if this bill passed, with the low wages and low food of the Poles; but if so, how was it that we had competed successfully against the low wages and low living of Ireland? He had never heard that question answered, or any explanation how it was that we could not compete with a country 13 days’ sail from us, when we competed successfully with a country 13 hours’ sail from us, in precisely similar circumstances of fertility, cheapness of labour, and lowness of food. Appeals had been made to the antiquity of the Corn Laws, and their lordships had been warned to adhere to the wisdom of their ancestors with respect to them. Now it was true that this country had had Corn Laws since the reign of King John; but every one of those laws, with the exception of one, the 3d Edward IV., cap. 2, which the noble lord (Stanley) referred to in the late debate, up to the period when the landed interest obtained greater power in Parliament, had been laws, not for protection, but for providing food for the people. That act, the 3d Edward IV., cap. 2, prohibited the importation of corn up to a certain price; but if the noble lord had looked a little further, he would have found that chapter 4, of the same year, also prohibited the importation of all articles of manufacture whatever from abroad. This country was to have no communication with foreign countries for the supply of its wants; it was to be self-dependent; was the noble lord prepared to go that length? The noble earl then quoted, from the Paston Letters some expressions in a letter (written about the same period) of Dame Margaret Paston to her son Sir John, stating that malt was very dear, and wheat was 8s. 8d. a quarter, and that the king had prohibited the exportation of wheat, and ending with the remark, “I fear we shall have a right strange world,” for the purpose of showing that exportation was forbidden as well as importation, and then went through the titles of various statutes up to the reign of Charles II., to show that all the legislation up to that period on this subject had been, not for protection, but with a view of providing food for the people. When the landed interest got the upper hand in Parliament a new system was introduced, and the idea of protection began to be acted on. An act was passed in the 12th year of the reign of Charles II., imposing duties on the importation of corn, and another in the 15th year, by which those duties were increased. At that time it was confessed without scruple that the object of these acts was to keep up the rent of land. This was not so openly confessed at present; but there could be little doubt that protection was desired for that purpose. Then came the system of bounties upon exportation in the reign of William and Mary, by which the gross injustice was perpetrated that not only was the price of food raised, but a tax was laid upon the people for the advantage of the owners of land. Under this system exportation, of course, took place to a large extent. Between six and seven millions of money was paid in the shape of bounties, and upwards of 2,000,000 quarters of wheat imported. Owing, he presumed, to the increase in the population, in 1750 exportation began to decrease, and from that period it went on constantly diminishing until we became an importing country, and as such we had gone gradually increasing up to the present time. One would imagine, to hear the arguments on the other side of the house, that the natural state was a state of restriction, and that commercial freedom was a mere experiment, whereas it was just the very reverse of this. The Corn Laws were an experiment, and the natural state was a state of freedom. It was Paine, he believed, who in one of his publications, speaking of the plan of a sinking fund for paying the national debt, said it was like a man with a wooden leg running after a hare, the faster he ran the wider they were apart (a laugh). And so it was with protection—the more they increased protection the further were they from benefiting agriculture (hear). It was said the present measure would benefit merely the manufacturing interest. He denied this, and thought it would benefit both the agricultural and manufacturing interest; but maintained, that even if it were true that the manufacturing interest alone would be benefited by it, the landed interest ought to give it their best support. In the first place, he would remark that it was said on the other side that the landed interest was by far the largest and most important in the country. He denied that it was so, and appealed to the population returns in proof of his assertion.

The Duke of RICHMOND remarked that the population returns were not true.

The Earl of RADNOR replied, that the returns were prepared with great care, and that he had no doubt of their perfect accuracy.

The Duke of RICHMOND said that what he meant was, that in the last population returns every man was calculated as a manufacturer who belonged to any trade or handicraft, though supported by the agriculturists; for instance, every tradesman in a country village was put down as a manufacturer (hear, hear).

The Earl of RADNOR repeated his belief in the perfect accuracy of the returns, and proceeded to say that in 1811 it appeared that the agriculturists amounted to 35 per cent. of the population; in 1821 they were only 33 per cent.; in 1831 they were reduced to 28 per cent.; and 1841 they were still further diminished to 22 per cent. (hear). Had the agricultural population in 1841 borne the same proportion to the other classes of the population as they did in 1811, they would have consisted of 2,445,500 more persons than at present. The consequence would have been, that the agricultural interest would have had so many more persons to support; and, as these would generally have been of the poorer sort of persons, an additional poor-rate of nearly 1,000,000*l.* would have been thrown on the agriculturists. From this additional payment, however, they had been relieved by the diminution of the agricultural population (hear). The noble earl also entered into calculations to show, that from the same cause the agricultural interest had been relieved of 6,500,000*l.* of other taxes, which would have fallen upon them had they continued to bear the same proportion to the other classes of the population in 1841 as they did in 1811. He said, therefore, that even if there was no reason in the justice of the case why the Corn Laws ought to be taken off the landed interest, they ought to do anything rather than injure the manufacturer. But he maintained, that on the ground of justice alone, the measure ought to be supported. When the Canada Corn Bill was before that house he (the Earl of Radnor) opposed it, because it was a departure from the principles of Free Trade; and he felt, what had since come to pass, that it would create interests which at a future time would be against the principle of Free Trade. Wherever Free Trade had been really carried out it had been successful—more particularly in the case of the shipping interest, woollens, and silks. The noble lord (Lord Stanley) had argued that there had been a falling off in the Baltic timber trade; but that had been amply made up by the greater increase in the general shipping trade. From 1812 to 1845 the increase had been from 563,000 tons to 1,114,000 tons. The same results had followed with regard to the articles of the tariff, on which reductions had been made. Upon the whole, he was prepared to support the measure.

The Earl of WICKLOW claimed to be heard as the only Irish peer who had hitherto offered himself to their lordships,

He avowed that he entertained sentiments upon this subject different from both parties. He conceded that protection was not necessary to British industry, because by means of protection our manufactures had been brought to their present state of perfection. He opposed this bill, not on the ground of protection, but because it did not carry out the principle of Free Trade justly, equally, and fairly. If our farmers were compelled to compete with the slaves of America and the serfs of Poland, they ought to be placed upon an equality in other respects. Why should our farmers pay high prices for their coffee and sugar? There should be reciprocity between us and other nations to justify this measure, or we gave a benefit to other nations at the expense of our own pockets: the people of England would, in fact, pay an income tax to support the revenue of other countries. The noble earl then animadverted upon the conduct of the Government in the origin of this measure, and contended that they had been outwitted in respect to the potato disease. His alarm was not so great with reference to this country as to our colonies. In what manner were our colonies to be of use to the mother country, if we exercised neither of the privileges which Mr. Burke has said constitute the only value of colonies—that of taxation or that of monopoly? On the other hand, what was to bind the colonies to the mother country? He believed, if this bill passed, Canada would not five years hence be a part of this empire. He trusted that their Lordships would weigh well the matter before they passed this bill in its present state. This measure was in a different position from the Catholic Emancipation and the Reform Bills. This was the first time that so important a measure had been brought forward here, and he hoped their Lordships would not be led away from their duty to the country by the activity and the noise of Free Traders and Anti-Corn-Law Leaguers.

Lord LYTTELTON, representing the colonial department in that house, was anxious to say a few words. On the subject generally he was satisfied with the argument that, in a matter of this kind, the colonies must needs follow in the wake of the mother country, and partake of the system adopted by her; indeed, unless by a bounty on colonial produce, which would find but few supporters, the colonies could not be exempt from the operation of this law, if adopted here. But there need be no apprehension entertained by our colonies interested in this question, namely, Canada and some of the Australian colonies; he said “some,” because the leading one, New South Wales, imported wheat for its own consumption, and while it was a country of very great and rapidly-increasing prosperity, it was one in which the capital and industry of the people were more and more taking the direction of pastoral occupation; it would be found a better market than this country for the produce of its neighbours (hear, hear). Then with reference to Van Diemen’s Land and South Australia, the average price of wheat in 1843 and 1844 was 26s. a quarter in the one, and 28s. in the other; the freight thence to this country was never much above 20s. a quarter, bringing the price at which they could sell their corn here to 46s. or 48s., besides which they had a natural protection, which would be put exceedingly low if stated at 10s. a quarter, in the incomparable quality of their produce; Australian wheat was the finest grown in the world (hear, hear). But by far the most prominent feature in these discussions was the Canadian question. Now, first, all that had been alleged on that head by the opponents of this bill had been alleged by every interest that had been affected by alterations in customs duties of late years; in 1842 there was hardly an interest affected by the reductions in the tariff of that year, the representatives of which did not visit the Board of Trade, in many instances with a case apparently irrefragable upon paper, showing the inevitable ruin which would befall them; but a pamphlet was published last year by Mr. Gladstone explaining how all these apprehensions and anticipations had been falsified, and the trade affected remained as it was, or improved. Were the Canadian interests backward in that year to make such representations (hear)? Far from it. Those interested in the Canadian timber trade, asserted that the diminution in the differential duty in favour of Canadian timber would bring total destruction upon that trade, and, as was now said, weaken the connection with that colony. The house had heard on a former night from the President of the Board of Trade (the Earl of Dalhousie) what was the present state of that trade. The price of Canadian timber, which for two or three years after that alteration had been lower, giving the consumer the whole benefit of the reduction, had of late, in consequence of the increase in the demand, entirely recovered its former amount. That a similar result would attend this measure as respected Canada he had every confidence. As to the feeling which prevailed in that colony on the subject, he did not wish to deny that he was now arguing the question at a disadvantage in consequence of the receipt of the address from the Canadian Legislature to which so much allusion had been made. But he laboured under another disadvantage in consequence of the non-receipt of the last mail, which he felt confident would bring intelligence favourable to the policy of the Government. The whole tone and purport of the address was entirely inconsistent with what had taken place in the Canadian Legislature. That address, it was understood, was passed by the Legislative Assembly unexpectedly; and, if any of their lordships had referred to the reports of the debate or no debate, for there was really none, they would have seen that what was carried—and it was carried the very night before the mail went out—was simply a motion made by a gentleman named Holmes for a select committee to consider the address; and in the newspapers nothing was stated beyond the appointment of the select committee. It might be said that this proceeding showed the unanimity of the Legislative Assembly upon the subject. But if their lordships had read the debates on the previous resolutions, they would have participated in the surprise with which her Majesty’s Government received the news that the address was adopted. The resolutions did not go to any definite approval of the policy of her Majesty’s Government; but the bare idea of any diminution of the spirit of loyalty in Canada was as wild and absurd as could possibly enter into any man’s imagination. So far as an opinion had been expressed in Canada on the subject of the Ministerial measure, it had not taken a line of disapproval, but somewhat of alarm, unless the measure were accompanied by certain others. Mr. Merritt, a member of the Canadian Legislature, in a speech characterised by great ability, while so far he disapproved of the measure, concluded, after proposing a great number of measures which he conceived it was within the power of the Canadian Legislature to adopt of itself, by asking,—“With these resources at command, why should we not avail ourselves of the accidental and natural advantages we possess, and promptly follow this great movement; which, happily, has been introduced under the sanction of the most eminent statesman in the greatest nation of the present day?" He might also refer to the proceedings at the great public meeting held in Montreal. Though he admitted the resolution proposed at that meeting, to express entire approval of the Ministerial measure, was defeated by a very small majority, yet he should call the attention of their lordships to the fact, that the resolution which was carried embodied an expression of opinion in favour of the ultimate establishment of Free Trade in Canada. The resolution was—"That, whilst this meeting has in view the ultimate establishment of Free Trade in this colony, it nevertheless, if hereafter found necessary, will use its influence to insure the continuance of such protective duties on our produce going into the markets of Great Britain and Ireland as the Imperial Parliament, in its wisdom and justice, may now or hereafter see fit to enact for the welfare and prosperity of this country. In the meantime, however, this meeting is of opinion that the dangers apprehended from the change of system may only be met by a wise and timely adjustment of depending interests to suit the altered circumstances of her relations with the mother country." Much stress had been laid upon the first despatch of the Governor-General of Canada on this subject. That despatch, it was obvious, was not intended to convey his own views, but to state the representations made to him in his official capacity. The Governor-General, in common with the Legislature of Canada, desiderated other measures to accompany the Corn Bill. So far with regard to the feeling which prevailed in Canada on the subject. He should endeavour to show from the facts of the case that the people of Canada need not be under any apprehensions as to the result of the Ministerial measure. Mr. Cayley, the Inspector-General, that was the Finance Minister of Canada, entered into the question how far Canada might be able to bear a share in the general trade of the world with England as regards corn, excluding any reference to the special competition with the United States. He stated the charges on grain imported from Quebec, and deduced from his calculations that it might be landed in Liverpool at or about 40s. One or two items in Mr. Cayley's calculations were too low; but he (Lord Lyttleton) had received a calculation from a Canadian merchant, the greatest indeed in this country (Mr. Gillespie), who stated that Canadian corn could be landed in this country at or about 46s. But the chief apprehensions which were entertained as to the effect of the Ministerial measure related to the presumed competition with the United States. He was at a loss to understand on what ground it was that it had been so strongly asserted that it was out of the question for the Canadians to compete with the Americans with respect to the corn trade in the English market. Why could not the people of Upper Canada compete with the Americans of the western states? Their soil was about the same, the wages of labour were about the same, and the quality of the best Canadian wheat was equal to the best grain in England. He believed that the difference of freight between New York and England, as contrasted with the freight between Quebec and England, was considerably in favour of the Americans, but that advantage was counterbalanced by other considerations; and could, it might be safely said, be overcome by the enterprise and energy of the Canadians. It had been stated in 1842, before the improvements in Canada had arrived at the maturity which they had now reached, that with respect to the export of wheat from the corn-growing districts of Canada, and the western states of America, the Canadians ought to be on an equality with the Americans. The report of a special committee of the Legislative Assembly of Canada on the subject of a Free Trade with Great Britain in the agricultural productions of British North America, and of a protection to those productions from the competition of foreigners in the colonial home markets, alluded to "the relative and nearly-balanced advantages possessed by the two rival communications with the Atlantic, the St. Lawrence, and the Hudson Rivers." It is also stated, "After the enlargement of the Erie Canal shall have been completed, which is our most formidable rival, notwithstanding the reduction heretofore mentioned by the St. Lawrence, the cost of transportation through the two channels will be nearly equal." He had seen a calculation in figures, with which he would not now trouble their lordships, in reference to the two routes—one from Buffalo to New York by the Erie Canal and Hudson river, and the other from the entrance of Welland canal on Lake Erie to Montreal—in reference to transshipment, &c.; and in every one respect, except the length of canal, the advantage was in favour of the Canadians. He would read to their lordships the following extract from a despatch of his right hon. friend (Mr. Gladstone) to Lord Cathcart, dated the 3d of March, 1846, in reference to the advantages possessed by Canada:—"Among them," stated the despatch, "I reckon her light taxation; the assistance she has received from her British credit and funds, in the construction and improvement of her internal communications; her more regular and steady course of trade with this country; her low tariff, so favourable to importation, and, on that account, powerfully tending to encourage her reciprocal commerce outwards; some advantages in the point of proximity, as compared with the most westerly states of the Union, which are also her most formidable rivals in cheapness of production; and lastly, the means of carriage without transshipments by the St. Lawrence, which cannot be had by way of the Erie Canal. She will likewise have this in her favour, that her corn trade will have become a settled one of some standing, with all its arrangements made and in full operation, while any regular commerce in that article from the United States must be a new creation, and must go through the processes attending its self-adjustment to circumstances as yet untried; and if it be true that New York offers some advantages as compared with Montreal, particularly in regard to the rate of insurance, on the other hand I consider that the shipping of British North America has many advantages over that of the United States in the competition for freights, as it is constructed at far less expense, and is, I must assume, navigated with equal vigour and equal economy." He was not aware in what particular any part of that statement could be controverted. And what argument in opposition was brought forward in this Canadian address which was now so much talked of? Only one, and that was, that the route by the St. Lawrence was frozen up six months in the year. But the same was nearly the case with the Erie Canal, which was the great route for American produce. He therefore thought that there was no doubt that with reasonable efforts on the part of the Canadians, they could compete successfully with the Americans, especially as great improvements had recently taken place in Canadian agriculture by the application of increased capital and in other respects. Having said thus much, he was not willing, if he were able, to follow noble lords at any length into a general disquisition of what was called the colonial system. He did not believe in the advantage or benefit of that system. He would not adopt any of the violent language of the Anti Corn Law League and call it mutual robbery, but it was mutual privation and mutual impediment. These restrictions were either injurious or superfluous; injurious, if the protected produce could be more conveniently obtained from other places, superfluous if it could not. Then they were asked,—"What are the use of colonies, unless this system is maintained?" Now, he denied that this system was of any use, either to the mother country or to the colonies. It was not in such a pecuniary way that the use of colonies to the mother country was to be estimated. He had always considered the advantage of colonies to consist in providing an outlet for the teeming population of this country, and in forming the foundation of great communities, where our laws, our habits, and our religion might prevail. This he had always considered to be the use of colonies, and the way to preserve their attachment was by imparting to them the same freedom as we enjoyed, and not by an adherence to a scanty remnant of a perishing system. This vaunted colonial system could hardly be said to exist but in name: it was against the interest of the mother country, and only nominally in favour of the colonies. They had heard of the antiquity of this system; yet, however ancient it might be, it was not coeval with our early settlements. Our early charters with Virginia gave the inhabitants the power of Free Trade with all the world; and with respect to parts of this system—the system of timber duties, for instance—there was hardly one of their lordships within whose lifetime that system had not begun. It commenced in 1808. Was there no actual example to prove the truth of what he was now stating? His right hon. friend (Mr. Gladstone) had in his last despatch referred to the Australian colonies. With respect to those great communities, which owing to the incredible rapidity of their advance, were calculated to add to the glory of the English name, this system was hardly anything but nominal; and in regard to their most important and most abundant produce, that of wool, within the last few years the trade had been entirely thrown open, and the opening of the trade had been followed by an enormous increase in it, and had tended to the general prosperity of those colonies (hear, hear).

The Duke of BUCKINGHAM said the question before their Lordships was very simple, namely, whether they could carry Free Trade into this country under the circumstances in which it was placed. It was all very well in theory, but in practice it was another thing. It was not right, proper, or just that Free Trade should be introduced into a country so burdened with taxation. His Grace then argued that this bill would throw land out of cultivation, reduce the wages of labourers, which ought to be increased, and compel the clergy to submit to a reduction of 25 per cent. in their incomes. So far from settling this question, as some supposed, it would keep up agitation, and the noble duke believed that, if he lived a few years hence, the Minister of the day would come down to Parliament and ask again for protection for the land. He looked upon this measure with the greatest possible alarm; it would affect all classes, and the manufacturers would be the first to suffer. No bill ever came to their lordships' house more generally disliked; it was the offspring of party feeling, and a desire to retain office, from which the present Ministers, if they could not maintain the principles upon which they assumed the Government, ought to retire.

Lord COLCHESTER spoke against the bill, supporting the amendment. With reference to the remark of Lord Lyttleton, that colonies were useful to the mother country in carrying off our surplus population, his lordship observed that there were two other important uses of colonies—one, the taking off our manufactures; another, the affording stations for our navy; and he showed the extent of the colonial demand for the products of home industry.

Lord HOWDEN was merely anxious to state a few circumstances which he believed to be not foreign to the question now before their lordships, and which he hoped would not be considered inapplicable to the discussion in which they were engaged; and he trusted, that in bringing these considerations under the notice of the house, he should be enabled, by the brevity of his observations, in some degree to repay the indulgence of their lordships. He should at once relieve their minds from the fear, and himself from the imputation of arrogance, which might arise if he entered at any length into the facts, or even a small portion of the reasonings, which in the course of the discussion that took place upon the present measure had been brought under the notice of Parliament. If he wished to reproduce arguments already threadbare, he might, without the least difficulty, occupy a great deal of their lordships' time; but it was his intention, on the contrary, to confine himself to a few short observations, and he should proceed to submit them to the house without further preface. The first vote which he had an opportunity of giving in that house was on a subject connected with the Corn Laws; but it was quite a milk-and-water proposition as compared with the present measure. Upon that occasion, which occurred six or seven years ago, he was left in a very small minority, for it was strenuously opposed by the noble viscount then at the head of her Majesty's Government, and as might have been expected, it also was strenuously opposed by every member of the Cabinet excepting one noble earl; but the recollection of that should not tempt him into any digression; he said it should not tempt him into any of those personalities which for some weeks, nay, for some months, had been so prevalent, and which often induced him to imagine that there must be something very agreeable in saying disagreeable things (hear, hear). The flash of that sort of talent showed him the way in which he should not tread, rather than lighted him on the way which he ought to pursue. Some of his earlier years had been spent in a country the institutions of which were in great favour with noble lords who sat on the cross-benches; there existed in that country the greatest possibly antipathy to change of any description. Every individual in that land concurred in the wisdom of his ancestors. Now, it so happened, that in the year 1810 or 1820, he forgot which, two of the southern provinces of Spain were in a very peculiar position; one of those provinces lost its harvest wholly; whilst the other enjoyed the advantage of an harvest more than sufficiently abundant. Now, circumstances precisely analogous to those were reproduced on a larger scale in different countries. In the year 1810 between France and England there was a similar state of things, and it might fairly be thought that the existence of such relations demanded free commercial intercourse upon a large scale. Of that, however, he should now say no more. Returning to the state of Spain, he should merely remind their lordships that the legislation of that country contemplated no freedom of trade, and that even the intercourse between those provinces was restricted by Custom-house regulations; regulations which actually applied to wheat. The noble lord then proceeded to show the application of this case to the intercourse between different countries. But how could they prevent that increase in our manufactures? With our increasing population it was impossible, for they could not expect that the people would remain still, with their hands unemployed. It was, then, policy and justice to feed the population as cheaply as they could. In the exigencies under which they were legislating, theories were useless; for hard realities derided the economies of the schools. It had been said that protection had always been the principle of the statesmen of this country; and had pervaded our commercial regulations; and a noble lord near him had referred to an old Act of Parliament in support of that opinion. But he (Lord Howden) might be permitted to surmise, that that which was necessary in the 14th century was not necessary in the 19th. He might, indeed, remind their lordships of the advice given by a celebrated character of Cervantes, who, like Shakespeare, was said to know everything. Sancho Panza, in giving advice to some person in authority, said, "Take care and provide an abundance of eatables and drinkables for the people, for nothing sooner alienates their minds from their rulers than any deficiency in those things" (hear, hear). He had no fear of what foreign nations would do; but he did fear that there were circumstances in this country which would deprive this measure of much of its benefit and all of its grace. He would not use the language which the other house had been compelled to hear from the accredited organ of a party, but he asked their lordships who opposed the bill, what was to be expected from the present state of affairs? The noble earl opposite had withdrawn his support from the Minister.

Earl STANHOPE said he had never given him his support (cheers).

Lord HOWDEN.—Well, then, the Opposition would make him, who had sacrificed the hope of place to the strength of his convictions, cease to rule the destinies of this country (protectionist cheers); but he (Lord Howden) was stirred he was the true expositor of their lordships' feelings, when he said that the noble earl and those noble lords had no hope or expectation of succeeding to the inheritance (cheers). They were only rendering impossible a Government with reference to which they had one feeling of dissent and a thousand in common, whilst they were paving a way for and making a macadamized road (great laughter) for a party for which they had not one sympathy, and with which they had not a single tie (cheers). He had no hereditary or personal reasons for attaching himself to either of the great parties of the country, but their lordships had ancient rank, vast possessions, and extended influence, and they were throwing into the scale the weight of their authority in favour of a party from the great majority of whose opinions they differed. He had heard the word "treachery" used (protectionist cheers); an ungracious word—treachery by the Minister to his adherents; but as an humble individual, sincerely attached to true Conservative principles, he hoped from the bottom of his soul that their lordships would never be found to be traitors to themselves (hear, hear). And here he must allude to what, in modern phrase, and in epigrammatic language, was called the pressure from without. Their lordships were sensible, as they ought to be, of the well-expressed opinion of the nation, though they would scout what was, in the invidious sense, to be taken as the pressure from without. But there were such things as worthless fears, and there were prophecies which worked their own accomplishment. So long as their lordships did their duty to themselves and the country he cared not in what unholy aspirations the members of the League indulged, but fears heedlessly expressed might verify their own sinister forebodings, and those who really thought they were approaching the end of their senatorial existence might, in his opinion, adopt more dignity in their preparations for their decease ("Oh!" and cheers). He, on the contrary, had every confidence in the good sense of the country—if it were not attended with moderation it would not be good sense, and he did not dread what the noble earl called accumulated agitation, unsatisfied encroachments, subjects not yet broached, and theories not yet hatched (hear, hear); but he asked what must be the immediate disposition and expectation of the millions upon a question on which there was no longer any speculation, which was not in embryo, and which had passed triumphantly through the other branch of the Legislature, and which was now waiting on the threshold of their lordships' house for a final judgment to be pronounced (hear, hear)?

On the motion of the Marquis of EXETER the debate was adjourned till next day, Friday.

The glad tidings of the reading a second time in the House of Lords of the Ministerial Corn Bill diffused unmingled joy throughout our community on Monday morning. The ringing of the steeple bells, at eight o'clock, communicated the gratifying intelligence to the inhabitants; and since the measure is now perfectly safe, we feel confident that, on the occasion of the anniversary of her Majesty's birth—Tuesday next—the citizens will be proud to testify publicly their devotion and gratitude to our beloved Sovereign, to whose wise, firm, and benevolent resolve is traceable, it seems, the triumphant success of the Bill.—Montrose Review.

AN APOLOGY.—At an agricultural dinner there was recently given the toast—"The Duke of Richmond and the protectionists." It was followed by the song—"A man's a man for a' that."—Punch.

FOREIGN FRUIT.—The General Steam Navigation Company's packet, James Watt, which has arrived at the St. Katharine's steam-packet wharf, from Havre, in addition to the usually large cargo of French productions and manufactures, has brought the very large number of 999 packages of fresh fruit, the produce of France. The importation of fruit having commenced thus largely, may be looked for from the present time with certainty and regularity from the principal orchards and gardens in the neighbourhood and suburbs of Rouen, the usually extensive supplies from which luxurious place on a former season were unhappily despoiled by the ravages of a terrific storm, which will not be forgotten, and which caused very great and serious destruction to the crops of every description, at the time when they were fast arriving to profuse abundance and maturity. The same company's vessel Giraffe, from Rotterdam, has brought 20 packages of cherries, the produce of Holland. Altogether it may reasonably and with justice be remarked that both France and Holland are of the utmost importance to us with regard to the extensive supplies of fruits of the earth, cattle, and provisions of the most esteemed descriptions furnished to us by those countries.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND'S LOVE FOR THE LABOURERS.

(From the Times.)

The labourer is still the theme of eloquence at agricultural meetings, where his importance is energetically urged, and his condition spoken of with affectionate interest. To hear the speeches of protectionists at their dinners, where the labourer is never omitted as a toast, and is sometimes tolerated as a guest, one would imagine that the humble cultivator of the soil must be better provided for than the members of any other class of industry. Goodwood on Tuesday last was the scene of one of those annual meetings which are held in many parts of the country for the purpose of giving the worthy labourer his reward, in the shape of ten shilling prizes for the twelvemonth's stock of virtue he may have exhibited. The Duke of Richmond was in the chair, supported by a Bishop, an Archdeacon, an Honourable and Reverend, and an M.P., besides a number of clergy and landowners of the district; while, to do honour to the humble hero of the day, the Duchess of Richmond and the Ladies Lennox were present in a side gallery. There is something very beautiful in the idea of the master sitting down to the same meal with his men, and the presence of a galaxy of godliness is highly appropriate to such a truly Christian act as the feasting of the employed by the employer at his own table. The charm, however, of the proceeding is speedily dissipated when we find that at such a very early stage of the business as the first toast after the health of the Royal family having been drunk, the labourers had entirely expended their allowance of beer, and were compelled to keep up their enthusiasm as well as they could with empty mugs to the end of the entertainment. When the Bishop of Chichester was toasted, the gentlemen present pledged him in a bumper; but the labourers were forced to shout and gesticulate with nothing to drink, like the "happy peasantry" that we see on the stage tossing off copious draughts of mere atmosphere to the long life of their Prince. The whole of the proceedings, however, were of the same false, unsubstantial, and dramatic character as the phantom libations of the humbler portion of the guests. The Duke of Richmond's speech was crammed with clap-traps, which would have told admirably on the audience at a minor theatre, but which could not for a moment stand the test of sober criticism. He talked glowingly of the value of the "honest, meritorious, and industrious labourer," and added, that "one man who felt a deep interest in the welfare of his employer is worth a hundred of those who only worked for the sordid consideration of their daily pay." There is something absolutely comical in the idea of taunting a poor wretch who gets perhaps eight shillings a week with "the sordid consideration of his daily pay." Archdeacon Manning adopted the same truly comic conceit, and reiterated the noble chairman's sentiment, that "one man who worked from affection was worth a hundred who worked merely for lucre." This high disdain for filthy dross ought not, we think, to be exacted from labourers at eight shillings a week, who certainly, if they are actuated by the sordid love of lucre imputed to them by their employers, have very little to gratify their avaricious appetites. Well may the working man entreat to be saved from his friends, when those who assume that character call upon him to work from affection, and to show an utter contempt for pay. Surely he already accepts the minimum of wages on which it is possible to exist. We have heard of things being so dear that they are not to be had for love or money. The toil of the labourer is an article that has hitherto been paid for by a little of both, but it would seem that his friends the protectionists would like to obtain his services purely for love, without having to expend any money at all. Simple as the labourer is, we do not think he will be persuaded into a belief that such a proposition can be for his benefit. We wonder if it has ever occurred to the Duke of Richmond to pay a hundred times as much wages to a man who works "with a regard to his employer's interests," as his Grace would pay to a mere every-day labourer working for lucre—or, in other words, toiling for his own and his family's support. Surely the employers ought to be satisfied with the labour, such as it is—and it surely is cheap enough at its present miserable price—without grumbling that the article is not given in a spirit of the purest disinterestedness. One might as well taunt a servant with a love of lucre for wanting his wages, or a tradesman with sordid considerations for sending in his bill. The agricultural labourers cannot afford to put money entirely out of the question, though their employers, by reducing wages to the lowest possible point, take care not to encourage sordidness too far, or, at all events, not to give avarice too much to feed upon. It is quite clear that the motive for giving what are by courtesy termed prizes to the agricultural labourers, is that they may become more valuable in a pecuniary point of view to their pretended friends. This was avowed at the West Sussex Agricultural Association, and the purpose is, perhaps, legitimate, or even laudable; for, as a general rule, workmen, in becoming more valuable to their masters, must be happier in themselves.

We fear, however, that there is too much hollowiness in the words of encouragement addressed to them, and that the premiums offered are too nominal and contemptible to have much influence in producing the desired effect. The distribution of a few Bibles and Prayerbooks, and a few prizes, varying from 10s. to 4l. will not compensate for a year's privation, caused by a rate of wages so miserable as to be wholly inadequate for comfort, and frequently insufficient for support. That such is the doom of the labourer almost every day's experience affords some proof, and we need go no further back than our paper of yesterday for a strong case in point. Under the title of The Poor Law in a Rural District will be found the report of some proceedings taken by the parochial authorities to force upon a married labourer, earning only 8s. a-week, the maintenance of his mother, whom he declared himself unable to support. The energy with which the overseer went to work to prove the man capable of bearing the burden, affords an amusing illustration of the difference of treatment the labourer experiences as the hero of after-dinner eloquence at protectionist meetings and in the board-room of his own parish, to which he is summoned that another weight may be thrown upon him in addition to those he is already struggling to bear. In the case to which we allude every inquisitorial measure seems to have been adopted for the purpose of proving that the labourer earning eight shillings a-week, and having to keep a wife, ought to spare the parish funds by taking also the support of his mother wholly upon himself. First he was taxed with having "four pigs and six stocks of bees," as if a man could keep his mother all her life on honey and pork, and could afford to expend these luxuries upon her. It turned out, however, that half the bees were dead, and the pigs were still unpaid for. So that before his mother could be fed from these sources there was a mortgage to be paid off, and the magistrate, acting, probably, on this view of the question, refused to make the order for which the parish authorities had applied. We should be glad to know whether this poor man, if he were to enter the Duke of Richmond's service, full of affection for the nobleman who has expressed so deep a concern for the welfare of the labourer, and who, actuated by this affection, would be worth a hundred ordinary labourers—we wonder, we repeat, if he would obtain from the Duke of Richmond a hundred times, or even ten times, or twice the amount of wages usually paid. If masters were to be found to appreciate such zeal as it deserves, it is most likely that the poor man whose case we have referred to, and many others in similar circumstances, would not have to appear before boards of guardians to resist orders for the support of their aged parents. The labourer, however, can be much more cheaply cared for in an after-dinner speech than by giving him a fair remuneration for his services. "Civility costs nothing," but unfortunately it is intrinsically worth nothing to the party on whom it is bestowed.

DISSOLUTION OF OLD PARTIES.

(From the Times.)

The debate—if debate so disorderly a scene deserves to be called—of Monday night, is strangely and even gloomily ominous of that troublous pass which the nation seems now in careless haste to essay. A picture is presented to us of a legislature in which all things are out of order, out of place, out of proportion, out of season, out of keeping, out of all political and decent rule. On one hand a Government, which by singular energy and address, though not by its own resources, is in the very act of sealing a great victory, falls itself under the weight of its spoils, and by the mysterious law of the weapons it has thought fit to employ. On the other, an ancient rival, wasting under the wounds of repeated and confirmed defeat, is able at this critical moment to avenge his wrong, and perhaps even to repair his disappointment. In another part of the scene an army of mercenaries, smarting under the breach of impossible engagements, having neither share in the victory, nor hope of redress, seeks a last consolation in the sweetness of revenge. If it is a reality we are beholding, how near akin is it to falsehood! If it is a drama, what chance or caprice has had the casting of the parts? The golden apple of this conflict lies on the ground. The victorious possessor is apparently devoting himself to another object, which he seeks only that he may fall in the enterprise, and thereby gain a remediable loss. The deserted auxiliaries, after long fighting for order, think to find their account in a general confusion. This bout has failed them, so a fresh start is their object. The representatives of territorial rights, and a heaven-sent aristocracy, think to write antiquity again on the carte blanche they will obtain, by permitting an interval of democratic usurpation. The guardians of "property," the protectors of land, are recording their decision against a measure whose chief aim is the security of these objects.

There is also in the scene that mixture of feverishness and listlessness which give us the least security for discretion, and the greatest chance of extravagance. Private reasons, or rather private fancies, are uppermost. The house is with difficulty assembled for the debate which professes so serious an object, and is actually pregnant with such weighty consequences. False stimulants must be applied. Vehemence of attack, petulance of interruption, reproaches, remonstrances, discursive allusions, reckless predictions, old standing arrears of ranking grievances, and bitter recollections, are the substitute for a legislative debate. Something, meanwhile, either chastens the spirit or ties the tongue of the party that has to endure this sharp warfare. Could one judge of its tone, it expects its doom. It is impossible not to recognize the eve of great changes, not to say great convulsions, when the chief powers of the political world have so departed from their wont. It is not growth, but dissolution, we are beholding. It is a house divided against a house, and it cannot but fall. The extempore ring-leader of the disaffected may be set aside as far as concerns his power upon the present question, but he is effectually destroying that social framework on which we must rest our hopes for the future. The edifice that cost the labours of patient years even before its foundations were seen above the ground, after being first betrayed by its author, now crumbles to pieces by blows from within, exchanged by familiar and once friendly hands.

The attacks of enemies may be forgiven, and even forgotten. They may be accounted for on a theory. The opponent renounces his opinions, and thereby retracts his invectives. The bitterest philippics are often little more than political conventionalities, which proceed on certain assumptions, and are forgotten when the assumptions are no longer received. It is so with the indignation of friends and allies. Their angry words are the seeds of enduring hostility. Their allusions are too familiar to miss their mark, too pointed not to sink deep, too envenomed not to rankle. The mutual recriminations of the divided host will live for years in the disruption and annihilation of party. Our comfort for the solitudes that must naturally throng upon each peaceful mind at the prospect of the coming confusion, is that really the present distribution of parties has lasted too long, if not for moral truth, at least for moral clearness, and for moral emphasis. There is no existing section of the political world which is not hampered with pledges and alliances that entail an irreconcilable struggle with the ripening necessities of the age, and with its growing convictions. The work of the next generation must be done, if by parties, at least by new ones. At present the signs of decomposition predominate. The House of Commons shows rather the fusion, than the reconstruction of systems. The old forms of opinion are passing away, but the new organisation scarcely begins to appear.

How much change, again, must we expect in the administrative and legislative element before we shall have a Government and a Parliament really able and willing to address themselves to the wants of the times! For example, is there the least prospect, with our present Ministers and present legislators, of that great subject, the religious, moral, and sanitary condition of our towns being fairly taken in hand? What statesman have we who so much as dreams of such a thing as a sound and comprehensive municipal system? Who is there that we can trust with the simplification of our laws, the reform of our courts, and the protection of our charities and other foundations? Who has heart, or nerve, or sinew, to grapple with the Irish landlord? Who has the skill to plead the cause of the poor, and establish their claims, so as to steer clear of a decayed and abusive antiquity, on the one hand, and the iron invention of political economy, on the other? The great problems of this age are everywhere discussed, and receive every other than a Parliamentary solution. The present legislature cannot even master the business actually brought before it. Perplexing, painful, and disastrous, therefore, as may be the approaching passage of our public destiny,—even though we have to pass through the fiery furnace of social reconstruction,—even though the names of Whig and Tory, Conservative and Radical, agricultural and manufacturing, country and town, may pass away, and become as mere matters of history as the white and red rose, the Guelph and the Ghibelline, we still trust that the good sense and good heart of this nation will, under Providence, raise out of this chaos a legislature and a Government better able to apprehend and to grasp the real wants of the people, under no slavish thralldom to parties or classes, and not driven to the continual alternatives of disloyalty to the commonwealth, or treason to their partisans.

THE ONLY PLAN FOR A FINAL SETTLEMENT OF THE SUGAR DUTIES.

(From the Economist.)

The time has arrived when the final adjustment of the sugar duties can no longer be postponed. The removal of protection to the cultivator of the soil at home renders the maintenance of that principle in favour of the planter, in the colonies, no longer possible. Every argument which has been so successfully employed to show that protection has been a delusion—a false and deceptive prop—at home, is equally applicable to the colonies. We are bound, however, to admit, that in some respects an important difference has existed between the owner of the soil at home and the planter in the colonies. It is true that protection has been claimed for the farmer, at home, on the assumed existence of special burthens imposed upon him by the state, for the public good, but the existence of which, so far, it has been impossible to discover. On the contrary, he has been exempted from the charge of every assessed tax, which would otherwise have borne upon him in his capacity as a farmer, even down to that upon a shepherd's dog. If any doubt could have existed of the utter absence of any claim on this score, on the part of the home farmer, before the recent inquiry by a committee of the House of Lords, Lord Montagu's report of that inquiry must have effectually dispelled such doubt, and have proved to any candid inquirer, that, instead of special public burthens, the home agriculturist enjoys many special exemptions from taxation. But such, we are free to admit, is not the case with the colonial planter. We readily admit that restrictions have been, and still are, imposed upon him, of which he has a right to complain, and from which he has a right to demand relief. At the same time, nothing will be more evident than the fact, that these restrictions or disabilities to which the planter may be thus exposed, can form no compensation to the consumers at home for the extra price which they are obliged to pay for their sugar.

Admitting, however, as we do, the existence of restrictions and impositions, to which the colonial planter is exposed, we propose now to examine what they are, as alleged by the West Indians themselves, and in what way relief should be given. The grievances of the West Indians may be thus stated. First, they aver that the effect of emancipation has been to withdraw a large portion of labour from sugar cultivation, and materially to raise the rate of wages, as compared with that paid by other sugar-producing countries; and that the restrictions imposed upon immigration have precluded them from obtaining such additional supplies of free labourers as would have enabled them to cultivate their estates with profit. Secondly, they complain that they are restricted as to the sources from which they can supply themselves with those articles which they require to import for the consumption of the islands. Thirdly, they complain that there are restrictions placed upon the sale and use of their produce. And, fourthly, they complain that a portion of their produce is, to a great extent, practically prohibited from consumption at home, in consequence of the high differential duty to which it is subjected, in order to protect the manufacture of British spirits. With respect to the whole of these complaints, we freely admit there is some foundation, and that the West Indians have a right to seek the same advantages from the principles of Free Trade, by the removal of those restrictions, as we have with respect to the introduction of their produce into the home market. This is a right which we have never denied, but for which, on the contrary, we have often, on principle, contended. But the great error hitherto made by West Indians has been, an inference, that restrictions imposed upon their trade, were to be regarded by the consumer at home as a compensation for the high differential duties imposed in favour of their sugar in this market. They may all be just grounds of complaint against our colonial policy, but certainly they are no satisfaction to the home community for the high price of sugar to which it has been exposed. It would be difficult to show in what way restrictions placed upon the imports into the colonies, or restrictions imposed upon the sale of their produce, or a high duty upon West Indian rum, could be regarded as any compensation to the great mass of the community at home, for the high price of sugar to which they have been subjected for so many years. Moreover, the community have had more reason to complain against the course pursued by the West Indians, inasmuch as no great efforts have ever been used to obtain direct redress of these grievances, with some exceptions in regard to immigration, while every effort has been used to maintain protective duties against the home consumer. On the part of the home consumer, too, it cannot be denied that we have to regard the sum given for emancipation as a large payment. It may be denied by the West Indians that it amounted to full compensation. But whether or not is not now a practical question to be settled; for it is certain that very much of the West Indian property has changed hands since that time, and has been either inherited or purchased, subject to the existing state of circumstances. Moreover, the extra price already paid by the country for colonial sugar since the termination of the apprenticeship cannot amount to a smaller sum than the twenty millions paid as a direct compensation. For the five years ending in 1844, Mr. Gladstone, in the pamphlet entitled, "The Ministry and the Sugar Duties," calculated that additional sum at sixteen millions sterling; or at the rate of 3,200,000l. per annum; to which, if we add the two years which have since passed, we make a total sum of more than twenty-two millions sterling, as paid by the country, in addition to the original sum of twenty millions for compensation. It would appear, therefore, that the sugar colonies have cost the country, in direct payment, and in the shape of a higher cost of sugar, more than forty-two millions sterling, during the last 10 or 12 years. The time has, however, arrived, when this additional expenditure to the country must shortly cease, and when all restrictions or disabilities, as far as they are imposed by the legislature, on the colonies, must cease also. We propose, therefore, to offer some observations on these alleged grievances.

First, then, with respect to immigration to free labourers. We confess that we can see no good defence for the jealousy with which the Government have regarded the subject of immigration into our sugar colonies, from the time when the entire abolition of slavery took place. The reasons which were so commonly given, viz., that of the fear that immigration might relapse into a revival of the slave trade, and that specific contracts for labour might assume the character of slavery, appear to us to be wholly unworthy of a great country, having an executive sufficiently powerful to enforce the observance of its laws throughout the whole of its empire. Whether the immigration of labourers from the East Indies and from Africa would be an economical application of capital, is altogether another question, with respect to which we would probably differ from the great bulk of the West Indians themselves. But we cannot deny the political and civil right which the West Indians have to employ capital in the importation of free labour, as much as the land companies of Canada or Australia, always of course subject to the same regulations as are considered in the latter cases, needful for the protection of the immigrants, and any other which the peculiar circumstances attendant on African immigration may render necessary. As a right we have not an objection to urge against it. As an economical application of capital, we feel that the safest course is to leave those on whom the responsibility rests, to decide that point. We cannot suppose that West Indian proprietors would continue to lay out their own capital, or burden their estates with the payment of taxes to satisfy the interest of a loan, for the purposes of immigration, if found to be unprofitable, and, especially, considering the legal obligations which they take upon themselves to send their immigrants back at the end of five years. As far as we are concerned, in the mother country, we may safely rely upon the owners of West India estates, and upon the colonial assemblies not committing themselves to any very injurious extent by such an outlay, if it proved by experience a less profitable means of applying capital than others open to them. For our own parts, nothing can persuade us, while yet there is so much to be done, by the application of capital, to economise and render productive the existing amount of labour in the colonies, that it can prove a very desirable means of investment to import Hill Coolies from India at the enormous cost which is required. But that, we repeat, appears to us a proper question for the West Indians themselves to entertain, but no ground for our denying them the full right, if their interests dictate the course.

On the ground of humanity, we contend that all the argument is in favour of immigration, and especially from Africa; and we only wish we could persuade ourselves that economically it is desirable to as large an extent as immigrants could be obtained. There can be no question that every negro removed from Africa to the British West Indies, really changes the condition of the most abject and degraded slavery for the benefits of a comparatively highly civilised life. In the case of the free immigrant too, the horrors of the middle passage, against which our feelings have been so justly excited, are entirely removed. The removal of Africans to the British West Indies, can only be regarded as a process of emancipation from the most degraded and brutal condition in which the human race can be found, to one of great moral and physical advantages; from the tyranny and cruelty of brutal slave-masters in Africa, to the protection and security of the most advanced and enlightened government. We know that there are those, who see a great danger of promoting internal wars in Africa for the mere purpose of procuring slaves to carry to the coast, as long as there is a demand for them. A demand it is said on the coast will promote cruelty in the interior in order to supply it. This no doubt is so in the case of slavers who give high prices for slaves. But with respect to the free immigrants, who are not purchased, for whom no money is given, excepting in the shape of a free passage, and of which no part would go to enrich the Africa slave-dealer, this can not be urged as an objection. On the contrary, the more abundant free labour becomes in our colonies the less will be the temptation or the ability of slave-owning states to pay the price for slaves on the coast of Africa, which leads to the internal African slave trade. While, therefore, we may doubt the prudence of a large investment of capital, in the introduction of immigrants into the West Indies, at a great cost, and with onerous future obligations, we cannot deny to the West Indians the right so to employ their capital under proper regulations if they think fit. To prevent abuse which might arise therefrom, the executive is bound to rely on its own powers.

Secondly, the West Indians complain that they are restricted in the sources from which they can supply their wants, or, at least, that the imposition of duties on commodities, the produce of other countries, from which those of Great Britain and our other colonies are exempted, raises the price to their disadvantage. It cannot be denied that, in principle, this protection to the produce and manufactures of England and the North American colonies, against the West Indian consumer, is an evil of which he has a right to complain, and which ought to be removed. Till a very recent period, the prohibitions and protective duties imposed upon foreign commodities were extremely prejudicial to the West Indies; a great step was, however, taken in 1842, to abolish the prohibitions, and to modify the protective duties. In that year the Act 5th and 6th Victoria, c. 49, repealed the former duties, and established a new and modified tariff; but which is still open to the objection that considerable duties are imposed on goods from foreign countries, while our own are admitted free. On foreign wheat flour we impose an import duty of 2s. per barrel; on foreign-taken fish 2s. per cwt.; on foreign salted or cured meat 3s. the cwt.; on foreign butter 8s. the cwt.; on foreign spirits and cordials 1s. per gallon; on glass and silk goods of foreign manufacture, fifteen per cent. ad valorem; on cotton, linen, woollen, leather, and paper manufactures, hardware, soap, and candles, from foreign countries we impose a duty of seven per cent.; and on all foreign goods not enumerated a duty of four per cent.;—from all of which British products and those of our other colonies are free. It is quite clear that when we call upon the West Indies to relinquish protection in the home market, we must also be prepared to relinquish it in their market.

Do not let us be misunderstood. The duties which we have quoted are not the Island duties raised by the colonies for the local revenue, but are imposed by the Imperial Parliament. It may be urged, and no doubt with great truth, that these duties in most instances are nominal and inoperative. With respect to most articles of British manufacture, the protective duties in the colonies are no more operative than they are at home; nor would their removal make any difference to the cost of those goods, because there is no other market where they can be bought so cheap. But if so, there can be no reason why even an imaginary grievance should be allowed to remain among our laws. But though this is the case with respect to British manufactures generally, it is not so with respect to flour, fish, meat, butter, cheese, and probably some kinds of glass and silk goods. With respect to provisions these duties clearly raise the price, and are a ground of just complaint. These protective duties are, therefore, either useless, if inoperative, or unjust to the West Indies if operative, and in either case should be repealed. They cannot be retained a day longer than the equalisation of the sugar duties is provided for.

Thirdly, the West Indians complain that they have been subjected to restrictions on the manufacture, and still are in the uses to which their produce can be applied. The restriction which so long existed against the produce of the colonies being shipped to other countries, cannot be said ever to have led to any real disadvantage, as England has always been the best market. The practical prohibition against refining sugar in the colonies has already been removed, but still the restriction against the use of sugar and molasses in distilleries at home continues. It is much to be doubted whether this restriction is any real disadvantage or not; nevertheless, its maintenance is impossible on the principles by which we now wisely seek to govern the material interests of the country. If not advantageous, it would not be done, and if more profitable to the importer than the present uses to which his produce is put, it ought to be left open to him. The true interests of the country can only be consulted by the most economical use of every product which it possesses, and which perfect freedom alone can determine.

Fourthly, the West Indians complain that, in bringing their rum into the British market, they are subjected to a duty, which acts to a great extent as a practical prohibition, in order to protect the home distiller. This, no doubt, is true, and cannot be justified. The duty charged on colonial rum is 9s. 4d. the gallon, while on British spirits in England it is 7s. 10d., in Scotland 8s. 8d., and in Ireland 2s. 8d. the gallon. The effect of the high duty on rum has been to banish its use altogether from Scotland and Ireland, or nearly so, and materially to reduce the whole consumption of the country. In 1802, the consumption of rum was fifty per cent. greater than in 1844, while in the latter year the consumption of British spirits was 100 per cent. more than in 1802. The following table shows the comparison of rum and British spirits taken for consumption at the two periods in question, with the duties chargeable thereon:

It is impossible on Free Trade principles to defend any differential duty against the rum of the West Indies. But the West Indies must, on the same principle, be prepared for the admission of foreign rum, brandy, and other spirits at the same rate of duty.

As far as we have been able to collect, these are the whole of the grievances of the West Indians, and which, we are perfectly free to admit, require, upon every principle of fairness, to be redressed; and which may be easily done, with great advantage to the revenue and to all parties concerned. We are glad to observe that Mr. Hume has given notice of a motion which will bring all those questions under discussion, and we trust they will before long be all disposed of in a general scheme for the entire equalisation of the sugar duties. No other settlement of this question is now possible; and the best interests of all parties will be consulted, as well as that of the revenue, by that settlement being made with as little delay as possible. We may take an early opportunity of working out the probable effects upon the revenue of such a comprehensive scheme, involving the entire removal of all these restrictions and the equalisation of the sugar duties, by the time the Corn Bill is finally operative in 1849. To conclude, we are bound to say that many of the parties most influentially and extensively interested in West Indian property have expressed their entire concurrence in such a settlement of the question, which appears to us in every way fair and just; and we therefore have great pleasure in congratulating the country upon the probability of an early and satisfactory settlement of this important question; the constant and necessary changes in respect to which, during the last few years, have done more to unsettle commerce and puzzle merchants than all other causes put together.

THE BRITISH UNICORN.

(From Punch.)

MR. PUNCH.—"You have made my companion, the British Lion, very popular; can you do nothing for me? Understand, I shall be well content with half the notoriety you have bestowed upon my leonine friend; for, certainly, since you have signalled him by your notice—since you have drawn him from the obscurity of the National Arms, and discussed the length of his mane and tail, the sharpness of his teeth and claws, and the various modulations of his roar—the poor beast has been worked and belaboured more than any costermonger's donkey. 'Twill not surprise me, soon, to see the British Lion advertised as peculiarly fitted for 'the most timid lady.' Certainly, timid gentlemen, who might pass for ladies, have of late ridden him hard enough. I much question whether the Culling Smiths, the Sibthorpes, and the Plumptres, are not—for their sharp taskwork inflicted on the British Lion—obnoxious to an information for cruelty to animals. However, to my own case.

"I am a modest brute; so modest, that I have suffered all sorts of scholars and philosophers—men who take the universe to bits and put it together again, like a child's puzzle—to question even my existence. By some I have been called the Indian ass; by others the rhinoceros; and all these presumptuous men have flatly denied my right to the graceful form made familiar by the Royal Arms to every true-born Briton. But, sir, patience has its limits. Trodden worms will turn; and—it will be found—outraged unicorns will gore.

"Nevertheless, for myself, I could still endure the contempt and slander of the world with perfect indifference. Yes, sir: I could hear my companion, the British Lion, praised for his courage, his magnanimity, and every other after-dinner virtue (though between ourselves I have known him guilty of certain rogueries and fooleries more worthy of the British fox and the British goose; only lions, by virtue of their claws, are privileged as occasional knaves and simpletons)—I say, I could, unmoved, listen to his praises—unmoved as one opera-singer hears the applauding fame of another (my frequent position over the proscenium has familiarised me with all play-house virtues), were I alone concerned. But, sir, consider; if I am called a fabulous beast, a fictitious nonentity, a thing that never had a place in the ark, what a rebellious insult is thereby cast upon the Royal Escentee! The Lion is a terrible verity, says the world, and with his truthful strength, his awful looks, supports and watches the Royal Shield; but the Unicorn is a nondescript nincompoop: a fib upon four legs: at the very best a horned flam? Now, I ask it, is not this opinion treasonous? Does it not make the Royal Arms lopsided? On the right they are supported by leonine power; on the left by a word than nothing—by a fiction! Now, sir, will you urge Lord George Bentinck to move for a committee to inquire into the truth of the existence of the British Unicorn? I suggest Lord George, because as I am more than half equine, the inquiry could be best carried out by his stable mind. Did I really feel myself the ass that some naturalists have written me down, I could name other honourable members of the honourable house as being peculiarly fitted for the investigation.

"And in the meantime, Mr. Punch, do think of me. Let me not suffer for my long endurance. Folks must tire of the roar of the British Lion; therefore, do now and then say something about the honour of the British Unicorn. For I put it to you, whether it is not too bad that I should bear half the weight of the Royal Shield, and the Lion monopolise all the glory? Besides, the British Lion, for a time, at least, has had his day; therefore, do justice to his long-silent and long-suffering companion.

"THE BRITISH UNICORN."

POTATO CROP IN DEVON.—Last year, through the month of June, it was observed that the potato crops in my locality had never previously been seen in a more healthy, vigorous, and evenly state of growth. The tubers, too, of the early kinds, in the month of July, were not only numerous, but large; any quantity could be purchased at fourpence per score pounds. But this spring they have been selling as high as twenty pence per score pounds. It is now the last week in May, and the early crops of potatoes are equal in strength and evenness with what they were a month later last year, and the tubers are equally fine and numerous, more particularly all the autumn planted varieties; those which were protected through bad weather with dry dust, fern, and other refuse, have actually now about finished their growth—the foliage is cupping up as if ripening; other crops also appear in most luxuriant health, when viewed at a distance; but I am sorry to state that the detestable enemy has again made its appearance, in its too generally-known forms of rustiness, black spotted inky blotchings on the foliage, canker, gangrenous, sore-looking spots on the stems or stalks and ribs of the foliage. Whether the cold rains which we have had—the remarkably cold north winds we have experienced for the most part of the first twenty days of this month—have in any way accelerated the disease or not I cannot say; but I am sorry to again observe its appearance even on some of the young tubers. We cut and pick off all the diseased stalks and leaves as we discover them, and burn them, although by this means I do not expect wholly to stay or prevent its ravages; but the trouble is little, and it puts out of sight an eye-sore. I never had crops so prosperous in appearance, when viewed at a distance; and this has led many to suppose that all was right. It would, however, be strange indeed were not some of us to produce good crops and clear from disease this season; for no doubt can be entertained that many have been careful in the preservation, selection, and planting of this year's crop, and the after-management will, no doubt, be performed with more than usual care, and this useful vegetable may yet possibly be an average crop. I am happy to say, too, that at present we have here some pieces of potatoes in which no disease has been observed; still I am doubtful as to the future.—Correspondent of the Gardener's Chronicle.

DESTITUTION IN THE SHETLAND ISLANDS.—From a communication, dated Lerwick, 23th May, in the John O'Groat Journal of Friday last, it appears that famine is spreading rapidly among the Shetlanders. We sincerely trust that public sympathy will be extended towards the sufferers without loss of time. The following is part of the communication alluded to:—"Want and misery are now written on many a face, where, till now, such had not been seen, and, if not promptly relieved in some way or other, there is great reason to fear that, during the summer, and before the crops can come on so far as to be made available, even in a half-price state, for the pressing wants of the population, cases of death, from actual starvation, will be neither few nor rare. During the years 1837-38-39—well named the 'bad years'—the want of food through these islands was not greater than it is at the present time. At this moment individuals are known to the writer of this, who have not tasted bread for a whole week, and others who have neither tasted bread nor meal in any shape for periods varying from ten to fifteen days; who, when they had scraped together the sum necessary, had to take their bags under their arms, and to travel distances of from six to eighteen miles—Zetland miles, too—before they could procure the small quantity of meal which they were able to purchase, and that, too, at a most exorbitant price. The breakfast of shell-fish has to be gathered in the morning, at the sea-side, among the rocks, before the cravings of hunger can be satisfied; then the next meal, consisting of fish, with, perhaps, a few potatoes; and if they have a little meal, fish, and bread, or else fish and potatoes again, before going to bed, comprises all that they can afford, fish and potatoes being the chief, almost the only articles of diet, and bread being used more like a luxury than as the staple article of food. These are not cases of rare occurrence."

Accounts from Leeuwarden, in Holland, state that the potatoes in that district appear to be infected with the same disease as last year.

NEW NEWSPAPER, PRICE THREEPENCE.
THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that arrangements are in progress for the Establishment of a NEW PAPER, Price THREEPENCE, to be called,

THE NEW ERA.

Particulars will be given in future Advertisements.
To be published by J. GADSBY, Douvrie-street, Fleet-street, London.

FREEHOLDERS BUILDING SOCIETY, MANCHESTER.—Shareholders in this Society wishing to transfer their Shares are requested to apply to Mr. Senior, League Office, Newall's-buildings, Manchester.

A few copies of No. 93 of the ANTI-BREAD-TAX CIRCULAR, and of Nos. 68, 75, 81, 83, 84, 97, 99, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 117, 119, 122, of "THE LEAGUE," are particularly wanted. A liberal price will be paid for them on their being forwarded to Mr. Whitome, 67, Fleet Street, London.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, June 10, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

THE STRIKE IN THE BUILDING TRADES.—This ill-advised strike of the men still "slowly drags its weary length along." All the bricklayers have resumed work, and the greatest activity prevails in that trade, and the joiners and carpenters are gradually resuming work on the masters' terms; and this refers not only to strangers, but to the old hands who have been unionists, but who are tired of the sway of "the central committee." In one establishment, six men commenced work on Monday morning last, including three of the old hands, who were unionists, but have ceased to be so. The conference of the National Association of United Trades, which commenced its proceedings on Whit-Monday, and the transactions of which we noticed in our last, terminated on Friday afternoon, but on that day no business of importance was done. At present we are informed there are 400 workmen on the strike in Manchester and Salford, but it is expected that twenty or thirty will go in to-day (Wednesday) to Mr. Birch's, near Faulkner street, who, it is stated, has acceded to the terms of the union. In Liverpool, as here, the strike has ceased to be a general one; the masons being still out we believe.—Manchester Guardian.

LETTERS FROM KENT.

LETTER I.

At no time perhaps since Kent got its name from Canute the Dane, did its rich corn crops look richer than now; certainly in the best of the summers within living memory they never looked better, seldom so well. It may turn out that fruit will be an exception. But of wheat, and beans, and peas—the green peas of the market gardens for million-mouthed London, never had Kent such a lapful of plenty. Nor is the promise of abundance confined to Kent. Surrey is the same, and also Sussex; at least, such parts of it as I have just seen. And by analogy and common report, all agricultural lowland is the same. Let me tell of what I have just seen.

First, of wheat. It was well grown in May; but in most parts of Surrey and Kent, a rusty-coloured fungus settled on it. This fungus was very minute in its particles, but so universally spread, that the fields looked for several weeks as if scorched with red fire. In walking only for a few yards through the wheat thus affected, the feet were covered with red dust, as if one had walked in the rubbish of a brickyard. The fungus was generally attributed to atmospheric causes, and some good reasons were given to show that it was related in its origin to the disease which last year affected the potato plants, and that both proceeded from humidity and low temperature. Other plants had this rusty fungus on them besides wheat; gooseberry bushes, the natural grasses by ditch banks, the hawthorns, and even the more early grown potato plants. But now, with a high temperature and dry atmosphere, the fungus has disappeared. Plants affected by it are not only convalescent, but in the enjoyment of a robust health equal to anything ever known. One would almost think the field crops are rejoicing as they grow in having been purified of internal diseases by that which was external.

Taking a glance at the thinly sown wheat, near Croydon, where Mr. Davis has been for several years laudably, and I am told, successfully engaged in practically reforming the seed-sowing of wheat, we cannot help believing what our ears bear, that half the usual quantity of wheat sown per acre, is better for the ensuing crop than the usual amount of sowing.

Yet again, as we go on, the old system is seen; and assuredly at the present time, it is more than judgment can determine to say which promises most profit, the thin sowing or the thick, the new system or the old.

One thing is clear, clear as fine weather—that so far as the national welfare depends on abundant crops: abundant comforts of clothing and furniture depending on abundance of food; full employment, and full wages depending on the ability of the millions to spare for clothing and furniture the money not required for food; the buoyancy of mercantile enterprise reciprocating with all these, producing them and being produced, until we reach nationally that condition which is called prosperity.—I say, that so far as all these happy circumstances arise from good harvests, plenty and cheapness, there never was a brighter prospect before England than there is in this blessed month of June, 1846.

In the preparation of green crops, such as turnips and wurzel for the feeding of stock, rain is prayed for; but the farmer's prayer for rain in one parish is put up at the same time that his brother farmer in another prays for dry weather to continue; one has his turnips to get sown as the chief dependence for his live stock in winter; the other has his hay to get in as the chief dependence for his stock. The weather at present is good for all of them. The turnip sower in Kent is getting his land prepared in the best manner, and all the weeds destroyed, (so far as a Kent farmer troubles himself about destroying weeds,) and the haymaker is going on most gloriously making his hay while the sun shines. Then there is the Corn Bill about to become law, and admit maize, and beans, and peas, and oats, and barley, to help to feed cattle and sheep with their green crops. Already has mustard feeding been tried, and the green mustard, which grows up four or five times in an ordinary summer, a product of the soil far more abundant and profitable than any other succulent, only wants to have an admixture of grain or pulse (some dry mealy food) to qualify it to become the favourite of the farmers for the summer supply of the markets with mutton, and the pockets with cash, and the soil with fertility.

Then again there is the flax seed, which will doubtless soon become a home product on every farm when the coarser grains and pulse can be obtained freely and moderately priced, to mingle with it and with roots for cattle food in winter (thanks once again to Mr. Waines, of Norfolk, for his indefatigable exertions in the cause of flax seed and cattle feeding, and thanks to the Free Trade which is to supply him with material and consume his beef!)

All these things are pointing to the coming circumstances of agriculture; namely, that the best of all manures shall be produced at home, not purchased at an expense of five or six millions sterling per annum as now; that less land shall be sown with wheat, yet not less wheat shall grow; that the cultivation of wheat shall consequently cost less per acre; that more labour shall be employed per acre in producing beef and mutton, which will render a scientific system of feeding, like that of Mr. Waines's, return the farmer's capital at least three times a year, with a profit each time, instead of once a year, as upon corn, with occasionally (from the expense of fertilising) no profit at all.

These thoughts arise in the mind while in Kent more readily than anywhere else. We already see the two millions of mouths in London agape for more food, for more, more, more; they get mutton, and they must have turnips; and they must have greens, cauliflowers, broccoli, carrots, &c., not forgetting potatoes; potatoes and greens, and they must have beef to them or bacon; lamb, they must have green peas; green peas, they must have lamb, or ducks, or a young goose; a dinner of meat and vegetables, they must have puddings, tarts, custards, and fruit after these. If they do not all live thus why is it? Only because they cannot all afford it. And what is Kent doing? Growing more; growing year after year, crop after crop, even in the same year, to feed London that has its two millions of mouths always open. And Kent finds (so do all the metropolitan counties) that the more food she supplies regularly to the metropolis the greater becomes the demand for it. Who are they that do not eat the best of everything? Those who cannot afford it; none else. Who, then, shall set bounds to the consumption of all England, and Scotland, and Ireland; even to Ireland, when her people at home shall do as her people removed to London do, eat beef and mutton with their potatoes? Up, farmers, and to work, and open the nation's gates to commerce—and get commerce to help you to feed cattle and sheep in thousands where you have only now hundreds; thousands of people are ready to eat them as soon as they can get them, where hundreds only eat them now. Up, merchants, and abroad upon the world, and get cattle for the farmers; help them to be manufacturers of human food, and make every farm a factory of the first necessities of life. Up, manufacturers, and craftsmen, every one who cover and lodge and adorn the human body, make one another and all able, as nature has made you all willing and ready, to be the customers of the food manufacturers on the farms! Shall all this not be? Aye, shall it; and England shall be one broad market garden, as truly as the fields of Surrey and Kent nearest London are so now.

LETTER II.

But omitting anticipations of the future, let us revert to the present, as indicated at the beginning of the previous letter. Let the reader take a few minutes of his spare time and follow me; I will take him quicker through Kent even than the locomotives on the rails, so he need not fear his loss of time. I will let him see what the cuttings and tunnels and speed of the trains permits him not to see, so he need not fear that his journey will be mere locomotion and noise and bustle.

Once more I say, when did wheat look better than this year's wheat? See, some of the farmers have old ricks on hand yet. They had better thresh out and sell. See, how their farm buildings stand unhelpful of one another on the farm; a stable and a yard here; a shed for cattle 400 yards from the stable and the yard; a barn half a mile, on this large farm, from either; another barn in another field; a rick half-way between the barns! No order, no economy of labour. Kent is lovely. No eye that was formed to look upon and admire the beauty of wooded hill and watered valley, of luxuriant green and profuse blossom, can look upon Kent and be unkind and ill-contented in its looks. Still Kent might be all as lovely, and have her barns more conveniently assembled for the work of each farm.

Look here! We are between Maidstone and Tunbridge. Has the world, any part of it beyond these two towns, anything like those ten miles of country lying between the towns? This has been asked by other travellers; and Cobbett, long ago, said, the world has nothing else like this. We, who see this for the first time, in June, 1846, say the same. Not but there are rich alluvial valleys in the world, with hills rising on the outsides of them, and even a better river than the Medway in the centre; but what country in the world brews beer like England? Where is the hop culture for the beer brewing carried to such perfection? Where is the plant that equals the hop in beauty, when seen as we now see it, over miles of country. When seen even naked of the hop and of all adornment, it is still lovely.

Let us glance at these hop-grounds; the poles are all up in clusters of four, six, or seven, or eight, and perhaps more, according to the size of the stool of the plant and number of its shoots. Three or four feet apart, those clusters of poles stand in rows. The men are "shimming." We see a kind of plough, drawn by horses, a man holding it, and a boy leading the horses. It turns out the weeds and loosens the earth; that is what they call "shimming."

The women are "tying," and some of them "horseing." They, as we see, tie the vines to the poles; and when the vine grows near the top of the pole, the tyer gets a folding ladder, called a horse, and mounts to tie them. This is called "horseing." A woman takes for the season from one to two and a-half acres to tie and horse, according to her ability, or her freedom from family cares. They will earn, the best of them, about 1s. 6d. a day at the work.

The women we see feeding and working in the fields with the hoe, are paid about 10d. or 1s. a day. The hay-makers get from 1s. 3d. to 1s. 6d.; the hours of work being longer and the work harder. But they are mostly all hired by the men who take the "job of haymaking" from the farmer by contract.

Whatever may be said in favour of Scotch farming in general over English farming, the Scotch haymaking is far behind English haymaking; and in the metropolitan counties the making of hay has attained to an excellence matchless anywhere else. At any age to which hay is kept, it is found here to be as sweet and fragrant as at first. It never withers; from the hour it is cut it is worked with the rakes and forks until it is finally built into a rick. The sun and the enamoured atmosphere would luxuriate with it, and rob it of its sweetness, if it lay ungarded on the open field; but they are not suffered to make waste of it; and it yields the atmosphere all the more fragrance that it is never out of the hands of those who have the care of it.

Breathe it in this odorous air! Would you not say that the favourite meeting place of heaven and earth must be among the new hay? Yet in Kent you would even doubt this if you saw the forests and fields of fruit trees in blossom when they are in their prime.

But the blossom is over now. Some of it was bit by frost this year because it came too soon out, and was caught by lingering winter while it looked for early summer. Some say there is a caterpillar, too, and many other insects more than enough. Perhaps there are more than usual; but who shall say they are not performing the useful office of counteracting, in their existence, some disease inherent in vegetation, which in their absence would appear in another and a worse form?

We proceed on. We have left Canterbury, and our journey is north. Can we say so much of vegetation, and say nothing of the people? Here is Blean Wood; there is Boughton; and again, here is the ozier bed. Has the world forgot what happened here in hot weather just like this eight years ago?

Perhaps the world has; and so perhaps has Canterbury, and all its priesthood. Not so those tillers of the fields. Despite their proximity to the head-quarters of that church which in England has taken Christianity under its special care, they (not a few of them) believe as religiously in the sanctity of Mad Thom, who with their brothers and fathers was slain here, as ever pilgrims believed in Thomas A'Beckett. In short, there is still a dismal lingering faith among the unlettered peasantry of this part of Kent that the monomaniac Thom, alias Sir William Courtenay, Knight of Malta and Jerusalem, was what in his wildest moments he said he was—the second incarnation of divinity upon earth.

A disposition to believe in superstitious marvels is common in other parts of Kent as well as here. Mr. Vaughan, in his "Report on the Employment of Women and Children in Agriculture," says, "I was informed credibly of a very substantial farmer in the north-east of Kent, who within a very few years used to arrange his scythes in a particular order around his stables to secure his horses from witchcraft."

And, again, Mr. Vaughan says: "Superstition (the result here, at least, of ignorance) still lurks among the labouring classes in these counties; the belief in charms for the healing of bodily hurts is not uncommon; faith in the same means of fertilising the ground and trees is said to exist."

Mr. Vaughan might have spoken more positively. Faith in fertilising the soil by charms and incantations, does exist, as certainly as Acts of Parliament for the maintenance of high prices exist. The gypsies, who are so plentiful in Kent, and the political jugglers, who are hardly so excusable as the gypsies, keep up both delusions.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

AMERICAN PRODUCE.

The importations of provisions from the United States, into the ports of London and Liverpool, have continued to be of an extensive nature, and are of importance as showing the extent to which the supply of such articles from that quarter is carried. The following are the principal arrivals of the kind, since our last notice of the subject some days since:—The Margaret Evans arrived at this port from New York, having 3050 barrels of flour, 400 packages of oil cake, 50 of clover seed, 40 of lard, 104 of arrow root, and 9600 staves for coopers' use on board, in addition to an extensive cargo, comprising rosin, turpentine, and other articles; and the Paoli, from Baltimore, brought 3501 packages of flour, 102 of pork, 10 packages of cyder, and other articles; and the Diamond, from Alexandria, United States, 8634 packages of flour, and other produce. The ship Swan, which arrived at the port of Liverpool, from New Orleans, had on board 2753 packages of flour, 408 of pork, 50 of tongues, 111 packages of oil cake for feeding cattle, and 5000 staves for cooping purposes, in addition to an extensive cargo of cotton, hemp, hides, &c. The ship Henry, subsequently arrived at this port from New Orleans, brought 1254 packages of beef, 459 of lard, 147 tierces, and 586,758 lb. loose of oil cake, and 1500 staves for cooping purposes; and the Oceana, also from New Orleans, a very large quantity of oil cake, seeds, staves, &c. The North Star, from Philadelphia, at the port of Liverpool, brought 2535 packages of flour, a quantity of clover seed, &c.; the Actæon, from New Orleans, 204 bags of Indian corn, 279 of beef, and 2400 staves; the Eleanor, also from New Orleans, a large quantity of cotton, 1200 staves, and a quantity of heading for making casks; the United States, from New Orleans, a quantity of cotton, 6000 oak staves, 200 packages of pork, 813 of flour, 432 of lard, 60 of bacon, and 746 packages of beef. The Charlemagne, arrived from New Orleans, brought 5000 bales of cotton, 2000 sacks of Indian corn, 4000 of flour and other articles; and the Athole, from Montreal, Quebec, and St. George's Bay, Newfoundland, 1797 packages of flour, 910 quarters of wheat, 340 of butter, 100 barrels of herrings, and a large quantity of coopers' staves, of Canadian produce. The T. H. Perkins, subsequently arrived at the port of Liverpool, from New Orleans, brought 1960 packages of flour, 471 of lard, 754 of beef, 1009 sacks of Indian corn, and 30,000 tree-nails for ship-building purposes; the Siddons, from New York, 4316 packages of flour, 60 of bread, 70 of beef, &c.; the Astræon, also from New York, 1226 packages of beef, 500 of flour, and 3400 staves; the Corin, from New Orleans, 1773 packages of beef, 928 of flour, and 10,000 staves; the Ram-mohun Roy, from Philadelphia, 3712 packages of flour, 60 of beef, &c.; and the Susekannah, from the same place, 4420 barrels, and 48 half barrels of flour and other articles; the Great Western brought 1000 bags of corn meal, a large quantity of clover seed, and other articles; the Ward Chipman, from New Orleans, 1666 packages of flour, and 85 of grease, 49 of pork, 260 quarters of wheat, 153 of beans and 269 of corn, 1079 packages of lard, 168 of beef, 19,200 staves, and other articles; and finally, the ship Barbara, from Halifax, brought among other articles 573 packages of flour, 40 of pork, 129 of herrings, 13,260 staves, 55,400 lbs. for the peculiar purposes to which they are especially applied, and a large quantity of hardwood, timber, planks, battens, and other wood goods peculiar to North America. The numerous vessels mentioned have contained, in addition to the articles named, extensive cargoes of the usual description of articles known as being produced in the United States, and brought thence to this country; but we have generally confined ourselves to the articles of food and general provisions which have arrived, it being our intention to show the extent to which the production of such articles in the States is carried, and to how great a degree we avail ourselves in the matter, both of which will be evident from a cursory glance at the list of importations which we have enumerated, and which are of interest and importance. From the extensive arrivals of food and general provisions which appear to be constantly brought here from North America, coupled with the extensive importations from almost every State in Europe, Holland, France, and Germany especially, not to speak of the amazing supplies of every description from the sister country, all of which appear in our columns at full length, and in round figures, so plainly as to afford no chance of a mistake about the matter, it will, we think, appear conclusive that although the supplies of our own country are immense, and the soil most productive of all that its inhabitants can require or desire, we are in no trifling measure indebted to extraneous sources for the further supply of food; or if it be willed so, we avail ourselves of the means afforded by foreign and distant countries, which would argue that such supply is eminently necessary and advantageous, otherwise it would not be the case.—Times.

NOVEL ASPECT OF CONSERVATISM.—As soon as the Lords had given their assent to the second reading of the Corn Bill, the Morning Herald and Standard commenced a most furious attack on the house, denounced the absurdity of an hereditary peerage, and accorded a preference to the nobility for life of France, or the elective senate of the United States. Not content with attacking this branch of the legislature, it has since turned against the Crown, declaring that "all her Majesty's maternal relations, as well as the relations of her royal consort, have a deep, personal, and pecuniary interest adverse to the interests of British agriculture." Surely this is Conservatism with a vengeance. Did any Corn Law repugner ever advocate such destructive views?

Dr. Lardner is engaged in preparing a philosophical work to be called "Five Years in America,"

AGRICULTURE.

AN EMPTY THREAT.

The political monopolists are strange people. They live in a little dreamy world of their own. Possessed of land, to which an enormous value has been given by the labour and industry of the rest of the community, without thought or effort of their own, they are angry that the people won't submit any longer to be taxed, in order to give monopolist landowners' land an artificial value. In their despair at having their hands taken out of other people's pockets, they utter all kinds of nonsensical prophecies, and indulge in most ridiculous threats. "Wheat will be to be had for next to nothing, while nobody will have anything to buy any, when the trade in grain shall be free, is, in brief," the burthen of monopolist prediction. But perhaps the most serious threat, if it had been serious, is that which we lately met with in the leading columns of the monopolists' organ, the Morning Post. After commenting on a pamphlet, by the elder Mr. Gladstone, who stoutly writes in support of that mischievous monopoly his son has aided to break down, and says the price of wheat will be 40s. a quarter when the corn trade is free, the editor of the Post proceeds thus:

"The consequence anticipated to the English landowner is that he must abandon his present position in society—that he must cultivate his own land according to the Continental custom. But he cannot convert his tenants into servants. They cannot descend to the position of labourers, because there are already enough of labourers without them. What, then, it is asked, is to become of the tenants?"

Now, speaking as a tenant farmer, bound by a long lease at a high rent on land naturally poor, we have no sort of apprehension, and we believe there is no good farmer in Great Britain who does entertain any serious apprehension of ruin, or even loss, should the price of wheat become 40s. a quarter. The occasion for putting the Post's threat in execution is, therefore, not likely to arise. But if there was any chance of the landowners taking to cultivate their own lands—where they are to find the lowest amount of capital even now regarded as necessary for farming, we are at a loss to guess—we must admit that it would prove a very serious affair for the community. Then, indeed, there would be danger of scarcity; then we should probably have prices high enough to content the most stony monopolist heart. The landowners of this country, however, are utterly incapable of growing on their own land, taking the country through, one-half of the produce which is now grown by tenant farmers. Yet it is allowed on all hands that full one-third more of produce—we speak within the mark—might be grown by the tenants, but for the injudicious regulations and mismanagement of the landowners.

It is very well for the oracle of the servants' hall, and, of late, of the monopolist lords and squires themselves, after imagining a long concatenation of impossible contingencies, to ask, "What is to become of the tenants?" but there is a previous question to be considered by the landowners before they will have to become occupiers of their own land, namely, "What is to become of the rents?"

Now the slightest reflection on the part of those least acquainted with agriculture, would convince them that all threats of landlords occupying their own land, and turning their tenants upon the world, are the most silly imaginable. Lord Stanley tells the peers, boasting, that the landowners are not a saving class—that they spend all their incomes as soon as they get them, if not a little before—and we have no doubt the house fully assented to the statement. Moreover, there is scarcely a landowner of any extent whose estates are not mortgaged, and charged with annuities to a greater or less extent; and nearly all are merely tenants for life under settlements, who could only raise money to begin farming with by way of annuity, or by changing their life interests, and insuring their lives to secure repayment of the principal money borrowed. But let us suppose all these difficulties got over, and that by hook or by crook the landlord has scraped together enough ready money to take to his farms. In the first place, he must trust the management to a steward or bailiff having none of the knowledge or habits of business necessary to farm even moderately well. Let this difficulty, however, be also surmounted, and we behold the owner of 10, 20, or 40,000 acres his own tenant, and himself his only tenant. Let the crops be well got in, let the season be propitious, let all be supposed to happen to the man of little knowledge and no industry, which could under the most favourable circumstances be produced by enterprise, skill, and activity in husbandry, and what is the tenant-landlord's position? Why, for one year certain, he has no income; in fact, for two years, the farmer commencing business can scarcely be said to derive any income from his farm.

But for our illustration the absence of one year's income is amply sufficient. How, during that year, is the interest on mortgages and incumbrances to be kept down? The tenant-landlord would find that by his first harvest some Chancery suit to foreclose his mortgages would be pressing him sharply. Then there would be the interest on the money borrowed to farm with, and, in the case of a tenant for life, the premium on life assurances whereby that money was secured. Imagine the position of a lordly or squirearchical household under such circumstances. What is to become of my lady's pin-money? How are the wine-merchants' and the coachmakers' bills, the opera-box, and the cost of the racing and hunting stables to be paid? How will the portly butler, the burley porter, the fat coachman, the train of spruce footmen, the housekeeper, the ladies' maids, and the long muster roll of an aristocratic establishment be provided for?

Need we go on? Is there a monopolist in either House of Parliament to whom this view of his position is not convincing, if not satisfactory?

The circumstance that some landlords farm, and so far as produce goes, farm well, tells nothing; for they merely conduct their farming as an amusement, without regard to profit or loss. As a wealthy and highly educated landlord once observed to us, "the plough is a very expensive play-thing."

But, after all, even these threats of the Post go for nothing. They probably echo only the second-hand obligations of monopolists' servants' hall, for the monopolist landlords are taking just the opposite line to that indicated by the Post. They are improving, or promoting, or compelling improvements on their estates. The money-loving Marquis of Salisbury is converting cold and poor woodlands into farming land as a good speculation; while the moneyless Duke of Buckingham is making his tenants do the same kind of thing, at their own cost, and charging them full rents for the land when improved by their own capital. This does not look like English husbandry going back to the primitive condition of that of Germany.

FOREIGN COMPETITION FALLACIES.

The following passage from the letter of an English farmer resident on the banks of the Elbe, shows very sufficient reasons why the British farmer has nothing to fear, at all events, from German competition:

"The English farmer's dread of any change in the Corn Laws (says my informant) is founded on four chief particulars, in which he supposes himself likely to be placed at a disadvantage compared with the Continental corn grower; and these are, the great surplus grown abroad beyond the requirements of the inhabitants, the vastly increased quantity of land which the stimulus of a certain market will bring under the plough, the low rate of Continental labour, and the absence of all public burdens on the land. But a more competent knowledge of the position of those German states whose competition is most generally dreaded would entirely remove those fears, by showing the utter groundlessness of some of them, and the immensely more than counterbalancing advantages which the British cultivator possesses in regard to climate and command of labour, the first of which his Continental competitor can never, and the second not probably before the lapse of centuries, hope to equal, not to touch (at present) on his incalculable superiority in agricultural implements and breeds of farm stock. The first supposed ground for alarm, viz., the great grain surplus grown on the Continent, may be got rid of by a single sentence—we have no stock. For three successive years droughts in some parts and tropical rains in other, causing the most devastating inundations, have literally swept away the hopes of the farmer before his eyes. This has especially been the case in Upper Silesia, where even recently tremendous rains have damaged the winter and limited the sowing of spring grain, and Poland, whence large supplies of the finest wheat used to be shipped at Dantisc, Elbing, and other Prussian ports, in consequence of which the inhabitants of those once fruitful, but, for years to come, greatly deteriorated districts, so far from having anything to spare, have had a scanty supply for themselves. Russia, too, has suffered from more than one bad harvest, and such was last year the famished state of some of her provinces, that it was esteemed a Providential interference that the almost unprecedented circumstances of the Baltic remaining open till January permitted the uninterrupted transport of grain to the starving population of Livonia and Esthonia. Stores of grain, therefore, do not now exist here, with which to inundate the English market; neither is there a prospect of any redundance from the ensuing harvest, since the inundated banks of the Vistula and Elbe will produce comparatively little, while the high price of grain last autumn naturally restricted the sowing to what was considered unavoidably requisite. Furthermore, the yearly increasing population of these countries calling here as elsewhere for increase of food, there is little likelihood that the land now under cultivation can produce, even in favourable seasons, so large a surplus as to make an essential impression on English prices, setting aside the self-evident consideration that the German corn-grower hopes, and assuredly will strive to obtain, by a rise in his price, a share of that profit which English importation, under the sliding scale, has hitherto poured into the pockets of the corn-merchants only, without benefiting either the English consumer or farmer; for a short crop being generally an ill-saved one, the consequent low average and high duty, though they grind the face of the poor buyer, do not enrich the English grower, who cannot obtain for his ill-conditioned corn more than it is worth, however large the price given to the importer of sound foreign corn."

Then the repetition of five and six grain crops, followed by a four or five years' rest in half-and-half pasture, being the common German rotation, is of itself sufficient to calm the alarm of the most sensitive agriculturists. Again the land in Germany is all under culture of some kind or other, and the character of the people is such that they are not easily induced to become improvers.

RURAL ECONOMY.

We are convinced that one of the consequences of an earnest, business-like attention to the details of farming, which will result from the abandonment of the delusions of "protection" will be, the more economical feeding of our stock. Can any one have seen cattle turned into abundant pasture without remarking what a large proportion they soil, waste, and destroy unprofitably?

We know from our own experiments that by keeping cattle in the houses and sheds, and cutting grass for soiling them, they can be kept for less than half the cost they occasion when turned out. By having a paddock into which they can be turned a few hours daily, all the advantage of exercise is attained, and a greatly increased quantity of manure during the time they remain in the stalls. The following is another mode recommended to economise food:

"A HINT FOR DAIRY FARMERS.—Last week we took an opportunity of visiting a farm occupied by Mr. Dumbrell, who has adopted the system of tethering his cows upon a somewhat new and profitable system. The land is of a light and shaly soil, and through the judicious management of the tenant, by the economical use of liquid manure, and by judicious depasturing, he has brought the land into a high state of cultivation. The Alpha and the Omega of his system is, perhaps, that of root culture, which has enabled him to keep a much greater number of cows upon the land to the acreage than is to be met with in the neighbourhood. The great difficulty which most dairy farmers meet with in keeping cows profitably during the two months preceding the hay harvest has been overcome by Mr. Dumbrell, who by tethering the cows is enabled to make the meadows, of comparatively smaller dimensions than is customary, yield food in sufficient abundance for his dairy. The usual way of tethering is to allow a cow the range of a circle to the extent of the chain; and when it has eaten down its food within its area, it is removed to another spot. Instead of doing this, Mr. Dumbrell tethers his cow with a chain of 12 to 15 feet, and begins at the side of the field; and when it has consumed the grass within its reach, the pin is removed onwards a foot or a foot and a half; the cow then eats this quantity, and is again allowed another bite of the same extent. This plan prevents the animal from treading on the food which it consumes while quite fresh, and the chain assists in distributing the droppings. The field is thus fed over evenly, and all is consumed and none trodden upon. Mr. Dumbrell professes to realise good profits from his system, and with a degree of liberality highly creditable to his character, reserves no information from his visitors."—Surrey Standard.

TENURES AND TENANT RIGHTS.

It is surprising how rapidly agricultural opinion is forming definite and sound conclusions on these topics; and conclusions which are directly opposed to all the prejudices and semi-feudal notions of the landowners.

We scarcely take up an agricultural paper without meeting some such notices as the following:

"TENANT RIGHT.—NORTH AND SOUTH WILTS FARMERS' CLUB.—At the first meeting of this Tenant Farmers' Club held in August last, the subject of 'tenant right' was brought under discussion, and so fully persuaded were the members of establishing the principle for the mutual advantage of landlord and tenant by improved covenants, it was resolved: 'That a committee be formed, to frame a model lease.'

Again, at Monmouth, Mr. George, apparently a landowner, seems to hesitate about granting 21 years' leases, the shortest term a farmer ought to accept, but says:

"My opinion is, that any lease for a less term than ten years is a disadvantage to a tenant, as many landlords who grant leases, say seven years, consider they have a moral right to make a fresh bargain at the expiration of the term; and if the farmer has ventured to invest his capital in the improvement of the land, he will run the risk of paying in interest upon such capital in the shape of increased rent; and probably the same landlords would not on any account give a yearly tenant notice to quit, unless they had good reasons, such as great arrears of rent, or negligent farming."

The truth is, that a seven or even a ten years' lease is nothing but a trap for farmers; they may get their land into good condition in that time, but it will be for the landlords' benefit, not their own. Every man who means to farm well ought to require a 21 years' lease. There are many cases in which it would be reasonable on the part of the landlord to stipulate for an agreed advance of rent at the end of each period of seven years; and if farmers would accede to some such plan, we think many landowners would abandon their objections to long leases.

Mr. George made the following remarks on the prudence of not taking too much land, which the farmer of every grade would do well to bear in mind:

"Before I conclude, allow me to call your attention to a rock upon which many an industrious farmer has been wrecked, and just at the time that he has considered himself in smooth water. I mean the too great eagerness to get into a larger farm. I would caution every farmer, before he much increases his farm, to calculate his increased liabilities, and clearly ascertain that he will provide for such increase, not only in fair weather but in foul. Depend upon it that a farmer, in a moderate-sized farm, with a few pounds at his banker's to meet his half-year's rent, is much better off than he would be in a larger farm with all his capital invested in his stock. In the former case it is true he has small interest, but it is certain: in the latter case, he may probably be compelled to sell, just at the time that he ought to hold; and these forced sales, by depressing the markets, not only injure the farmer himself, but his brother agriculturists."

The following account of tenant-right in Madeira shows that everywhere secure tenure is the indispensable preliminary to high cultivation:

"TENANT RIGHT.—In Madeira there is very little change respecting tenants, and every inducement is given for encouraging the tenant, which is not in vain, as generally the island may be said to be tilled on the most approved plan for producing the greatest quantity. In every district there are valuers appointed, who, in case of removal, value what the incoming tenant has to pay, and they proceed on a twofold plan. If the landlord takes possession, then the valuers give the outgoing tenant what they consider the full value for all improvements in buildings and land; but should the tenant be followed by another tenant, then two-thirds only of the value is paid by the incoming tenant. Then, again, while the tenant is allowed to make all improvement he pleases, yet it guards the landlord by not allowing him to give up the land without providing another tenant; and the outgoing tenant is obliged to find a third, unless the landlord accepts either of the two first; but if he refuses them he is bound to accept the third, otherwise a tenant might lay out a very great sum in building and other improvements (as he might call them), and make his landlord pay the full value; this plan is well adapted to protect both landlord and tenant."

MONOPOLIST EVIDENCE FOR FREE TRADE.

The Duke of Buckingham, like his fellow monopolist, the Marquis of Salisbury, is giving the best practical contradiction to his own votes and the speeches of his faction in the House of Lords. Land must go out of cultivation, say the Parliamentary monopolists. Farmers must be ruined, belloweth Bentinck of the stable mind. There will be no work for the agricultural labourer, whineeth the Duke of Richmond; and all these dire forebodings are to be realised on the passing of the Government measure.

Now we have always said that the political monopolists have no faith in their own nostrum. Their marked characteristic is that of political profligacy; for what can be more base than to delude the more ignorant farmers with these fabulous tales of prospective injury? However, so far as the Duke of Buckingham is concerned, we are content to set his acts against his votes and his speeches, and to ask the farmers whether they believe in the duke's sincerity. Here is the contradiction of his speeches by his own act.

"The Duke of Buckingham is causing land to be brought into tillage on his Wotton estate. Twenty acres of rush beds, wood, in the parish of Brill, is now being cleared by his grace's orders, and is forthwith to be laid to two neighbouring farms, the tenants of which are, we understand, to pay the same rent for it as they do for the other land in their occupation, and are to 'grab it' at their own expense. The timber is chiefly oak, and a great portion of it very fine, and the underwood is all cut down. The duke has had from 50 to 60 men at work in felling and barking."—Bucks Gazette.

THE FREE TRADE CURRENT.

Though farmers, and amphibious squires in the fens, may be used, or stimulated to cause the rejection of liberal noblemen as conservators of the fens, on account of their votes on the Corn Law Bill, the quiet undercurrent of agricultural opinion, when undisturbed by the presence of monopolist lords or squires, is setting strongly and steadily towards Free Trade. Even those who still doubt desire a settlement, an immediate settlement, of the question, and they know that whilst a remnant of "restriction" exists there can be no settlement. Thus we find that at the South West Middlesex Agricultural Society, which was a quiet gathering of farmers, such sentiments were more than once expressed. For instance, Mr. May, alluding to the Metropolitan Sewerage Manure Company, whose Secretary had explained the objects and plan of the society, said:

"If they should be enabled to accomplish what they in their prospectus set forth, but of which he professed he had his doubts, then he thought he might with justice say that they would be far greater friends to the agriculturist than their pretended friend Sir Robert; and although he much disapproved of the present plan, still he thought the time had arrived when it was necessary that a settlement should take place, and that agriculturists would then know the worst, for that would be far preferable to the doubt and uncertainty that had lately prevailed; for now every one knew what they had to expect: formerly they had only to make up their minds to meet the difficulty in the best manner they could. Although he had expressed a doubt of the practicability of the plan proposed by Mr. Moore, it should be borne in mind that the agriculturist had nothing to lose by its failure; but, on the contrary, if it succeeded, he felt no hesitation in saying the agriculturist would be glad to become their customer, and that led him to repeat that the Metropolitan Sewerage Company would indeed be the true friend of the agriculturist if they succeeded."

And we may suggest to Mr. May that the same line of argument might be made more widely applicable to the condition of the farmers.

Mr. Moore, the company's secretary, truly said that the farmers are not the parties who are backward to improve. But they cannot improve, with safety to themselves and their families, as yearly tenants. He said:

"Even the subject to which he solicited their attention, to many appeared a strange one; and notwithstanding the too often expressed opinion of gentlemen in the metropolis, 'that the farmers were so bigoted to their old modes of management, they could not be induced to alter their system, however advantageous it would be to their interest,' he was happy to be able to state, that he had not come in contact with a single farmer in the country but was desirous of embracing every real improvement, and all of them were unanimous in their desire to obtain the liquid manure on the terms proposed by the company; and he had frequently to stand up in defence of the agriculturists in that respect; but he had to admit that they manifested a degree of caution in receiving merely theoretical projects introduced by persons having a smattering of chemical science without agricultural experience. The occupiers of land in that neighbourhood had many advantages, in climate, soil, manure, and market for their produce; the application of the liquid manure would be a very great addition to those advantages, and would enable them to sustain their position."

SIGNS OF AN ELECTION.

When certain birds or beasts fly or lie in particular ways, the observant naturalist predicts certain changes in the weather or peculiarities of seasons. Now geese, especially wild geese, are supposed by their flight and acts to indicate coming meteorological events. So do the deeds of some members of Parliament—we would not be supposed for a moment to liken any of these personages to geese—tell pretty distinctly when an election may be expected.

Perhaps a reader here and there may remember that a certain loquacious Squire Finch has been returned for some midland county in the room of a member who, on recovering his reason, found himself pledged chin-deep to monopoly, and consequently, obliged to give up his seat. Well, Squire Finch finds Parliament so much to his taste, that he wants to be elected again; and accordingly he sensibly enough seeks to propitiate the farmers. Behold the mode of propitiation:

"Mr. Finch, M.P., has informed his tenantry in Rutlandshire that he shall not in future preserve the game on his estates, and that they have his permission to shoot on their respective farms."

This is a move in the right direction, and one which will naturally incline the Rutland farmers to look with favour on Mr. Finch at the next election. But let them carry their recollection a little further back, and they will find that they are indebted to the Free Traders and the leaders of the League for the exposure of Game Law evils which the Squire Finches of the day would have fostered and concealed. This Game Law question is one of such vital importance to the farmers that we should strongly recommend them never to vote for any candidate who preserves or reserves game. Whatever else he may be, he is not a farmer's friend.

EARLY WHEAT.—On Thursday there were exhibited in the Exchange News-rooms specimens of wheat in full ear, from the farm of Harold Littledale, Esq., at Egremont. The stalks were full four feet high; the heads were strong and healthy. There is one peculiarity about this crop; the seed came last year from Australia, was the crop of 1844, and was taken from the ship's side to the three acre field, where it was sown in December. The wheat sown in October from the best English seed, in an adjoining field, though looking well, is not yet in ear. If a general conclusion may be drawn from this experiment, it is desirable to import seed from southern into northern climates; and it demonstrates the erroneousness of the prevalent opinion respecting the unfitness of seed intensely dried, while it shows, at the same time, the capacity of Australia as a wheat-producing country. In general, it is considered sufficient for the farmers' prospects if wheat gets into ear by the 20th of June, and we were about to take for granted that this early specimen was owing to the seed being Australian, when we learned that a whole field, from English seed, at the farm of R. E. Harvey, Esq., at Walton, was also in ear on Thursday. Still, as the Australian seed has anticipated the English seed on Mr. Littledale's farm, the inference is inevitable that Australian wheat is an early harvest under like circumstances. Mr. Harvey's mode of cultivation ought to be noted, for early harvests would be, generally, a blessing in this climate.—Liverpool Journal.

LORD MOUNT-EDGCUMBE AND LORD STANLEY.

My Lord,—Had the state of my health rendered it possible for me to attend the House of Lords, I should certainly have attempted there to have defended the vote which, by proxy, I have given in favour of the Government Corn Bill, and I cannot conceive that the motives which would have justified me in so doing will not equally justify the method I now adopt for making known my opinions. I can think of no more convenient form for the purpose than that of a letter to you, who have consented to lead that party with which it is now my misfortune, for the first time, to differ.

Although admitting that I still think much danger attends the great experiment which Ministers are attempting, and that my mind is not yet satisfied of the necessity of its introduction in a manner so destructive of confidence between the different classes in the commonwealth, I never yet gave any vote with more thorough confidence that it was in entire accordance with my duty.

It will be asked, What I vote for so important a measure of which you do not entirely approve? But, in return, let me ask, whether, in the existing complicated state of society, an isolated view can, or ought to, be taken of any subject; whether with it should not be taken into consideration concurrent circumstances from which it is impossible to separate it; and whether it is not a legislator's duty then to adopt that course which, after such a general view, his judgment and his conscience indicate? My principle is to do what is most expedient, looking to the future, for the general good, and to that I will be consistent; and let those who exclaim against expediency say upon what other grounds taxing food can be defended, in a country heavily taxed to maintain millions of paupers.

Were it possible to conceive that protection could for any number of years be continued, or that any Government could be found capable of carrying on the affairs of the State who would consent to maintain it, I might hesitate; but as my mind cannot entertain the smallest doubt upon either point, it is unable to conceive that any good could arise from the rejection of the measure, while the evils which must be produced by such a step are manifest and manifold. Let us consider what would be its immediate results.

First, Government might not dissolve. The consequences, then, would only be a miserable delay, a prolongation of that state of uncertainty which I believe no one denies that all trades and all classes are now suffering from, and a renewal of hatred-stirring excitement and clamour. Tell me not it is cowardice to listen to such clamour. I would never advocate attention to any such unsupported in Parliament; but to turn a deaf ear to one so violent and mischievous, supported by a majority of the Commons, and at least 19 out of 20 of the men who, by their talents and acquirements, have raised themselves one jot above their fellows, I hold not to be courage, but (I can use no milder term) recklessness folly.

Secondly, Ministers may dissolve, and possibly a majority in favour of this measure may be returned. But here I must observe, that I hold that such an appeal, upon any specific point, to the constituency is an act to be avoided as most democratic in principle. It is evidently the desire of many of the constituent body to become legislators themselves, instead of the electors of legislators; and any call upon them to send men not to consult, but merely to enforce an already-formed determination, can but sanction and encourage that desire. Too much care, on the contrary, cannot be taken to maintain the independence, so much threatened, of the members of Parliament. But to return. Suppose a majority in favour of the measure be elected, what will then be gained to compensate for the evils which must arise from the bitterest class-contest that was ever yet inflicted upon this country, and the putting into action that threatened system of employing manufacturing capital to overbear, by bagot votes, the local interest in the counties?

Thirdly, suppose that a small majority against, which is all, I imagine, that the most sanguine could expect, were returned—can it be believed that if, upon such principles, a Government could be formed, it could maintain itself against an opposition so formidable in numbers, yet infinitely more formidable in talent, ranged against them? and, if the attempt were made and failed, what then would be the consequences? I think the country would, from their recent lesson, have little desire of another dissolution; and that majority would be placed in the alternative of arresting all Government, or of passing the measure they were actually, in that case, sent as delegates to resist—they being the men, too, who had most violently denounced the change of opinions in others. I am unable to foresee any other possible contingencies, or aught but mischief to flow from either of these.

But it has been said, that it is derogatory to the honour of the Lords to yield their known opinion to that of the other powers of the State. Their right to maintain it, they, I trust, will never yield; but it is not for those who were parties to the Reform Bill to blame a cautious exercise of that right. They were implored to consider what would be the effect of removing that unseen influence, evidently granted for the purpose of guarding against the danger of collisions. I wish not here to discuss, or give an opinion as to the propriety of the resistance to that appeal; but it is clear that since then that danger has been admitted and acknowledged. The evil apprehended has not yet occurred—but what has, on more than one occasion, protected us from it? What alone but the beneficent influence of the Duke of Wellington, controlling, by his wisdom and character, the feelings of the large party outraged by that measure, and still more by the means employed to pass it; and manifold and eminent as have been the services rendered to the State by the noble duke, for none ought the friends of the Constitution to feel more deeply grateful than for his conduct and success upon those occasions.

But is the danger over? Would that I could think so! On the contrary, it is but too probable that many years may not pass before a demagogue-elected Parliament may send up measures which it will be our imperious duty not only to oppose, but steadfastly, permanently to resist. In such a contest I am sure you, my lord, would take a prominent and leading part, and I think that I should not be found shrinking from the performance, to the utmost of my power, of mine, however humble; I will, however, not join in any such struggle, unless I know that there are competent statesmen ready to carry on the Government on the principles we combat for, or in which we can be supposed to engage, unaided by personal, still less pecuniary considerations. No man on earth can be deemed less likely to be influenced by base motives than British peers. Yet he is a bold man, he who he may, who will assert that he is aware of each hidden motive that may act upon his judgment; and he exacts much, who requires the public to believe him totally free from that weakness of human nature upon the supposed general existence of which is founded the law, that no man shall be a judge in his own case. Our consciences must not only be clear, but our character and motives must be exposed to no imputations that cannot more decidedly be met; let those who charge us with timidity, say what we have to dread but injury to the state—and is that a fear of which any man need be ashamed?

My conviction is, that, yielding this point, we shall, by confirming general confidence in our honour and disinterested patriotism, strengthen the grounds upon which alone our power rests.

Another important question still remains.—This measure passed, is the political horizon clear? Although the consequences of the conduct adopted by the ultra-Protestant party, after the Catholic Relief Bill, were such as emphatically to demonstrate that it is one which every man who pretends to be a friend to the constitution, or an enemy to change, ought most carefully to avoid, yet it is said it will be followed. Yes, undeniable though it be, that it is the duty of a party not strong enough to form a Government itself, to support, or at least not furtively to thwart, the one least likely to act in opposition to the principles they themselves avow.

Danger may be apprehended from a Minister on whose firmness and consistency reliance cannot be placed, but evil is certain to flow from a Government so weak that it must pander to extreme parties for existence; and deep is the responsibility of those who render it impossible for any to be carried on except by such means.

'Tis hard to think that men of indisputably high character will let any sense of wrong from individuals, or desire for what they consider retributive justice, blind them to such considerations; fortunately, impossible to believe that you, my lord, would encourage them in such a course. Their opposition to Ministers who have given them such grounds for offence may be in accordance with justice and consistency. Justice is to be admired, but not political justice so blind that, in aiming at individuals, it wounds the State. Inconsistency is to be deprecated, but let all who fear violent changes dread and defend us from the honest indignation of reckless consistency!

I have the honour to be, with unfeigned respect for your talents and character,

Your Lordship's most faithful servant,
MOUNT-EDGCUMBE.

Bath, June 8.

P.S. Since the above was in print, I have heard of the meeting at Lord John Russell's, and seen the report of Lord George Bentinck's speech. Not doubting, that from a Government they did not wish to thwart, the Irish measure would have been accepted by both, I am only confirmed in my belief that the suggestions I have ventured to make are well worthy of attention, come from what source they may. If Lord George Bentinck intends to take office with Lord John Russell, or, with his cheerers, to form a fellow-joint to Mr. O'Connell's in his lordship's tail—although nothing, in my opinion, can justify the violence of his language—his conduct may be in accordance with his public duty. The formation of a Government by his party alone is held, by all I have ever met with, as a chimera only calculated to raise a smile. The talent to vituperate and destroy a minister does not prove the ability to be one; and the determination to impede all government—aid none, though the expression of it may excite party cheers, will not gain the nation's confidence. The opinion that it is for the public good that the Queen should have an efficient Government is not entertained by the Duke of Wellington alone.

When the Irish Church is prostrate, social changes now too violent to be more than vaguely hinted at, embodied in Ministerial measures, and another phalanx of ultra-Liberals corralled to enforce them, consistency may even by him be deemed a virtue that may be pushed too far. My consolation under such national misfortunes will be, that I have not permitted the fear of being deemed presumptuous to prevent me from making this feeble effort to awaken men's minds to consequences, the probability of which none, I think, whose judgment anger does not blind can dispute or deny.

CANADA AND THE REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.

The following is a copy of the address to her Majesty from the Legislative Assembly of Canada, respecting the admission of foreign corn into the British markets, which was so frequently alluded to in the last debate upon the subject:

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, respectfully beg leave to address your Majesty on a subject of the highest importance to the inhabitants of this province.

"We assure your Majesty, that while we have seen with unmingled satisfaction the happiness and prosperity of the people of this colony advancing in steady and successful progression under that moderate system of protection of her staple productions, grain, and timber, which your Majesty and your Imperial Parliament have hitherto graciously secured to them, we feel that we should be wanting in our duty, as well to your Majesty as to our constituents, did we fail earnestly to represent to your Majesty that we view with serious apprehension and alarm, as detrimental to the best interests of this colony, the adoption of the proposed principle of commercial intercourse now under the consideration of the Imperial Parliament.

"We cannot but fear that the abandonment of this protective principle, the very basis of the colonial commercial system, is not only calculated materially to retard the agricultural improvement of the country, and check its hitherto rising prosperity, but seriously to impair our ability to purchase the manufactured goods of Great Britain; a result alike prejudicial to this colony and the parent state.

"We feel truly grateful to your Majesty for enabling us, by guaranteeing the payment of 1,500,000*l.*, to undertake many valuable public improvements, which are now approaching to completion, and which under the existing laws would ultimately prove productive. But should the duties on foreign and colonial produce entering the United Kingdom be assimilated, as at present proposed by your Majesty's Imperial Government, it is much to be apprehended that the agriculturists of this province will be deprived of a fair and remunerative price for their surplus produce; and that, consequently, the increase of our staple products, which was reasonably anticipated, will be checked to such an extent as materially to lessen the prospect of our canals and other public works proving as productive as we had reason to expect.

"We respectfully represent to your Majesty, that, situated as Canada is, and with a climate so severe as to leave barely one-half of the year open for intercourse by the St. Lawrence with the mother country, the cost of transporting her products to market is much greater than is paid by the inhabitants of the United States; and that without a measure of protection, or some equivalent advantage, we cannot successfully compete with that country.

"It therefore becomes our duty, as faithful subjects of your Majesty, to point out what we sincerely believe must be the result of measures which have for their object the repeal of the laws affording protection to the Canadian export trade. First, it will discourage those at present engaged in agricultural pursuits from extending their operations; secondly, it will prevent the influx of respectable emigrants from the mother country, who have for many years past settled in large numbers on the waste lands of the province, and who, by their industry and capital, have materially contributed to that rapid advancement of the country which we have before noticed; and, lastly, it is much to be feared that, should the inhabitants of Canada, from the withdrawal of all protection to their staple products, find that they cannot successfully compete with their neighbours of the United States in the only market open to them, they will naturally and of necessity begin to doubt whether remaining a portion of the British empire will be of that paramount advantage which they have hitherto found it to be. These, we humbly submit, are considerations of grave importance both to your Majesty and the people of this province; and we trust we need not assure your Majesty that any changes which would tend in the remotest degree to weaken the ties that have for so many years, and under trying circumstances, bound the people of Canada to that land which they are proud to call their mother country, would be viewed as the greatest misfortune which could befall them.

"We would further remind your Majesty that while, in compliance with the recommendation of the Imperial Government, we have passed a law repealing all duty on American produce coming through our country for exportation, no similar advantage is accorded by the American Government to the people of this province, but that duties, amounting in most cases to prohibition, are rigorously maintained by that Government on every article of ours entering within their ports. The disadvantage we must labour under in this respect is so apparent that we respectfully request your Majesty will be pleased to cause the necessary steps to be taken for opening a negotiation with the Government of the United States for the admission of our products into their ports on the same terms that theirs are admitted into those of Great Britain and this colony.

"We also humbly request that your Majesty will favourably consider the justice of admitting the products of this province generally into the imperial ports free of duty, as the expense of transportation is in itself all the protection which our fellow-subjects in the United Kingdom can reasonably expect as respects the imports from a colony situated at such a distance from the mother country, and with ports closed to commerce for so large a portion of the year. And we the more confidently appeal to your Majesty's justice upon this point as the relief we seek in this particular is in strict accordance with the very principles upon which the charges that we deprecate are based, as well as to the assurance received through your Majesty's Secretary of State, that it is the desire of your Majesty's Government that the trade of Canada should in all respects approach as nearly to perfect freedom as the wishes of the inhabitants and the exigencies of the public revenue may permit.

"While the subject that we have thus brought under the notice of your Majesty embraces other points requiring the gravest deliberation, and calling for the most favourable consideration on the part of the imperial authorities, your Majesty's faithful Commons have felt it to be their duty to your Majesty, to the Imperial Parliament and the mother country, and to their own constituents, to lose no time in at once approaching your Majesty with the declaration of their views upon that part of it embraced in their present address, and to which, renewing their assurance of devoted attachment to your Majesty's person and Government, they earnestly entreat your Majesty's most gracious and favourable consideration.

"Attested,

"W. B. LINDSAY, Clerk of Assembly.

"Legislative Assembly, Tuesday, May 12, 1846."

The following is Mr. Gladstone's reply:

"Downing-street, June 3.

"My Lord,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your lordship's despatch, No. 54, of the 13th of May, transmitting to me, for presentation to her Majesty, an address which has been voted by her Majesty's loyal subjects the Commons of Canada. In this address it is set forth that the Assembly of Canada regard the adoption of the principle of commercial intercourse now under the consideration of the Imperial Parliament with serious apprehension and alarm, and various grounds are stated for entertaining such impressions. Her Majesty has been pleased to receive this address with the fullest confidence in the loyalty and intelligence of her faithful Commons of Canada; but it is with sincere concern that her Majesty has learned the existence, in such a quarter, of anticipations of such a character.

"I have it in command from her Majesty to address to your lordship the following observations in regard to the matter of the address, which have been submitted by her Majesty's advisers for her gracious approval, and to which she has been pleased to give her sanction.

"Her Majesty's Government conceive that the protection principle cannot with justice be described as the universal basis, either of the general connection between the United Kingdom and its colonies, or even of their commercial connection. There is a large and important group of the colonies of this country, having a very extended commerce, and one of a peculiarly British character, in relation to which the protective system has at no time exercised a powerful influence, and in relation to which at present it has little more than a nominal existence. I speak of the Australian colonies. And it cannot fail to be remarked that while these are the most distant, and therefore, according to the supposition of many, the most in need of commercial preference, they have also made the most rapid progress, and have thus most effectually belied that necessity. It is true, indeed, that a part of their material prosperity may be ascribable to the supply of penal labour; but this is far from affording an explanation of the case, since perhaps the most remarkable instances of vigorous and rapid growth among the Australian possessions of her Majesty have been instances in which penal labour has been altogether unknown. The energy of the colonists has, without doubt, under Divine Providence, been the main cause of their singular advancement; stimulated, but not overborne, by distance, and aided, not repressed, by the enjoyment of commercial freedom. The same energies, with less disadvantage of distance to contend against, will, it may be confidently predicted, have a similar effect in developing the resources of British North America, and not with less, but rather with the more signal success when capital, industry, and skill shall be left to take their own spontaneous direction, and to turn to account, as individual prudence shall suggest, the abundant materials and instruments of wealth which the bounty of heaven has bestowed.

"Her Majesty's Government have been glad to find that the Assembly has viewed with an unmingled satisfaction the prosperity of Canada under the moderate system of protection which has hitherto prevailed; but the Assembly cannot fail to recollect that all the progressive relaxations of that system, which for a series of years past have been introduced into the law, have been met and resisted by predictions of the ruin that was honestly but erroneously conceived would follow them, and that those predictions have with a remarkable uniformity been disappointed. Experience cannot but suggest that a similar insecurity attaches to the renewal of the same expectations founded on the same arguments.

"It is not for the sake of controversial or purely argumentative advantage that her Majesty's Government refer to former apprehensions, and to the manner in which they have been dissipated by the event. A retrospect of this kind is calculated to throw clear and abundant light upon the real merits of the question. The fears which are now entertained have reference to the circumstance that it is proposed to remove all differential duty between Canadian and foreign corn. Is it, then, to be shown that the Canadian corn trade has prospered heretofore in proportion to the amount of such differential duty? Far otherwise. The law of 1828 diminished the difference in favour of Canada; the law of 1842 further and greatly diminished the difference in favour of Canada; the law of 1843, which reduced the duty on Canadian wheat to 1s. per quarter, still left a much smaller difference in its favour, as against foreign wheat, than existed under either of the former Corn Laws; and yet the corn trade of Canada has grown and prospered; and its extension has, doubtless, contributed in no small degree to the happiness and prosperity of the people of the colony, which the Assembly, sharing in the unmingled satisfaction of her Majesty and the British Parliament, has seen advancing in steady and successful progression. But this extension has taken place, not under protection secured from change, nor under protection fortified by successive increments, but contemporaneously with a series of changes involving its great diminution.

"It appears to be the impression of the Assembly that some great revolution of prices is likely to occur, as the consequence of the pending changes in the law, which will deprive the Canadian farmer of all hope of remuneration for his surplus produce. But the Canadian farmer is advancing from year to year in capital and in science; and, to say nothing of the great advantages he cannot fail to derive from improved communications, it would surely be rash to assert, nor probably do the Assembly in their address intend to imply, that his industry must be paralysed unless he shall continue to receive the precise amount of average payment for his grain that he has hitherto received for it. Doubtless the alarm which has been excited has reference to the idea of some sudden, great, and permanent reduction of price, to follow the repeal of the British Corn Law. Without pretending to estimate too nicely the momentary or the occasional effects of that measure, her Majesty's Government cannot but admit that they could better appreciate at least certain presumptive, though far from demonstrative, grounds for the alarm of the Canadian agriculturist in regard to the future fortunes of the colony if they shared in such an anticipation. To some reduction of average and usual price, from the removal of artificial restraints, they are disposed to look forward, but when they consider the steady and rapid growth of population in the corn-producing countries of the globe, they cannot but be persuaded that it would be unwise, whether in the friends or the opponents of commercial relaxation, to recommend or dissuade it on the ground of any great revolution in permanent prices to be operated by it; and their expectations of advantage, sanguine as these anticipations are, have reference in a greater degree to the increased steadiness of the market, and to the vigour which general trade will derive from the removal of restraints upon the exchange of commodities, and agriculture, from the cessation of all artificial influence disturbing the balance of its several pursuits, and from the wholesome stimulus that competition, which in farming pursuits can scarcely become overwrought, rarely fails to impart to industry.

"I am unwilling to repeat at length the arguments which I have addressed to your lordship in my despatch, No. 66, of the 18th of May, with respect to the other great subject of the alarm of the Assembly—namely, the trade in timber. When, however, we revert to the year 1812, it cannot but be acknowledged that this was the case of a trade peculiarly artificial as it stood under the former law. The reduction, though graduated, was decisive; perhaps in no case has it been more so; and certainly in no case have more uniform, confident, or sincere prophecies of ruin been hazarded by the opponents of the change. The result is, that the export of timber from British North America to this country attained during the last year to a height which it had never reached under the more protective law. I do not mean that the withdrawal of protection was either the exclusive, or even the principal direct cause of this prosperity; although there cannot be a doubt that many trades have to refer their vigour to the fact, that the absence of artificial support has in their case given free operation to the stimulus necessary for the development of natural and permanent resources. Increased demand in the United Kingdom has without doubt been the main and the immediate cause of the increased export of wood from British North America; but it is the conviction of her Majesty's Government that such increased demand was itself referable in no small degree to the relaxations of our commercial law; and therefore, in its due proportion, the growth of the timber trade is truly and justly, even if circuitously, to be ascribed to that very diminution of protection from which its ruin had been anticipated. We are now to look forward with hope to a further increase of the consuming power of this country; a further encouragement to the use of timber as compared with competing articles capable of being applied to the same purposes; a further encouragement to the use of Canadian timber, in combination with the wood of the Baltic, for those objects in regard to which the consumption of the one directly stimulates the consumption of the other. Is it too much to hope that causes so similar may produce like effects; and that the caution with which Parliament has proceeded in the gradual reduction of the timber duties to a moderate standard may be again rewarded by the satisfaction with which it will witness a further growth in the wood trade of Canada?

"Her Majesty's Government therefore cannot, on the part of the Imperial Exchequer, share in the fear that increased freedom of trade will have the effect of crippling the revenues of those important public works which are designed to facilitate the transit of the produce of Canada by the St. Lawrence to the sea. They can by no means subscribe to the opinion, that the comparative dearthness of this route is an established fact; and they likewise feel that if they did subscribe to that opinion, although it might corroborate the propriety of the course they have pursued in suggesting to Parliament the interposition of an interval before entire freedom shall be given to the corn trade, it could do no more; it could not induce them to ask, nor Parliament to grant, nor, they are certain, could it induce the people of Canada to desire, that the market of their farm produce should be maintained by means of a perpetual tax upon the people of England. In referring to the unchecked competition which, so far as British law is concerned, will be established between colonial and foreign corn by the repeal of the Corn Law, it perhaps may not have occurred to the Assembly that British law alone cannot suffice to establish this competition. The price which the foreign and colonial exporters of corn respectively will obtain for their grain in Great Britain must always be materially affected by the comparative degrees of facility which may be afforded in the country of the one and of the other for the introduction of those British goods by which payment for the corn must substantially be made. British goods are admitted into Canada at very low, into the American Union at very high, import duties. The effect of this is not merely to give to the British exporter a better position in the Canadian market than in that of the United States, but to enable him to give a better price for the commodity he purchases in return, and therefore to give to the corn trade of Canada a corresponding advantage, so long as the present tariffs continue, over that of the United States.

"With respect to that portion of the address which prays her Majesty to invite the Government of the United States to establish an equality of trade between the dominions of the republic, and the British North American colonies, I am commanded to instruct your lordship to assure the Assembly that her Majesty will readily cause directions to be given to her Minister at Washington to avail himself of the earliest suitable opportunity to press this important subject on the notice of that Government, and that it will afford her Majesty the most sincere satisfaction if any communication which may hereafter be held for this purpose shall have the effect which is desired by her faithful Commons of Canada.

"Her Majesty's Government have, as may be known to the Assembly, on several occasions endeavoured to make arrangements with foreign powers for the mutual relaxation of tariffs; and similar attempts have taken place among foreign powers, one with the other, but almost uniformly with ill success. Whatever arguments may be used to show the great increase of benefit that would accrue on both sides if states could have been induced to act simultaneously for this purpose, experience has sufficiently shown the difficulty of effecting those combined operations upon matters which are properly of domestic concern, and has suggested the wisdom of securing the incomplete advantage which depends upon our own free agency alone, rather than of foregoing it, in the vain endeavour to realise benefits larger indeed, but not within our reach. Should the Government of the United States continue to maintain the scale of import duties now in force upon its frontier, her Majesty's Government will view with regret a policy injurious to Canada; but they will reflect with satisfaction on the prevalence of laws more favourable to commerce on the Canadian side, and will anticipate from those laws both a direct benefit to the people and trade of the province, and the further advantage which a consistent example given by this country and by its colonies will, as they believe, not fail to realise in disposing foreign states towards the removal of restrictions on trade.

"With respect to that part of the address which relates to the duty of 1s. per quarter, which it is proposed to charge on all wheat imported into England after the repeal of the Corn Law, I am to refer your lordship to my despatch, No. 59, of the 18th April, on the same subject. From the purport of that despatch it would of course be even more difficult to recede at a period when the bill introduced into the House of Commons by the advisers of the Crown has passed through all its stages in that house, and has been affirmed, as to its principle, on the second reading by the House of Lords.

"It is necessary for me here to offer an explanation with regard to an expression of mine, which appears to have given rise to misapprehension. I have stated to your lordship, in a previous despatch, that her Majesty's Government desire that the trade of Canada should, in all respects, approach as near to perfect freedom as the dispositions of its inhabitants and the exigencies of the public revenue there may permit; and from this it is inferred, that the amount of 1s. per quarter, which has been adopted for a long period in this country as the standard of a nominal duty upon corn, ought to be removed. But the language which I employed had reference to the trade of Canada as effected by laws applicable in her own markets and on her own waters. Indeed, if the allusion had been to a rigid and perfect equality of trade in the ports and markets of this country, its first and most important bearing would, I apprehend, have been, not upon the nominal duty of 1s., which it is proposed to retain upon colonial in common with foreign corn, but rather upon the very considerable duties of 15s. and 18s. respectively, which, as against nominal duties of 1s. and 2s. on Canadian timber and deals, it is proposed to continue to charge on the corresponding foreign articles.

"Her Majesty's Government, in the discharge of their duty to the Crown and to the people of this country, and likewise to the empire at large, have not felt themselves to be at liberty to advise her Majesty to pass by the address of her Canadian Assembly with a brief or merely formal answer, although the advanced stage at which the deliberations of Parliament have now arrived might have afforded at least a technical justification for such a course. They have thought a more frank and full exposition of their views of this great question in its bearings upon Canada was due to the important body from which the address proceeds, and from which they are well assured may be anticipated the most candid consideration even of arguments opposed to their own. It is due especially on account of the importance of that body and of the province of Canada; but, even in the case of the smallest portion of her subjects, I have it in command to say that it would equally have been the desire of her Majesty that such a frank exposition of the policy of her Government should be made. Her Majesty does not recognise the distinction between her nearer and her more remote subjects with reference to a matter so nearly touching her relation towards them, and the duties and the sentiments of consideration and affection which it involves. Nor can she recognise in this view any distinction between the more and the less powerful, particularly at a time when her Parliament is engaged in the discussion of measures which are recommended to its notice, especially upon the ground that they tend to improve the condition of the most numerous and the least opulent classes of her people.

"It would indeed be a source of the greatest pain to her Majesty's Government if they could share in the impression that the connection between this country and Canada derived its vitality from no other source than from the exchange of commercial preferences. If it were so, it might appear to be a relation consisting in the exchange, not of benefits, but of burdens; if it were so, it would suggest the idea that the connection itself had reached, or was about to reach, the legitimate terms of its existence. But her Majesty's Government still augur for it a longer duration, founded upon a larger and firmer basis—upon protection rendered from the one side, and allegiance freely and loyally returned from the other—upon common traditions of the past, and hopes of the future—upon resemblances in origin, in laws, and in manners—in what inwardly binds men and communities of men together, as well as in the close association of those material interests which, as her Majesty's Government are convinced, are destined not to recede but to advance, not to be severed, but to be more closely and healthfully combined under the quickening influences of increased commercial freedom.

"I have, &c., W. E. GLADSTONE."

(From the Wiltshire Independent.)

The labourers of Goatacre and the adjoining villages have again met; but under circumstances which afforded a striking contrast to their former meeting. Then they assembled to detail their distress and to petition Parliament for relief. Their cry went through the breadth and length of the land, and reached the ear of the legislative assemblies of the empire. It has not been unheeded, for the very measure of relief which they so earnestly desired, is now almost in the certain road of becoming the law of the land. At this juncture of affairs, it was deemed desirable that a meeting should be held for the purpose of expressing the grateful feelings of the labourers towards the Government who have introduced this measure. This took place yesterday. Previously to the public meeting, the labourers with their wives and children, to the number of about 150, drank tea in the garden in front of Mr. Read's house.

At seven o'clock, Mr. W. WHITE, of Rushall, was called to the chair, and said that the meeting was called for a threefold purpose: 1st, to explain the principles of the Goatacre and North Wilts Building Society—a society which, he believed, would have a tendency to develop the principles of civil and religious liberty, and to raise the labourer in the social scale; 2dly, to acknowledge the kindness of those friends who had so generously responded to the call made upon their sympathies by the former meeting, and so kindly contributed to relieve the necessities of the sufferers; 3dly, to congratulate her Majesty's Ministers, and the friends of Free Trade who had so manfully advocated the cause in the House of Commons, on the success which had attended their efforts.

WM. EDWARDS then explained to the meeting the principles of the New Benefit and Building Society. He showed the evils of the old "club system," remarking that in North Wilts alone upwards of 28,387 was known to have been spent at the season of Whitsuntide in drinking. They saw this evil, and their object was to do away with the system of meeting at public-houses, and to apply all the funds for the benefit of the members. The building society was separate from the benefit society, and the principle on which they acted was this:—Every year the members would receive a dividend from the funds, which, instead of being paid over to them, should be transferred into the Building Society, in the name of trustees, on behalf of the members, and at the end of 13 years each member would receive his dividend in the shape of real property. Trustees would be appointed for every certain number of members, and the following agreement would be signed by all the members:—"We, the undersigned, members of the Goatacre and North Wilts Benefit Society, do mutually agree to transfer our dividends into the Goatacre and North Wilts Building Society, in the name of three trustees on our behalf. Such trustees shall take as many shares in the said Building Society as the directors of the Benefit Society shall instruct them to do, and shall take the shares jointly in the names of we the undersigned. The property so purchased shall be the property of us the undersigned members at the end of 13 years. Each member shall then receive his share of the property purchased by his dividend with interest thereon." It was proposed that "when sufficient shares were paid up in the Building Society, the Trustees shall purchase freehold or leasehold property to the amount of the sum paid up; that a ballot shall take place among the members of the Benefit Society holding the scrip of the said dividends, and the successful member shall have the property leased to him for his own life and that of his wife, at a rental of 4½ per cent." The Benefit Society was established on the same footing as many recently formed in London; each member under 26 years of age paying 2s. entrance fee, and so on according to age. The payments were made once in six weeks, and were as follows:—1s. 6d. for the six weeks, which secured 7s. a week in illness for the first three months and was then reduced to 3s. 6d.; 1s. 8d. securing 8s. a week for the first three months and 4s. a week after; and 1s. 10d. securing 9s. per week for the same period and 4s. 6d. a week after. Should any man die before the 2d of March next he would receive 5l. for his funeral expenses, to be raised by equal subscriptions amongst the members; or his wife 2l. 10s., to be raised in the same way. After that time an increased rate would probably be adopted. One benefit connected with the society was that a man did not pay his money, and then see it no more, but he would have scrip every year for his dividends, which in case of extreme distress he might always sell for its full value. Another article had been introduced into their rules which enabled men above the age for entering and women, profitably to invest their money. Thus they might take either a share, or a half, a quarter, or an eighth of a share in the Building Society. The value of a whole share was 60l. The rates of payment for a full share would be 1s. 9d. a week, for a half share 10½d., quarter, 5½d., half 2½d. The payments had been regulated according to the receipts, and there was no doubt there would always be sufficient money coming in to supply the out-

REVIEW.

A Letter of Remonstrance to his Grace the Duke of Richmond on the Repeal of the Corn Laws. By the Hon. and Rev. Sir Erasmus Williams, Bart. London: Longman and Co.

Those who have been engaged in the whale fishery inform us that the greatest danger to which they are exposed is when the monster of the deep feels sensibly his exhaustion and musters up his last energies for one great struggle of dying despair. "Beware of the creature in his flurry," is the earnest recommendation of the experienced harpooner. Monopoly, the giant monster of the political deep, has been harpooned; and the judicious captain of the fishers has allowed an unusual length of line for the run and play of the animal; but now that the final struggle approaches, it behoves us to beware of the monster in his flurry. He may endanger not only the boat in which the Ministers are embarked, but the vessel which carries the fortunes of the State. The signs of flurry cannot be mistaken; the vindictive vehemence of Lord George Bentinck, the menacing threats of his Grace of Buckingham, and the more gentle anger of the self-complacent Earl of Wicklow, are signs of a danger not very far ahead. Sir Erasmus Williams is anxious to point out to the Duke of Richmond the hazard at which these demonstrations of impotent and fruitless rage will be made. The measures are safe, whatever may become of the Ministry. The fate of monopoly is sealed, whoever may be the sacrificial priest fore-doomed to offer up the victim on the altar of justice. Like the harpooned whale, the monster of monopoly may overset the boat from which the weapon was launched; but:

"Hæret lateri lethalis arundo."

Or, in plain English:

"The deadly weapon quivers in his side."

Yes; monopoly is harpooned; it has run out every inch of line which the Ministerial boat can spare, and now comes the final tug of war. It is the object of Sir Erasmus Williams to show that the protectionists are adopting a course which they have neither the power nor the wisdom to pursue with even a moderate chance of success. He justly says:

"Peel has triumphed: the success of his grand, comprehensive, and benevolent measure is as certain as any thing political can be certain. England has pronounced the doom of protectionism; 'nay, but that's past praying for.' The House of Commons has responded by significant majorities to the wishes of the Sovereign, and to the prayers of her people. The House of Commons has decreed that the odious, unjust, oppressive Corn Law shall be blotted out of her Statute Book."

As a clergyman, Sir E. Williams is anxious to exonerate the episcopal bench from any share in the iniquitous maintenance of a system of artificial famine, and he dwells with great complacency on the absence of the prelates from the protectionist meeting at the Clarendon:

"There is, however, a circumstance respecting the meeting of too high import to be overlooked; namely, the absence of every Archbishop and Bishop from it. Not one Spiritual Peer could be found to lend his sanction to your views. 'The advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual' has been happily refused; and it may thence be fairly inferred that the object of your meeting does not meet with their approbation, and that, consequently, their approbation, will be also withheld when the matter comes before them for discussion in the proper place. God forbid that 'a man of God' should be found to raise his voice for starving the poor! What more violent improbability can be propounded?—what more atrocious and bitter calumny against the entire Bench of Bishops can be spit forth even by those ungodly ones, whose delight it is always to be foul, if possible, God's High Priests, than the bare supposition that a Bishop of the pure and reformed Church of Christ established in these kingdoms would uphold or sanction a system which practically abnegates the doctrines of the Holy Bible, defeats the gracious intentions of the Blessed Author and Giver of all good things for Christ's sake to man, and generates in the breasts of those, who are doomed in the sweat of their brow to eat their bread, any thing but love and good-will towards their more fortunate brethren? So far from receiving the concurrence of a Spiritual Peer, you may, perhaps, be reminded by some of them of what the Scriptures speak on this matter. They may, perhaps, refer you to the man after God's own heart, who says, 'Blessed is he that considereth the poor. The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing; thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness.' They may, perhaps, remind you of a proverb uttered some three thousand years ago by another king, reputed to be the wisest of men, 'He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him, but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it.' It is possible that they may desire you to see in your own mirror the resemblance of the noble Roman, complaining of his countrymen:

'They said they were an hungry, sigh'd forth proverbs
That hunger broke stone walls, that dogs must eat,
That meat was made for months, that the gods sent not Corn for the rich men only: with these shreds
They vented their complainings;'

and they may, with the freedom becoming a minister of heaven, inquire whether it is becoming in the great ones of the earth to ransack the world for meats and drinks to gratify their palates—for purple and fine linen to adorn their persons—while Lazarus shall not be permitted to satisfy his hungry soul with a grain of foreign bread."

It is much to be regretted that some of the prelates neglected the precepts of the Gospel and the example of their Divine Master in the late division in the House of Lords. They voted for starving the sheep of the Christian fold instead of feeding them; they showed an anxiety to reverse the miracles of the loaves and fishes; instead of multiplying the means of sustenance, they declared themselves anxious to stint and abridge the existing supply of food. We have got in our land a valuable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; it would be no bad preparation for its missionaries if, before going to distant lands, they would endeavour to convert the right reverend patrons of monopoly to Christianity.

Sir Erasmus Williams deals summarily with the Duke of Richmond's coarse vituperation of the Premier:

"Do not buoy yourself up with the idea, that because the country is silent it is therefore indifferent: it is silent, because it considers the measure to be safe; it is silent, because it believes that the House of Lords, 'a very small body of a very small body,' the receivers of rent, have the 'grace' to regard, the 'wisdom' to perceive, and the 'understanding' to bow to public opinion. Your Grace may be disposed to risk the danger of a contest with the people, but the House of Lords will not sympathise with you; they will admire your bravery, but will not applaud your judgment; you may, like others have done, vituperate Sir Robert Peel for carrying on this important measure without an appeal to the people, because you think he ought. But Sir Robert Peel is responsible for the right government and peace of the country, and not your Grace; and he, fortunately, has thought otherwise. Why should he appeal to the people against a Parliament which approves his measures? Why should he dismiss a Parliament honest enough in its character, as the representatives of the people, to carry his righteous measure for the benefit of the people?"

But you will say, Sir Robert Peel has changed his opinions. Well, what then? He tells you he has changed them. Has your Grace never changed your opinion? Are you the same reformer you were when a member of the noble Earl Grey's Cabinet? I am not going to impute to you any unworthy ground for your change; on the contrary, I give you all the credit due to an English Peer, and to any man of honour—the credit for having changed only on conscientious conviction; (bestow the same charity on Sir Robert Peel!) and I am sure that if your Grace is desirous of serving your country, you will never do it so effectually as by changing your opinions once again, and by withdrawing from the righteous measure now submitted to your consideration your threatened opposition, which will bring no honour to you, nor to the nonpareil order to which you belong.

"But your Grace provokingly complains, that if Sir Robert Peel had chosen to change (perhaps he could not help himself—he might not require to be trepanned in order to be convinced), he should not have converted others. What higher compliment could you have paid the noble statesman who sits at the helm, than this unintentional one? What can be more grateful to him—what more grateful to us, the people—than to find that his brilliant talents, his persuasive eloquence, should have been so eminently successful? and what a blessing it is to the community that your grace is not possessed of the same alchemical powers!"

The division on the second reading in the House of Lords indisputably proved that the peers possessing the largest landed properties and the most unencumbered estates are the leading supporters of the Ministerial measure; while in the list of the minority we find titled paupers, men whose estates are eaten up with mortgage, and some who are as bankrupt in reputation as they are in fortune. With such forces, it seems wonderful how even the practised hardihood of Richmond could venture on a conflict.

"Protect us mighty Providence,

What would these madmen have?—
First they would bribe us without pence,
Deceive us without common sense,
And without power enslave?"

In noticing the attacks on Sir Robert Peel's character, Sir Erasmus Williams seems inclined to expand Pope's maxim:

"Its proper power to hurt each creature feels, Bulls aim their horns, and asses kick their heels."

We could wish that he had given us a full and complete sketch of the zoology of protection; it would have been a worthy companion to Old Collier's pamphlet on the "Unclean Beasts in the Ark;" but we trust that the hint will not be lost on Punch, and in the mean time we quote the description of some recent scenes in the House of Commons, graphically given by our author:

"I have watched with anxious feeling the progress of this noble measure. I hailed its announcement by Sir Robert Peel with unmixed satisfaction, for I saw in it the future weal of my country. I have seen its noble author rise in the majesty of conscious integrity, and declare that his country's good compelled a change of his political opinions. I have searched in vain among all the tirades of his bitter and some rather unscrupulous opponents for something like proof of corrupt motive for the change. I have seen him challenge them to establish any motive but his country's welfare. I have seen him give up his high office, to which even dukes sometimes condescend to pay homage, rather than yield his honest convictions. I have seen him return to office, fight his country's battle, spurn with indignant scorn the odious accusation of treachery (of which more by and by), and, God be thanked, triumph over his unrelenting foes, beating them to powder, yea even the bitterest of the bitter—the hero of invective, who appears to have considered Sir Robert Peel only as a Shrove-Tuesday cock, placed to be pelted at. Bishop Warburton, addressing one of his adversaries, observes—'Though your teeth are short, what you want in teeth you have in venom, and know, as all other creatures do, where your strength lies.'" goings. It was likewise agreed (on the principle of some London Societies) that when the number ill, and on full pay, exceeded 4 in 100, a reduction should be made in the amount paid; but this was a circumstance which it was very unlikely would ever occur. The Society would hold their meetings every six weeks, after which, instead of resorting to the public house, certain subjects would be introduced calculated to give instruction and information on important and popular matters. Until the people were better educated and instructed they would not be able to cope with their enemies. He trusted that when the articles were completed, which would be very shortly, every man would obtain one and read, examine, and join the Society. Mr. Edwards then defended the legality of the proposed Society, and the correctness of its principles; and concluded by earnestly begging the meeting to take the subject into their earnest consideration.

There is perhaps too strong a dash of bitterness mixed up with the defence of Peel against the charge of treachery so vehemently urged by the Duke of Richmond:

MARY FERRIS then moved the thanks of the meeting to those gentlemen who had so kindly stepped forward to relieve the necessities of the poor in this neighbourhood. I hope, said the poor woman, the press will make known to those kind gentlemen our gratitude for what we have received, for if we had not had this relief our distress must have been great indeed. My poor children would have been almost starving, and without a bit of clothes. I hope the Lord will never send them a bit the less for what they have spared for us. I thank God for the kindness of those gentlemen, whom I never saw, and who never saw me, for if God had not put it into their hearts they never would have done it. I received more from those gentlemen than ever I received out of Brewhill parish in bringing up eight children. We received the money through Mr. Edwards, and we hope the Lord will reward them all for sending it.

LUCY SIMPKINS said, I have come to return thanks to those gentlemen who sent relief to us from Liverpool through Mr. Edwards; and also for the present we received through Mr. Read. I wish to say that what I said at Brewhill was quite true, although they said I had spoken falsely (cries of "It was true"). I did, when confined with my eleventh child, pass one whole day and part of the next without a mouthful of victuals. I am thankful to those members of Parliament through whom we are likely to have Free Trade, and hope when it comes about, we shall be able to get a bellyful of victuals.

The resolution was then carried unanimously with loud cheering.

MR. READ remarked, that they had held several interesting meetings in Gontacre, and now their efforts were crowned with success. Their voice had been echoed through the length and breadth of the land; it had entered the House of Commons, and he hesitated not to say that he firmly believed the meetings held in Gontacre, and other parts of North Wilts, had had great influence with the Prime Minister; and now they were drawing near the period when they believed monopoly would fall (cheers). One object of the meeting was to return thanks to those gentlemen who had so kindly assisted the poor people in their distress (hear). As he had taken an active part in this matter he would make a few remarks. After the great Gontacre meeting he received a letter, the writer of which wished to know to whom he could send a little money to be distributed to the most necessitous and deserving characters. He (Mr. Read) answered that he had resided in the parish nearly twenty years, that he knew most of the speakers, and believed their accounts to be strictly true; and that he would gladly undertake the proper distribution of any donation which might be sent. In a few days he received a sum of money. He immediately called the directors together, stated the circumstances of the case, read the names mentioned in the letter, all of whom received the exact sums the donor wished. ("That's correct.") "The rest I leave to your own judgment," was the instruction given in the letter. I accordingly made enquiry, and distributed the money in the best possible manner (hear, hear). Of course every one was not satisfied, that was too much to expect; but he acted to the best of his knowledge. Money, beds, blankets, and petticoats, had been distributed in this way. The beds were given to large families where they were much wanted, and one poor woman who received one, told him that she cried for joy all night, so that she could get no sleep upon her new bed. There were, however, still more families to whom the gift of a bed would be most serviceable. Upwards of 200 persons had been relieved to a greater or less extent, besides children; and only last night a kind lady in Bath had sent several packs of child-bed linen, to be lent out to the poor women in Gontacre who needed it (cheers). More than 40 smockfrocks had been given to the boys at the two schools, and the same number of frocks to the girls. He hoped that it was understood that these presents did not come from him; he only had the trouble—nay, the pleasure, of distributing them, for indeed it was the greatest pleasure he had ever enjoyed. Mr. Read then spoke of the great assistance which the sums expended in seed potatoes had been to the poor men who had received them; and said that he had still reserved a small sum of money in case of any emergency.

WILLIAM COLE, of Calne, then moved that the thanks of the meeting be given to her Majesty's Ministers for the introduction of, and their successful efforts in carrying through the house, a measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws. Mr. Cole delivered a very sensible address, urging on the people the importance of educating themselves, and showing that they were not unworthy of the kindness and attention which had been showed them.

WILLIAM EDWARDS seconded the resolution, which was carried by acclamation.

Several women then addressed the meeting, showing that their condition must yet be greatly improved before they can deserve the epithet by which they are so often described—"A bold peasantry, their country's pride."

MR. WHITE having made a few concluding remarks, the meeting quietly separated, first giving three hearty cheers for Free Trade.

EXTRAORDINARY MUSHROOM.—On Saturday last, James Stubb, of Buglawton, near Congleton, was somewhat surprised that one of the flags just within the threshold of his door had been so far displaced by some invisible agency, that it had become almost impossible to open or shut the door. To discover the hidden cause of this strange effect the flag was removed, and underneath it was found a fine mushroom, measuring nearly half a yard in circumference. The flag which was thus pushed from its place by the upstart fungus, was two feet long by eighteen inches wide, and two inches thick!—Macclesfield Courier.

Lord Morpeth has consented to take the chair at the next annual soirée of the Manchester Athenæum, in October.

"It is the fashion of the protectionists, your Grace among the number, to accuse Sir Robert Peel of treachery,—in other words, of insubmission to their dictation. 'Call me traitor' may be startlingly say: 'I who collected your disjecta membra; I who formed you into a compact body; I who nourished and cherished you through ten long years; I who marshalled you in battle array, and led you to victory over your enemies! Alone I did it! and call me 'Traitor! Have you forgotten who made you what you are? Have you forgotten the loaves and fishes I distributed so unsparringly among you? Have you not betrayed me into the hands of my (fortunately generous) opponents, because I will not obey your rebellious call? Prophecy not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things; prophesy deceits, and call me traitor. Ungrateful, ungenerous souls! But the question is, not whether Sir Robert Peel has changed or not, whether he is or is not a proper object for vituperation and invective, whether he is the traitor or the betrayed,—the simple question for your grave consideration is this, Is the measure good or bad? The House of Commons, by astounding majorities, has pronounced it to be good; and nine-tenths of the people accord with this judgment. What good can possibly arise from your opposition? Do you hope to terrify Sir Robert Peel out of his propriety? He does not fear you. Will you, in your distress, imprecate the nine days' wonder? Punch, last week, settled the matter. Punch weighed him; but, though well in figure, his deficiency was awful. Will you venture on Lord Stanley? He is a congenial soul with your Grace; Arcades ambo! both Reformers! both Conservatives! and what now? You had better be content with Sir Robert Peel. It is manifest he can do without you, and equally manifest that you cannot do without him; but, in disgust with the ungrateful, ungenerous, malignant treatment from those from whom better things might have been expected, he should retire from the office he fills with so much honour to his sovereign and so much benefit to his country, you will have for a Premier one who fears you as little as Sir Robert Peel, and whose honesty of purpose and determination of spirit you may not perhaps relish, but you must admire."

In conclusion, Sir Erasmus Williams very forcibly states the case of the labourer:

"Your Grace considers yourself better acquainted with the feelings of the farmers of England than any one else is. Be it so. I pretend to know something of the labourer. A few months ago one of this class was brought before me for punishment. He was 27 years of age, and 'a better ploughman I should not wish to see in my field,' and he was sent to prison, for running away from FOUR SHILLINGS a week! I venture to assure your Grace, that 99 out of every 100 labourers of any parish in the kingdom exultingly rejoice at the decrease of their arch enemy—the Corn Law. They submit with pious resignation in their suffering, whenever it may please a gracious Providence, whether as a punishment for our sins, or in order to 'humble and to prove us, to know what is in our hearts, whether we will keep his commandments or no,' he refuses to give his usual abundance of the kindly fruits of the earth; but they will never patiently submit that the decrees of God shall be overthrown by the decrees of man; that their country—'a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it, a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass,'—that this garden of the Lord's planting shall be turned into 'a desert' by the selfish act of man. The whole labouring population of the land demand the repeal of the odious Corn Law. Delenda est. The Queen, God bless her! is with them, public opinion is with them, the Houses of Lords and Commons are with them; and let not any mistaken zeal for the supposed interests of the farmers of England deter your Grace, and your Clarendon Hotel confrères from joining in the joy of emancipated England, nor induce you to withhold a blessing from the man who has opened your fatherland to receive the homage of the world."

"This Letter has extended to a length far beyond what I intended: I shall now, therefore, conclude with another quotation from Sir James Graham's admirable brochure (page 75), which I recommend to your serious consideration. 'The paramount duty of every government is attention to the interests of the community, of which the labourers must form the great majority. The right of property is instituted for the good, not of the few who possess wealth and honours, but of the many who have them not. If the majority be deeply injured, the public peace is in danger. If the majority want food, private property becomes a nuisance.'"

We have extracted largely from this remonstrance, because it expresses the feelings of a very large portion of the Conservative party, who believe that their interests as a party have been seriously perilled by being conjoined with the infamy and the selfishness of protection. But we differ from the rev. writer when he hopes that this remonstrance will produce any effect on the conduct of the Duke of Richmond and his followers. We have too much respect for these hereditary legislators to attribute their blind hostility either to obliquity of intellect or hardness of heart; but the course they have taken in the present debates show that they have not any materials in their mental composition on which reason and argument can be brought to operate, and that, therefore, all human means must fail to convince them of their error, or turn them from the evil of their proceedings.

A NEW CIDER COUNTRY.—It appears that the region acquired by England beyond the Sulej is remarkable for its fertility, and one district more especially, the vicinity of the city of Jellinder, abounds in orchards and fruit trees—a second Herefordshire, in fact. With all the advantages of climate, and with the improvements in agriculture which will doubtless take place under the peaceful sway of the British Government, it is by no means improbable that this portion of the Punjab will become an exporting country, and particularly if Ibrahim Pacha or his father should consent to the construction of a railway from Cairo to the Isthmus of Suez.

A RARE PLEASURE.—The last person Joseph Ady wrote to was Lord Stanley, for he made sure that his lordship would send him twenty shillings if only for the novelty of "hearing something to his advantage."—Punch.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COPENHAGEN, JUNE 1.—It can hardly be denied that the late modification in the Sound and canal tolls are chiefly to the advantage of Russian commerce, with which England and Sweden are contending. The reductions were considerable in comparison with the late tariff. For instance: on cotton, from 18 to 10 stivers; on brandy, from 4 to 3; and on raw sugars, from 5 to 4.—Hamburg. Borsenhalle, June 6.

A disease has recently attacked a large plantation of young fir trees near Cirencester. It is due to a plant, a fungus, which spreads by seed with great rapidity.

The West Indian steamer Tweed, which arrived at Southampton on Sunday, brought 9000 pine apples, 61 barrels of potatoes, and a quantity of turtle.

Mr. Watson stated in the House of Commons a few days since that though Lord Denman's salary is 10,000*l.* a year, he has never taken more than 8000*l.*

The great chess match of two games, by correspondence between the Paris and Pesth clubs, commenced in 1842, terminated in favour of the Hungarians.

In the county of Kerry, since the survey of it in 1842-3, there have been reclaimed 8,373 acres; and there are also 351,876 acres at present under cultivation, and 362,413 still unreclaimed.

The state of the growing crops in Lower Austria is said to be most satisfactory. In Hungary, however, the greater part of the growing corn, grass, &c., has been destroyed by the various rivers.

ANCIENT IMPORTATION INTO HULL.—About 1595, we find entered in the household book of the Cliffords, a sum of 11*s.* "for six cabbages and some caret roots bought at Hull." These were then imported from Flanders, whence even Queen Catherine, in the reign of Henry VIII., had her salads. Potatoes and turnips were not generally known, even to the gardener, until the reign of Elizabeth.—Hull Packet.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.—We are able to state on unquestionable authority, that a treaty for the international protection of copyright has just been signed at Berlin between Prussia and England; in which it is confidently expected that, before the ratification, Saxony will join. The consequence will be a reduction of the duty to 15*s.* per cwt. on at least half the German books imported into England.—Athenæum.

CORNISH SILK.—The thirteenth annual report of the Royal Cornwall Polytechnic Society states, that, at the annual exhibition, seraves were shown which had been manufactured in Spitalfields from the produce of between 700 and 800 worms, kept in an attic-room in Truro. In size and weight, the worms rather surpassed those of Italy; the cocoons were larger; the quality of the silk, when reeled, was fully equal to the best imported, and the quantity exceeded the Italian average; and this in a season not remarkably propitious.

News from the hop-growing districts now becomes interesting, and so far as the reports up to the present time are concerned, that interest is not unfettered by anxiety. The fly appears to be most abundant; neither Kent, Sussex, nor Worcester being exempt from the destructive visitation.

Mr. Francis Egerton, son of Lord Francis Egerton, is appointed a lieutenant in the royal navy.

NEW HAY.—Mr. Thomas Webster, of Bootle, brought the first load of new hay to Liverpool market on Friday. This is twenty five days earlier than last year.

RISE IN AGRICULTURAL WAGES.—At the feeing fairs of Bathgate, Stirling, Elgin, and Forres, which have been held during the past week, farm servants and labourers in husbandry have been in great demand, and wages have generally advanced. At the Whitsuntide hiring fairs held at Carlisle, Brampton, Penrith, Keswick, Cockermouth, Gosforth, Appleby, Kendal, Ulverstone, &c. farm servants were much sought after, and higher wages were paid than for many years past.

GAME CASE.—At the petty sessions at Bicester, held a few days since, Andrews, one of the Earl of Jersey's game-keepers, charged Thomas Izzard, aged 11, with an offence against the Game Laws. To prove his case he called Hitchcock, a looker-out, who said he saw Izzard go into Ardley wood, and set a snare which was lying on the ground, and which he (Hitchcock) was watching. The lad said he went through a gap in the hedge into the wood to look after bird's nests; that he saw the snare lying down and just touched it, but did not set it or take it up. The constable gave the lad a good character, and the keepers said that they never caught him at anything before. The father said he worked for Mr. Jackson; he knew he had been in the habit of getting birds' eggs for his master's son, and that he did believe he had never seen a snare before. He was ordered to pay a fine of 1*s.* and 14*s.* 6*d.* cost, and in default to be imprisoned in the House of Correction for fourteen days. His father said he had a large family; the lad earned 3*s.* per week, and asked for time to pay it in. Allowed a month.

AMERICA AND THE TIMBER DUTIES.—"I heard frequent discussions on the present state of the timber duties, both here (Nova Scotia), and in Canada, and great was my surprise to find the majority of the small proprietors, or that class in whose prosperity and success the strength of a new colony consists, regretting that the mother-country had legislated so much in their favour. They said that a few large capitalists and shipowners amassed considerable fortunes (some of them, however, losing them again by over speculation), and that the political influence of a few such merchants was naturally greater than that of a host of small farmers, who could never so effectively plead their cause to the Government. But, on the other hand, the labourers engaged during the severe winter, at high pay, to fell and transport the timber to the coast became invariably a drunken and improvident set. Another serious mischief accrued to the colony from this traffic; as often as the new settlers reached the tracts from which the wood had been removed, they found, instead of a cleared region, ready for cultivation, a dense copsewood or vigorous undergrowth of young trees, far more expensive to deal with than the original forest, and what was worse, all the best kinds of timber, fit for farm buildings and other uses, had been taken away, having been carefully selected for exportation to Great Britain. So that, while the English are submitting to pay an enhanced price for timber, inferior in quality to that of Norway, the majority of the colonists, for whom the sacrifices are made, feel no gratitude for the boon. On the contrary, they complain of a monopoly that enriches a few timber merchants, at the expense of the more regular and steady process of agriculture."—Lyell's Travels in North America, vol. 2, p. 225.

LONDON, Friday Evening, June 12, 1846.

"Drowning men grasp at straws," but even a straw possesses more firmness and stability than the incident on which the protectionists in the Lords have based their new policy of obstruction. Lord George Bentinck's declaration of his determination to oppose the second reading of the Irish Coercion Bill renders it very probable that the Ministers may be left in a minority on that measure. Hence arises a second contingency that Sir Robert Peel may resign before his Free Trade measures are carried; and from both these chances is inferred a third probability, that in the confusion incident to a change of Ministry the Corn Bill may be defeated, and the existence of monopoly protracted a little longer. It would puzzle an acute calculator to determine the value of these contingencies from the doctrine of chances. They are apt illustrations of the theory of vanishing fractions. Yet on these infinitesimal quantities the resistance to going into Committee on the Bill is founded. Earl Stanhope led the van. He is the Calchas of his party, and has been the "prophet of evil," but without the inspiration of the seer, as long as the memory of the present generation exists. If England has not been ruined some hundred times over, his lordship is not to blame, for he has some hundred times informed us that the sun of our prosperity was set, and the day of our glory departed. Peel's Currency Bill was declared by his lordship to be our national dose of Prussic acid, and he must in all consistency regard our present vitality as the galvanised animation given to a corpse. Hence he assumed the boding and sepulchral tone of the raven hovering around the chambers of death, but forgetting that unbelievers in omens only laugh at the croak of the melancholy bird. Superstitious old women could alone be terrified by such ill-boding notes; they have been heard too often and too long to inspire further terror; they belong to those visionary fears which haunt the night of ignorance, but which are at once dissipated by the first dawn of intelligence and light.

Lord Radnor vindicated the policy advocated by the League, and exposed the last of Lord Stanley's fallacies and misrepresentations which remained undetected. The over-rated speech of the heir of the house of Derby reminds us indeed of the fable of the daw in borrowed plumage. When first presented to the house, it was decorated with declamation, plausibilities, and positive statements, so that the peacock itself was hardly more brilliant; but Lord Brougham pulled some feathers from the tail, Earl Grey tore the crest from the head, Lord Clarendon laid bare the body, Lord Dalhousie plucked the wings, and Lord Radnor finished by leaving it as bare as the cock which Diogenes cruelly stripped of its feathers, as a practical refutation of Plato's definition of man, a "featherless biped."

The Earl of Wicklow disappointed us; he has of late shown some indications of a wish to become acquainted with the elements of economic science, and we regret that his progress in this part of a legislator's education has not been a little accelerated. The only point which he attempted to make out was the value of protection to our colonies, and his arguments on this head were so effectually demolished by Lord Lyttleton, that they require no further notice.

The only other speech on which we intend to offer a comment is that of the Duke of Buckingham, the self-named descendant and representative of the Plantagenets. His grace referred to the burthens on land in this country; and as he is probably very familiar with the subject, we are surprised to find that he misstated its nature. Mortgages, not taxes, are the burthens under which the land groans; but if landlords choose to be improvident, they must bear the consequences themselves, and not endeavour to throw them upon the industrial classes. In order to obtain political influence, certain noblemen have purchased more land than they had money to pay for, and have been thus compelled to borrow at a very high rate of interest. But they have found that what Johnson said of States is equally true of estates:

"Extended empire, like expanded gold, Exchanges solid strength for feeble splendour."

To such men the repeal of the Corn Laws will eventually prove the greatest of blessings. It will compel them to co-ordinate their affairs, and to proportion their extent of possession to their ability of management. They have at present little better than provisional proprietorship of their estates; and they would be greatly served if they were compelled, though in spite of themselves, to accept even a limited certainty in exchange for precarious pauperism. To them the Corn Laws have been like the corks which recently caused the death of the boys who went to bathe at Boulogne during the ebb of the tide; their heads have been artificially kept above water, but the receding waves have carried them away from the shore, and led them to neglect the line that limited the depth to which their efforts should have been confined.

We regret that the Lords at this stage of the measure should have resumed the obstructive policy which they virtually agreed to abandon. They cannot defeat the measure; its ultimate success does not depend on any possible combination of parties; no man can be Minister whose first measure will not be an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. Delay may be obtained, but it will be very dearly purchased; the experiment on the public patience has already continued too long; an interlude of party playing at cross-purposes would damage the reputation of all the actors; it might indeed perplex or even overthrow the present Ministers, but it would create a complication of difficulties around their successors, whoever they may be, which, in all human probability, would be insurmountable.

THE EFFECT OF FREE TRADE IN GLASS.—An example will serve to show how the supply of an article may indefinitely increase without meeting the demand, and how the profit of the maker and the wages of the artisan may be found compatible with an indefinite reduction of prices. It is a comparison of the plate-glass trade in 1827 and 1846. It must be premised that, in 1827, a ton of coals cost at the works 30s.—now only 13s. The difference in the price of plate-glass is almost as great. The chief difference, however, is the great improvement in the methods of manufacture, in the use of larger furnaces, melting pots, steam engines, grinding and polishing benches. The result is, that whereas large plates were then made with great difficulty, they are now made with perfect facility; the manufacturers then kept a large supply on hand,—now they can only supply their customers from hand to mouth, and that with difficulty. Wages were then comparatively low; now, though of course not so much per foot, they are high. The prosperity of the trade has been progressive. In 1827, glass sold for about 12s. per foot, to the extent of about 5000 feet per week. In 1836, for 8s. or 9s. to the amount of 7000 per week. In 1844, for 6s. or 7s. to about 23,000 feet per week. In 1846, for 5s. or 6s. to about 40,000 feet per week, exclusive of foreign glass. There can be no doubt, then, in a few years the demand will increase, and the price fall, till every small tradesman has plate glass, not only in his shop, but also in his parlour, or even in his bedroom, with a great increase of his comfort, and without much extravagance. Even at the present prices, at 5s. or 6s. per foot, builders are recommending the use of plate glass, by the argument that, in a few years, the want of it will be remarkable.—Times.

HAY HARVEST IN WESTMORELAND.—Mr. Richard Sani, of Milnthorpe, commenced cutting a field of seed-grass upon Milnthorpe Marsh, being the first we have heard of in this neighbourhood for the present season.—Kendal Mercury.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, June 8.—Samples of every description of Corn have fallen off during the last few weeks, and to-day the market is bare of samples generally. English Wheat sells steadily at last week's prices. Foreign Wheat is not inquired for. In Barley, Beans, and Peas there is no alteration to notice; the two latter exhibit rather a downward tendency, but lower prices are not generally taken. Oats, of which the show is extremely scanty, are 6d. better than this day week; and middling qualities of Irish fetch 1s. more money.

FRIDAY, June 12.—With very short arrivals of Grain since Monday, we have had a dull trade to-day. English Wheat is without any alteration in price. There is a little inquiry for low qualities of Mediterranean Wheat in bond for export to Holland and Belgium, at 38s. to 40s. Barley, Beans, and Peas continue as on Monday. Oats, both free and in bond, are 1s. dearer than Monday, with only a limited trade for the former. There was no alteration in the duties yesterday.

THE GAME LAWS.—The abominable Game Laws were a source of as bitter and as numerous complaints, a hundred years ago, as they are now. "We have lately (says the Manchester Mercury, of August 25, 1752) received letters from farmers in different parts of the country, expressing strong apprehensions that, as soon as the harvest is over, their hedges and ditches and fences are like to suffer greater damage than usual from the more than ordinary care taken of late to preserve the game, which care they would allow to be very laudable, provided the labour and property of the honest husbandman were at the same time duly considered. They likewise think it very hard to be denied the privilege of walking about their own grounds with a dog and gun, since the game live all the year at their cost, and, when fit to be killed, might as reasonably fall occasionally to the share of the feeders as their betters." Above 90 years have passed over since the above was written, and yet patient Englishmen still submit to the same wrongs, and content themselves with ineffectual grumbling. The counsel which follows the above extract is, however, somewhat different to that which would be given by a newspaper in the present day, and shows the cautious tone which the journals were obliged to adopt—"In answer to these and other cavils, which we don't think fit to crowd in our paper, the best advice we can give them is to be patient; and if they are not endowed with this virtue, let them pray for [it]; or, if they don't like this counsel, let them at least wait till a new el—n, and then pursue such measures as they think may best mend the matter."

GEORGE and JOHN DEANE, SADDLERS and HARNESS MAKERS, invite attention to their Gig, Tandem, and Carriage Harness, manufactured on their own premises, by workmen of much experience, and under the direction of foremen of superior ability and skill. Their leather is invariably dressed by first-rate London curriers, the furniture is also of the best town manufacture, and G. and J. Deane warrant that the productions of their manufactory cannot be surpassed for beauty, strength, and cheapness, by any other house. Horse-clothing made to order, of the best and most seasoned wood. Deane's London made whips, and all articles for stable and travelling use in large variety.—No. 2, Arthur-street East, opening to the Monument, London-bridge.

THE POCKET APERTIVE FOUNTAIN is an agreeable substitute for physic, which releases persons from swallowing purgatives, by enabling them to procure an evacuation of the bowels, merely with a little water. The fountain having been constructed by Dr. Scott, for the relief of invalids and ladies, is recommended to every individual, and is strongly recommended to families in general, especially to those who are subject to cosiveness, bile, &c. To be procured only of Mr. Le-wellyn, surgeon, 259, Strand, the third house from Exeter Hall, where may also be obtained the NON-IFIERS, by which any one person may produce whatever effect is necessary to ensure a complete restoration of hearing. Descriptions sent free on receipt of two post stamps.

CHILDREN'S HAIR.—The balsamic properties of ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, nourish the Hair in its embryo state, accelerate its growth, sustain it in maturity, and continue the possession of its softness, and all luxuriant and luxuriant, to the latest period of human life. Gentle and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the hair comb unnecessary. Beware of Spurious Imitations! The genuine article has the words "ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL," on the wrapper. Price 3s. 6d., Family Bottles (equal to 4 small), 10s. 6d., and double that size, 21s. per Bottle. Sold at 20, Hatton Garden, London, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

BRUSHES—NEW INVENTIONS. THE TRIPLE HAIR BRUSH. One stroke of this is equal to the effect of one penetrating, five small-tooth combs, and one even cut brush; to be had in four sizes, No. 7, 8s. 6d. No. 8, 7s. 6d. No. 9, 8s. 6d. No. 10, 11s. 6d.

THE DOUBLE ANTI-PRESSURE NAIL BRUSH, which does not divide the quick from the nail, no pressure being required, and thoroughly cleans and polishes the nails in a tenth part of the time of any other method. Price, in Bone, No. 1, 2s. No. 2, 2s. 6d. No. 3, 2s. 6d. No. 4, 4s., and all sizes and prices in Ivory.

THE NEW TOOTH-PICK BRUSH, which entirely enters between the interstices of the closest teeth, marks, full size brushes, No. 1, hard. No. 2, less hard. No. 3, middling. No. 4, soft. The Narrower Brush, No. 5, hard. No. 6, less hard. No. 7, middling. No. 8, soft, at 1s. each, or 10s. per dozen in Bone, and 2s. each, or 21s. per dozen in Ivory, the Hair warranted never to come out.

THE MEDIUM SHAVING BRUSH, between the usual Badger Hair and Bristle Brush, being a combination of the strongest Hair only from the Badger-skin, in a variety of sizes, both in Bone and Ivory. The above articles are the inventions of ROSS and SON, 119 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, London, and being protected, any one imitating them will be proceeded against.

THE DAILY NEWS,

NEW LONDON MORNING NEWSPAPER,

PRICE TWOPENCE HALFPENNY.

PUBLISHED IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

WHITEFRIARS, JUNE 11th.

The Proprietors of the DAILY NEWS regret to learn, that the Paper has not always reached the Subscribers so early or so punctually as might reasonably have been anticipated. Their apology is, that the success of the great experiment so far exceeded all expectation, that it was not possible to produce the required numbers, even with the most powerful machinery, in time for the Morning Expresses and Mails; and the number of Post-office Orders which poured in made it difficult, and some days impossible, to distribute them amongst the Trade—so that delays in executing such orders were unavoidable. They trust, however, that their arrangements are now so complete as to insure the Subscribers against all chance of delay; yet, as all the respectable News Agents have given to the DAILY NEWS an active support, and many have announced by advertisement their willingness to supply the paper for 16s. 4d. per quarter—payment being made in advance—the Proprietors recommend that new Subscribers should order copies direct from a News Agent, and only when there is an apparent difficulty transmit a Post-office Order, payable to JOSEPH SMITH, DAILY NEWS Office, Whitefriars, London.

COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE.

The accomplishment of Free Trade will be one of the most remarkable events, not only in the history of the British Empire, but of the civilised world. No movement so important, so effective, and so successful, has ever been before witnessed by mankind. Those who see the zeal, integrity, prudence, and ability this great triumph is due, will be recognised as the benefactors of mankind to remote generations.

It is a duty, then, which we owe to the world and to posterity, to preserve some

that deliberative and executive body, which has achieved more by moral force, than has been accomplished by associations that included physical strength and political power. For this purpose arrangements have been made with Mr. HERBERT, R.A., to paint a including Accurate Portraits, not only of the Principal Leaders, but of those less prominent Members, whose indefatigable labours during the whole course of the movement have entitled them to public gratitude. It is proposed that this shall be engraved by a first rate artist, on a large scale (33 by 22 inches), and that the copies shall be sold at such a price as to place within the reach of persons of moderate fortune, a monument of the mighty movement by which monopoly was overthrown, and the cause of justice established, without any remembrance of outrage or violence to lessen the enjoyment of so glorious a victory. The principles of universal peace have been established by their own practical development in peaceful agitation.

In order to accomplish this great work of Art, on a scale and in a style worthy of the subject it is designed to commemorate, those who are interested in its production, are requested to communicate to Mr. AGNEW, Printseller and Publisher, Manchester, the Class of Engraving for which they wish to Subscribe.

There will be three Classes of Engravings from this great Historical Picture, at the following prices:—

First Class Proof, Ten Guineas.

Second Class Proof, Seven Guineas.

Third Class Prints, Three Guineas.

On the 1st and 15th of each Month, every Part containing Four highly-finished Portraits, price One Shilling.

GILBERT'S

NEW UNIVERSAL ETYMOLOGICAL AND

PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The publication of a NEW ETYMOLOGICAL AND PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE, based upon the Dictionaries of Johnson and Walker, and comprehending all the principal terms which have been introduced and established since their day to the present time in Literature, and in the various departments of Natural and Mechanical Science, Arts, and Manufacture, has been long felt as a desideratum in British Literature, which, if well supplied, could not fail to prove highly useful and acceptable to the Literary and Scientific World wherever the English Language is read or spoken. To supply this desideratum, is the object of the present Work. It will be completed in about 31 Monthly Parts, and form two handsome Royal Octavo Volumes, of about 1700 Pages. Several thousands of words which occur in our old standard English Authors will be embraced, the obsolete being carefully marked as such, and quotations generally given from the passages in which they occur. The roots from which the Terms are derived are printed in Italics, obviating the difficulties which otherwise occur to persons not familiar with the Greek, Hebrew, or other ancient Alphabets. A comprehensive GLAMMAR OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE will be given during the course of publication; and at the end of the Work, a copious Vocabulary of French, Latin, and other foreign phrases and words now used by English writers. In Natural History, all the classes, orders, families, and recognised genera of animals, plants, or minerals, will be described, as now classified by the most eminent Naturalists; in fact, nothing shall be wanting to render the Work one of universal reference and useful information for the Private or Public Library, the Counting-House, the School, or the University.

The Publisher has received a great many communications, inquiring who the Author of the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY is? In answer to all such Correspondents, Mr. GILBERT has to state, that there exists no reason why the Author's name should not be known, save an earnest wish on his part that the Work should be tested solely by its own intrinsic worth. Mr. GILBERT, however, may state, that the gentleman in question is personally known, and his talents appreciated by some of the most eminent Professors in the Universities of London, Oxford, Dublin, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, and that he is himself an Author of several publications connected with Natural Science and Polite Literature, and has been for several years a Lecturer in one of our Universities.

T. RIDGELL'S PATENT ECONOMICAL MICA-GLASS LINING for the protection of Linnets, Caps, and Hats from the injurious effects of the natural and artificial moisture of the Air. Ladies and gentlemen, before purchasing such articles, should see that they are provided with this elegant and inexpensive article, which may be imperceptibly introduced into the most delicate bonnet or cap, thereby preventing the very unsightly stains produced by perspiration, oil, &c., being a non-conductor of heat, it will be found invaluable in warm climates, especially in the East and West Indies, preventing the effects of a coup de soleil or stroke of the sun, which has proved so fatal to Europeans especially. To be had of all respectable hatters, milliners, haberdashers, outfitters, hosiers, &c. N. Patterson, 101, Wood-street, (Chippendale, London), is licensed to supply wholesale houses only. Price One Shilling.

FOR FILLING DECAYED TEETH.

DALE'S ENAMEL, price 2s. 6d.—This preparation is confidently offered to the public as the best material ever discovered for filling decayed teeth, which it effects without giving the least pain or inconvenience, becoming, in a short time, as hard and as durable as the tooth itself, and, by perfectly excluding the access of air, it arrests all further possible progress of decay. The preparation, before use, is in a soft state, and continues so for a short time; and it may therefore be inserted by any person with perfect facility, and is warranted to succeed in every case, however large the cavity. Prepared by John Dale, analytical chemist, Manchester. Sold in packets at 2s. 6d. each, by most respectable druggists and medicine vendors in the Kingdom. Directions for use are enclosed with each packet.

Wherever we travel—or at home—
Whether by day or night—
This phrase is sure to arrest our ear—
This well known phrase, "All right!"
Now, readers, might we not apply
A sentence such as this,
To MOSES' name which stands so high,
Where nothing is amiss?
Yes, yet we might apply the phrase,
Indeed, indeed we might!
In all that MOSES' house displays,
We read the words "All right!"
"All right" in cloth! "All right" in style!
And not one garb disposes
The purchaser to wait in vain
Before he goes to MOSES.
Not over-short—not over-long—
Not over-loose nor tight—
MOSES and SON have nothing wrong,
And hence they say, "All right!"

THE LEAGUE.

No. 143.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JUNE 20, 1846.

[3d.]

COUNTY REGISTRATION.

Between the 20th of June and the 20th July, a valid claim can be made, which should be in the following form:

To the overseers of the parish of —

I hereby give you notice, that I claim to be inserted in the list of voters for the county [riding or division] of —, and that the particulars of my place of abode and qualification are stated in the columns below. Dated the day of , in the year

(Signed)

Christian name and surname of the claimant at full length.	Place of abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, lane, or other like place in this parish (or township), and number of house (if any) where the property is situate, or name of the occupying tenant, or if the qualification consist of a rent-charge, then the names of the owners of the property out of which such rent is issuing, or some of them, and the situation of the property.

Taking care to sign their Christian names (if more than one) and surname in full, their true place of abode, nature of qualification, and locality, conformable with the heading of the notice, so that it may be identified. In the third column state, if the qualification is freehold, say "Freehold house," or "land," or "rent-charge" (if for life, only £10 value is required), giving the name of the owner and the situation of the property.

If copyhold, say "Copyhold house," or "land," as the case may be.

If leasehold, say "Original lease of twenty years," or "sixty years of house," or "land," as the case may be.

If a sub-lease, then "Sub-lease of sixty" or "twenty years," as the case may be.

If tenancy qualification, say "House" or "land occupied at a rental of £50 per annum."

QUALIFIED FREEHOLDERS

Are those possessed of an estate of inheritance of the yearly value of 40s., or an estate for life or lives of the yearly value of £10, or an estate possessed prior to June 7, 1832, or since. If by marriage, or will, or promotion to office, or if the freeholder is himself the actual occupier, 40s. value will be sufficient.

Parish clerks, sextons, schoolmasters, Dissenting ministers, and holders of office, if entitled to emoluments of 40s. out of land, but the appointment must be for life, or during good behaviour. Six months' possession prior to the 31st of July will entitle the freeholder to be registered.

QUALIFIED COPYHOLDERS

Are those possessed of copyhold "houses or land of £10 value." The period of possession the same as for freehold.

QUALIFIED LEASEHOLDERS

Are those who possess an original lease or a sub-lease (if in occupation), originally created for sixty years, of the clear yearly value of £10, over and above all rents and charges, or for twenty years of the clear yearly value of £50, over and above all rents and charges, and in possession thereof twelve months previous to the 31st of July.

QUALIFIED OCCUPYING TENANTS

Are those who occupy as tenant any lands or tenements for which they are bona fide liable to a yearly rental of £50, and the period of occupation must be the same as the leaseholder.

Many electors during last year's revision lost their right of voting for twelve months, owing to their mistaking the tenancy qualification and leasehold qualification; but the reader will see they are totally different, and those who were struck off should reclaim.

The holding of a lease at a rental of £50 will not confer a leasehold qualification. The lease must be worth annually £50, over and above the rent, &c., and persons holding as described, when in occupation, should claim as occupying tenants at £50 rental. The claim, then, can be maintained, and costs demanded, if frivolously and vexatiously objected to. The notice, when filled up in duplicate, may be served on the overseer of the parish where the qualifying property is situate, by taking it to the post-office, where money orders are paid and received, and, on the payment of 3d., the postmaster will stamp the duplicate and forward it by post, or the notice may be left at the residence of the overseer or office for the transaction of the parochial business. It is to be observed that a redeemed land-tax of 40s., if purchased and entered under Schedule D, will confer a county vote; but neither freehold in occupation of owner, or a copyhold of £10 value, or a leasehold on which a tenement is built, will confer a county vote, if the property is situate in a city or borough. It has to be observed, however, that two or more copyhold or leasehold houses of less clear annual value than £10 each, but more together, will confer a county vote, even although situated in a parliamentary borough.

THE "AMENDMENTS."

"The smallest trifle thankfully received."—(From THE BEGGAR, a farce, lately performed by several persons of quality.)

We certainly ought to have known the faction well by this time; yet, we confess, even a seven years' intimacy had scarcely prepared us for that unblushing exhibition of sordid, spiritless, and crest-fallen mendicancy which disgusted the country on last Monday and Tuesday nights. Never was anything so "cruel small" as this last scramble for odds and ends. The wholesale plunder being over, they come, these aristocratic tradesmen, with beggars' wallet and beggars' whine, and ask for broken victuals and bones to pick. They are not nice. They will take a boon at the very hands of "treachery and perfidy" itself, and say, "thank you kindly, good gentleman." Anything. The new slide, with its 10s. maximum—or, in default of better, a very moderate and low fixed duty. "Some remnant of protection to the agricultural interest," cries the agonised lord of Stowe—"some fragment"—some "shadow"—something, if it were only to show and talk about. "Some small protection," whines that baron bold, De Mauley—something that shall "act as a sort of compromise," and at least "show a kindly feeling." But no! The House Steward is a hard man, and has no bowels of compassion. You have had your answer, and had better "move on there!" Cruel Peel! To think of being so short with "noble lords!"

These men are, in truth, to use the familiar phrase of eleemosynary commiseration, "real objects;"—objects of most real and heartfelt pity to those whose regret at witnessing so humbling displays of mean and hungry importunity on the part of members of a "proud aristocracy" overpowers the indignant scorn called forth by the exhibition of lordly legislators suing for leave to tax poor men's bread, and take toll of poor men's appetites. They are likewise, we must in fairness add, real objects of that charity which makes merciful allowance for the blindness and perverting influence of class privileges—which discriminates between individual character, and the class character induced by a vicious system of legislative favouritism—and which never forgets, that the very men whom the world knows only as the reckless supporters of a fabric of political extortion and injustice, may be, in every relation of private and social life, patterns of all the virtues. We freely give these noble lords all the benefit of the wide moral tolerance due to those misdoings which come under the category of "sins of ignorance."

The truth is, they are punished enough. They have done ample, though unconscious, justice on their own delinquencies. They have spoken—and reporters have written down—and printers have printed—and the too faithful Hansard will transmit their lightest, hastiest, and most fugitive utterances to other generations that may feel curious to learn how English protectionist peers, in the year 1846, comported themselves at the last crisis of their political fortunes. It was an awful slip. If they could but have kept quiet one week more! Posterity would have let them off for all the rest. Posterity would never have brought up in judgment against them the rant and nonsense of seven years. Even the "flag of protection," and the "British lion" posterity would have literally "forgiven and forgotten" it all, if they could but have been silent at the last. But the closing scenes of the protectionist drama will be profoundly interesting, and each trivial incident will borrow an adventitious attraction from its near vicinity to the denouement. We of the League have always been averse to everything savouring of "intimidation;" yet we cannot refrain from warning those noble lords who meditate saying a few more last words for protection, on the occasion of the third reading, that they will do wisely to have the fear of history before their eyes. Every syllable of the last of the Corn Law debates will be read, as long as English history is read. As the whole thing will so soon be over, would it not be judicious to avoid gratuitous self-exposures?

THE TIMES ON A FIXED DUTY.

We believe we may now, for the first time, indulge ourselves in the confident hope, that THE BILL IS SAFE. With every wish to abstain from premature rejoicing, it would be a sort of affectation to hold any longer the language of uncertainty. After the decisive majorities by which, on Monday and Tuesday nights, the committee of their lordships' house rejected the two great protectionist amendments, it is impossible to entertain any serious doubts, that the Government Bill will, in a very few days, become the law of the land. We expect to be enabled, when we next address the public, to announce that the principle of the total abolition of monopoly is definitively placed on the statute book of the United Kingdom.

It is a pity that the general unanimity of national sentiment and conviction which marks the legislative consummation of this great and beneficent measure should be broken by the dissent of any voice entitled to be heard. We regret to perceive that so powerful an organ of opinion as the Times places itself, to a certain limited extent, among the minority of objectors and non-contents, and enters a kind of half-retrospective, half-prospective protest on behalf of the principle of a "moderate," or "low," "fixed duty" for the purpose of revenue. As our contemporary treats the matter in a very temperate and argumentative tone, and as we have a little leisure on our hands just now, we willingly take the opportunity to advert once more to a question which henceforth can have no other than a purely speculative interest.

The Times complains, with a seriousness and emphasis that almost rise into pathos, that the scheme of a fixed duty has scarcely had fair play in this great national settlement; that it has been "swamped" in a "strange juggle of parties just at the time when it might have been introduced with great advantage to the country at large;" that it has suffered from the "heats of faction" and the "struggle of rival leaders," and has succumbed to what is no better than "a moral prejudice," a "sentiment," and a "cant." Our contemporary sees no more harm in a tax on foreign corn (if levied exclusively for revenue) than in a tax on any other foreign commodity ranking among the necessities, or quasi-necessaries of life. There is "no abstract reason why men should not pay a tax on bread as well as on anything else entered for consumption. There is no good a priori reason why they should not pay it on bread as well as on tea, or any article of food." And he views accordingly with natural uneasiness the ascendancy of a doctrine which, according to his theory, puts in jeopardy the entire customs' revenue of the empire. He fears that, some day or other, the tea tax and the sugar tax may go the way of the bread tax, and "an agitation which has prevailed over one branch of the customs' duties may triumph over the rest." Or rather, as it would elsewhere seem, our contemporary, having a strong faith in the good sense of the British people, and in the ultimate triumph of truth, does not fear this, but looks forward to an eventual "revulsion, at some not distant day"—when the "struggle with a stinted exchequer" shall necessitate new fiscal experiments, and, perhaps, "another Parliament may, at the desire of the people, undo in part what this has already done."

There must be few, if any, among the habitual readers of THE LEAGUE, who will not see at a glance the fallacy of all this. The objection which we Free Traders take to the "low-fixed duty" is not exactly that it is a tax on bread; the objections to any tax on bread rest on grounds valid in themselves, but perfectly distinct from the principle of our movement. We object to the "low fixed duty" on foreign corn, that it is a protective duty; that, although imposed in the name of revenue, it would also act in the way of protection; that, by restricting supply, it would raise price—the price of all the bread eaten in the country; and that of this enhancement of price the state would receive only that part paid on the corn imported—the rest would go into the pockets of the landlords. The "low fixed duty" would, in fact, be a differential duty in favour of the home grower, at the cost of the consumer. It would be making the public pay what the Queen's and people's exchequer would not receive. In what precise proportion it would raise prices—whether by the exact amount of the duty, or by some less or greater amount—is a question which there is no occasion to decide. It is clear that it would raise prices, more or less, for it would narrow the field of supply. It would keep out some corn—namely, that corn which could not afford to pay the duty; and the statutory diminution of supply would be a statutory enhancement of price, of which, not the state, but the landlord, would have the benefit.

The Times' analogies fail altogether. Customs' duties on commodities that are exclusively of foreign growth—or customs' duties balanced by an equivalent excise on the same commodity when produced at home—may, or may not, be objectionable, in nature or in amount, on other grounds; but they are not objectionable on that ground on which the British people and legislature now object to the low fixed duty on foreign corn. They are free from the vicious ingredients of protection. There is no artificial enhancement of price for the gain of a class. What the consumer pays, the exchequer receives. The tax on tea is, in its principle, a fair revenue tax, for Great Britain does not grow tea—there is no British tea interest to make a profit by the fiscal enhancement of price. Sugar, the same—for we have a countervailing excise on home-manufactured sugar. Tobacco, the same—for we prohibit its home-growth, to save the cost and trouble of keeping the army of excisemen that would be wanted to protect the revenue from fraud, were its cultivation allowed. And a bread tax would be a fair revenue tax, so far as the special principle of the League is concerned, were it levied in the shape of an excise at the mill, on all the bread eaten in the country. It would be a burden on all classes—not on all classes except one, for the benefit of that one. It would be a very bad and oppressive tax; but it would be bad and oppressive on grounds perfectly distinct from those on which the Parliament of the United Kingdom is now legislating.

Our contemporary may make himself quite easy. Free Traders mean no harm to her Majesty's treasury, which, indeed, they are only too happy to defend against the invasions of the great "interests" that impudently employ her Majesty's revenue officers to levy private taxes for their own dear protected selves. The League leave the whole question of the relative merits of direct and indirect taxation exactly where they found it. Their work terminates with the emphatic and practical legislative recognition of the principle, that all taxes paid by the people shall go to the people's receiver-general, her Majesty the Queen. As we have none but the very kindest feelings towards our contemporary, we warn him, as he values his peace of mind, to get this "low fixed duty" out of his head with all convenient speed. He will never live to see it. The "revulsion" will never come. What is done now, in this year 1846, is done on principles that will stand every conceivable test of reason and experience—even the test of a "struggle with a stinted exchequer;" and will never be undone—not even "in part"—while England is England.

THE CHRISTIAN BISHOPS.

We only perform an act of justice, which is as grateful to our own feelings as it is due to the eminent and truly "right reverend" persons above designated, when we record our high sense of the services rendered to the cause of commercial and industrial freedom, by the Bishops of St. David's and Oxford. To those prelates who have simply given their silent votes in favour of the enfranchisement of industry, we tender our thankful acknowledgments; but an ampler and more special tribute is due to those occupants of the episcopal bench who, on the night of Friday, the 12th instant, so luminously expounded, so persuasively recommended, and so energetically enforced, the great principle of the working man's right to earn and eat his bread.

Our Bishops, it will be seen, put the question on its broadest and highest ground. Doctors Thirlwall and Wilberforce understand that it is a working man's question—a people's question—a question of work, wages, food, physical comfort, domestic happiness, intellectual and moral improvement, affecting the great mass of the community; and they refuse—indignantly and scornfully refuse—to narrow and debase it into a question of special class-interest. They resent, as an insult to the church, the appeal which protectionist advocates make to the episcopal order, to stand forward in defence of dear bread and a high scale of tithe rent-charge. The landlords profess superiority to sordid class interest, and our Free Trade prelates deem themselves and their order insulted by an argument that assumes class interest to be the rule of clerical action. The interests of the clergy "either coincide with those of the great mass of the community, or are distinct and separate from them;"—if coincident, there is no need of talking of the clergy at all in the matter—if distinct and separate, the great mass of the community must be considered before the clergy. The representatives of the clerical order will not allow the church to be placed in the odious position of living on a public wrong.

"There is only one way" in which the Bishop of St. David's "can consent to look upon this question, and that is, the effect it is likely to have on the COMFORT, AND WELL-BEING, AND PROSPERITY OF THE GREAT MASS OF THE COMMUNITY." And his right reverend brother of Oxford repels with scorn "appeals to the episcopal bench on the MISERABLE SYSTEM OF THINKING WHAT WOULD BE THE BEST FOR THE CLERGY, AND NOT WHAT WOULD BE BEST FOR THE COUNTRY." As regards the question of fact, both prelates are sufficiently well versed in the laws of economical science, to know that any nominal diminution in the amount of the tithe rent-charge, resulting from a lowered average price of wheat, will be amply made up to the clergy in the "compensations" arising from increased cheapness of living, and from the general prosperity of the country.

It is not wonderful that the Bishop of Oxford, in particular, spoke with an emphatic and almost vehement earnestness, that gave offence to sensitive protectionist nerves. Doctor Wilberforce remembers 1815—when his father's house was garrisoned by a military force, to defend the supporter of a bread tax from the vindictive fury of a maddened population. He was then but a lad of ten years old—yet thirty years had not effaced the impression which the spectacle of violence and outrage made on the mind of a generous-hearted and quick-sighted boy. All the landlord sophisms are thrown away on him. The memories of that year are conclusive. The Bishop of Oxford needs nobody to tell him the inherent viciousness of a food law that had to be thrust down the throats of the people at the point of the bayonet. In general, our Bishop's moral perceptions are of a fineness and promptitude to the last degree inconvenient and embarrassing to the advocates of a public wrong. He has a keen eye for a fraud. He sees through a lie at a glance. He made himself particularly disagreeable to their protectionist lordships, by some very plain speaking about "the nominal owners of heavily-mortgaged property;" and the unpardonable allusion to labourers who, "on a day of false festivity, drink from empty glasses a welcome to their landlords," provoked, naturally enough, the coarse and insolent sarcasm of that lord of salmon who never opens his lips, but something comes out characteristic of the mean and vulgar nature of the man.

From our hearts we thank these Christian bishops. They well merit all that they have won—the rude contumelies of titled bread taxers, and the gratitude and honour of the working and bread-eating millions of the British people. This time, at all events, Christianity has "lifted a mitred front in courts of Parliament," to good purpose. The Church of England may set a white mark in her calendar opposite to the day on which, by the lips of two of her most distinguished prelates, she protested, on behalf of "THE ECONOMY OF THE GOD OF NATURE," against the "MOST UNNATURAL PRINCIPLE OF PROHIBITING THE POOR MAN FROM BUYING HIS BREAD ON THE CHEAPEST TERMS."

THE TEN HOURS' AGITATORS.

The leaders of the agitation for a ten hours' bill are doing their best to justify the charge we brought against them in our last of having been from the commencement of our labours in collusion with the monopolists. They have held a gathering in Manchester, at which the most virulent abuse has been heaped upon Messrs. Cobden and Bright. We do not know how many persons attended the meeting, or what really passed, beyond the information afforded by the Morning Post, to which journal a special report of the proceedings appears to have been given, whilst the reporters for the local press, who might have furnished a faithful account, were either excluded, or did not deem the affair worthy of notice. One of the speakers reiterated a charge, made in London, that Mr. Cobden had attended meetings of the "trades" in Manchester, to induce them to support the League, by holding out hopes that the Free Traders would assist the ten hours' agitation. In yesterday's Post appears a letter from "our correspondent at Manchester," reiterating the charge more specifically:

"Mr. Cobden having abstained from voting against the bill in 1844, was selected as the most likely person to complete the fraud the League were about to perpetrate on the factory operatives and the country. Immediate steps were taken to ascertain the places of meeting of the different branches of factory workers, and the whole having been carefully arranged, Mr. Cobden commenced his tour through the various public-houses where those meetings were held. The operatives who constitute such meetings are, as it was well known to Mr. Cobden, to a man, zealous supporters of the Ten Hours' Bill, and do not care a rush about the repeal of the Corn Laws. To secure their support it was of course necessary to promise largely respecting the Factory Bill; but these promises were so well managed and so vaguely made, that Mr. Cobden may have got out of the difficulty by referring to the actual words used at such meetings, which are of so jesuitical a character as to be capable of bearing a different construction. The fact, however, is, that the men unanimously believed that the Free Traders would help them to get the Ten Hours' Bill if they (the operatives) would join them for the repeal of the Corn Laws. The bait, in some cases, succeeded, and now, the working classes find they were deceived. Several meetings of them have been held recently on the subject, at which the double-dealing of Cobden has been explained to the workmen. Reports of the proceedings have been published, with which Mr. Cobden has been furnished, but up to this time he has never dared to reply to the charges made against him. In 1838, Mr. O'Connell, as it was alleged, sold the factory children for 1000*l.*, but Mr. Cobden—so the rumour goes—has demanded a higher price. He has stipulated, it is said, for an estate worth 100,000*l.* at least, and subscriptions are now collecting for that testimonial. It is added here, that the millowners are the principal subscribers. Surely such deceptions as these will open the eyes of the working classes of this district, and stimulate the protectionists in all parts of the country to expose these dealers in fraud. The fact is, the working classes of this part of the country do not care sixpence about the repeal of the Corn Laws, and they only want an opportunity of expressing their attachment to the principles of protection to native industry. The Leaguers dare not hold an open meeting or allow the question to be fairly discussed."

Now let our readers observe that here is a specific statement of certain facts, easily proved if true, and we are going to offer a sufficient temptation to bring out the proof. Mr. Cobden was absent from the division on the factory bill in 1844, because he was engaged in the contest for South Lancashire. It is alleged that he has subsequently lent himself to a scheme for bringing over the factory workers to the League by attending their meetings at public houses, and holding out vague promises, &c. Now we hereby offer 100*l.* reward to any man who will prove that Mr. Cobden has from that time to the present day attended a meeting of factory operatives of any kind whatever. As for the statements made by these worthies of what passed between the delegates and certain members in London, including Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Cobden, we believe them to be as destitute of all foundation as the above; nay, they are so utterly absurd as to be unworthy of contradiction. There is but one way of avoiding the spread of similar falsehoods in future. We advise the Free Trade members of Parliament to confine themselves in their intercourse with these self-styled factory delegates to written communications; or, if they trust themselves in an interview with them, to take the precaution of having a short-hand writer present.

THE CORN BILL AND THE SUGAR DUTIES.

(From the Economist.)

Nothing has transpired to indicate with any certainty the course which will be pursued with regard to the sugar duties. It has even been a matter of doubt whether the present Government will remain in office to deal with the question, or whether it will fall to another Minister to do so. Sir Robert Peel gave notice a fortnight since that he would bring forward the sugar duties on the 12th of June (last night), provided the second reading of the Irish Coercion Bill was disposed of. In the meantime it has been arranged, among the opponents of that bill, that the debate shall be continued, and that a division shall not take place until the Corn Bill has passed the House of Lords, on the ground, that it is expected the Government will be placed in a minority on that bill, and which, it is thought necessary to abstain from doing until the Corn Bill is passed. The Corn Bill will not go into Committee in the House of Lords before Monday next, and it is now very unlikely that it will be finally passed before Monday, the 22nd. If, therefore, the division on the Irish Coercion Bill is to depend upon the time when the Corn Bill is passed, and the introduction of the Sugar Duties Bill is again to depend upon the division on the second reading of the Irish Coercion Bill, it will be the 25th before the sugar duties can be proposed. But as the present bill expires on the 5th of July, it is obvious that there would not be sufficient time left for the discussions which must arise on that bill and all the amendments, of which notices have been given. It is, therefore, more than likely that Sir Robert Peel will take an early day in the ensuing week for the sugar duties, without waiting for the disposal of the Coercion Bill; and even in that case it is difficult to see how sufficient time will remain for the discussions which must arise on those duties, considering the multiplicity of other business before the house. Under any circumstances, therefore, it appears not unlikely that a short bill will be passed to continue the present duties at least for a time, unless, indeed, Sir Robert Peel should be prepared with such a measure (which is by no means unlikely), as should at once secure the approval of a great majority of Parliament. As it is at present, the whole question remains in the greatest uncertainty and doubt, not only as to what will be proposed, but as to who will propose it. All that is positively known is, that Sir Robert Peel expressed an intention at the beginning of the session, of making no further change than that of reducing the present duty upon foreign free labour sugar, to 19*s.* 10*d.* the cwt. from 28*s.* 4*d.*

Lord John Russell has indicated his policy with respect to the sugar duties, not only in the notice which he has given of an amendment upon the proposed plan of the Government, but also (according to the published report), at the meeting of his supporters held at Chesham place, on Saturday last. The noble lord proposes at once to equalise the duty on all foreign sugars, to the rate intended by the Government to be placed on foreign free labour, to take effect immediately, and, further, to provide for the extinction, by equal annual instalments, of the differential duty in five years. According to this plan the duties would be as follows:

	Colonial sugar.	All foreign sugar.
1846	14 0	19 10
1847	—	18 8
1848	—	17 6
1849	—	16 4

By this plan the practice, which in many respects has proved exceedingly inconvenient, but which inconvenience would be greatly modified, if not entirely removed, if the sugar duties were placed on a permanent basis, would be abandoned of making these duties an annual bill. As a principle, a deferred reduction of duties has been shown by experience to be highly objectionable. We must, however, admit, with respect to the case before us, that there are reasons which render any other principle so difficult to adopt, that we should not feel disposed to urge any objection to it, except that the time is somewhat too long. After an arrangement based on this principle has been acted upon in settling the question of protection at home, it could not with any fairness be denied to the colonies. Moreover, sugar being an article on which we rely for a large revenue, it is doubtful if a more sudden reduction of duties would not be only an addition to the price paid to the importer, and not a reduction to the consumer, from the want of a sufficient quantity, in the first place, to meet the demand which a lower price would create. And again, so small a reduction annually as one or two shillings per cwt. will not be sufficient to impede the progress of trade or interfere with usual transactions. Being fixed before-hand, calculations can be made in reference to each change, and supplies will be as uniform as if no change had to take place. The only difference will be, that for a month prior to the time of reduction in each year, some dealers will circumscribe their purchases to immediate wants, but the difference will again be made up in the following month; and even this effect will be partial, as it will be doubtful if the dullness of the market before the change, will not enable the dealers to buy as well, as the brisk market will, immediately after. The difference proposed at any one time will not exceed 2½ per cent. on the price.

As far as revenue is concerned, there can be no doubt this plan would lead to a very important increase from the first, while the immediate reduction of price to the consumers could not be estimated at less than 5*s.* to 6*s.* per cwt. So far we know the views of Lord John Russell; but the doubt still remains, whether, in the event of any circumstance immediately placing the noble lord in power, he could carry them into effect, unless it shall turn out that Sir R. Peel and his colleagues have changed their views since the beginning of the session, and have determined to abandon the distinction between free labour and slave labour.

As to what really are the present views of Sir Robert Peel with regard to the sugar duties, nothing is accurately known. It may, however, be taken for granted that the right hon. baronet has relinquished the principle of protection. To allude to all the rumours which have been circulated during the session of the views of the Minister, of his differences with some of his colleagues on this subject, and finally, of the Cabinet having at length consented to some extensive plan, advocated by Sir Robert Peel, would only be to entangle the subject more than it is. We may, however, allude to some circumstances which point less or more to the course which Government have had in view in relation to these duties, to be acted upon sooner or later.

The Spanish claim for the admission of Cuba sugar at the low duty was at last entirely disposed of and put at rest, by the Duke of Sotomayor, on the part of his Government, accepting the construction put upon the treaties by our Government. But a letter was addressed from Lord Aberdeen to the Spanish Ambassador, dated the 5th of December last, by which it appears that our Minister at Madrid, "was already furnished with instructions, based on a principle of strict reciprocity, and therefore in accordance with the engagements taken in 1783 and in 1809, for a renewal of negotiations" for a new treaty. It may therefore not unfairly be hoped that these negotiations shall have proceeded far enough to enable the present Government, if they do deal with the sugar duties, to relinquish the distinction between free and slave labour, without which, for the present year at least, no other arrangements could meet the wants of the country.

A rumour has been circulated, with some appearance of authority, that it is intended to propose three rates of duty,—one of fourteen shillings on Colonial, one of twenty shillings on foreign free labour, and one of twenty-five shillings on foreign slave labour. We do not give any credit to this rumour. It would be an unjustifiable departure from all principle to reduce slave labour sugar to such a duty as would serve to admit it for consumption, but in such a way as to raise the price of all other sugars to the English consumer. At the present relative prices, the sugars of Brazil could freely pay a duty of twenty-five shillings; but once departing from the principle of practical exclusion, how could a high duty be justified, which only tended to keep the price of sugar at a high rate, to the advantage of the producers in the colonies and in Java? On no pretence could two rates of duty be justified the moment the principle of admitting slave sugar to consumption is acted upon.

Another mode of escaping the present difficulty has been suggested, viz., to suspend the navigation laws, and admit Java sugars from Holland, where the stock is at this moment twenty thousand tons more than last year. Here, again, we meet with the difficulty that those sugars have not the needful certificates of growth, though their origin is easily ascertained. For our own part, we do not think it likely that Sir Robert Peel will adopt any of these temporary expedients. We are rather disposed to think that he will either be prepared with some large and comprehensive scheme with a view to a final settlement of the sugar duties, based, perhaps, on the result of recent negotiations with foreign countries for the purpose of more effectually suppressing the slave trade, or, if not, that he will simply propose the duties announced at the beginning of the session.

Nothing, however, can be so desirable on every account, as that a final arrangement should be made with regard to these duties; and no parties are, probably, more interested in such a final settlement than the colonists themselves. As long as the question is suspended in doubt and uncertainty, we are satisfied nothing really will be done to meet the new competition to which the colonies must sooner or later be exposed, with that earnestness which is required. But a final settlement of the sugar duties must provide for a much lower duty than any as yet contemplated in the various proposed plans. On an article of such universal consumption, and capable of so much extension in its use,—an article, moreover, which must ever be one of the most important objects of exchange for the manufactures of this country in all tropical countries, a high duty cannot be maintained. We are apt to think that fourteen shillings per cwt. or three half-pence the lb., is a low duty, and so it is, compared with what we have been accustomed to;—but, when we consider that that is about seventy-five per cent on the first price of sugar, we are satisfied it is too high either for the permanent interests of the consumer, or for those of commerce, and, ultimately, for the revenue itself.

In order to give a very great stimulus to the consumption of sugar it should be retailed to the public at fourpence per lb.; and such an arrangement of duties is quite possible at this moment to secure that object within four years, without any sacrifice of revenue in the meantime, and with an ultimate and permanent increase after that period. In order to accomplish this great object, we would propose, first to pass resolutions which should bind Parliament to take measures with as little delay as possible to remove all the restrictions to which the colonies are now subjected, and then to pass a sugar bill, establishing a duty of fourteen shillings the cwt, or 1½*d.* per lb., on colonial sugar, and one of eighteen shillings and eightpence per cwt, or twopenny the lb. on all foreign sugars, the former to be reduced at the rate of one shilling and twopenny, and the latter at the rate of two shillings and fourpence per cwt, each year, until they become equal at nine shillings and fourpence per cwt, or one penny the lb. This would be accomplished in four years, thus:—

	Colonial.	Foreign.
Years.	s. d.	s. d.
Duty 1846	14 0	19 10
1847	12 10	18 8
1848	11 8	17 6
1849	10 6	16 4

Such a reduction of duties we believe would give a stimulus to the production of sugar both in our colonies and in foreign countries, far beyond any calculation that the most sanguine dare now make. But taking merely the experience of the present time, let us see what the effect would be on supply, price, and revenue in 1850, the first year of the lowest duty which would be the most trying one. Last year we consumed 4,880,606 cwt., at an average wholesale price of about 50*s.*—which therefore cost the country 12,415,600*l.* Then take the price of all sugar in bond in 1850 even at 25*s.* 8*d.* per cwt., to which add the duty of 9*s.* 4*d.*, we should have a price of 35*s.* the cwt., or of 3½*d.* per lb. to the dealer. Then suppose each individual expending only the same sum which he does at present on sugar, will give a quantity of 6,972,294 cwt., and if to that we add a quantity in proportion to the increase of population, we shall have a consumption of 7,490,265 cwt., which at 9*s.* 4*d.*, would give a revenue of 3,500,000*l.*, which is, as nearly as may be, the present amount. But our own belief is, that with such a reduction of duty the consumption would be much greater at the low rate of fourpence the lb., at which good sugar would be sold.

The most important consideration is, whether a sufficient quantity could be obtained to supply such a demand. Last year, we imported of all kinds 5,811,281 cwt., or 290,000 tons. What we should require for the contemplated consumption would be 374,000 tons, or 84,000 tons more than the supply of last year. When we consider that the production of the world, available for European and American consumption, is estimated at 905,000 tons, or about 55,000 tons in excess of that of last year—when we look to the rapid increase of production in Java and in the Southern States of North America, by which the latter will soon be rendered more independent of the supplies of other countries—and, chiefly, when we consider the means now being used both in the East and West Indies, to increase the cultivation of sugar, an additional supply of 8,000 tons at the low duty of 9*s.* 4*d.* per cwt. in 1850, is a matter on which any statesman may calculate with the greatest certainty.

One word as to the fiscal effects of this plan. It will be said that an increase of the present revenue may be obtained by a higher scale of duties. We think it probable such might be the case; but it would be at the sacrifice of commerce, and the ultimate perfect success of the scheme. The plan proposed would lead to an additional import trade, amounting at the first price of the sugar, to 2,000,000*l.* annually, and would lead to an export of our manufactures to a similar amount, the profits and wages secured in the production of which would be a much greater boon to the country than any relief from taxation which the revenue derived from a higher scale of duties could afford, besides securing to all classes a plentiful supply of this article of universal consumption at a low price. We are satisfied, before ten years have passed, the revenue derived from such a duty would be greater than from any higher one which may now be imposed; and that without involving any sacrifice in the meantime. With the colonial planters, moreover, such a measure would meet with great approval;—in short, we can hardly imagine any party who could object to the plan, except those who are in favour of resorting more to indirect, and relinquishing direct taxation, who are now few in number. It is the most essential consideration in all fiscal arrangements that we should consider how we can best increase the ability in the community to bear the necessary burthens of the state. They may be lightened by a greater prosperity of trade, but cannot be by a mere shifting from one source to another.

DEATH OF THE REV. DR. HEUGH, OF GLASGOW.—We have to announce with the deepest regret, the death of the Rev. Hugh Heugh, D.D., of Glasgow, which took place on the 10th of June, at his residence in Montrose-street, in the 64th year of his age. Dr. Heugh has, from the commencement of our movement, been an able, zealous, and uncompromising advocate of Free Trade.

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. J. D. FERNELEY, OF STOCKPORT.—It is with extreme regret we have to announce the awfully sudden death of Mr. John Dyson Ferneley, of Greek-street. Mr. Ferneley died, at his residence, about six o'clock on Sunday evening, in consequence of an attack of an apoplexy. We believe he was in the enjoyment of his customary state of health on Saturday, but on Sunday morning felt somewhat indisposed. He availed himself of some simple aperient medicine, and did not attend chapel in the forenoon. At two o'clock in the afternoon he was attacked by the malady already mentioned; and although Dr. Turner, Mr. George Downs, and Mr. John Blackshaw, surgeons, were incessant in their attentions, he died at six o'clock in the evening. In all the relations of life, Mr. Ferneley's conduct was exemplary, and his loss will be very severely felt by a wide circle of relatives and friends; while his death will occasion a decided blank in the general society of the borough. He was a distinguished member of the Wesleyan Methodist body, and deeply interested himself in all their concerns. His piety was conspicuous and decided, though without a shadow of ostentation. In politics, he was moderately Conservative, without party spirit, and an ardent advocate of Free Trade, and of every measure calculated to promote the general welfare of the people. The enlightening, liberalising spirit of the present times, had its influence upon him, and induced him to devote his talents and energy to the advancement of the cause of commercial reform. To any one at all acquainted with the physical or constitutional peculiarities of individuals, it would at once be obvious, that in Mr. Ferneley there was a natural predisposition to the malady of which he has died. This, acted on probably, by the present oppressively hot weather, has brought about the result which is now so deeply and universally lamented by his fellow townsmen.

In the city and county of Philadelphia, comprising a population of 150,000 persons, nearly 1800 annually wash themselves of their debts by the process of bankruptcy.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE
SESSION OF 1846.

Twenty-second Week, ending Saturday, June 20.

Passengers, after a long sea voyage, when they draw near to their desired haven, brighten up, look after their effects, adjust their persons, and anticipate, with hilarious excitement, the pleasure of walking on terra firma. A similar pleasure has animated the friends of Free Trade—meaning thereby the friends of national prosperity, of the improvement and elevation of the working classes, of universal peace, and of our common humanity—in watching the last stages of the Corn Law debate, and waiting on what is now an assured victory. The Corn Bill has not, at the time we write, passed quite through the dreaded ordeal of a committee of the House of Lords. But the red-hot bars, and the boiling water, have been administered in vain; a steady majority of THIRTY-THREE, on Monday and on Tuesday nights, have rejected the attempt of the Duke of Buckingham to perpetuate the minimised sliding scale, and of the Earl of Wicklow to impose a fixed duty; and though there remains an amendment of the Duke of Richmond, it is exceedingly probable that on Friday (last night, though we go to press before the fact is known) the bill will be passed through committee, and then, on an early day, the concluding stage, that of third reading, will terminate the triumphant procession.

On Friday night week the exhausted debate received novelty and interest, from the fact that three bishops took part in the debate. Hitherto, the episcopal bench had abstained from all expression of opinion; the votes of the prelates were silent ones, though a majority undoubtedly voted in favour of the bill. But on Friday week the silence was broken, and broken in a way which, to a thoughtful observer, proclaims the wonderful power, the majestic influence, of that PUBLIC OPINION which the ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE has evoked, and which has now achieved a peaceable and a bloodless victory, that, a few years ago, might only have been obtained under the lurid glare of Bristol burnings, and the coercion of a revolutionary excitement, more destructive than the outpourings of lava from a volcano.

On Friday week, the adjourned debate was resumed by the Marquis of Exeter, who, throughout his speech, spoke in a tone inaudible except to those in his immediate neighbourhood. He was understood to advocate protection as a system, and consequently to deprecate the measures of the Government.

The Earl Delawarr, who has lately resigned the office of Lord Chamberlain, referred to the kindness with which he had been treated in a distinguished quarter, to which he dare not farther allude, but which called forth his deepest gratitude. His allusion, of course, was to her Majesty, whose zeal for the repeal of the Corn Laws is well known, and who has vainly endeavoured to retain this Corn Law lord in his official situation. But as an honest man he could not support the measures of the Government, in favour of which he denied that public opinion was enlisted.

Dr. Connop Thirlwall, who, in 1840, was created Bishop of St. David's, and whose name is a familiar one in the literary world, then rose, and immediate attention was directed to the significant circumstance of the first member rising on episcopal benches.

The Bishop of ST. DAVID'S said, if he was anxious to be allowed to say a few words before the debate came to a close, he could assure their lordships that it was not because he had any intention to trouble them with a discussion of the general merits of the great question now under consideration, but simply to state the grounds of the vote he had given and meant again to give on that question. This was a subject so alien to his ordinary studies and pursuits, that it was one on which he could have no claim whatever to their lordships' attention. He was conscious he possessed no authority whatever on it that could give the slightest weight to his opinion, and that he was not able to adduce any facts or arguments with which their lordships were not familiar, even to weariness and satiety. It was a very different motive, and one of a very special kind, that had induced him to depart from his original intention, and break the silence he intended to preserve, in order to solicit their lordships' attention. It was a motive that compelled him in a manner to speak in his own defence; for their lordships would not have forgotten that in the course of the recent discussions very numerous appeals—most pointed, emphatic, pressing, and earnest appeals—were made by a great number of noble lords—he did think in a very unusual manner—to those who occupied a place in that part of their lordships' house where he was situated (hear, hear). And their lordships must be aware—as was every one to whom those appeals were addressed—that they were of such a nature as to involve very serious charges against those members of their lordships' house in that place who held the opinions he had, who had given a vote conformable to that which he had given on this question—charges involving a neglect of duty which they (the bishops) ought to hold most sacred, and an indifference to interests which ought to be most dear to them. Under these circumstances it was perfectly natural and proper that one of those to whom such remarks had applied should for a short time solicit their lordships' attention to meet these appeals. At the same time, he was speaking simply in his own name; he had not the presumption to pretend to stand forward as the representative of others, many of whom would be much better able to discharge the duty, and to whom he should most gladly have resigned it, if he had seen any manifestation of an intention on their part to address the house; still, however, he believed that in the most part he should, in what he was about to say, be speaking the sentiments of the whole of that (the episcopal) bench (hear, hear, hear). There was one thing in the appeals made to the episcopal bench which he must acknowledge afforded him some satisfaction; namely, that those appeals came exclusively from one quarter, and one part of the house—from noble lords adverse to the measure. The case might have been far otherwise, considering the arguments used on other occasions; and he could not help expressing surprise that those noble lords should not consider that in these appeals they were using a weapon which might be employed just as effectually by their opponents, and turned against themselves. For it would not have been surprising, if that bench had been appealed to on principles, not merely of public policy, but of justice, of humanity, nay, of religion itself, and if even texts of Scripture had been adduced to prove that it was their bounden duty not to lend their countenance to any measures which had for their visible object that of thwarting the benevolent designs of Providence, by restricting the supply of food to the population of the country (cheers). It would have been quite as specious a kind of appeal. Not that he attached the slightest value to such arguments, he considered them as gross fallacies; but at the same time he admired the moderation of noble lords favourable to this bill, in refraining from those popular and specious topics (hear). He held them to be fallacies, because it was quite clear that they took for granted the question at issue; that they supposed, not only that one view of the subject was the only right one, but that it was known and felt to be so by those who opposed it (hear). Another circumstance connected with these appeals deserved attention; and he really looked upon them as a very curious and remarkable feature in this discussion. The noble lords who made them seemed a little inconsistent with their own professed principles. They appealed to the episcopal bench, in their quality of representatives of the rights and interests of the clergy, to give their votes against a measure which threatened to be injurious to those interests; but what was the language, and what were the professions of the same noble lords in other parts of their speeches? Had not every one of them most indignantly repudiated the idea of treating this as a landlord's question, or a question affecting the peculiar interests of a class (hear, hear, hear)? They all stood forward as the advocates of the interests of the great mass of the community, the friends of the labouring man; they cast away all considerations of private interest, all considerations affecting their own order. But must not the clergy stand in that position also (hear, hear)? If the interests of the clergy were identical with those of the great mass of the community, then what occasion was there to bring the episcopal bench into particular notice, and appeal to them as the representatives of those particular interests? When their lordships considered the line of argument taken by those noble lords—how they had represented the measure as pregnant with ruin to the institutions of the country, as well as to the labouring population, did it not border upon the ridiculous, that there should be placed in juxtaposition with those mighty interests anything so comparatively diminutive and insignificant as the effect the measure was to have upon the interests of the clergy? Were they (the bishops) to be told in the same breath to resist this bill, because it tended to the overthrow and ruin of the empire, and also because it would produce a considerable reduction of tithes (hear, hear)? There appeared to him to be indications of something which those noble lords were willing to conceal, not only from the house but themselves. All must recollect the vehement language of one noble lord, who held out some vague indefinite threat of retributive consequences, which were to fall upon the members of that (the episcopal) bench, if, as he said, they deserted—what? Not the interests of their country, or of the labouring population, or any interests which might be expected to be dear and sacred to them in the character which they sustained in that house; but, said the noble lord, if they (the bishops) should desert "us." It was evident what was uppermost in the noble lord's mind. Why, he felt, although he might not be distinctly conscious of it, that this was not the question of the labouring classes, not the question even of the tenant farmers, but that it was a landlord's question (hear, hear, hear). But there was another circumstance still more remarkable about these appeals; noble lords who expressed such a sympathy for the interests of the clergy appeared to understand their wishes and feelings better than the clergy themselves. For not only had the clergy as a body abstained from expressing any opinion on the subject publicly or by petitions; but they had never in private, as far as he (the Bishop of St. David's) knew, signified to the members of the episcopal bench any desire as to the course of conduct they should pursue on this subject (hear, hear, hear). He conceived that in so acting the clergy had acted most wisely, and had earned the approbation and respect of their countrymen (cheers); but what could be the purport of the appeals made by noble lords to that (the episcopal) bench, except that they should, by their voluntary, officious interference, place the clergy in that very invidious position which they themselves had declined to stand in (hear, hear)? What must those noble lords have thought, if there had been in that sense a perfect unanimity among the members of that bench, but that part of the house at least had been swayed, not by their dispassionate and deliberate convictions, but by a sense of the interests of their own class (hear)? He rejoiced that it was otherwise, proving that they (the bishops) as a body had followed their own convictions; and he might appeal here to the fact, that two of that body, united not only by their office but by ties of blood, took opposite sides of this question (hear, hear). A noble duke (the Duke of Buckingham) had spoken of the effect of this measure upon the interests of the clergy, and had calculated it so precisely as to be able to say that their incomes would be diminished by one-fourth; he (the Bishop of St. David's) did not pretend to be able to follow that calculation, but he conceived that the noble duke had overlooked everything in the shape of compensation which the clergy might receive to make up for this deficiency in consequence of the effects of this measure, and which, being anticipated by its advocates, could not fairly be left out of the account. Moreover, whatever the bad effects of the bill on the interests of the clergy, they could not properly be laid upon this measure, but resulted from one passed long since, for it was by this measure in connection with that for the commutation of tithes, that the interests of the clergy were placed on a different footing from those of other classes interested in land. But, if so, although it was possible that the clergy might sustain loss, they could not say they suffered any injury, for that measure was undoubtedly passed with the concurrence of those who represented their interests in that house, and with full warning of the possibility, if not probability, that it would be followed by the proposal now under consideration. Some who took part in that discussion distinctly adverted to the possibility of a repeal of the Corn Law at no very distant period. He (the Bishop of St. David's) alluded to that, to show the uncertainty of calculations of this nature; for those who adverted to this possibility did so, not because they conceived the interests of the clergy would be affected in such case, but because the repeal would operate as a grievance and a hardship to the owners of land ("Oh!" from the front cross-bench). The noble duke who cried "oh!" would find that the fact was so. However, he (the Bishop of St. David's) would only say here, that the clergy did not entertain the slightest desire that their (the bishops') votes on this question should be in the least degree influenced by their view of its operation upon the particular interests of the clergy; and if he were to say to them, "I think I have merited your approbation, for although, according to my own convictions, the measure was one likely to promote the general interests of the community, still, because I understood and believed that it was likely to operate injuriously to you, I complied with the exhortations I received from some of your best friends by voting against it;"—if he were capable of such folly and such dishonesty, he was quite sure he should be as far from earning the good will and thanks of any part of the clergy, as from deserving the good opinion of any man in the country (hear, hear). He could not consent to place such a momentous question as this upon any such narrow, paltry, and miserable ground, as its effect upon any particular class, however closely he was connected with it. He could consent to look at it only in the view of its probable effect upon the comfort, prosperity, and well-being of the great mass of the community (hear, hear). Now, looking at it in that point of view, he would wish to ask those noble lords to whom he had been referring, whether he rightly understood them, that the state of the great mass of the labouring population of this country was, upon the whole, so satisfactory, that it did not stand in need of any great change (hear, hear)? He thought that expressions which fell upon his ear pointed strongly to such a notion; and yet, when he reflected on all that he heard and saw, it appeared so monstrous a paradox, that he scrupled to attribute it to the good sense and good feeling of any of their lordships (hear). It was impossible to doubt that, if this measure were a great and a fearful experiment, as was said, at all events it was not a gratuitous and wanton one. Gratuitous and unnecessary it might be with reference to the case of those noble lords, and the class immediately below them, the occupiers of their land, who might have no desire for any uncertain or perilous change; but with regard to the interests those noble lords most particularly professed to advocate, he must contend that this was far from a gratuitous experiment, that it was one forced upon Parliament by the emergencies and necessities of the case, and that the question was one of life or death to the people of this country. To his own mind it was the great recommendation of the measure, that at all events it held out that which was the sweetener of all human adversity and misery—hope ("hear, hear," and a laugh), the hope of an improvement in the condition of the people. If their lordships rejected this experiment, and declared their determination to abide by the system advocated by the noble lords to whom he had referred, what had they to hold out in exchange? What prospect of improvement did they present (hear)? It was a natural and inevitable consequence of their principles, that they should more or less directly, openly, or covertly deny the existence of the need of such improvement (hear, hear). The house had been reminded in this discussion of the consequences likely to ensue from the rejection of this measure—reminded of what he believed to be an unquestionable fact, that such a step would be likely to produce a very great degree of disappointment, and discontent, and irritation, in the country. That was a topic on which he should be most unwilling to touch for the purpose of influencing their lordships' determination; but there was one thing deserving their most serious attention,—the reason why the rejection of this measure was likely to produce such discontent and irritation. Was it not simply this, that the country at large, the labouring population, felt that if their lordships rejected this measure, they were excluding them from the only hope which they had at present to look to of a favourable change in their condition (hear, hear)? He (the Bishop of St. David's) did not mean to say, that although he looked at this measure with hopeful expectation, he anticipated any very great advantages from it (laughter, and ironical cheers from the cross-benches). He was glad to have afforded some transient gratification to any of their lordships (a laugh). If the Government had represented the measure in the light in which it had been placed by many popular declaimers, as the beginning of a new epoch of unbounded prosperity in the country, he should have viewed it with the greatest distrust; he felt his confidence in it very much strengthened by the sobriety and caution of the language in which they expressed their expectation, contenting themselves with declaring their belief that it will produce an increased steadiness in the market, more constant and regular employment for the labouring man, give a certain and very active stimulus to trade, and a considerable and healthy stimulus to agriculture itself (hear, hear). With all this, he was quite aware that it would be unreasonable to expect it to promote the great interests of the manufacturers, and at the same time produce very considerable advantage or addition to the comforts and enjoyments of the labouring man. But he still anticipated some such results; and he would remind their lordships that, however small individually those results might be in adding to the means of existence enjoyed by the labouring men, it became a matter of great importance when the vast surface over which the benefit was to be spread came to be considered. He was not sure that noble lords were all fully aware of the importance of the addition made to the comfort, happiness, and well-being of the labouring population by a very minute addition to their means. It was frequently the case that the poor were unable to take advantage of the means of education and instruction accessible to them, in consequence of the misery of their physical condition. In a parish where there might be an excellent school, and a place of worship affording abundant room for the population, there might be seen swarms of ragged children playing about throughout the whole of the Sundays and other days, and contracting habits of idleness. Why was this the case? In nine cases out of ten it would be found, that it occurred because those children had not decent clothing to appear in at church or at school. Now, if it happened that the parents had a little surplus, however small, out of the share they received of the productions of the soil which they cultivated, and which surplus they might send to Manchester in exchange for decent articles of clothing, such an addition to their means would be an inestimable blessing, as it would enable them to obtain for their children the means of instruction, and would thus tend to improve their moral and religious condition (hear, hear). He had heard noble lords speak of this measure as a wanton and gratuitous experiment, because it was not positively certain what amount of benefit was to be derived from it. Though that might be a fair consideration for those who had to bear the whole responsibility of introducing it, it was no argument against the measure which ought to operate on their lordships' minds; because, if this measure were to leave the country in the precise state in which it was at present, still he contended that by rejecting the measure their lordships were incurring imminent danger of altering their position in the most injurious manner. It would be no contemptible gain if their lordships relieved themselves from the obloquy and suspicion of having rejected such a measure from selfish and interested motives (hear, hear). Their lordships might feel conscious of the purity of their intentions; but, as a strong feeling with respect to this measure was entertained out of doors, their lordships' conduct might be subjected to a different construction. A noble lord who spoke last night observed, that it would be remarkable that a measure of this importance should be passed through the House of Lords on the very first time when it was brought forward in that house, and had reminded their lordships how differently they had dealt with another great question, on which they had first differed from the other house, but to which they ultimately acceded—viz., the Roman Catholic Relief Bill. He would remind that noble lord that there was a wide difference between the two cases. With respect to the question of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, it was possible that for rejecting it their lordships might be charged with short-sighted prejudices, but there could be no suspicion that they were biased by motives of personal interest. Could there be a more glaring contrast than that which existed between the two cases? Though he had said that he did not entertain any exaggerated expectation of benefit to be derived from the passing of this measure, still he had a very decided belief that the alarm of disastrous consequences to be expected from it had been very greatly exaggerated. There were several reasons for believing that those consequences were not of a nature which ought to excite any reasonable apprehension. In the first place, those who threatened these disastrous consequences had, throughout their whole arguments, entirely overlooked all the compensations which might arise from the nature of things for any of the evils which they anticipated even if those evils were realised. It had been assumed that if the legislature passed this measure, it would thereby divest itself for ever of the power of interposing at any future period for the purpose of redressing and correcting any inequality, injury, or inconvenience, which experience might show to be the result of it. Now, he took it to be quite certain that Parliament did not, by passing this measure, abrogate any such power, and did not preclude itself from receiving lessons from experience, or of adopting any legislative enactment applicable to the state of things which might result. He placed unbounded confidence in the wisdom and justice of Parliament, and he hoped and believed that, if it should appear that the result of this measure was unfair and injurious to the people or oppressive to any particular class of men, it would be found not beyond the reach of the wisdom and justice of Parliament to provide a remedy. Therefore he felt on every ground that he had not in the vote he had given, and which he was about to repeat, betrayed any of those interests which ought to be dear and sacred to him, while at the same time he had consulted, to the best of his poor ability and judgment, the interests of the community (hear, hear). It was, at all events, a great consolation for him to reflect that with respect to the vote he had given he found himself coinciding with men who had bestowed the most anxious and careful study on this question, and with the great majority of all the parties between which the legislature had hitherto been divided (hear, hear). He could not believe, in coming to the same conclusion with them, that he had fallen into any very great, serious, or fatal error; and with respect to those interests to which he had more particularly adverted, it would be a great consolation to him to feel that, whatever might be the result of the present measure, the conduct of the clergy with respect to it had increased for them the respect, the good-will, and the confidence of the mass of the people (cheers).

The Bishop of Exeter agreed with the Bishop of St. David's as to the disinterested conduct of the clergy, but differed wholly from him as to the probable effects of the measure. It might not be a main argument, but it was an important subsidiary one, that the temporal interests of the clergy would be affected by the bill, and to these they could not be indifferent. The worthy bishop disclaimed all knowledge of the thing called "POLITICAL ECONOMY;" and in that ignorance, declared that good wages and good food were far better for the poor than mere cheap bread, and he believed that the effect of the bill will be to place the labouring classes on the footing of the Polish serfs, while its most ardent promoters would be completely disappointed. He hoped that their lordships, discarding all other considerations, would act as in their judicial capacity, and, laying their hands on their hearts, say "Content," or "Non-content."

Several Peers having risen to address the house, and a great tumult having been raised as to who should have precedence, a short conversation on the subject of precedence arose, Lord Brougham thinking that speakers should follow each other for and against, and the Duke of Richmond suggesting that in that case they should measure time by the clock. At last the Earl of Warwick was allowed to proceed in a speech in which he strongly censured the proceedings of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and condemned the Government measures.

The next speech was a striking one. Dr. Wilberforce, the son of the Wilberforce, is still a young man, somewhere about 49 years of age. His rise in the church has been rapid. A short time ago, he was Archdeacon of Surrey. He was promoted to be Dean of Westminster; and about the commencement of the present year was made Bishop of Oxford. This is understood to be owing to the favour of her Majesty, whose admiration of the talents and the character of Dr. Wilberforce is very great. But the Bishop of Oxford (the youngest bishop who has attained the episcopal bench for many years past) is a remarkable man. His style of speaking is very showy; but then it is based on solid acquirements, accompanied by a boldness of spirit, and a freshness of heart, absolutely gratifying. Several times during his speech, on Friday week, the Protectionist peers, who writhed under his manly declarations, attempted to put him down by smiles, laughter, sarcastic cheers, and even groans. But nothing daunted him. Every interruption only inspired him; and his rebukes were delivered with a calm dignity which gave them force and power.

The Bishop of OXFORD said: After what has fallen from my right rev. friends, and from many noble lords, in the course of this debate, I feel it necessary, holding the opinions I entertain, and being prepared to record a similar vote to that which I have before given on that question, to trouble your lordships with a very few plain remarks, explaining the reasons which guide me in giving my vote. My right rev. friend on my left (the Bishop of Exeter) expressed great gratification at the appeals which have been made to himself and to other right rev. prelates on this occasion; and he gave a version of those appeals marked, I may venture to say, with singular skill and subtlety. He said, "We occupy these benches under peculiar circumstances; we are, as it were, authorities upon morals and religion; and, therefore, noble lords, anxious to be right upon matters of morality and religion, naturally appeal to us and ask for our opinion upon those questions." To all the appeals made to the bench upon which I have the honour to sit I have been a diffident and attentive auditor; but I cannot admit that such has been the character of the appeals made to us. I appeal to your lordships to give a verdict upon this point. What was the appeal of the noble marquis who began the debate? He said we had been devising schemes to increase the incomes of the clergy, and that now we were going by the present measure to diminish them. Was this the appeal becoming our position as authorities upon moral and religious matters in this house? One noble earl allowed himself to use language of this character. He began with the erroneous assumption of a fact. He said that the incomes of the bishops had been commuted into a fixed money payment (hear, hear). That is a view entirely fallacious. He then said to us,—"Your incomes are separate and distinct from those of the working clergy, and whereas this bill will lower their incomes, it will, inasmuch as it raises the value of money, improve your fixed incomes." The noble earl said to us that we should mend our incomes by diminishing those of the working clergy. My lords, these appeals are not only improper, they are utterly unconstitutional. We do not sit here to represent a particular class, and it is destructive of all sound constitutional principle to say so. The House of Lords is constituted by drawing members from every profession and rank in society, and is composed of those who by hereditary descent, and those who by the favour of the Sovereign, sit here to represent, not the interests of the class in which they were born, but the interests of all classes of the community (hear). If it were not so our mouths would be sealed upon all subjects except those affecting the interests of the clerical class. I cannot therefore welcome an appeal addressed to us as if we sat here to consider what is best for the clergy, instead of what is best for the country (cheers). I do not say that we neglect the interests of the clergy in taking that course, because I believe that their interests are intimately bound up with the interests of the country. The noble earl opposite on a former night addressed us on the principle that we were going to do something fatal to the country, and that we ought not to do so. But something was wanting in the noble earl's argument, and that was the shade of a reason why what we are going to do should be fatal to the country. That argument, therefore, so far as I am concerned, is entirely beside the mark. I shall not follow the example of the right rev. prelate in disclaiming all knowledge of political economy, because some slight knowledge of it is necessary for the consideration of this subject, and if the right rev. prelate says he has none, he puts himself out of the condition of the argument (hear, hear). I would rather suppose that he said this out of modesty, because the right rev. prelate is a very judge and master in all other matters which come before him in his legislative capacity, and this is a matter which lies in the alphabet of political economy. On the surest principles of political economy, so far as I have been able to understand them, I approve of this measure. It is, I admit, an experiment; but when was a great measure anything else but an experiment? All legislation is but a series of experiments. You meet a certain evil by a remedy embracing the greatest probable amount of good. I look at this question, my lords, chiefly as affecting the position and habits of the working class. Noble lords who have opposed this bill have been but too happy to appear as the labourers' advocates; but I cannot allow them to occupy that position. The present law, with regard to the importation of corn, must be admitted to be an unnatural state of things (cries of "No, no," from the cross benches). Do noble lords who cry "No, no," know the meaning of the term "natural"? In the providence of God and by the order of nature, wheat grows in the field; it is fed by the dew and ripened by the sun. God working through certain known laws. But does any one believe that for the working man to have bread on the cheapest terms is not a part of the economy of the God of Nature (cheers)? I say a Corn Law is unnatural. Legislation is for the most part, I admit, an interference with nature, but that legislation which as little as possible interferes with the order of nature is the best. The labourer is now prevented from being that important element in society in this country which he will be in the natural working of your altered law. The effect of repealing the present law is that it will produce competition.

The Duke of RICHMOND: Competition with foreign labour!

The Bishop of OXFORD: I thankfully accept the agreement which I crave (a laugh). What is it that makes any man more valuable in a life of labour? It is the amount of competition he has to strive against. Be he farmer or be he labourer, what is it that makes him important and valuable to those above him? It is competition; and, unless the foreign labourer competes with our own, he will never raise his present position. The noble duke smiles. It is agreeable to see a person in a matter affecting his own personal feelings smile rather than be angry (a laugh); but I do not forget that I am met by a smile instead of an argument,—by a laugh instead of an answer,—and I shall go on through the chain of reasoning I was about to enter upon, although the noble duke's laugh should increase to the highest degree of cachinnation (laughter). My lords, in the woollen manufacture, as long as there was no room for competition with foreigners, there was no room for skill, but when competition came in it became worth the while of the manufacturers to create a better class of labourers. So it will be found that competition generally both requires and makes it worth while to employ a better class of labourers. As long as the growth of our fields is protected, the grossest form of unskilled labour will be sufficient to enable the labourer to earn his bread, and the farmer to pay his rent. But when you admit foreign corn, the result will be that the owners and holders and tillers of the soil will all suffer if they make no change in their mode of cultivation. Self-interest here steps in, and when they cannot look to the legislature to protect them, they are compelled to protect themselves, by using the advantages which they possess. The farmers of this country must make an acre of land produce corn in greater quantity (an ironical cheer from the Duke of Richmond). The principle of protection has so completely eaten into the heart of the noble duke, that he cheers as if it were untrue that the English agriculturist could grow any larger quantity of produce from his land.

The Duke of RICHMOND said that the whole course of his life contradicted this opinion. He had always urged the English farmer to increase his produce as much as possible.

The Bishop of OXFORD:—I was not speaking of the whole course of the noble duke's life, but of the sound of his voice, which I admit was of an inarticulate, and doubtful, and easily mistaken nature (a laugh). Will the noble duke, will any one say, that the introduction of a better sort of agricultural husbandry will not bring in an increase of cattle-feeding, and that it will not be attended by a greater demand for labour (hear)? Let noble lords remember that we have a measure proposed to us, not by a bare authority, but proposed by the only two great parties who, as parties, can conduct the government of the country. I am not voting for this measure to keep the right honourable baronet in power. There is an essential difference between supporting a Government, and supporting the present Government. The one is a lawful, and the other an unlawful and treacherous motive. But, noble lords impute to us who support this measure motives of a contradictory and irreconcilable character. They say we do not give a free vote on a great constitutional question, because we are biased by a desire to keep the right honourable baronet in power, and yet they say we do not believe it will have the effect of keeping him in power. Then, it is said, that her Majesty's Government have brought forward this measure on account of certain agitation and clamour; and the noble duke cheers me. He will say, perhaps, that this agitation and clamour have been caused by the League. But has the noble duke read so little of constitutional history and of the proceedings of this house, as to tell me that the League, though they may have raised a large sum of money, ought to be spoken of as a body which the House of Lords must dread. The great consideration which gives them power and influence is, that the great mass of the thinking men in this country are with the League. In the depth of their hearts, and in the centre of their convictions, noble lords must know that the opinions of the people accord with this agitation, and they know that then and not otherwise such an agitation becomes fearful. Would the machinery of the League terrify this house, if their objects did not come home to the sympathies of the people? If the League had double their actual funds and proposed the repeal for instance of the Reform Bill, that agitation would not be dreaded by your lordships, because there is nothing in the great mass of the English people to answer to such an appeal. The secret, my lords, is, that in the thinking mind of England and the feeling heart of England, the opinions of the League are sympathised with, and this is why noble lords are roused by what they call agitation and clamour. There is this feeling risen and rising. The minds of men have undergone a change, and they are ready to support a Government which proposes a measure in conformity with that change. The condition of the working clergy has been referred to, as it will be affected by this bill. My lords, I know no class of persons who encounter more hardships and make sacrifices more cheerfully than the working clergy. I believe that in many cases a reduction in their incomes will be a reduction not merely in their luxuries, but in many cases in the essential necessities of life (hear, hear, hear). But it is a striking circumstance that the clergy have not raised their voices anywhere in support of the Corn Laws. This has not been from want of invitation, for they have been invited to throw themselves into the battle, and they would be covered by the capacious shields of their defenders. But they would not respond to the invitation; not because they fear to oppose the Government, for the table of this house has been covered with petitions against a bill supposed to be advocated by the most leading mind of the Government; because when they did indeed believe that a great national principle was at stake they were the first and most numerous in coming forward with their addresses to your lordships; but in this other case, because they suspected that they themselves must be injured—for I admit so much,—because they considered that they had no grounds of justice upon which to withstand this measure, they have been altogether silent (hear, hear). I say grounds of justice, because I very much desire that your lordships should distinctly see that injustice to them—injustice to the parochial clergy was committed by the Tithe Commutation Act, and not by the alteration in the Corn Laws. Before the Tithe Commutation Act it was urged that the clergy had a great interest in the agriculture of the country; but it was judged needful, I will not say whether it was wise or not, that they should lose that interest; and take in future an annual sum out of the income of the concern, instead of being, as they had been, sleeping partners in it; and why were they asked to do that? Because it was said that agriculture would be greatly improved if other persons who would come forward and advance the money were to have the whole interest of that money, instead of the clergy taking any part of it. What, then, is this Corn Law repeal, my lords, but the simple carrying out of that same object?—making it worth while for capitalists, if necessary, to lay out money in improving agriculture, in order that we may compete with the foreign grower; and therefore the injury done to the English clergy, when you take from him an increasing share in an increasing concern, and not allowing him any share in the increasing profits of that concern, is but in accordance with your former Act; and therefore the clergy, feeling that they have no ground of justice on which to resist this measure, have held a noble, dignified, self-denying silence, have refused to join in the clamour which they might most injuriously have swelled (hear, hear), and have set to all classes in the community an example such as it is rarely the habit or in the power of any one class to set, by showing that they knew there were interests beyond the interests of money, and a reward for themselves greater than the reward of their annual income (hear, hear). And when I say this, I admit that I think it probable that, to a certain amount, the income of the English clergy will be injured by this bill, and I do not see how that can be met except in one way, they will be made partakers in that compensation which this bill will produce in the cheapness of articles of consumption. This will be direct; but there will be another upon which I will say one word (hear, hear). But, before I do so, I think there is one class which will also be injured by this bill. I think it right and fair in argument to admit that. It is a class who may possibly have some representatives in this house—I mean the nominal owners of great property mortgaged to their creditors (hear, hear); and I will say of them that they appear to me to be in precisely the same position as the English clergy, and they may do well to copy in this respect their example (hear, hear). I think they will be injured by this bill, because, as I said, the foreign grower is only to be met by improved agriculture in England—by bringing corn into the markets of a better quality and in greater quantity, with the advantage which greater security of price will give to increasing such agriculture—of having better markets, and freedom from the liabilities of change, to which they are now subject. Now, in the case of noble lords who have capital, where money will be laid out, the capital will come from the possession of those noble lords. But I grant you, and it is my bounden duty in argument to do so, that when the estates of a noble lord are mainly and wholly another's, when they are mortgaged to his creditors, when he has no money to improve his land, then does arise the deep and solemn question which the noble earl put with that plainness of language upon which I could hardly have ventured, but which I may adopt, when he said, in a tone of sepulchral demand—“and where is the money to come from” (laughter)? Now it does appear to me an undeniable fact, that with regard to those mortgaged estates, the effect of your legislation must be that many of those lands must change hands (hear, hear), because we know that the tenantry of a poor proprietor are generally poor themselves; I know, from their cottages, that the labouring workmen of a poor proprietor are lamentably poor. It happened to me, the other day, to inquire into the moral condition of a certain parish, and I was told by the clergyman that it was in the worst state of immorality; and when I asked how it came, he said from the miserable dwellings of the poor making everything like decency of life absolutely impossible. I followed up my question by asking, “why have you not told the proprietor of the estate that he must, upon the higher claims of duty and upon the lower grounds of expediency, lay out some of his money in building better cottages?” The answer I received was, “I have already done so, the case has been looked into, but he says he has no money to build cottages with.” And this, my lords, is the case with many who, in the common parlance of society, are the owners of vast tracts of land, and who consider it necessary to their territorial greatness, but who are only nominally lords of the land, for others really possess them, and displace all the influence of the proprietor, who alone can feel the responsibility with reference to the poor on their estates. He alone can feel that responsibility; but if he does, he is unable to acknowledge it in any degree, because instead of having a small property really his own which he could improve, he has nominally a great property altogether beyond his means, and so he is, in fact, reduced to the condition which I fear some of your lordships are too familiar with, of the farmer with a larger farm than he has the capital to work, and which is altogether neglected, whilst the same man with a small farm equal to his capital, would be a good and successful farmer. And therefore, my lords, although I admit fairly that there must be much evil in such a change of property, I say that, looking forward to that as one of the possible contingencies of the working of this bill, yet it appears to me to be no reason why your lordships should not adopt it; because, in fact, it will be only one means of bringing the whole of property into a healthier and better condition—a condition in which it will be more easy to improve the land and more natural to acknowledge the responsibility which waits upon the possessor of it. This, my lords, seemed to me to be a most important view of this question, which it was the duty of a person in my situation, even at the risk of offending some of your lordships, to present to your notice. My lords, it is because I think that the condition of the poor is such as to require some such measure as this that I am an advocate in its behalf. But, my lords, I said there was another reason for the silence of the clergy. I believe that many of them, many who are acquainted with this state of society, are looking forward to this measure because, from the effects it will produce, they will minister to a happier, more contented, better provided, elevated peasantry (hear, hear). I know that they who live amongst that class, who do not see them only upon the days of forced festivity, drinking out of empty glasses “health to their landlord, and prosperity to agriculture” (hear, hear, and laughter), they who see them amongst their homes and trials, who visit them when they lie on the bed of fever and of death—I know that those men, for I myself was 15 or 16 years one of them, are continually grieved in their hearts at sights of wretchedness which they cannot alleviate, and wants to which they can only administer by spiritual consolation. I believe, my lords, that the other side of the hypothesis of Lord Bacon is made good in England. I believe, my lords, that the absolute necessity of this measure can be proved. I know that the clergy of this country believe that the state of the great mass of the labouring population and the peasantry of England is such that they cannot desire it long to continue as it is (hear, hear). They see other mouths to provide for, and no work likely to be found to furnish them with food; they see these things practically,—and looking round for a remedy, they believe it will be found in anything that increases the general prosperity of the country (hear, hear). But, some noble lords say, that this measure will not increase the prosperity of the country; that our best markets for our manufactures, our home markets, will be injured, and that we shall suffer more than any body else (hear, hear). The noble lord cheers that, and I will join in it, because if it be so what becomes of the argument brought forward with the usual eloquence and power of the noble earl who at the beginning of this debate told us to calculate on the step we were taking, for it is irremediable for us and our posterity. Why? Because you give way to some strong necessity and admit to a share of power persons heretofore excluded, there is no retracing of your steps, because the persons to whom you give this power will be strong enough to keep it. But the noble lord says you are altogether in mistake about this measure. It will be ruin to the manufacturers and agriculturists. Then I ask, my lords, who is the third party to maintain this measure (hear)? Why is it to be irremediable? If it is found that the home markets will be ruined by this measure, will any one of those who claimed this concession stand up in the House of Commons and ask that it might be continued? If the manufacturers are on the brink of ruin, if agriculture is on the verge of destruction, they will forget their past dissensions and ask that this measure shall not continue. They will have found the evil of this experiment, and the utmost harm will be that you will have to retrace your steps and re-enact the former law (hear, hear). Therefore, this argument, my lords, is clearly most destructive to the other argument from which the opposite side of the house draw their conclusions. The two cannot be held together by any rational man. Therefore, with the utmost deference to those who differ from me, but with a full determination not to act upon the judgment of others, but to the best of my poor ability to judge for myself upon the subject under discussion, I am prepared, for one, to risk the dangers, and as I hope to partake of the benefits of the experiment you are now invited to make. It would ill become me, my lords, and it is most alien to my feelings to suppose that your lordships were influenced by any motive of fear upon this measure. If any strong motive be brought to bias your decision, there is but one motive of fear which your lordships have any danger of falling into—and that is the fear of being thought afraid (hear, hear, hear). I believe that this is the fear your lordships should, more than any other, guard against—that you should not, for fear of being thought, out of fear, to have changed your purpose, refuse to show that the time is come when that which might once be useful has become noxious; for let me remind your lordships of one of the arguments mentioned in this debate from an agricultural quarter, but in a manner which seemed to me not to savour of any great agricultural faith. The argument was this:—“Protection is the course you pursue with regard to everything else. You nurse carefully and protect the tender fruits of the earth; and you ought to do the same with this tender plant, the agriculture of England.” I do not think that our agriculture is so tender an exotic; and I have no doubt that, free from the shackles of protection, it will assert its own indigenous strength and power (hear). But my lords, I am a protector of native industry (ironical cheers from the crossbenches); and, in spite of the cheer of the noble duke, of which I am as little afraid as of his arguments (a laugh), I again assert the same thing (hear), and I say that we, on this side of the question, are the true protectors of native industry; for what is that true protection? Simply to bring it into the field, and enable it to maintain a wholesome competition with the foreigner. Such was the course with respect to the great manufactures of this country. In the commencement of those manufactures they were sheltered with protection, even as you would place a glass upon a tender seedling (hear, hear); but as soon as they had asserted their native strength, and had based themselves upon the habits and minds of the people, that protection was found to be an impediment to their growth, and was withdrawn. When Mr. Burke said he would raise the woollen manufactures of England until they supplied the markets of the world, by raising foreign competition, he was met by clamour, to which even in this house we have not been altogether strangers this evening (laughter). He was told he was going to exterminate our manufactures. But the truth of his prophecy was proved, because it was based upon the eternal truths that govern all human conduct and human things (loud cries of “hear, hear”). You must provide for human necessities by human exertions—by human skill. You must teach men that they must depend upon their own right arm, their own moral habits, their own genius, and the ever favouring providence of God. You must teach them to compete with the world, and not, by your system of protection, to destroy that object. Make it worth while for that native industry to meet that of the world, and you will be the true protectors of that native industry (hear, hear, hear). You will make it as sure as it ever can be now, for who can depend upon any legislation, when any rash Minister (as we are told), at the sacrifice of place—of everything which a party man esteems of the highest value, but fulfilling that which his conscience tells him he ought to fulfil, in order to provide the necessities of life for a great nation, which Providence has placed under his government, may abandon it at any moment? In spite, then, of those derisive cheers, I venture to say that I and the noble lords who think with me are, and at one day will be acknowledged to be the true protectors of the native industry of the English people; and, believing this, I would most earnestly beseech you not to be led away by that taking declamation which has tickled our ears (a laugh). I hope your lordships will not be misled by the splendid declamation with which we have been favoured. What is declamation? Is it not painting in the most glowing colours certain propositions, which, when they come to be tried and examined, prove to be rottenness and delusion (cries of “hear, hear”); telling you that you are about to do that which the most partial Englishman could not have admitted into his brain, and then proving them by saying that wheat was sold in the Liverpool market at 15s. per quarter, and then, when the fact comes to be examined, it crumbles away, and you find that 15s. was 25s. on the spot in a distant port, to which was to be added the expense of freight, the outlay of capital, and that the wheat was also of inferior quality (hear, hear, and a laugh). I entreat your lordships not to be led away by any such declamation, delightful to hear, but not matter upon which Englishmen and English statesmen should draw their conclusions. I do believe, my lords, that there is in the minds of the people of this country a deep seated conviction, a firm persuasion, that your lordships will in this, as in other matters, gravely, soberly, and wisely consult, not for your own interests, but for the best interests of the whole nation. Here, my lords, is your strength, and I do beseech you not to shake its foundations. Her Majesty's Government has been said to be mainly culpable in that it did not send back to the electoral classes this question for decision before calling upon Parliament to settle it. My lords, such a course I believe would have been alike unworthy of English statesmen acting on an enlightened view of their duties, and contrary to the essence of the constitution. I believe the very principle of representation as settled by the constitution of this country, to be that the electoral body, when they elect, should leave to the judgment and discretion of their representatives for a limited time the decision of those questions which may arise and call for decision during that period, and I think, therefore, with respect to any separate question, of such a nature as that it can easily be made matter of divers representations addressed to and acting mainly on the feelings of those who have to decide in elections, that such a question is one which would be reserved by the theory of the constitution, not for the decision of the electoral body, but would be left to the decision of the elected. It had been stated to their lordships that this question was mixed up with a multitude of questions of political economy; but if so, how alien was such a question from the habits that could alone lead to a proper decision of it on the part of the people? How surely, at an election, would it be carried by appealing to the feelings and passions, and not by the sober exercise of cool, calm judgment; how certainly would it be decided by appeals from one side and the other to those particular prejudices, feelings, and passions, by which, of all others, it was most undecidable, for the welfare of the nation, that such a question should be settled? Therefore, my lords, I think it would have been unworthy of a great statesman to have taken this course, and have flinched from calling upon Parliament for a decision upon this question—flinched, first from a regard for himself, and then from a regard for your lordships. I think it would have been unworthy of a great statesman, after having satisfied himself by cogent arguments and reasons, to have said, “I dare not rest on them; I must risk a dangerous convulsion, which will reach to every county and borough in England, in order to set the question at rest.” What would that have been—what else could it necessarily have been—but to set class against class in a struggle of a doubtful issue; what but to tell the manufacturer, “Now is the moment for you to try all your strength;” and to tell the agriculturist, “Now is the time come for you to raise your loud shout for protection to agriculture?” My lords, it cannot be doubted that the effect would have been to cause this question to be decided as a great party question instead of deciding it by the dictates of the wisdom of the best informed minds, if the Government had gone to the country instead of coming to Parliament for the settlement of it. Sit on this question then, my lords, I beseech you, divested of party feeling; sit on it judicially, not as the representatives of one interest or another, not as owners of rents (hear, hear), not as owners of land, not as owners of inappropriate titles who are about to suffer by the change; but as the natural heads of the great English people, in whose welfare your whole welfare is necessarily bound up—in whose success you must succeed, and in whose prosperity you must prosper (hear, hear, hear). Remember, I beseech you, that the labouring classes of this country look to you, in the patient endurance of long-continued suffering—suffering which, I am sure, no other class of men but the English peasantry could be found to endure with patience—but with the anxious hope that you are about to do something to assuage that hard and consuming suffering. Do not disappoint the expectations that they have built upon your known justice. Do not, above all, mistake the greatness of that suffering for apathy to that which is passing around them. Do not read the signs of the times so. Never was there in this country, a time in which there was less outbreaking dissatisfaction, but that is not because the labouring classes are apathetic with respect to their condition, but the reason is, because they believe that those who have the power have also the inclination to do something for the improvement of their situation. Beware, my lords, of disappointing those expectations. Show the people of this country that your decision of this question is based on the broad and grand principle of justice to all, not on the narrow one of advantage to a few. In coming to this decision on those broad grounds, you will set on the firmest and broadest foundations the authority of this assembly. In this assembly, I believe, is laid the main ground of British liberty. Show that you are ready to make any sacrifice—if sacrifice there be—of that which has been only given to classes for the benefit of the people around. Your power is indeed great; but there are some things which it cannot effect. It cannot stand, my lords, against the rising tide of a great nation's conviction. Do not think, therefore, that even you can set your curule chairs on the edge of the rising waters, and think that you can bid them, on a principle of hereditary prescription, recede and fall back from your feet. Do not, my lords, set this house in a position in which it shall seem to represent the hereditary wealth, and not the hereditary justice, wisdom, and virtue of this mighty people (cheers).

Lord Ashburton, with reference to the allusion of the Bishop of Oxford to mortgaged estates, reminded the house of one of the heroes of the French revolution, who said, “I have great respect for the rights of property, but we must change the proprietors.” A one-sided Free Trade would not change the policy of other nations, and could only ruin ourselves. It was evident, also, from the recent despatch of Lord Cathcart, that he entertained great apprehensions as to the result of the measure on the social and commercial interests of Canada.

Lord Montagu adduced from the population returns evidence that the non-agricultural portions of the community were rapidly accumulating, as compared with the agricultural; and this result, on the principles of political economy, was the condition of every prosperous country in which land was increasing in value and productiveness. But protective legislation retarded the natural development of this prosperity, as he showed by tracing the effects of the successive Corn Acts which have been passed since 1815, and which he contended have worked injuriously to all interests, agricultural as well as commercial.

The remainder of the evening was occupied by speeches from Lord Stanley, who predicted ruin; from Earl Grey, who ably grappled with Lord Stanley's allegations and arguments; from Lord Brougham, who performed a similar operation; and from the Duke of Richmond, who attacked the Bishop of Oxford. At the close of all, Earl Stanhope's motion was either withdrawn or negated, without a vote; and it was agreed that the house should go into committee on the following Monday.

On Monday night, in the House of Lords, before their lordships went to the order of the day,

Lord Stanley presented a petition, signed by the chairman of Lloyd's, the chairmen of the London and East India Dock Companies, six Bank directors, a large number of bankers, merchants, shipowners, and traders of the city of London, including all engaged in the Canada and Australian trades, expressing doubt whether the petition which had been presented by Lord Dalhousie represented the general opinion of those classes in the city, and declaring that they did not believe the bill before the house was necessary or called for; and that, in their opinion, it was an experiment affecting vital branches of our national interests, and involving the most serious consequences, which called for the anxious consideration of their lordships.

The Earl of Dalhousie observed, that the petition he had presented did not profess to express more than the opinions of the petitioners, “certain” merchants, bankers, and traders of the city of London, including, however, 24 or 26 Bank directors, 14 other banking firms, and 267 other signatures.

Earl Grey took notice of an erasure in the petition of a passage which had expressed an opinion that there was no necessity for passing the bill with the least possible delay, which erasure implied that, in their opinion, it ought to pass without any delay.

The debate on the order of the day for going into committee was resumed by Lord COLVILLE, who very shortly declared his hostility to the Bill.

The BISHOP of ST. DAVID'S, with reference to a remark of Lord Stanley upon a former night, said, that of his public income little more than one-third was derived from a fixed payment, and as to the rest, it was subject to the reductions consequent upon any depreciation of the prices of agricultural produce, exactly in the same proportion as the incomes of any other of the clergy.

Lord STANLEY justified the allusion he had made by an observation which had fallen from the Bishop of St. David's, that there might be an impression out of doors that their lordships were influenced in their votes by motives of personal interest, and he insisted that there was a broad distinction between the episcopal bench and the parochial clergy in relation to the measure.

The BISHOP of SALISBURY vindicated himself and his brother prelates from any suspicion that motives of personal interest could sway their opinions.

The Earl of Malmesbury, the Bishop of St. David's, the Bishop of Oxford, and the Earl of Winchelsea addressed their lordships with some warmth upon this personal matter.

The house then went into committee on the bill, when

The Duke of BUCKINGHAM, with a view of saving a shadow of protection to the agricultural interest, moved the omission from the first clause of the date "1st February, 1849," when the 1s. duty is to come into operation, the effect of which would be to continue a portion of the sliding scale, so that, after 1849, the duty on wheat at 48s. would be 10s. per quarter, and at 53s. and upwards 4s. He was aware that many of their lordships were in favour of a fixed duty, instead of the remains of a sliding scale; but he still claimed their votes for the protection he proposed.

The Earl of RIPON opposed the amendment. An objection had been made to the interval of three years; but this did not destroy the principle of the bill, and it had been considered that it might have the effect of mitigating the evils which might arise from the greatness of the change. The amendment of the noble duke was at variance with the principle of the bill; it professed to give a protection, and a protection which, so far from being an efficient one, was not worth the acceptance of the agricultural interest, if they could hope to maintain it.

The Earl of CLANCARTY supported the amendment. His lordship went over several of the topics which had been urged by other peers in opposition to the bill. He defended the Irish landlords from the charges which had been attempted to be fastened upon them. The landlords of Ireland felt that they held the land in trust for the benefit, not of themselves merely, but of the nation. This measure would fall with severity upon them, and not on them only, but upon the class of occupiers. He should cordially support the amendment, not in order to defeat the bill, but because, if carried, it would show that their lordships recognised the principle of a minimum of protection.

Earl STANHOPE likewise supported the amendment. In reply to the objection of Lord Ripon, he contended that the principle of the bill was contained in its preamble, which was not opposed to the amendment, for it merely declared the expedience of altering the laws relating to the importation of corn. After repeating, with increased severity, his animadversions upon the "great dictator of the Cabinet," and upon those who had basely and pusillanimously supported him at the expense of a violation of duty and breach of the trust reposed in them by their constituents, his lordship admitted that, as a measure of protection, the amendment was inefficient, still it recognised the principle that protection was necessary to British industry, and upon the same ground he had supported the sliding scale, though he did not think it a full and sufficient protection to agriculture; and in voting for the amendment he did not pledge himself to adhere to this or any other sliding scale.

Lord BEAUMONT was also in favour of the amendment. He admitted that it was no efficient protection, but still those who supported it might justify their votes upon the ground that it retained the name of protection. This, however, was not the ground upon which he gave his vote, but, first, because he thought it was wrong to abandon, at the end of three years, one of the chief sources of our revenue; secondly, because he believed that, instead of being an advantage to the farmer, the delay of three years would be seriously injurious to him; and, thirdly, he thought their lordships had no right to legislate this year for another Parliament, adopting a principle which they dared not carry into effect. If the principle of Free Trade was to be adopted, it should be adopted at once; whereas this bill would derange our foreign commerce as well as our agriculture, exhibiting the monstrous absurdity of a sliding scale without the benefit of the sliding scale, and which was intended neither for revenue nor protection. His lordship denied the assertions made respecting the effect of this bill upon commuted tithes. The tithes had been commuted upon the result of years of high farming upon protection, which had brought poor lands under tillage, which were now saddled with arable tithes, though they would be thrown out of cultivation by this bill. He likewise attempted to show that the operation of the measure would be to put into the pocket of foreigners the amount of revenue which was sacrificed by this bill.

The Marquis of BUTE opposed the amendment. He thought the noble duke who moved it, in his own mind, considered that it was no real protection; and if it was not, the landed interest were much better without it. This was not his own opinion merely, but the opinions of a large proportion of the farmers of this country. Then, would it not place a large portion of her Majesty's subjects in the invidious position of desiring a tax upon foreign corn which would be of no use to themselves or to any one else? The noble marquis considered that the supposed alarms of the farmers had been much exaggerated; he did not think they viewed the measure with apprehension.

The Earl of HARDWICK, in support of the amendment, said, when this bill passed their lordships would hear no more of Free Trade except from farmers, who would be the parties anxious to buy their articles of consumption as cheaply as they could. The object of the amendment was to have a fraction of protection left, in order that they might come to the house hereafter, if necessary, for more protection; for without protection he was convinced the poorer soils of this country could not be cultivated. Their lordships were less likely to suffer from this measure than another class, a numerous class in this country, and particularly in Ireland—namely, those who cultivated or owned small portions of land. In Ireland there were 157,000 farmers who cultivated less than 15 acres of land each. These were the classes who would suffer from this bill, so unjustly said to be a landlords' question. The noble earl then showed, from a detailed statement of the expenditure and produce of a heavy clay farm, assuming, as he did, that the price of wheat under this bill be 40s. a quarter, that if no rent at all was taken, the tenant would be a loser. Their lordships must not lose sight of the political consequences of this measure. How was the Government to be maintained if, with a manufacturing class imbued with radical sentiments, the county constituencies were offended and disgusted? If that protection was withdrawn from the landed interest which had enabled it to discharge the peculiar burdens cast upon it, it was only an act of justice to make the monied interest take an equal share in the burdens of the State.

Lord KINNAIRD agreed with his noble friend who had just addressed the house, in deprecating the clause which held this question in suspense for three years longer. He should certainly have preferred a total and immediate repeal (hear, hear). His noble friend stated that, if this measure were carried, all the farmers of the country would become Free Traders. He (Lord Kinnaird) should not be surprised at that, for, as a member of the Anti-Corn-Law League, he might say that the principle of universal Free Trade was a principle on which they had always relied (hear). One of the dangers the noble lord opposite had set forward with much force was the irruption of foreign grain to be expected upon the reduction of the duty. This was an assertion which apparently deserved some attention, but in effect it would be found of no importance. There was a large quantity at present in bond which could not be sold at a profit to the merchant for less than 60s. He contended that the improved method of cultivation which would be introduced would more than compensate for the less price to be obtained for the grain. He would instance the successful competition of the Scotch agriculturists with those of England as an example of the advantage to be derived from a better education of the agriculturist, and the introduction of a better system of farming. A friend of his had stated that two Scotch agricultural labourers were fully equal to three labourers of Hampshire or Dorsetshire; and their work, besides being equal in quantity, would be much better done. An experiment had been tried in Ireland on two fields, side by side; one was cultivated on the old system, and the net profit for three years was 6l. 12s. 6d. The other was cultivated on an improved system and thoroughly manured, and the profit for the same period was 23l. 7s. 6d. (hear, hear). Much had been said about the ruinous effect which the repeal of the Corn Laws would have upon the value of landed property. He (Lord Kinnaird) had had the advantage of hearing the opinion of Mr. Simpson, the eminent auctioneer, a few days back; and what did their lordships think was the effect already produced? Mr. Simpson said, that in all his long experience he had never known estates more in demand, or more easily either let or sold. Rents were rising, and prices were firm and to be obtained with facility. Few better or more competent authorities than that gentleman could be found, and such was his statement; and he had added that the sliding as well as other scales had fallen from his eyes (laughter). But there was another high and competent authority, whose opinion was of great weight upon the question—he meant the tenantry themselves. On an estate which he (Lord Kinnaird) would mention as an instance merely of what was taking place, a number of farms having lately fallen out of lease, the tenants, in retaking them, demanded the insertion of a clause giving them the option, in case the Corn Laws should be repealed, of giving up their holdings. The agent consented upon condition that a similar option were given to the landlord of rescinding the lease, in case the property should, after the repeal of those laws, become more valuable. The terms were agreed upon, but before the completion of the deed the tenants came voluntarily forward, and declined to have the option in either case inserted, preferring to take their chance in the ordinary manner as theretofore. He could cite several similar instances to their lordships; but he did not wish at that late hour to trespass further upon their time. But before he sat down he wished to add a word or two with regard to what had been said of the League, of which he was a member. Many allusions had been made to that body, and it had been asserted that no such excitement existed in the towns upon the question before them as had been represented by the League to exist. Their lordships would, he hoped, give them (the League) credit for having remained perfectly quiescent during the progress of the debate in both houses. To such an extent, indeed, had they been quiet as to have given some sort of right to the noble lord opposite to say that no excitement could be got up by them in the towns upon the subject; but he could assure the noble lord that the League had resisted all the applications which had been made to them from all parts of the country to make a movement during the discussion, from a motive of respect to their lordships, to the other branch of the legislature, and to the Government which had taken the matter in hand, lest it might be said of them, in case they made a great demonstration, that their intention was to intimidate their lordships (laughter and cheers). He was well aware that the League had been already frequently charged with an attempt to intimidate, and he was equally aware that many protectionists had asserted that their lordships could not be intimidated; but although that had been said, yet he could assure them that the motives of the League were such as he had stated. They would not give a colour to such an assertion. They left the matter in the hands of the Government, and to the wisdom and discernment of their lordships and the other House of Parliament, and that had been the reason for the great quiescence of that body (hear, hear). But if their lordships imagined that there was any apathy abroad upon the subject they greatly mistook the feelings of the country. The opinions of the manufacturing districts were deep and unanimous. He could speak for Scotland from personal knowledge, and he should say that if they were disappointed in their expectation that the Corn Bill would pass—if anything should occur to mar those hopes which were regarded at present as almost certain—they would soon be heard, and in an unmistakable voice.

Upon his lordship resuming his seat, two or three noble lords essayed to be heard, but the calls of "question" and for a division were so general that they desisted, and the house divided. The numbers were:

For the amendment 103
Against it 136
Majority in favour of the original motion — 33

The house resumed, and immediately after adjourned at a quarter past 11 o'clock.

On Tuesday, farther procedure was resumed, on the order of the day for going into committee.

Earl Stanhope asked if the Government could inform him whether, under the Corn Law Repeal Bill, the price of corn would be raised, lowered, or remain stationary.

The Earl of Ripon replied, that under each of the former Corn Laws there had been extreme fluctuations in the price of corn, and though not anticipating any very material change, he declined to prophesy.

Earl Stanhope said it was evident that the Government had brought in their measure in total ignorance of what its effect would be.

The Earl of Winchelsea then convulsed the house with laughter by likening the conduct of ministers to that of a medical man, who, after 20 years' discreet management of his patient, suddenly proposed, on the recommendation of a quack, to try a wholly different course, though utterly unable to say what would be the effect of the experiment he proposed.

The Duke of Richmond pointed out that in a recent despatch to Canada, Mr. Secretary Gladstone stated it to be the opinion of competent persons that prices would remain about the level of the average of the years 1844-45. If no great change were to take place, why all this agitation?

Earl Stanhope thought that the country would form its own opinions of the suspicious silence of the Government.

The Earl of Ripon would not submit to the imputation of a "suspicious silence."

Earl Stanhope did not impute personal motives.

Earl Grey remarked that the object of Free Trade was to obtain, not an assumed price of 80s., as in 1815; nor of 65s., as in 1827; nor of 55s., as in 1842; all of which assumptions were never realised; but to confer on the country the advantage of obtaining corn at the natural price, whatever that might be. They ought no more to be called on to predict the price of corn than of tea, cotton, for any other commodity.

Some further conversation was kept up, turning on the point of order, and the subject dropped.

The house having gone into committee on the Corn Bill,

The Earl of WICKLOW moved an amendment in the first clause, that the duty upon wheat not the produce of our colonies, after February 1, 1849, be 5s. instead of 1s.; and if their lordships agreed to this proposition, he should move that there be a proportionate alteration in the duty upon other grain. The noble Earl adverted to the conflicting opinions respecting the effect of this bill upon prices—some thinking they would fall, others that they would rise, whilst others believed that there would be little or no change, but a less fluctuation of prices. To secure the latter object was said to be the aim of the bill, and if it did get rid of that fluctuation, so injurious to the farmer as well as to the consumer, he needed no argument to prove that a 5s. duty would not have the effect of raising prices, which would be much the same with the duty as without it; so that, whilst the consumer lost nothing, the revenue of the country would be a considerable gain. After enlarging upon the evils which would flow from the measure in its present shape, his lordship asked, if it was wrong to tax the necessities of life and the food of the people, why were other necessities of life taxed except corn—sugar, for example, which was as much a necessary as wheat? He knew that the consequence of his amendment, if carried, would be to cause the loss of the bill, and he wished it, in order to get a better bill, a measure likely to be permanent, for it was impossible to settle this question, and the agitation connected with it, by this bill, which, as respected Canada was the most impolitic measure ever introduced.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE opposed the amendment. He pointed out the different position in which this question stood now and when he, on a former occasion, supported a fixed protective duty; the sudden withdrawal of all protection would have then created a panic, and he had never been an uncompromising enemy of all protection. The country has since undergone great change of circumstances and of opinion. As to whether this bill would depress the prices of corn, he believed that prices would be lowered by this bill; but not in a way to injure the landed interest, for he thought our farmers, in spite of their burdens, which had some compensations, would be able to compete with any foreign growers, who had none of the advantages of good roads and other appliances of the British farmer. Meanwhile, the prosperity of the country would be increased, and with increased prosperity the value of landed property would increase. He agreed with the noble earl that bread might be taxed for revenue, a 5s. duty was only a shadow of protection, and he thought a low duty upon corn for revenue might be judicious: not from any abstract love of a tax, but as a substitute for another tax, and when he had advocated a fixed duty, it was to avoid the alternative of an income tax, under which, however, the nation now seemed to be patient. He had no love for this bill, though he had voted for its second reading. He agreed with the Duke of Richmond that it was a bill which seemed to have been framed, as far as the retention of the sliding scale, for the purpose of embarrassment. Still less did he admire the pretences under which this great measure had been introduced; and the way in which it had been carried was, in his opinion, very injurious to men in high stations. After a severe criticism of the conduct and arguments of the Premier, the noble Marquis declared he entertained every one of the principles he had professed, and it was not without difficulty that he had come to the determination to vote against the amendment.

The Earl of CARNARVON, who supported the amendment, considered that the great question was, whether this measure would practically improve, or practically deteriorate, the condition of the poor man. He thought that the cheapening of corn would throw land in this country out of cultivation, and that the poor man would lose more on the one hand than he gained on the other, and as far as the agricultural labourer was concerned, any diminution of the profits of the farmer would infallibly act upon his interests. His lordship predicted from this measure the most destructive consequences to the tenant farmers and lesser tenants, who would suffer utter shipwreck, and their lordships were bound to look to the interests of little men. He shortly replied to some of the arguments against a fixed duty; and deprecating the application of the pure principle of Free Trade to a commodity in which so large a class was interested, he urged their lordships to consent to this fragment of protection, which would put this great question at rest, and instead of keeping up a conflict that set class against class, pour all the balm they could into the wounds of the agricultural interest.

Lord DE MAULEY supported the amendment, considering that a fixed duty so small as that proposed would assist the revenue, and enable the Government to repeal other taxes which weighed more heavily upon the mass of the country, whilst it would afford some slight protection, incidentally, to the landed interest.

Lord CLONCUNRY declared, that the people of Ireland, who had suffered much misery from the famine, would gladly assent to and acquiesce in this law, though many of them did not know what bread was.

The Earl of WINCHELSEA supported the amendment, not because he concurred in the reasons for which it was proposed, but in the hope of another and a better bill. His lordship reiterated, with little diversity, the arguments of preceding speakers against the bill, and denied that a measure could set this question at rest which would entail a reduction of 20 and 25 per cent. of the retail of the country. So fearful a revolution would keep up a constant ferment and agitation.

Lord POLWARTH, being connected with various counties in Scotland, and cognizant of the feelings of the agricultural interest there, explained the circumstances under which certain farms in Scotland had been let at higher rents in 1844 and 1845, from which he nevertheless drew conclusions adverse to the bill. The agriculturists of Scotland felt great alarm at this measure. The farmers considered that if they weathered the storm, it must be by changing their mode of agriculture, and by increasing their stock. He believed the measure would have the effect of causing a considerable displacement of labour, a great quantity of which would be driven out of the agricultural counties.

The Earl FITZWILLIAM complained that that house had been ill-treated by her Majesty's ministers, who ought to have allowed their lordships a voice in this measure. Men who had obtained power in the way they had, by the support of the aristocracy and of the landed interest, ought to have brought to the consideration of this question that branch of the legislature in which the aristocracy sat, and which was most connected with the agricultural democracy of England; and the noble earl declared, amidst loud cheering, that her Majesty's ministers had betrayed all who had placed a reliance upon them, and that he trusted, whatever coincidence of opinion there might be between his friends about him and the Government upon this question, they would never sully themselves by an intimate connection with those who had conducted themselves in such a manner. After referring to the strange contrast between the year 1833, when he proposed a measure like this and stood alone, and the present time, when both houses were in its favour, the noble earl said he would not with Lord Winchelsea reject this bill in the hope of getting a better, or run the risk of a general election upon it. He believed that the measure would confer a great benefit upon the mass of the people, all classes of whom would be placed by it in circumstances of more ease and comfort; whilst it would be advantageous to agriculture in every part of the kingdom, and most in those parts which were least advanced.

Lord BROUGHAM lamented the loss of time in a discussion of the bill in general, instead of the amendment, which was the question before the house. His lordship dispelled the languor of the discussion by some amusing remarks upon Lord Fitzwilliam's speech, justifying the course pursued by her Majesty's Ministers with regard to this bill, and soothed the terrors of the "alarmists" by reading accounts of recent land sales in Essex and Suffolk so far exceeding the valuation as to astonish the auctioneer, an enemy of Free Trade. With reference to the amendment, he was and always had been an enemy to a fixed duty. He preferred the sliding scale, little as he liked it. To say a 5s. duty was a measure of finance was absurd; unless a corresponding duty was imposed upon our own corn, it was a measure of protection, and it imposed a tax upon the people in the shape of an enhanced price of bread. The noble and learned lord, in touching upon the delicate subject of a change of administration, said he would not ask Lord Stanhope to say who would be Ministers a fortnight hence; but he would venture to prophesy that there would be no change, and he assigned the grounds of his prediction in the proceedings of certain parties with reference to this bill and the Coercion Bill, which he had learned from certain "eminent oracles." He called upon their lordships to reject the amendment on its own merits, and because it would be neither more nor less than throwing out the bill.

Lord STANLEY retorted upon Lord Brougham, in a tone of raillery, the charge he had made against other peers of wandering from the proper subject of discussion. He adopted Lord Fitzwilliam's objection against the course of proceeding in this measure by a bill originated in the House of Commons, which gave their lordships no alternative between agreeing to or rejecting the bill as it stood. The rights of this house were infringed, the constitution itself was infringed, if a measure involving great political considerations was sent up from the Commons in the shape of a money bill; it should have been done by resolution in the other house sent up to this house. His lordship was commenting upon a part of Lord Brougham's argument upon the effect of a 5s. duty, which brought up

Lord BROUGHAM, who repudiated the argument attributed to him, and the debate was suspended for a time by a contention on the question of order.

Lord STANLEY, upon resuming, adverted to the coalitions and meetings spoken of by Lord Brougham, professing his ignorance of such proceedings. He acknowledged the justice of Earl Fitzwilliam's remark upon the extraordinary combination of parties now existing; it was by that combination alone that this measure would be inflicted upon the people. Disclaiming for himself and those who acted with him all desire to seek to overthrow the present Ministry—they were above such a proceeding—and applying himself to the amendment, his lordship observed that he had long been of opinion that, as a measure of protection, the sliding scale was infinitely preferable to a fixed duty; and if this amendment had been proposed before the second reading of the bill, he should have opposed it. But the house had rejected a modified sliding scale, and he, therefore, without hesitation, should vote for this amendment, preferring a fixed duty to no duty at all. He urged the evil effects attending the exchange of indirect for direct taxation, and the impolicy of binding succeeding Parliaments, Ministers, and constitutions. He concluded by affirming that this measure never would have been passed but for considerations alien to it, and for the combinations of parties to which he had alluded.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE began by referring to the statements of Lord Brougham relative to certain meetings, distinctly declaring that what really took place at the private house in question was the reverse of what had been stated by Lord Brougham, whom he defied to prove that he (Lord Lansdowne) had taken any other course than a fair parliamentary one in respect to either the Corn Bill or the Coercion Bill. With regard to the amendment, he had never supported a fixed duty in any other sense than that of revenue; and even now he considered that a low fixed duty for revenue might be desirable. But a 5s. duty, either for revenue or for protection, was not worth contending for, with the prospect of losing the measure. He was prepared to make a sacrifice in order that this bill might become the law of the land; and although he was sanguine enough to hope that it would extinguish agitation, if, at the end of a few years, the agricultural interest should suffer injury from the measure, there would be a union of opinions in the country which would procure a revision of the whole subject.

Lord BROUGHAM replied with some warmth to the observations of the noble marquis, which seemed to imply that he had been an informer or an eaves dropper, and he entered, amidst symptoms of impatience, into some details in vindication of what he had before stated respecting private meetings of the Opposition. The noble lord then turned to Lord Stanley, with whom he expostulated for having cast what he conceived to be an imputation upon his motives in defending the measures of the present Government, and declared that it was his own fault, not that of the present Ministers, he was out of office, for he had firmly but respectfully declined most high and brilliant offers.

The Earl of BESBOROUGH explained what had taken place at the meeting referred to, confirming the statement of Lord Lansdowne.

The committee then divided, when the numbers were—

For the amendment 107
Against it 110

Majority —3

The house then resumed, with the understanding that the other clauses of the bill would be considered on Friday.

Their lordships then adjourned.

NEW NEWSPAPER, PRICE THREEPENCE.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that arrangements are in progress for the Establishment of a NEW PAPER, PRICE THREEPENCE, to be called,

THE NEW ERA.

Particulars will be given in future Advertisements. To be published by J. GADSBY, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London.

THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE PICTURE.

Subscribers to the Engraving for the London district to be sent to Mr. WICKHAM, League Office, Fleet-street, London; for the Country to Mr. AGNEW, Exchange-street, Manchester. It is desirable to have them as soon as possible, in order that they may be registered.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, June 17, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

THE AMERICAN COTTON CROP.—The accounts from the United States, received by the Britannia, show a decrease in the deficiency of cotton received at the ports, as compared with the same period of last year; so that, in all probability, the entire crop will be a little larger than had been previously anticipated. Taking into account the increase of stock in the interior towns, the falling-off of receipts is now only about 337,000 bales (instead of 380,000, which was the amount of the deficiency at the departure of the Cambria, on the 16th of May), and, from the rate at which the arrivals have been recently going on, it seems not unlikely to be reduced, before the termination of the season, to less than 300,000 bales; giving a total crop for the year 1845-6, of very nearly 2,200,000 bales, instead of 2,100,000, which was the highest estimate about a month ago.—Manchester Guardian.

REPRESENTATION OF NORTH CHESHIRE.—It seems that the Liberal party in North Cheshire are preparing for the probable event of an election. We had previously heard the Hon. E. J. Stanley and John Cheetham, Esq., of Dukinfield, mentioned as the candidates at the next election, whenever that event might occur; but another has now actually offered himself, in the person of E. D. Davenport, Esq., of Capes-thorne. Mr. Davenport issued an address to the electors on Monday. He states, that having been repeatedly consulted as to his intention to stand, if supported, he thinks there is no reason for withholding a declaration that he is ready to do so. He assigns as his chief reason for coming forward, "an earnest desire to promote the better instruction and moral improvement of the people;" and declares his principles to "consist in political and commercial freedom and religious toleration, all of which are included in that still more ancient precept, 'To do unto others as you would have others do unto you.' It is, at all events, understood that Mr. Tatton Egerton does not intend again to contest this division.

PASSAGES FROM THE LIFE OF AN ENGLISH FARMER.

PASSAGE V.
In which the political uses of the tenantry at an election are given. This is omitted.

PASSAGE VI.
Which relates how Mr. Hurst kept his old farm, and not getting rid of his new one—how he, like many others, had more land than he could manage well, is also omitted.

PASSAGE VII.
Which relates how the mortgagees caused Berry Park and mansion to be let to a sportsman who brought a new corps of gamekeepers on the estate, and preserved the game more than ever, is also omitted.

PASSAGE VIII.
Containing an account of the movement (metaphorically) of heaven and earth, in 1811, to return Tory Members of Parliament, who were to protect such men as Mr. Hurst from the enemies of agriculture. This is likewise omitted.

PASSAGE IX.
In which it is related how Mr. Hurst, having followed the recommendations of the Royal Agricultural Society, in his efforts to make his farm more productive, was prosecuted for penalties, and made to pay them at the instance of members of that society for so doing. An instructive passage; but also from necessity omitted.

PASSAGE X.
Showing how Mr. Hurst examined closely for the first time, and found the conditions of agreement between him and his landlord to be such, that he was bound hand and foot not to improve the culture of his farm. This, too, must be omitted.

PASSAGE XI.
In which Mr. Hurst, being in London, is going up Fleet-street, and sees a notice on the house, No. 67, that a League meeting is to be held that evening in Covent Garden Theatre, and that seats will be reserved for tenant farmers who may wish to attend it, tickets to be had on application within. How he, always a believer in the virtue of the Corn Law, went in, his political conscience smiting him at the same time, and got a ticket, and went to the theatre and heard Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright; the first exposing the delusion practised on tenant farmers by the political landlords; the latter the wrongs to agriculture and to society by the feudal landlords in stocking the country with wild beasts, and preserving them by savage laws. This we must also omit.

PASSAGE XII.
Setting forth how Mr. Hurst thought he had heard the real farmers' friends speaking for the first time in respect of the feudal landlords and the Game Laws; and how the Corn Law was after all not such a sacred law as he had hitherto deemed it to be. How Mr. Cobden's exposition of it took root in his mind as seed sown upon new soil, and how he applied for and obtained copies of all the League tracts, read them and believed them, and endeavoured to make his brother believe them. This too is omitted.

PASSAGE XIII.
Showing how he had struggled to succeed, and had succeeded, in making his two farms pay the high rents that he had a few years before contracted to pay for them, notwithstanding the obstacles of unfriendly gamekeepers, swarms of game and conditions of agreement which bound him not to improve his agriculture. How he employed more people per hundred acres than his brother farmers, and raised better crops; but how he had his character as a farmer decried because he had been to a League meeting, and now said that he believed the Corn Laws had never been of any benefit to the farmers or to agriculture.

PASSAGE XIV.
Tells how he went before the Parliamentary Committee on the Game Laws and gave evidence of the great injury done to himself and to the agricultural interests of his county by the excessive waste committed by the game; but owing to the parliamentary forms, forbidding the publication of the evidence for the present, his statements are not inserted; and this passage of his life is also omitted.

PASSAGE XV.
Showing how he was received by his brother farmers, whose interests he had served as well as his own, in giving evidence against the Game Laws, he being now an avowed opponent of the Corn Law.

It was rent day, the receiver of the rents was an elderly gentleman, a lawyer, from the precincts of Lincoln's Inn. He came down to the Royal George Hotel in a glass coach; and when he alighted from it, there would have been no violence done to truth to have said, he looked as if he had come out of a glass case; so prim, so scrupulously perfect was this elderly little gentleman in his dress. From the gold spectacle on the wig of his head, to the silver buckles on the shoes of his feet, there was no spot upon him.

And his professional conduct was as precise and formal, his moral character as spotless as his dress. Fiction will have it that lawyers living in the deep recesses of the temple and inns of court, in those caves of social life, called chambers, are the spiders of human kind reposing in dust and cobwebs, sleeping with their eyes open to dart out upon any human flies that may go too near them. But this is only fiction, or, if there be such lawyers, ours in the glass coach was not one of them; ours in the glass coach, if we may be so irreverent, was like a cockroach, or a black-beetle, to whose glossy exterior no impurity adheres, rather than a dusty spider. He had dealings with the world, and as a lawyer, not unfrequently with those who bring upon it the appellation wicked world; but he never touched wickedness, as we may say, with his bare hands. He read his law books through his glasses, and he knew mankind through his law books. He knew there were bad men and good men. He knew there were bad men, because laws had been made to hang them. He knew there were good men, because laws had been made to hang the bad ones. He knew the world must have more good men in it than bad, else the bad ones would have been strong enough to hang the good ones. He ranged himself on the side of the laws and of good men,—thus, of mankind generally.

Individual men were revealed to him in a similar manner. He knew there were good farmers and bad farmers, because some were always ready with their rents on rent day and others were not. He knew the relationship of landlord and tenant because it was written on parchment. He knew the progress of agricultural science from the applications made to him by the tenants, when paying their rents, for authority to make and deduct the expense of making, next rent day, new gates, or repairs of old ones; repairs of floors and roofs of barns; construction of cesspools to save wasted manures; farm roads; drains to dry wet land; drains to keep the wasted manure of the yard from defiling the pond where the cattle had to drink; palings to protect young quickthorns; young quickthorns to supplant old ones; and other improvements akin to these. He knew that those who applied to have these things done had not done them. He knew their farms needed such improvements else such applications would not have been made. And he inferred that those who made no such applications for repairs and new works did not require them. Therefore it was logical to conclude that the tenants who being content to have broken gates, dilapidated roofs and floors, wasted manures, poisoning the ponds and pools where cattle got drink, bad fences, who never made a new fence or repaired an old one, who never drained wet land nor cleared out a ditch that made land wet,—it was a logical consequence to conclude that such tenants, who made no complaints and no demands, were the best farmers, and had their farms in the best condition; seeing agriculture, as he only saw it, through his gold spectacles on a map or on parchment, riding in a glass coach.

He was the very perfection of a legal land-agent. His integrity was as firm as the bank buildings; the cash committed to his keeping as safe as the Bank cash. His rules of procedure were so squared off by a legal straight-edge, that, as all the clauses in the agreements between landlord and tenant were provisoive of penalties for the landlord against the tenant, the latter never made a claim that was allowed to be good, so as there were no good claims preferred by tenants, there were no decisions in their favour. He decided the claims made by the tenants according to the parchment. And, on the same authority, he decided the complaints preferred against the tenants. The complainants in such cases were the gamekeepers, for disturbance of the game (some fields of hay being mown when it was ready to be mown with pheasant's nests still in it—a grievous crime, if the farmer did not make friends with the gamekeeper); or the woodman, the farmer having, perhaps, cut some overshadowing branches from a hedgerow tree; or the secret informer, never known precisely who, that had a farm on the estate, and kept his eyes open to see if all the crops were sown in the exact rotation written on the parchment, according to the rules of the agricultural science dwelling in the legal chambers of the Temple or Lincoln's-inn. The more numerous the informations laid by those servants of the estate, for disturbance of pheasants on their eggs, for the lopping of an overbranching tree, or for judging what crop would grow best by the quality of the soil, rather than by the provision in the parchment, the more vigilant were they held to be, and the better claim did they feel themselves to have for augmented salaries and ultimate pensions.

Well, it was rent-day, or as it is more genteely termed, the audit. More, to whom it is the pleasantest day in the calendar, call it by the pleasantest name. More, who see it coming on them long before it does come, coming as certainly and as sternly as an annual day of judgment, call it by the name which they know it best by, the rent day. It was the rent day at the Royal George Hotel, at the nearest market town for the Berry tenantry. They met there to pay their rents, and to prefer their complaints. Let us look at some of them.

There sits in a private room of the hotel the little elderly gentleman with his clerk beside him. There stands before him Mr. John Bull, with his hat in his hand. He has got his receipt—what more does he want? He might be as bold as any man that ever trod on English ground, yet he is timid. He has paid his rent, and owes no man anything. A little ago he was so bold in the public room as to tell Mr. Hurst to his face that he and all like him who went to League meetings were "no good to their brother farmers," that all who minced matters now a-days, and did not speak out for protection, would deserve to lose protection. Why does this Mr. John Bull now hesitate in presence of this one man and his clerk to say his say? He has not a farm gate that will hold in a cow, or a horse, or a pig, and has not had for half a dozen years; they have been patched and patched, and again broken and broken, and at last thrown down by the fox-hunters, and by his own work-people, who found them more trouble than service, so often that the wreck is fit for nothing else than fire-wood. He has no timber to mend gates and fences, and he is trying to ask for authority to have the old ones replaced by new, the expense to be paid out of his next rent. He has a mind, too, to ask for repairs to the old barns, which let rain through the roofs and the corn through the floors; but he has asked such favours before, and there is a feeling within him that those who have asked most earnestly and frequently to have their farm buildings repaired have been least successful. Yet his have got into such a state of absolute wreck that he cannot help urging the request once again. He bears in mind the very eminent services rendered at the last election in getting in the candidate for whom the gentleman now before him was concerned, and he gives hints, imperfectly expressed, that he should not be overlooked in any favours which are to be conferred.

Here is Mr. John Bull's error, the fatal error of farmers in submitting to ask for rights as for favours. The man who exacts rent for a farm of land which he does not provide with suitable buildings, and which he professed to provide, and at the same time lets the farm to the tenant on the condition that he shall quit at six months' notice, thus rendering it utterly impossible for him to supply the requisite buildings, or fixtures himself—that man, be he agent or landlord, is no better than another Pharaoh exacting the bricks from the bondmen without supplying the straw.

But look at the bondman, this John Bull, whose voice is as loud as a lion's—as a British lion's—so loud as to be called the British lion's voice, when he happens to roar on the same side of the table, or the same side of the subject with the agents and the landlords. Listen to him, then, while now on the right side of a good cause—his own cause—in which the first principles of justice are involved, he dares hardly open his mouth to that one little old man.

But listen to the old gentleman. Mr. Bull is to be favoured. Authority is to be given for the expenditure of 100*l.* in repairs. The tenant is pleased beyond expression. He bows low and is grateful, and retires. He should be grateful for a favour. He should be polite under any circumstances. But has he anything to be grateful for? Will this expenditure of 100*l.* in repairs be a favour? Will it not rather be a perpetuation of unfit buildings, make-shift gates, and fences? Will it not make it requisite for Mr. John Bull to go again next year, or the next, begging once more to have some other part of his farm put in repair?

Then here is another tenant in the private room paying his rent. He has determined for the last nine months, and has sworn it a hundred times in his daily conversation, that he will not quietly submit to have his fields nearest the sand hills eaten up with rabbits any longer; again, and again, has he even this day formed in his mind what he would say to the agent when he paid his rent. But he cannot now say it. And why? because there is no door to his stable; and the stable itself is flooded whenever wet weather comes, and he has lost two horses by death, and the use of one, or two more by disease, because the drainage cannot be made complete, without leave to alter the water course and money to make another. If he begins to talk about rabbits, he will take the ground from under him to ask for a new stable; for his ambition, or daring, does go as far as an entire new stable on a dryer piece of ground. So he talks of the stable, and omits the rabbits.

Then comes Mr. Hurst. He also is in the private room and has paid his rent. He has taken it into his head that all patchwork repairs are useless, and that no thorough improvements can be effected without he obtains a lease of twenty-one years. He thinks if a new set of farm-buildings were erected, and new fences also, at a cost of 3000*l.*, on which he would pay five per cent. of additional rent, it would be of greater benefit to him and to the farm than if he received an annual drawback of ten per cent. from his present rental to repair the old buildings. He offers to prove this, and the old gentleman listens; but at last stops him by saying he has no power to alter the present system of letting the farms: which is true.

Others of the John Bull family enter and pay their rents, and tell how dilapidated their farms are, if they have any hope of an allowance for repairs. Some express a hope that they are not going to lose "protection to agriculture," to which the elderly lawyer says that is impossible; it can never be taken away and never will; and though he may grant them no drawback for repairs, no redress for rabbits, tell them he has no power to interfere with the game, doom them to their undrained bogs and sour cold clays, without an allowance for drain tiles, or for any one thing recommended by the Royal Agricultural Society as needful and indispensable to agriculture; they retire comforted and happy in heart that they are not to lose "protection." They retire to their dining room, and in due time the dinner is on the table, and the elderly gentleman who came from Lincoln's Inn in a glass coach, and who reads his law books through his glasses, and mauls through his law books, is chairman of the dinner.

This was in the autumn of last year, 1845. The dinner might be worth description, and the speakers worth reporting, but they were the same as have often been given to the public in print. The "enemies of agriculture" were denounced, and the hints that there was only one "renegade" to the good cause of protection in the room, and on the estate, was cheered.

The only man who had dared to go before the parliamentary committee, to expose what they all suffered from—the overbearing game, and the only one who had the courage in the private room to speak of those requirements which alone would have been favours, if granted by the old lawyer, was Mr. Hurst, who was roared at by the British Lions around the dinner table, as a "renegade to the cause."

I conclude this brief sketch. If the names are not real, the facts and the persons are; and deeply do I regret to say that what is here written is too true, and too generally applicable all over England.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

THE STRIKE IN LIVERPOOL.—We hope this struggle is approaching a full termination. So far as bricklayers, joiners, and plasterers are concerned, workmen are in abundance. The masons, however, still form an exception; being a strong body, and there being a great demand for their services on the Holyhead, Carlisle, and other railways, together with the desire of the Liverpool and Birkenhead Dock Companies to forward their river walls and dock works during the summer months, they will stand out, and the lamentable consequence is, that a number of other artisans cannot procure employment because bricklayers and joiners are unable to proceed for want of masonry. The masons wish the hours of labour to be reduced to nine hours, which the masters cannot comply with, in justice to the operatives in the other branches of the building trades.—Liverpool Standard.

THE STRIKE IN THE BUILDING TRADES.—The symptoms of this strike being near its termination are becoming every day clearer and more numerous. Last week, from individual inquiry, it was ascertained that 22 masters were employing 486 men, all of whom have either signed the declaration that they do not belong to the national association, or have joined the new society, which makes a declaration to that effect the basis of its constitution. This week no fewer than twenty-one men have resumed work at one establishment, all of whom have either signed the declaration, or joined the new society. There are several other instances of applications being made to the masters, to know on what terms they will again employ the men; amongst others to a firm to which there has been previously no communication from their old hands since the strike. The masters abide by the declaration, or the alternative of the men joining the new society. Yesterday the following note was received by Mr. J. B. Rogerson, the secretary of the masters' association:—

Railway Inn, Deansgate.
Sir,—A deputation from the central committee of the United Trades' Association for the protection of industry, consisting of Messrs. Robson and Bush, desire an interview with the committee of the association of master builders, of which you are secretary, with a view, if possible, of coming to an amicable arrangement of the unfortunate differences now existing between your association and their workmen.—Sir, yours respectfully,
W. ROBSON.
Mr. J. B. Rogerson, Secretary of Master Builders' Association. JOHN BUSH.

We understand that Robson is not in any way connected with the building trades; but is in fact a working boot and shoe maker, No. 14, Richards Place, Haggerstone Bridge, London; and he is named as one of the auditors of the accounts of the National United Trades' Association for the protection of industry. John Bush is a carpenter, but also residing in London, at No. 1, York-street, York Road, Lambeth, and he is, or was, vice-president of the National Association. The note was laid before the association, at their meeting yesterday, and after some observation on the course pursued by the men—that of sending two strangers from London, and one of them a boot and shoemaker, to discuss terms between master builders and their workmen, the meeting unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"That the masters do not recognise any national association, and consider that their own workmen are the only parties with whom they should hold communication."

Here the matter stands; but men, including turn-outs, are applying daily to the masters, and resuming work on the terms already stated.—Manchester Guardian.

AGRICULTURE.

HOME TRUTHS FOR THE LANDLORDS.

Honour to the Bishop of Oxford. Right worthily has he discharged the duty of a leader among the teachers of Christian men. But, above all, the tenant farmers and farm labourers of England ought to be grateful to Dr. Wilberforce for his fearless and manly exposure of the defenders of monopoly. He has laid bare the source of all the evils under which English husbandry labours, and which depress all who depend upon it for subsistence. Our readers will find in another column a full report of the speech of the Bishop of Oxford on Friday se'nnight during the Corn Law debate in the House of Lords; and we commend it to their attention as worthy of a most attentive perusal. We do not know that there has been any speech delivered during the weary years of agitation against the monopoly of food which bespeaks more moral courage, comprehensive intelligence, and enlarged sympathy for the industrious millions. We shall in this place confine our remarks to that part of Dr. Wilberforce's admirable address which relates especially to the condition of agriculture.

Having referred to the appeals which monopolist lords had made to the Bishops to induce them to oppose the Ministerial Bill, upon the ground that the incomes of the clergy would suffer from a low price of corn, Dr. Wilberforce admitted that the clergy might possibly suffer, but said that they scorned to put their own personal and class interests in competition with the national weal. "They felt that there was an interest greater than the interest of money; and a reward for themselves of more importance than their annual income." Dr. Wilberforce then added:

"There was another class, also, who would be injured by the measure—a class which it was just possible to suppose had some representatives in that house—he meant the nominal owners of great properties which were mortgaged to other parties. There was just the possibility that persons so situated might be called upon to vote upon this question—their interests with respect to it were in something like the same position with those of the English clergy, and they would do well indeed to profit by the example which the clergy had afforded them. This measure would advance the general interests of the country, and would cause a greater demand for labour, as in order to ensure a return for the owner of the land its production should necessarily be increased."

"Earl Stanhope: Where is the capital to come from?"

"The Bishop of Oxford: That was an important question, which had been so plainly put by the noble earl in a tone of sepulchral demand (laughter). It was clear that the person who was the nominal owner of a large property, which was deeply mortgaged, could not increase its production fully; and it was also clear that the tenants of poor proprietors were generally poor themselves, and he knew, from visiting their cottages, that the labourers of such proprietors were lamentably poor. It was only the other day that he was inquiring of a clergyman as to the moral condition of a parish in his diocese, and he was answered that a lamentable degree of immorality prevailed there. He asked why that was the case, and he was told that one great cause of immorality was to be found in the uncomfortable and confined description of dwellings, which were highly opposed to the observance of the decencies of life. He then asked why the clergyman did not represent to the landlord that if he wanted to have a moral peasantry he should build better cottages for them, and the answer which he received was, that the landlord was aware of that, but he had not money sufficient to enable him to build houses for those on his estates who required them. Property which was in the hands of nominal possessors was in this condition, that the mortgagees did not feel any responsibility as regarded the condition of the tenantry and labourers, whilst the nominal owner, who felt the responsibility, was not in a position to relieve it, because, instead of a small property which he could manage, he preferred to be the nominal possessor of a great property. His position was like that which their lordships must have often witnessed, an instance of where a man kept a larger farm than he was capable of managing, whilst he could successfully cultivate a smaller one. These nominal possessors of heavily mortgaged property would suffer from the change, and although he admitted that prejudices might be shocked and some injury effected by changes of property, yet looking at such a change of property as one of the results of this measure, it formed no reason why they should not adopt it, for he viewed it as one of the means of bringing the holding of property into a more healthy and natural state, and of providing for meeting those responsibilities which naturally lie on the holders of land."

Here we find the origin of protection laid bare. The deeply-seated sore which infects the landed interests of England is probed with a firm, unflinching hand. Deep and difficult as the wound is, its depth has been ascertained and disclosed without circumlocution. It is the mortgaged interest which requires "protection"—the nominal possessors of large estates who want artificial scarcity as the means of maintaining their own false position. Labourers and farmers are poor when they work and rent on heavily encumbered estates. We have shown all this again and again; but now the exposition comes backed by the authority of a spiritual peer.

And let us here note that the position of a bishop, if he be a courageous and large-minded man, is singularly favourable for the acquirement of sound views on this subject. His course of life must have led him to mix with all classes, and to understand the way in which the actual system of landed property affects all orders of the landed interests. They who regard the labourers exclusively and chiefly contemplate their condition, will not thereby arrive at the origin of the evils, "the unnatural" and unnecessary evils, which fall upon the agricultural labourers of this country. Tenant farmers must be known, and known intimately, not merely at agricultural shows, protection meetings, or elections, but by their firesides, on their own farms, in their daily, weekly, ordinary temper, before the influence of a mortgaged and effete landocracy can be understood. Neither will the examination of the condition of the labourer and the farmer alone be sufficient to realise to the mind the extent of the mischiefs caused by nominal landowning. The observer who would know all, must have known something of the landlords; he must have been behind the scenes; he must have penetrated beneath the glare, and glitter and frivolity, and ostentation, which cover the real condition of the landlord; he must have heard of the large slice of the apparent income which goes to pay interests and debts and jointures and annuities; of the landlord's pressure on his steward for money, of the steward's pressure upon the tenants, of the tenants' pressure upon the labourers. The paralysis which insolvency—that is the word—brings upon the "great" landholder descends with more or less of ill upon all connected with him, and must be noted before the true position of the landed interests can be understood.

Now the Bishop has had the means of observing most of these things. Beginning life as a parochial clergyman, in a rural district, he visits the poor at all times and seasons; he knows, and constantly converses with the farmers, he becomes the depository of the complaints of both classes; and that, not by formal and direct complaint for any special object, when perhaps complaint might be carried too far, but incidentally. Then, the constant opportunity of observing the material condition of both of the industrious classes, the obstructions to their advancement, and those silent indications of the stationary or receding state which can be better observed than described, form a study which to the man of education and reflection must lead to settled convictions upon the landed system of this country. Moreover, a man can scarcely arrive at the station of a Bishop, whatever be his personal merits, without much acquaintance and personal intercourse with the landed aristocracy. Carrying with him the practical knowledge acquired in his parish, and the clear views which that knowledge, in combination with book-learning, has given him, he has a light for reading aristocratic society, which no mere aristocrat can possess. He has the key to the mixture of hauteur and meanness, the combination of profuse expenditure and want of money, the greediness for high rents with the neglect of economy, the lavishing hundreds on an opera girl or a race-horse, and the utter inability to find a few pounds to build cottages and preserve human decencies on the patrimonial estate, and various other characteristics of a large, very large, section of our landed aristocracy.

It is plain that Dr. Wilberforce has not been through this course of training without advantage; and, to his credit, he has dared to give the short and comprehensive result of his experience and observation in the passage we have quoted, from his speech in the House of Lords. And what was the effect of these outspoken truths upon the peers? Did they deny the facts or displace the conclusions? Nothing of this kind. On the contrary, each monopolist peer seemed to take the general propositions of the Bishop of Oxford as a personal attack upon himself. Earl Stanhope, when improved husbandry by the outlay of capital was hinted, groaned out with an agony evidently real, "Where is the capital to come from?" Ashburton, as a new lord and a rich lord, anxious to pander to the prejudices of his elder brethren, declared that insolvent landowners should by law be shielded from the ordinary consequences of insolvency.

Hardwicke, Malmesbury, and Winchelsea, by their attacks on the Bishop, proved that they felt he had pointed at them personally, when he described the false position of the nominal owner of heavily incumbered estates. Like galled jades they winced.

But there was one peer, the Duke of Richmond, who over and above these reasons for deeming Dr. Wilberforce's speech personal, appropriated to himself the following remarks about the agricultural labourers.

The Bishop said:

"He believed that the passing of this bill would, in the first place, have a great effect upon the condition of the labourers, who were at present in a most unnatural state (expressions of dissent). Did the noble lord who differed from him mean to say that the principle of prohibiting the poor man from buying his bread on the cheapest terms was a part of the economy of the God of nature (hear)? He (the Bishop of Oxford) would say that it was a most unnatural arrangement."

And afterwards:

"It was, therefore, the duty of their lordships to give their support to such a measure as this, which was calculated to produce a happier, a better contented, and a more elevated peasantry than that which at present was to be found in England. He knew the peasantry, for he had lived amongst them, and had seen them not only on a day of false festivity drinking from empty glasses a welcome to the landlord, but he had seen them amongst their hovels, he had visited them in their homes, he had seen them on the bed of fever, he had watched them struggling with these difficulties which beset the English peasant during the long English winter. He knew their hearts, for he had lived 15 or 16 years amongst them. He had witnessed their patient endurance, and he was convinced that the time had come when the other side of Lord Bacon's observations might be observed, and that there was great and necessary cause for the experiment. The mass of the peasantry were in a state in which he did not wish them to continue, if it could be prevented. He did not wish to see their children suffering from physical wants, and from moral and religious destitution. He did not wish to see them living in cottages from which the decencies of domestic life were necessarily banished, and children looked at in their upgrowth with the feeling that so many additional mouths required to be filled, whilst the difficulties of obtaining food were increasing (hear, hear, and cheers). Seeing those things, and looking round for a remedy, he believed that one would be found in anything which would extend the general prosperity of the country."

This certainly was personal to the Duke of Richmond, because he is one of the greatest promoters of the humbug of professing to feast the labourers at show feasts at the landlords' tables, while all that really promotes the welfare, the decency, and the material comfort of the labourers is totally neglected.

But truly has Dr. Wilberforce said, that if Free Trade should bring about the dispossession of the nominal owners of heavily encumbered estates, it will thereby produce a more healthy condition of landed property, which will greatly conduce to the welfare of the community.

WHO ARE THE LAGGARDS?

John Bull having now acquired, by a somewhat laborious course of teaching, a clear knowledge of the protective system and the backwardness of British agriculture, asks, in a peremptory tone, "Who are the laggards?"—Why, of all his sons, the farmers alone require the "sickly" shelter of protection?—Why Anglo-Saxon energy becomes paralysed when turned to the culture of the soil? And John has a full right to receive a precise answer to these questions.

Now the farmers say, and say truly, we are no laggards. They point, and justly, to what some of their body do under favourable circumstances to increase the production of our land. They ask for a fair field for their industry, security of possession, and no absurd or obsolete interferences with their management, and they want nothing more. But, they add, the proprietors prevent this. Now, what say the landlords? First, by inference, they admit that they require protection; for the peers resented the manly speech of the Bishop of Oxford on the Corn Law Bill as personally insulting. This is how the Bishop of Oxford spoke of protection:

"It had been said during the debates on this question, that protection was the principle which was applied in other cases, and therefore it ought to be applied to agriculture, that we nursed the tender and delicate fruits of the earth, and that we ought to do some with the tender interest of the agriculture of England. He, however, was not one who thought that the agriculture of England was such a sickly and fantastic exotic as to require the aid of protection; he thought that all it required was to be set free from the shackles of protection, and it would assert its own indigenous strength and vigour. Protection to native industry had become a favourite phrase in reference to this subject; and he could say for himself that he was one of those most favourable to the protection of that industry (an ironical cheer from the Duke of Richmond). The noble duke might cheer; but he (the Bishop of Oxford) feared his cheers as little as he feared his arguments. What was protection to native industry? It was to bring it into a field where every opportunity would be afforded for wholesome competition."

This is a healthy and a hopeful view of British agriculture. But now let us hear the Lords themselves. For instance, Lord Hardwicke may be taken as an exemplar of the protectionist landlord. He owns a large estate in Cambridgeshire, which is let to yearly tenants, who are in a deplorable state of dependence. None of them can make any profit worth naming, and but few can make a living at all. He sometimes has six or eight farms on his hands at once, and we remember to have seen an advertisement of a lot of his lordship's farms to let, subject to conditions so onerous, that no man who deserves the name of a farmer would think of taking one. Amongst other terms, the tenants were to be "subject to the general regulations of the estate!"

Such is the Earl of Hardwicke as a proprietor. Let us follow him into the House of Lords, and watch his capacity for legislating on agriculture. During the debate in committee of the Lords on the Corn Bill, Lord Hardwicke said:

"He was as convinced as he stood upon the floor of that house that the Government measure would throw the poorer lands out of cultivation. His noble friend (Lord Kinnaird) shook his head; but he must remember that that noble lord was of opinion that no land was fit for tillage unless it would produce thirty-two bushels an acre. No land to be cultivated unless it produces thirty-two bushels an acre. Then how are you to feed the people? Why the average production on most inferior soils is not more than twenty bushels an acre. Thirty-two bushels is a very large average, indeed. So you will displace all the labour, and throw all the land out of cultivation which does not produce thirty-two bushels an acre. What are you to do for bread?"

"Lord KINNAIRD: I said thirty bushels an acre."
"The Earl of HARDWICKE: Oh, the noble lord has come down a bit (laughter). But no land is to be cultivated which does not produce thirty bushels an acre. My lords, this is very important, considering that it comes from the head of the Anti-Corn-Law League ('bear, bear,' and laughter). We are to starve, unless all lands produce thirty bushels an acre, or unless foreign countries feed us. Why, if the noble lord thinks that thirty bushels an acre is the average produce of the kingdom, I must say he knows nothing about farming."

"Earl STANHOPE: Kitchen garden cultivation the noble lord must mean."

"The Earl of HARDWICKE: Truly, my noble friend is correct. The noble lord of the thirty bushels (laughter)—must be speaking of the produce of the kitchen garden. It was a mistake to suppose that the farmers were interested in causing bread to be dear. The cheaper the bread, the better for them; but it must be the bread of home-grown corn. Protect them—protect them he would say, and he would answer for it, that under the system of protection the people of England would eat cheaper bread than ever they would under the proposed measure."

Now there is not a real farmer in England who would think of growing wheat upon land of which he had secure tenure and complete possession, except with the reasonable expectation of getting 30 bushels to the acre. And one year with another he will do it. We know that 30 bushels per acre is not the average produce of wheat, because three-fourths of the farmers of this country farm under the cloud of a Stanhope's mortgages, or a Hardwicke's "general regulation of the estate." Kitchen garden cultivation, indeed,—why the circumstances and "regulations" of half the estates in England prevent anything which deserves the name of cultivation at all. It is a kind of annual battle between the cultivator and a landlord-created waste, and the waste generally gains three-fourths of a victory. But mark the notions entertained by the monopolist lords of the soil of the incapacity of the soil. They assume that land is to remain in this bad state, to which their mismanagement has reduced it; and the national trade is to be tied down to their narrow limits.

We say distinctly no man should grow wheat without expecting 30 bushels to the acre. On some land, or by some systems, he might not get that return, if he sowed wheat oftener than once in five or six years; but then he should not attempt it more frequently. Poor lands, as the monopolists call them, will not grow corn so often, but no man can reasonably expect to farm with profit, unless he determines that when he does grow corn, be it once in three years, or once in ten, he will have a good crop; and nothing less than 30 bushels of wheat to the acre deserves the name of a good crop.

ANECDOTE OF A TAME LEOPARD.—While on the subject of wild animals, I may mention a leopard that was kept by an English officer at Samarang, during our occupation of the Dutch colonies. This animal had its liberty, and used to run all over the house after its master. One morning, after breakfast, the officer was sitting smoking his hookah, with a book in his right hand, and the hookah snake in his left, when he felt a slight pain in the left hand, and, on attempting to raise it, was checked by a low angry growl from his pet leopard. On looking down, he saw the animal had been licking the back of his hand, and had by degrees drawn a little blood. The leopard would not allow the removal of the hand, but continued licking it with much apparent relish, which did not much please his master; who, with great presence of mind, without attempting again to disturb the pet in his proceeding, called to his servant to bring him a pistol, with which he shot the animal dead on the spot. Such pets as snakes 10 feet long, and full-grown leopards, are not to be trifled with. The largest snake I ever saw was 25 feet long, and 8 inches in diameter. I have heard of 60 feet snakes, but cannot vouch for the truth of the tale.—Davidson's Trade and Travel in the Far East.

THE POTATO CROP.

Fears are entertained that the potato crop will again be in many instances a failure, more especially the early crop of ash-leaf kidneys. A person at Bicester, Oxon, planted six bushels of the above description, and they are a failure, though he paid no less than six shillings per bushel for the seed, in order that it might be good. Other persons are in a similar situation.

THE POTATO CROP IN DEVONSHIRE.—I beg to forward an account of what I have observed in regard to the potato crop of Devon within this last week. I have visited many potato fields, most of which have a very luxuriant and thriving appearance when seen at a distance, but on examination I find the whole to be diseased; I could not discover one not affected less or more. I fully believe that the whole I have examined will be roasted or scorched up with the direful calamity within a month of this time. Many considered their crops to be doing remarkably well, and, indeed, expressed themselves satisfied that their crops were quite clear from disease until I pointed out its defects. Mr. Bridle, of Otterton, called my attention to a fine piece of early potatoes, which he had planted pretty early in February last, in a sheltered, dry situation; they had remarkably strong stalks, from two to three feet in height, and many of them at the base as thick as the middle finger, with foliage as large as good spinach leaves. Mr. Bridle, on Monday last, calculated that he should be able to take up 50 bags of good tubers from this piece in the last week in this month, and I do not doubt but that quantity would have been produced by the end of the month had they kept clear from disease, which attacked them on Thursday the 4th inst., and the whole have now dropped down dead, many of the stalks looking as if charred. I enclose a stalk, that you may have ocular demonstration of those facts. The effluvia is uncommonly disagreeable in this hot sunny weather. The fact is, on my examining them I could distinctly observe that they never had been free from disease; it originated in the old tubers which produced strong cankerous watery shoots. Whatever may have been the origin or first cause of this destructive disease, it is clear that it now proceeds from the tuber—that its first appearance is, if either in tuber, stalk, or foliage, in the shape of little watery spots, pimples, or bulgings, swelling into a dropsical contortion until it bursts, at which time the disease runs through the crop like wild fire, carrying rapid destruction before it. It is now almost a certainty that the whole of the crops which have been planted at the usual season, and that too without any previous preparation of the seed-tuber will be again destroyed, whatever certainty there may be with prepared seed and early planting.—Sidmouth Correspondent of the Gardener's Chronicle.

THE POTATO CROP IN SCOTLAND.—The agricultural report of the Glasgow Herald states that the young potato crop in the neighbourhood of that city is extensively affected with the same disease as that of last year. The diseased plants generally look tolerably well; but, on digging round them, the seed from which the plant had sprung is found wholly or partially decomposed, and the sets had assumed a brown tinge, which was generally communicated to the stem.

THE NEW POTATO CROP IN IRELAND.—In the course of Friday, a gentleman who resides northward of Dublin, at Raheny, sent to us some stalks of potatoes of the now growing crop, in which the blight, as it appeared developed towards the harvest of last year, was painfully evident. The stalk was full of sap, the leaves luxuriant, and the upper part, which were manifestly about to throw out a blossom, was particularly full and green. About midway down all the stalks the marks of blight were apparent. The disease appeared as it were to enter the stalk at a joint, whence it appeared to run downwards only towards the root. The whole of the canal which transmits the nutriment to the tuber bore, from the point where the disease struck in a brownish hue, and in the centre the sap itself seemed to have become stagnant and corrupt. The gentleman who transmitted us the stalks, and who is an excellent agriculturist, says—"I send you a potato stalk attacked with the rot or blight, from which last year's crop suffered so much. The potato from which this stalk grew was a pink eye, and planted in February,—the field in which it grew had not the disease last year."—Dublin Freeman.

POTATO DISEASE IN PORTUGAL.—It may be interesting to know that my potato crop, which was a few days ago most flourishing, suddenly became black and withered; the same has occurred to many others, both in the neighbourhood and at some miles distant.—Correspondent of the Gardener's Chronicle.

ELIHU BURRITT, THE LEARNED BLACKSMITH.

As this indefatigable philanthropist will probably visit Great Britain in the course of a few weeks, it will, no doubt, gratify many of our readers to learn something more regarding his history than they may have been able to glean from the newspapers of the day. The following brief sketch of the life of Mr. Elihu Burritt, extracted chiefly from American documents, is from a letter of Dr. Dick, of Dundee, to the Evangelical Magazine.

"Elihu Burritt was born in New Britain, Connecticut, in the year 1811, of honest and respectable parents. He enjoyed the privilege of attending the 'District school' for some months every year, till he was sixteen years old; and by his diligence and attention to his studies he became well versed in the elementary branches of an English education, and by cultivating a taste for reading, he acquired much valuable information. When he arrived at the age of sixteen his father died, and he was apprenticed to the trade of a blacksmith; and when the term of his indenture had expired, and he had attained his legal majority, he had gained the reputation of being a young man of good moral and religious character, a skillful workman in his vocation, and one who cherished an ardent attachment for books. The Bible was the first book which he thoroughly studied; and at a very early age, he was familiar with almost every passage in the Old and New Testaments. He next availed himself of the opportunity of reading afforded by the 'Social Library' in the town in which he lived; and afterwards was dependent on the kindness of his friends. Before he reached the age of 21, he was conversant with the English classics, both in prose and poetry, and passed delightfully many of his leisure hours in poring over the pages of Milton, Young, Thomson, Cowper, Addison, &c. In the winter of the year in which he attained his majority, he commenced under the direction of a brother-in-law, who was an accomplished scholar, the study of the Latin language, for the purpose of reading Virgil in the original. He soon after turned his attention to French, which he mastered with wonderful facility. He then acquired the Spanish, and afterwards the Greek and German languages. During two winters he devoted nearly all his time to study, but he was occupied a large portion of his time during spring and summer in working at his trade as a blacksmith, and in this exemplary way, acquiring the means of subsistence.

"When about 23 years old, he accepted an invitation to teach a grammar-school; but this employment did not suit his convenience or his inclination. He was then engaged for a year or two as an agent for a manufacturing company, when he returned to his avail, and has since been industriously engaged in the honourable occupation of a blacksmith, to which he was apprenticed in his youth; but devotes all his leisure hours to literary pursuits. After having mastered the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, and all the languages of modern Europe, he turned his attention to Oriental literature, and in order to avail himself of the facilities afforded by the valuable library of the American Antiquarian Society at Worcester, he removed to that place, where he has ever since resided, and been regarded as a useful and exemplary citizen. By dint of hard labour he has become a proficient in the most difficult languages of Asia, and in many of those languages of Europe which are now nearly disused and obsolete—among them are Gaelic, Welsh, Celtic, Saxon, Gothic, Icelandic, Russian, Slavonic, Armenian, Chaldaic, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Sanscrit, and Tamil! It was stated, in a public meeting, in 1838, by Governor Everett, that Mr. Burritt by that time, by his unaided industry alone, had made himself acquainted with FIFTY LANGUAGES.—Mr. Burritt shows no disposition to relax from his labours. He usually devotes eight hours to study, and eight hours to physical indulgence and repose; and, by pursuing this course, he enjoys the advantages—vainly coveted by many literary men—connected with 'a sound mind in a healthy body.' Nor does he confine his labours to the mere acquisition of literary wealth—he also diffuses it with a liberal hand. He has written many valuable articles for periodicals of high standing; he has delivered many lectures which have been replete with interest and valuable information; and has been repeatedly listened to by large and highly respectable audiences in New York, Philadelphia, and other places with edification and delight. He has not yet reached the meridian of life, and it is to be hoped that many years of usefulness are still before him. He is indeed a man of whom New England may well be proud."

The following extract from a letter written by Elihu Burritt, in 1839, to Dr. Nelson, a gentleman who had taken some interest in his history, displays the simple, unassuming, earnest character of the man, in a very interesting point of view:

"An accidental allusion to my history and pursuits, which I made unthinkingly, in a letter to a friend, was, to my unspeakable surprise, brought before the public as a rather ostentatious debit on my part to the world; and I find myself involved in a species of notoriety, not at all in consonance with my feelings. Those who have been acquainted with my character from my youth will give me credit for sincerity, when I say, that it never entered my heart to blazon forth any acquisition of my own. I had, until the unfortunate denouement which I have mentioned, pursued the even tenor of my way unnoticed, even among my brethren and kindred. None of them ever thought that I had any particular genius, as it is called; I never thought so myself. All that I have accomplished, or expect, or hope, to accomplish, has been and will be by that plodding, patient, persevering process of accretion which builds the ant-heap—particle by particle, thought by thought—fact by fact. And if I ever was actuated by ambition, its highest and farthest aspiration reached no farther than the hope to set before the young men of my country an example in employing those fragments of time called 'odd moments.' And, sir, I should esteem it an honour of costlier water than the tара encircling a monarch's brow, if my future activity and attainments should encourage American working men to be proud and jealous of the credentials which God has given them to every eminence and immunity in the empire of mind. These are the views and sentiments with which I have sat down night by night, for years, with blistered hands and brightening hope, to studies which I hoped might be serviceable to that class of the community to which I am proud to belong. This is my ambition. This is the goal of my aspirations. But, not only the prize, but the whole course lies before me, perhaps beyond my reach. 'I count myself not yet to have attained' to anything worthy of public notice or private mention; what I may do is for Providence to determine."

"As you expressed a desire in your letter for some account of my past and present pursuits, I shall hope to gratify you on this point, and also rectify a misapprehension which you with many others may have entertained of my acquirements. With regard to my attention to the languages, a study of which I am not so fond as of mathematics, I have tried, by a kind of practical and philosophical process, to contract such a familiar acquaintance with the head of a family of languages, as to introduce me to the other members of the same family. Thus, studying the Hebrew very critically, I became readily acquainted with its cognate languages, among the principal of which are the Syriac, Chaldaic, Arabic, Samaritan, Ethiopic, &c. The languages of Europe occupied my attention immediately after I had finished my classics; and I studied French, Spanish, Italian, and German, under native teachers. Afterwards I pursued the Portuguese, Flemish, Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, Icelandic, Welsh, Gaelic, Celtic. I then ventured on further east into the Russian empire; and the Slavonic opened to me about a dozen of the languages spoken in that vast domain, between which the affinity is as marked as that between the Spanish and Portuguese. Besides those, I have attended to many different European dialects still in vogue. I am now trying to push on eastward as fast as my means will permit, hoping to discover still farther analogies among the oriental languages, which will assist my progress."

Amongst his works of philanthropy, Elihu Burritt issues almost weekly 1000 or 1200 of his "Olive Leaves" for the press; and, in proof of his powers of writing, we may mention the fact,—a fact perfectly unparalleled in the annals of periodical literature,—that the articles thus forwarded are regularly printed in about three hundred newspapers in various parts of the Union.

THE CROPS IN CUMBERLAND.—Wheat, which in a few favourable situations southward, is in ear, will be light, but of better than average quality. Barley promises well, but oats have in many places suffered to a great extent by the attack of the grub, and fears are entertained in many quarters that this crop will prove a failure.—Carlisle Journal.

REVIEW.

Three Lectures on National Education. By the Very Rev. G. Waddington, D.D., Dean of Durham.

These admirable lectures are devoted to a subject of such great and permanent interest, that little more is required from us in the way of introduction than to state that they were delivered to large and intelligent congregations in Newcastle-on-Tyne, and that they evince, in a very marked manner, the same depth of Christian philosophy and the same extent of Christian philanthropy, for which the other writings of the Dean of Durham are distinguished. It is gratifying to find the prelates and dignitaries of the English church identifying themselves with the wants and wishes of the English people; rebuking the apathy and coldness with which the rights of the industrious, and the wrongs of the poor, have been treated in high places. Every true friend of the Church of England has reason to congratulate himself on the evangelical eloquence displayed by the Bishops of St. David's and of Oxford, in the recent debates. The Bishop of Oxford especially deserves our gratitude for his vigorous exposure of those abuses in the exercise of the rights of property which impede and even prevent the performance of its duties. The adding of field to field for the mere purpose of extending territorial domination is equally condemned by reason and by scripture. It makes both the proprietors and cultivators slaves to the soil, fixing on the one the yoke of mortgage, and on the other the yoke of uncertain tenure. It was worthy of a Christian bishop to demand the emancipation of land from this double bondage, to require that proprietorship should be free to encourage improvement and tenancy free to reap the rewards of industry and expenditure. The abolition of slavery is the hereditary task of a Wilberforce, and the Bishop of Oxford, in accepting the inheritance, has added new honours to the imperishable name of his father.

It was not the least evil of the food question that it kept the education question out of sight. It would be vain to proffer books, when bread was withheld; to offer culture to the mind, when the body was fainting for want of sustenance. Though we felt with the Dean of Durham that the education of the poor in this country is still most imperfectly conducted, in regard both to its extent and its quality, and that the wealthier portions of the community, if they value either their honour or their security, must make, in some form or other, a very much larger provision than has yet been made for the purpose, we deemed it inexpedient to open so important a discussion, so long as the corn question remained undecided. That great measure of substantial justice, that great engine of redress for wrongs which, during the space of a whole generation, have crushed the energies and aggravated the toils of the labouring population, has passed through the perils of every legislative ordeal, and will, before another number of this journal appears, in all human probability, be the law of the land. The time then has come when the investigation of another social evil, preparatory to its removal, may fairly be commenced; and it could not be begun under better auspices than those of the Dean of Durham. After having described the storm of opposition with which the first effort to obtain legislative assistance for the education of the poor was received, Dr. Waddington thus describes the present state of the question:

"Discussion succeeded to declamation, men's passions subsided, and their blindness departed with their passions; and then this much desired project was discovered to rest on the very principle so loudly demanded by all—it was a project for improving the secular and moral instruction of the poor on the foundation of the Christian religion.

"And here you will not expect me to enlarge on a truth which is admitted by every man, that any system of education not so founded would be any thing rather than a blessing to those who received it. To sharpen the intelligence only, without cultivating the heart—to inculcate secular knowledge only—to make men acute and ingenious and subtle, without teaching them the duties of integrity, temperance, chastity, general self-control—this would be no better than to become school-masters for Mammon, to prepare our pupils for his service, and to bid them walk in his ways. Again: to inculcate morality on any other than Christian principles would be fruitless as well as irreligious. For from what other source can be derived precepts so sublime and pure, or motives so commanding, even if the conduct of this life only were in question? But if you will rise to higher considerations—if you will but for a moment reflect, how fugitive and comparatively worthless is all that this life can give, you will still more strongly feel, that those, whose knowledge must after all be very limited, ought to possess at least the knowledge which concerns them most. For the knowledge of God is not only the beginning, but also the end, of wisdom. It is the knowledge of an eternal Father by children whom he is preparing for eternity. It is the knowledge of a righteous Judge, by culprits whom he has destined to judgment. It is the knowledge of a merciful Redeemer, by sinners who have no other hope but in his merits and his mercy. Whatever other lessons we may teach them, at least let us never, on any consideration, omit this.

"It only remains for us now to consider one other aspect which this question assumed, before it reached its present position. It was understood, as I have said, by all parties, that the system of national education, to be established in this country, should stand on the foundation of Christianity. But there are many forms of Christianity, differing from each other more or less on points of doctrine, or observance, or discipline. Indeed, in no other European country are they so numerous as in this, in consequence, no doubt, of the greater latitude of individual opinion that has long been enjoyed by this people. Hence then arose, another question, involving a very serious difficulty, and supplying a subject of grave consideration both to divines and statesmen. It was this—Whether the children of parents of different persuasions should be educated together in the same schools, or apart from each other in separate establishments? This led again to controversy. On the one side it was urged—that the former scheme, that of mixed education, involved what was called a 'compromise of principle'; that the distinctive points of the particular creeds would not by this method be sufficiently inculcated; that religious indifference might flow from this; or, if not indifference, that religious disputes would arise among the children thus collected within the same walls.

"It was argued on the other side—that the points on which Christians are divided are not nearly so numerous, nor for the most part so important, as those on which they agree; that the habit of receiving together the same instruction, from the same instructor, would tend to soften the asperity of religious difference; that the distinctive dogmas might be taught separately by the respective ministers; and that it would be well for those, who were so soon to become active members of our community, to derive together, from the same sacred source, all their moral and the greater portion of their religious knowledge. This method was thought by some to be best fitted to sow the seeds of mutual forbearance and evangelical charity.

"But it was not thus ordained: the aspirations of a too sanguine philanthropy were stifled—the zeal of reciprocal jealousy was too strong and too intense. After some short controversy it became quite manifest, that there was no religious party in this country which desired the system of mixed education; all seemed to claim alike the privilege and the right of exclusive establishments. Though the opposite principle is still asserted by one great society, yet it is obviously the general feeling among all denominations, that, by the separate system alone, they can all secure their respective independence, without any fear of proselytism, or any suspicion of compromise. And the Government, acquiescing in this feeling, distributes its assistance, as I am led to believe, with strict impartiality to all."

The dangers of allowing the increasing masses of our population to grow up in ignorance, are thus forcibly described:

"Let us not close our eyes against this truth. Let us not attempt to deceive ourselves. Let us not forget the past, or lose sight of the future, in the prosperous tranquillity of the moment. Any self-delusion in this matter may terminate, after a short dream of fatuous confidence, in some signal calamity. You all know, as appears from the last census, that the population of the greater part of this diocese—this more immediately connected with the mining interest—has recently increased with a rapidity almost unparalleled; and you have only to cast your eyes around you to perceive that it is still steadily and fast advancing. These very seasons of peaceful prosperity in which you rejoice, and perhaps confide, accelerate that increase; and the increase will remain, when the prosperity may possibly have departed. Now, my brethren, you constantly hear this increase designated as fearful—but why fearful? What cause is there for fear in the multiplication of your species? What is there terrible in the aspect of a large multitude of honest, industrious, orderly, moral, and contented fellow-Christians? Surely this should be a subject of hope rather than of fear! A population trained in the love of God and of man, intelligent, considerate, peaceful, can never be too large, either for the general prosperity of the country, or for any individual interest. Why, then, do you call this increase fearful? I will tell you. It is because you apprehend that the character of this rising population is not such as I have described—that it does possess those qualities, which would make it a gain and a blessing to the community; and you foresee great danger—and in this I entirely agree with you—in the rapid multiplication of masses not so imbued, not so trained, but possessing other and perhaps opposite qualities.

"More than this. You are well aware that, in this vast augmentation, by very far the larger portion belongs to the lower orders. And this is a fact deserving your very serious reflection; for it indicates, no doubt, a great approaching change in the social system, for good or for evil. You do reflect—for you are very far from inconsiderate. You reflect, and the consequence is, that you fear. Why, I repeat, why not rather derive hope from your meditation? Are those men who are thronging round you, so destitute of the good feelings of your common nature, and so ignorant of the first principles on which society is founded, as to move only your jealousy and distrust? You reply, that they are ignorant. Aye, my brethren, that is true indeed—they are ignorant—and thence is the only real danger. But the crime of that ignorance does not rest with them.

"However, let us not enquire with whom it rests. Rather let us once again implore the Father of Mercies to avert from this nation the just consequences of our past omissions and neglects, and to give us grace to apply more virtue and more wisdom to the time to come.

"They are for the most part ignorant. Many of them have never been taught so much as the rudiments of their religious and moral duties. Their intellects have seldom been trained by any discipline, or stored with any useful information. They are uninstructed, or they are misinstructed, as to the foundation of their social obligations. They are conscious of certain rights; but, if their rights be greater than their knowledge you must see how certainly they will abuse them. They have intelligence enough to understand an appeal to their passions; not enough to detect the sophistry, which is sometimes employed to mislead them. They have virtue enough to love their families, to apply a good deal of industry to their support, and to abstain generally from any flagrant violation of the law; not enough to make them provident against casual distress or disappointment, or to preserve them from much disorder in their lives. They congregate together in large masses, and are capable of firm and continuous co-operation, whether for a good purpose, or, as it might possibly happen, for a purpose the reverse of good.

"Now, this condition of such large multitudes is by no means that which promises security, or inspires confidence. In worldly intelligence and technical knowledge they are far removed from incapacity—in character, if not independent, they are certainly not servile; but they are for the most part deficient in moral principles as the motive of their actions, and in sound religious principles as the basis of their morality. If then there be danger, this is the source of it. You are surrounded by masses of men whose physical energy and mechanical skill surpass their moral qualifications; and among whom an indefinite sense of their power, and a possible misapprehension of their rights, are not regulated by habitual self-control. And how should this be otherwise? Self-control is the end and fruit of education; and these men have been instructed very partially, and educated not at all. They have learnt their trades, but they have not been taught their duties. They know the value of their hands, but they are uninformed as to the price of their souls. They have a strong sense of the interests of this world, but they have been left—many of them—without any certain knowledge, whether there be so much as a world to come, or not.

"I may here suggest to you another consideration, less important indeed, yet not without much weight in the treatment of this subject—what are the recreations to which they usually have recourse in their hours of leisure?—for these, you will observe, are exactly the hours of their temptation, from various objects unconnected with their daily pursuits; from the subtle suggestions of political or social corruptors; from the mere gross impulse of uncontrolled sensuality. With what principles then are their characters fortified for resistance to these seductions? With what light is their intellect provided to divert them from such vulgar and sinful occupation of their spare time? For I need not inform you, that when the curiosity has been awakened early, and the mind exercised and informed, the seasons of repose often become golden moments for moral reflection, or scientific enquiry, tending not only to increase the knowledge and improve the habits of the man who employs them, but also to augment the general store of information and virtue. And I would not by any means be understood to say, that there are none among the working men in these districts who answer this description—on the contrary, I believe that there are many of acute intelligence, considerable mechanical knowledge, and uncorrupted moral integrity. But what we all lament in common is, that these form no more than a body of honourable exceptions, and not, what they ought to form, and what they might form—the very heart and substance of the people."

Dr. Waddington fearlessly points out what is really the greatest defect in all the systems of education which have been established, either in England or on the Continent, the want of providing efficient schoolmasters by systematic training. Nowhere is this essential element of success so sedulously cultivated as in Ireland, under the National Board; and the teachers trained in the model school of Dublin are superior to the average of those entrusted with the education of the middle classes. It was one of the crying evils of the Kildare Place Society that they permitted a system of private patronage to influence the appointment of the schoolmasters they selected, so that in nine cases out of ten, every such appointment was nothing better than a local job. The Dean of Durham eloquently describes the qualifications which should be required in a schoolmaster:

"And now let us enquire, in a very few sentences, what are the principal qualities requisite for the office of a schoolmaster,—and I have no doubt that there are many among you, even parents it may be, who have never to this moment asked yourselves this question. First among them, we require in him sound religious principles, not as a matter of belief only, but also as a motive of action; we require a spotless moral character—these are essential; nothing can compensate for their absence. Next, we insist that he be familiar with the various authorised methods of imparting information; but, besides this, he ought to command an extent of knowledge larger than that which he is called upon to impart; for thus only will he be able to illustrate his lessons, and give them perspicuity and force. Next, he must possess the art—the very difficult art—of communicating his information. This cannot be learnt, of course, without experience; but experience alone did not suffice;—to awaken the curiosity of the child, to interest his imagination, to attract his attention, to teach him to think—rather than to repeat dry formalities of mere words which convey no meaning to his mind—to teach him to think, I say, and to understand and to infer and to reason—this, my brethren, is the secret, the very essence, of the art of teaching; and without it you may construct, indeed, an useful, animated machine, but you will never form a considerate and intelligent man.

The requisites that I shall last mention are gravity of deportment, discretion, self-control, and perfect command of temper. And this is a mere outline of the qualities which must combine to constitute the character of a good schoolmaster.

"Now I need not inform you that such men as these are not to be sought in the refuse of other trades and professions; on the contrary, a profession so composed would possess a moral elevation to which most others might look up with deference. You perceive, besides, that they cannot be self-created; that they cannot attain that model without much diligence and discipline,—in a word, that the art of teaching must first be taught to them; that they must be tutored and instructed themselves, before they can be qualified to exercise tuition and impart instruction.

"Till very lately we have lived with different notions. For all other professions some previous training and knowledge have been required—from the schoolmaster alone we have exacted no special preparation, but allowed him to enter, as if self-enlightened, or gifted with some sort of inspiration, on his most important mission; and to this, no doubt, as I have just remarked, it may be mainly ascribed, that the amount of instruction communicated to the poor has been hitherto disproportionate even to the insufficient means employed.

"It is for these reasons that during the last ten years, since people have begun to think at all on the subject, we have seen the establishment of institutions called Training Schools—that is to say, schools for schoolmasters—schools where the men to whom the education of the youth of this country is to be committed are prepared for that office—where they are taught that they will have solemn duties to discharge towards their pupils and their country, and are taught, too, how to discharge them. It is in these establishments that they may attain the model which has just been placed before you. These, my brethren, are the nurseries, whence the men who will greatly influence the destinies of the next generation will proceed; and on their number, and conduct, and efficiency, will mainly depend the extent of the general good to be expected from our present exertions."

The Christian lessons inculcated in the conclusion of these lectures are so eminently suggestive, that we shall not weaken their effect by comment.

"We are by this time, I hope, convinced that the welfare of all classes is deeply interested in the improvement of what is called the lowest; that that class stands in great need of improvement; that any further delay might be fraught with danger; and that the instrument which God has given us for that purpose is education. We have seen, likewise, that the means of education must in every district be chiefly provided by the wealthier inhabitants, while some conditional assistance may be expected from the Government. Now, as a nation, we are capable of noble sacrifices. Many millions of our treasures have been expended on the emancipation of our slaves, and year after year we still continue our willing contributions in support of that holy cause. Yet it is a part of rational philanthropy not to confine its exertions to foreign and remote objects, however sacred, but at the same time, and with still greater zeal, to contend with any vast and wasting domestic corruption. I therefore repeat my opinion, that it is the duty of the Legislature to consecrate to the education of the poor of this country sums very much larger than the present grant.

"But even when this shall be done, the main part of the burden must still fall, as I have told you, in some shape or other, upon the locality; and if you who are rich, if you have any superfluities, will not contribute to this purpose by the spontaneous exercise of an ample benevolence, you must expect an alternative which will be much less grateful to your feelings, in some form of compulsory impost.

"You are not insensible to the importance of sound and earnest spiritual instruction; as is proved, not only by your regular attendance in this church, but also by an act of grateful munificence lately performed by you. You recognise the value of literary and scientific information, whether for the exercise of your intellects, or the recreation of your leisure hours; and this is shown by the number and magnitude of your institutions, and the liberality with which you dispense their advantages to all within their reach—but those within their reach are not the poor.

But in respect to the poor, you are not indifferent to their bodily wants and sufferings. Individually, or associated for humane purposes, you support the helplessness of infirmity, you alleviate the pangs of pain, you satisfy the cravings of physical necessity. . . . But there are other necessities of which you do not dream, and which, though less visible, less obtrusive, are evils not less real, not less important—nay, in their consequences far more important—than those which your charity relieves. The children in your streets cry aloud for your assistance. They ask for bread, and you give it to them. It is but half your duty. Give them at the same time that for which they do not ask—knowledge of their God, knowledge of their duties, and understanding to perform them.

"Act a more generous and a wiser part. Form societies for the improvement of the schools which exist, for the establishment of others in districts where they are most needed. Infant schools, as I have said, are valuable at least as means of moral discipline. Evening schools are frequently useful to those whose mornings have been employed in labour; and Adult schools to those whose early education has been neglected. Further these objects,—further them, not by pecuniary assistance only, but by the contribution of your time and your talents. Employ any influence that you may possess over the parents, to show them how clearly both their interests and their duties lie in the education of their children. Above all, improve the character and raise the condition of your schoolmasters. Bear in mind how entirely the result of your exertions must depend on their qualifications; and extend your support to the diocesan institution in which they are trained.

"If at any time you shall have any funds generally available for educational purposes, let me advise you to apply them principally, or at least some considerable share of them, to the education of the poor. And this for two reasons. Because the upper and middle classes are already much more abundantly provided with facilities of instruction than those below them; and because, even if this were not so, they never can want the power to provide them for themselves. It is not wisdom, my brethren, it is not good sense, it is not common foresight, to widen that broad space which already separates the upper from the lower orders. To raise the one still higher, is in effect to depress the other to a lower depth; to accelerate the progress of those already too far in advance, is but to excite the despair of those who have not the means to follow. And you may be well assured of this besides,—they will not stand still; and unless you lead them along in the same path with yourselves, they will find out other paths, devious and perhaps crooked paths, pointing in a different and perhaps opposite direction, and ending—where you would least desire to see them end.

"Then let others take pride in their academic halls, or in their simple institutions for the growth of science, and the embellishments of art, that is, for the advantage and delectation of the classes who have raised them. But let it rather be said of you, that your foremost attention was directed to the wants of the destitute and the helpless. It will be a prouder boast than if some new towers should crown your hills and add to the splendid monuments of your prosperity. For you will thus leave behind you monuments of your virtues too; and though the temples which you shall raise will be of humbler elevation and ruder structure, they will bear a more glorious inscription on their front, for they will be dedicated to the holiest of all human purposes, by the purest of all human motives. . . . Act thus, my brethren, and you will build both more honourably and more permanently. Place your foundation in the interests and affections of the poor, and then your walls will stand fast in immortal security, and the protection of Heaven will be upon you.

"I have now performed my task: I know how imperfectly, how unworthily of the cause which I have presumed to plead, but with an earnest heart and with a single purpose. I commit the result to Heaven—only entreating you, when you shall reflect, as you sometimes will reflect, on my advice and warnings, to consider through whose bounty it is that you have received what you possess; through whose mercy it is that you preserve what you have received; and to manifest your gratitude to God by your loving kindness towards man."

Our course draws to a close. The mission of the League is almost accomplished. One great victory has been won for our common humanity, and monopoly has fallen before the unaided force of moral principle. The ground is clear for philanthropy and philosophy to combine with piety in the great work of the moral elevation of the people. Hitherto the Minister has been waiting for the country; and the country has been waiting for the Minister. Time waits for neither; and every day which we leave unimproved adds to an appalling mass of moral degradation, which, if allowed to accumulate unchecked, menaces the country with most perilous consequences.

Prisons and Prisoners. By Joseph Adshead. With Illustrations. London: Longman, Brown, Green, and Longman.

This work is a valuable contribution on a subject to which the author appears to have devoted very considerable reflection and labour. The important topics on which it treats have been, for some years past, attracting an increased share of attention from thinking and philanthropic persons; but much remains to be done before a due regard will be paid to them by a sufficient number of influential individuals, or by the public at large. Abuses and abominations have to a considerable extent been abolished in old modes of prison discipline; yet so many serious evils still remain, so large a sphere is left for reformation, that benevolence has even in the present day a mighty task to accomplish in this direction of improvement. It is no easy thing to excite a general and full consideration of the principles which should regulate criminal treatment—at least, there are many difficulties in the way of doing so. The great majority of the people fortunately know nothing practically of the interior of our gaols. They pass by the strong, gloomy, stone walls with a notion, if they think on the matter at all, that strength and security are the only requisites for a prison. Of what is going on inside, whether the influences to which the inmates are subjected are corrupting and degrading, or reformatory as well as punitive, they are ignorant, and consequently are not stimulated to exert themselves for the removal of abuses which may, and often do, exist in sad abundance. Some persons more sensitive than others shudder at some indefinite idea of prisoners' sufferings, but few think of inquiring if any of that suffering is unnecessary, or if the ordeal of pain is really promotive of the interests of society and the improvement of the law-breaker. Much of this indifference is certainly attributable to the fact that what is passing in the interior of prisons is necessarily out of sight to the bulk of the community. We trust, however, that an enlightened public opinion will speedily be directed to the establishment of our penal institutions on a right basis, whereby the proper and only justifiable ends of punishment may be carried out.

There can be no better test of the degree of a nation's civilisation and humanity than the principles on which it acts in the treatment of crime. Barbarous conditions exhibit blind revenge and extravagant cruelty as the impulses of an injured party—wild justice, as some have called it. By degrees, as barbarism subsides, justice becomes less savage; it loses a portion of its vindictiveness by its being taken out of the hands of offended individuals, and confided to the care of magistrates; still it long retains a retaliative character. To make the lawbreaker suffer seems to be the sole object. The law is not constructed with an intelligent regard to the welfare of all through the security of the social fabric, but with a view to the gratification of vindictive feeling. Gradually, ameliorations are introduced into the penal code; and ultimately intelligence and humanity are associated with the administration of justice, and with those processes which the morally corrupt must undergo, to prevent contagion, and for their own purification.

It is out of our province to say anything in this place on the practicability of resorting to plans for the prevention of crime; by the diminution of poverty and its temptations; by extending the benefits of sound, healthy, moral, education, and by promoting various elevating influences among those classes which are now most exposed to vitiating circumstances. In passing by these measures we do not undervalue their overwhelming importance; but the mind must dwell upon one department of a subject at a time. The book before us relates to the treatment of criminals after conviction, and will be found to assist in solving the problems.—How far may humanity to the prisoner be made consistent with the conservation of society? and what method is the best adapted for reforming the culprit, and at the same time deterring others from the commission of crime?

Various systems of prison discipline are at the present time in operation in different parts of the civilised world, and in the same nation; as in our own country and the United States. Each of these systems meets with its respective defenders, between whom a great contrariety of opinion exists as to the principles and details in practice of penal management. We have prisons where the inmates are thrown into indiscriminate associations, and where they have every opportunity of full communication with each other; with little, if any, attempt at classification. Then there is the silent and congregated system, generally connected with such a classification as the gaols will allow of; under which system the prisoners work together during the day, and an attempt is made to prevent them communicating, inflicting severe punishments for breach of the prison rules in that respect. There is also the separate system, which provides a separate cell for each inmate of the gaol, and in no case whatever allows the criminals to be brought into contact, so that communication is impossible. Work is given to the prisoners; a habit of industry is promoted among them; they receive moral and religious instruction; and are frequently visited by inspectors, the chaplain, and other officers. The silent and congregated method is sometimes called the Auburn system, from its being adopted in a prison of that name in the State of New York; and the separate arrangement is often known as the Pennsylvania system, from its being acted upon in the eastern penitentiary in that State. Many of the provinces throughout the States have adopted one or the other of these methods. Mr. Adshead gives his voice in favour of the separate system; and adduces a vast array of facts, derived from numerous authorities and extensive personal observation in England and America, in reply to its opponents, more particularly the Times newspaper, Mr. Dickens's American Notes, and the Boston Society's Reports.

Very little reflection appears to be needed to convince of the direful effects which must necessarily result from the free associations of the depraved, in their different degrees of guilt. Under such circumstances the tyro in crime learns lessons of deeper sin; the heart yet open to impressions of goodness is hardened by contact with the confirmed villain; scoffs and jeers greet a tear of repentance; and he who entered the prison door with fear, designing a better life, comes out with bravado, an accomplished enemy of his fellow men. Yet such contamination is permitted in this the city of London, the metropolis of England, and seat of so much that is great and good. Newgate and other gaols under the management of the city authorities have frequently called forth the censures of the Inspectors of Prisons. In the Report of the Inspectors of the Home District, for 1843, the following passage occurs:

"It has been our painful duty again and again to point out attention to the serious evils resulting from gaol association, and consequent necessary contamination in this prison (Newgate). The importance of this prison, in this point of view, is very great. As the great metropolitan prison for the untried, it is here that those most skilled in crime of every form—those whom the temptations, the excesses, and the experience of this great city have led through a course of crime to the highest skill in the arts of depredation, and to the lowest degradation of infamy, meet together with those who are new to such courses, and who are only too ready to learn how they may pursue the career they have just entered upon, with most security from detection and punishment, and with greater success and indulgence. The numbers committed, nearly 4000 per annum, which have rapidly increased, and are still increasing, render this a subject of still greater moment. Of this number about one-fifth are acquitted; many of these return to their associates with increased knowledge and skill in crime; with lost characters; with more hardened dispositions, from their association here with others worse than themselves; and with their sense of shame and self-respect sadly diminished, if not utterly destroyed, by exposure to others, and by increased gaol acquaintances. We most seriously protest against Newgate as a great school of crime. Associated together in large numbers and utter idleness, frequently moved from ward to ward, and thereby their prison acquaintance much enlarged, we affirm that the prisoners must quit this prison worse than they enter it. It is said that prisoners are here but for a short time, and that, therefore, much mischief cannot be done. Many of them are here for three weeks and more, and are locked up together in numbers from 3 to 30, for 22 out of 24 hours, without the restraining presence even of an officer, without occupation or resource, without instruction, except that afforded by the daily chapel service, and by the short visits which a chaplain can pay from ward to ward, in so large a prison, and by the books which are placed in the wards. At the end of three weeks what remains to be learnt that any inmate of a ward can teach? What narrative of guilty or sensual adventures remains untold? What anticipation of future success and indulgence that has not been dwelt upon?"

Very few persons would have expected a character like this attaching, at so recent a period as 1843, to the chief metropolitan gaol, under the management of the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen of the City of London. Mr. Adshead is of opinion that there can be no radical constructional improvement in Newgate, to admit the introduction of proper discipline, without the entire demolition of the present building. He also adds, that since the date of the report above quoted from:

"There has been no alteration in the construction of the prison, for the prevention of the characteristic contaminations of the gaol. There may be a more frequent removal than formerly of the prisoners, and the number of its inmates may be somewhat lessened by prison regulations, but opportunities for mutually demoralising contact exist in all their proportionate extent, without an attempted remedy. A deputy-governor has been appointed, by whom there is a more direct surveillance (the governor being now principally occupied in office details), and who is fully alive to the ill-adapted construction of this prison for any purpose of proper discipline amongst the prisoners there confined."

The amount of injury effected by a continuation of these arrangements; the sources of pollution thus opened up, to spread vice and misery in a thousand different channels, cannot be calculated. If the extent of contamination could be reckoned, and the number given of those who might have been restored, by a superior discipline, to respectable citizenship, but who are now pests in the social state, the estimate would be fearful. Of course, these remarks as to the lamentable consequences of indiscriminate gaol association apply to all the prisons throughout the country where the same practice is in operation. It is to be hoped that the metropolis will soon entirely put away these abominations, and by the application of correct principles to the management of its penal institutions, cease to be an example of error—taking its proper position of leadership in the march of improvement.

The silent system, with classification, is certainly better than the licentiousness just described, but just doubts are entertained of its being adequate to fulfil the purposes for which it was designed. It is adopted at the Coldbath-fields and Tothill-fields Houses of Correction. In the first place, a classification of the prisoners, which shall prevent injury from their mutual contact, is impossible with the various degrees and shades of guilt which must exist within the walls of a prison. Under the head of the New Prison, Clerkenwell, the following remarks occur in the present volume:

"Let us examine into the nature of prison classification. Take, for example, a department under that mode of discipline, termed the 'vagrant-yard'; or a prison subdivision in which are placed prisoners of a very heterogeneous character, committed under the Vagrant Act. They include persons charged with the offence of begging, sleeping out at night, and not able to give a satisfactory account of themselves, suspected persons, gamblers, reputed thieves, for petty thefts, &c. All these are summarily convicted for various periods, without going to the sessions.

"The real character of the occupants of this yard we will endeavour to analyse.

"They are frequently strangers, who have never before seen the interior of a prison. There are also to be found gamblers, who may not be known to be thieves, and persons committed also for the most trifling offences; whilst it would be seen that a large proportion are comprised of those who have previously been on the misdemeanant, or felon's side, and also in the transport yard; some who have been transported, and have again returned to their own country, to plunder upon the community, and here we find them in what is termed the vagrant-yard. We may refer, also, to the 'Convicted felon's first offender's yard'; there may be 40 or 50 under this head. Having, during the day, mingled with old offenders or transports at the treadmill, or in some other mode of employment in the different workrooms, they return in the evening from their labour to their yard and day-room. On these occasions it is, after the day's work has terminated, that free and mutual communication takes place, when they relate to each other their several acquirements in criminal knowledge.

"The disposition or placing of untried prisoners must not be overlooked. Those who are committed as first offenders, and old offenders, are placed in distinct wards. By first offenders is meant those who have never been known to have been convicted of felony, but who may nevertheless have been frequently in the vagrant ward as reputed thieves. Amongst those who appear as first offenders may also happen to be included those who are deeply steeped in crime, and who may have been confined in other prisons for misdemeanours or felonies; but being apprehended in another county, are classed as first offenders; for when questioned on their admission to the prison, such characters take especial care not to make the worst of themselves. It is an acknowledged fact, that in the first offence ward there are, with those who are confined in a gaol for the first time, in constant association, some of the most depraved and hardened characters, who are brought in contact with the novice in crime, both in their bed cells and during their employment in the lighter kind of labour assigned to them. Such prison classification may aid the prison officers in more readily distinguishing the character of their criminal charge than under detention, but as a point of discipline for any important purpose of moral improvement, it is quite out of the question."

Where a number of prisoners are brought together, though under an injunction to maintain silence and avoid all communication with each other, it must be evident that the circumstance of their being brought together constitutes a strong and almost irresistible temptation to break the rules in this respect. They are naturally curious to know the terms of each other's imprisonment and the crimes for which they are committed, besides being desirous of varying the monotony of constant muteness. Insubordination, too, is likely to meet with mutual encouragement. Recourse to severe punishments, in addition to the sentences of judges and magistrates, is thus rendered necessary. Dark cells, solitary cells, handcuffs and irons, stoppage of diet, and other punishments are in frequent use for the preservation of discipline. In the year 1842 there were upwards of 125,000 committals in England and Wales; and in the same year there were 65,969 offences committed in our prisons and punished in various ways. Of two modes of punishment—imprisonment in dark cells and in solitary cells—there were 9026 of the former, and 15,310 of the latter. To take an example of one prison conducted upon the silent and congregated system, we find (Report for 1843) in Coldbath-fields prison, in one year, a total of 16,808 offences for 10,380 prisoners, or 161 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of prison delinquency. A contrast favourable to the separate system is shown in the Pentonville prison, which gives a total of 82 offences for 714 prisoners in the course of the twelve months, or 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of delinquency in prison.

After all, communication cannot be prevented. The ingenuity of the prisoners is taxed to evade the officers' vigilance; and that cunning which characterises so many criminals is exerted to devise means of signalling or communicating with one another undetected. The Inspectors' Return for 1843 states, with reference to Coldbath-fields prison:

"Notwithstanding the discipline is attempted to be maintained by never overlooking a single breach of it, however trifling (for if a prisoner speak only once—even one word—he loses his meal), notwithstanding punishments generally are inflicted to the extent which the law sanctions; and notwithstanding the frequency of these punishments, yet it is admitted by Mr. Chesterton, that 'The punishments are decidedly insufficient to keep up the discipline.' 'They will not deter—it is almost impossible to make the prisoners work.' 'The punishments are not preventive.'"

Under this discipline, however successfully carried out, there must be one evil of serious magnitude. The utmost silence with congregation cannot prevent recognition. On coming out of gaol the unreformed thus have an introduction to a larger circle of criminal acquaintances; while those who feel inclined to a better life are annoyed by the approaches of former fellow-prisoners, and by importunities are often tempted to a repetition of crime.

The separate system obviates this difficulty. Prisons under this method cease to be places for the formation of new companionships in guilt; and become what they ought to be in every case—means of disconnecting the fallen from depraved associations. No doubt the idea of exclusion from the pleasures of companionship and society is appalling to a sensitive mind; but it must be remembered that imprisonment in any shape is distressing, and that to a person of delicate feelings, forced association with the coarse, brutal, and depraved would, to say the least of it, be quite as shocking as total solitude. The advocates of separation in our gaols are not monsters of cruelty, as some suppose, delighted with torturing the unfortunate sons of guilt. Many of its promoters are men of exemplary benevolence. Absolute solitary confinement is not defended; indeed, such mitigations and ameliorations as are necessary for the preservation of bodily health and mental elasticity are strongly contended for. The author of "Prisons and Prisoners" gives, in the introduction to his work, the substance of a definition or description of the separate system, supplied by the Inspectors of the Home District, a portion of which we here quote:

"What is separate confinement? It is totally different in its nature from solitary confinement. It differs from it in the following particulars: In providing with a large, well lighted, and well ventilated apartment, instead of immuring him in a confined, ill-ventilated, and dark cell; in providing the prisoner with everything that is necessary for his cleanliness, health, and comfort, during the day, and for his repose at night, instead of denying him these advantages; in supplying him with sufficient food of wholesome quality, instead of confining him to bread and water; in alleviating his mental discomfort by giving him employment, by the regular visits of the officers of the prison, of the governor, surgeon, turnkeys, or trades' instructors, and particularly of the chaplain, instead of consigning him to the torpor and other bad consequences of idleness, and the misery of unmitigated remorse, resentment, or revenge; in separating him from none of the inmates of the prison except his fellow-prisoners, instead of cutting him off, as far as may be, from the sight and solace of human society; in allowing him the privilege of attending both chapel and school, for the purpose of public worship and education in class (securing, on those occasions, his complete separation from the sight and hearing of his fellows), instead of excluding him from divine service and instruction; in providing him with the means of taking exercise in the open air, whenever it is proper or necessary, instead of confining him to the unbroken seclusion of his cell. The object of separate confinement, is the permanent moral benefit of the prisoner—an object which he can plainly see this object has in view.

"Under the separate system an appeal is made to the moral sense and understanding of the prisoner; he is treated as a man, and with the respect and benevolence due to humanity, even in its lowest debasement.

"Separate confinement is fitted and designed to induce reflection, kindness, gratitude, and amendment: in short separate confinement is the separation of each offender from all communication and association with his fellow-offenders, regard being had to his bodily health, his mental sanity, his intellectual improvement, and his moral amendment, by inculcating industrious habits, and by religious and moral instruction."

We have no hesitation in acknowledging our confidence in a system of penal discipline, conducted consistently with the principle enunciated above, that the prisoner should be "treated as a man, and with the respect and benevolence due to humanity, even in its lowest debasement." The task of reforming those who are deeply dyed in guilt, while they remain within the sphere of mutual contamination, is hopeless. Some plan of separation must be adopted, or we must come to the conclusion that the restoration of criminals to the paths of rectitude is but seldom to be expected, and that in most instances they must remain centres of moral pollution. To the objection often urged against the separate system, namely, its alleged tendency to cause insanity, Mr. Adshhead brings forward in reply a host of statistical details and many explanations which are too numerous for notice in this article.

We cannot refrain, however, from mentioning one explanation given with reference to the sudden and extraordinary alleged increase in the number of cases of mental aberration, continuing for two or three years after 1837, in the Eastern Penitentiary, Pennsylvania. In 1837 a new physician was appointed to the Penitentiary, and the authority of Dr. Varrentrapp is quoted to show that a very considerable number of the cases reported, as those of alienation of the mind, would not have been so designated by the profession in Europe.

The returns which present this extent of lunacy, also present cures in the proportion of 80 per cent. of the patients; while the disorder in most instances was of short duration. Now, the highest proportion of cures ever known to have occurred in any lunatic establishment, even the best regulated, is 50 per cent.; so, if it be argued from the statements referred to, that separate confinement is likely to produce insanity, it follows from the other part of the statement that the same discipline constitutes by far the best cure yet discovered. In giving this explanation we are at the same time fully convinced of the injurious effects of unmitigated solitary imprisonment on the mind: and we coincide with the author of the volume before us, that the relaxation of some of the rules of the Eastern Penitentiary might be effected with propriety and advantage, to bring them in accordance with the regulations of the Model Prison, Pentonville, which are not a jot too lenient. Every good principle is liable to be carried to extremes; and in carrying out the separate system in our gaols, care must be taken to introduce all such ameliorations as are consistent with the purposes of a penal institution, for the prevention of morbid mental excitement or unnatural torpor. Powerful and useful medicines, when injudiciously prescribed, destroy the patient, instead of curing the disease; so must the separate system be administered with judgment and humanity, to benefit the morally diseased individuals submitted to the treatment.

Space will not permit us to comment upon the different branches of the subject treated of by Mr. Adshhead. The book is evidently penned in an earnest and benevolent spirit, and exhibits a close acquaintance with the workings of the various penal systems in operation in this and other countries. It contains a mass of information; and those who feel interested in the subject (and who should not?) will find "Prisons and Prisoners" a useful aid in arriving at sound conclusions. May a few years witness a great advance in the adoption of improved means for the cure of crime and its prevention for the future.

JOURNALISM IN FRANCE.—The recent laws directed against the press in France have rendered the establishment of newspapers much more expensive and difficult than formerly. To secure the payment of the highest fine, the security, or cautionnement, for a journal has been raised to 100,000 francs, or 4000*l.*, and the responsible editor must be proprietor of one third of that sum. In a country where capital is so limited, the necessity of paying 4000*l.* operates very unfavourably to enterprise in journalism, and may be considered almost as a prohibition, when it is remembered that this money is at the mercy of a Government whose judges may interdict the publication of the paper after two judicial condemnations. But notwithstanding the sinister influence of this law, and the efforts used by the Government to corrupt public writers, these combined causes do not operate to raise the rich proprietor of a journal above the poor but able writer, as in England. The main cause of this lies in the social habits and institutions of France which are more favourable to talent, and far less favourable to the power and influence of mere wealth than the social system of England. Ministers in France seek to bribe and debauch writers in newspapers, and too often succeed—ministers in England, if there be a favour to confer, or a good thing to bestow, confer it on the proprietors of journals, not on the writers of them. In England, the proprietor of such a paper is made a deputy-lieutenant, the proprietor of such another is created a baronet, the proprietor of a third is appointed a local magistrate. In France, it is the writers, and not the proprietors, who are rewarded; and the Bertrins are no exception to this rule, for they were far more celebrated as writers than as proprietors. Fievre, Etienne, Keratry, and Chevalier, with many others, were made councillors of state, while at least twenty other writers were made prefects, sub prefects, maitre des requêtes, &c. The number of newspaper writers who have taken a still higher flight over the heads of proprietors, and attained ministerial "port-feuilles" or the peerage, is by no means inconsiderable. Chateaubriand, Salvandy, Guizot, Thiers, Duchâtel de Remusat, Villemin, Cousin, and many others, may be numbered. Thus is a homage paid to talent, both by government and people in France, which in England is reserved for wealth or title. The late Mr. Thomas Barnes, of the Times, though not a man of genius, like Chateaubriand, nor a man of such varied attainments as M. Guizot, was yet far superior, both as a scholar and a writer, to all the other French newspaper writers who attained the rank of minister. But Mr. Barnes was born in a wealth-worshipping and aristocratic land; never was an M.P.—never was a privy councillor—never was a minister in a country which has had a Knatchbull, a Lincoln, and an Ellenborough in the Cabinet, and an Addington, a Goderich, and a Peel, for prime ministers.—British Quarterly Review for May.

A Fancy Fair and Fete Champetre will be held in the grounds of the Almshouses, Waltham-green, Fulham, on Tuesday, the 23d, and Wednesday, the 24th of June, in aid of the Butchers' Charitable Institution. A Concert and Ball are amongst the varied amusements of the day. Vocal talent of a superior order have been engaged, and several original and appropriate pieces, written for the occasion, will be presented.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 144.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1846.

COUNTY REGISTRATION.

Between the 20th of June and the 20th July, a valid claim can be made, which should be in the following form:

To the overseers of the parish of ———
I hereby give you notice, that I claim to be inserted in the list of voters for the county [riding or division] of ———, and that the particulars of my place of abode and qualification are stated in the columns below.
Dated the _____ day of _____, in the year _____
(Signed)

Christian name and surname of the claimant at full length.	Place of abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, lane, or other like place in this parish (or township), and number of house [if any] where the property is situate, or name of the property, or name of the occupying tenant, or if the qualification consist of a rent-charge, then the names of the owners of the property out of which such rent is issuing, or some of them, and the situation of the property.

Taking care to sign their Christian names (if more than one) and surname in full, their true place of abode, nature of qualification, and locality, conformable to the heading of the notice, so that it may be identified. In the third column state, if the qualification is freehold, say "Freehold house," or "land," or "rent-charge" (if for life, only £10 value is required), giving the name of the owner and the situation of the property.

If copyhold, say "Copyhold house," or "land," as the case may be.

If leasehold, say "Original lease of twenty years," or "sixty years of house," or "land," as the case may be.

If a sub-lease, then "Sub-lease of sixty" or "twenty years," as the case may be.

If tenancy qualification, say "House" or "land occupied at a rental of £50 per annum."

QUALIFIED FREEHOLDERS

Are those possessed of an estate of inheritance of the yearly value of 40s., or an estate for life or lives of the yearly value of £10, or an estate possessed prior to June 7, 1832, or since. If by marriage, or will, or promotion to office, or if the freeholder is himself the actual occupier, 40s. value will be sufficient.

Parish clerks, sextons, schoolmasters, Dissenting ministers, and holders of office, if entitled to emoluments of 40s. out of land, but the appointment must be for life, or during good behaviour. Six months' possession prior to the 31st of July will entitle the freeholder to be registered.

QUALIFIED COPYHOLDERS

Are those possessed of copyhold "houses or land of £10 value." The period of possession the same as for freehold.

QUALIFIED LEASEHOLDERS

Are those who possess an original lease or a sub-lease (if in occupation), originally created for sixty years, of the clear yearly value of £10, over and above all rents and charges, or for twenty years of the clear yearly value of £50, over and above all rents and charges, and in possession thereof twelve months previous to the 31st of July.

QUALIFIED OCCUPYING TENANTS

Are those who occupy as tenant any lands or tenements for which they are bona fide liable to a yearly rental of £50, and the period of occupation must be the same as the leaseholder.

Many electors during last year's revision lost their right of voting for twelve months, owing to their mistaking the tenancy qualification and leasehold qualification; but the reader will see they are totally different, and those who were struck off should reclaim.

The holding of a lease at a rental of £50 will not confer a leasehold qualification. The lease must be worth annually £50, over and above the rent, &c., and persons holding as described, when in occupation, should claim as occupying tenants at £50 rental. The claim, then, can be maintained, and costs demanded, if frivolously and vexatiously objected to. The notice, when filled up in duplicate, may be served on the overseer of the parish where the qualifying property is situate, by taking it to the post-office, where money orders are paid and received, and, on the payment of 3d., the postmaster will stamp the duplicate and forward it by post, or the notice may be left at the residence of the overseer or office for the transaction of the parochial business. It is to be observed that a redeemed land-tax of 40s., if purchased and entered under Schedule D, will confer a county vote; but neither freehold in occupation of owner, or a copyhold of £10 value, or a leasehold on which a tenement is built, will confer a county vote, if the property is situate in a city or borough. It has to be observed, however, that two or more copyhold or leasehold houses of less clear annual value than £10 each, but more together, will confer a county vote, even although situated in a parliamentary borough.

VICTORY!

Our work is done. The great principle in whose name and power we leagued ourselves together, and which we undertook to see finally embodied in an Act of Parliament, has now received the seal of statutory enactment. The British legislature has made its last Corn Law—has relinquished henceforth and for ever, the unholy office of restricting the people's food. By and with the assent and consent of the three estates of the realm, in Parliament assembled, FREE TRADE in the first article of human use and necessity is now part and parcel of the law and constitution of the country.

It has taken a long time to do. First, seven years of popular agitation; and then, five months of Parliamentary conflict! Never was a public and social wrong more deeply rooted and ingrained in the institutions, habits, and prejudices of a country, and in the pride and supposed interests of a dominant class, than was that which, in the commencement of the year 1839, we pledged ourselves to wrench from its place in the British statute-book. Future generations will marvel that it should have cost so much to achieve an end so simply right and rational—to win legislative recognition for such palpable rudiments of common justice and common sense. Yet, now that all is over, we are not disposed to complain, with any bitterness, of the tardy action, either of popular intelligence or of Parliamentary forms. Delay itself has not been without its compensatory advantages. It marks deliberation and settled purpose. It serves to indicate, to the obtusest perception, the finality and irrevocableness of a national act, which the national judgment has so slowly and cautiously matured. Nobody has been taken by surprise. All opinions have had fair play—all parties have had free speech. Neither violence nor hurry has shared in effecting this great consummation. The act to which her Majesty's most gracious and glad assent yesterday gave the force of law is, most emphatically, the work of the national intelligence, the expression and embodiment of national conviction—of a conviction wrought very gradually, spread over many years, tested and confirmed by a long course and wide variety of national experiences, and successively embracing larger and larger classes of minds, until at length it has reached that maturity and universality which constitute a moral necessity for the statesman to recognise and obey. It is too little to say, that what is so done can never, in the nature of things be undone;—the bare notion of the possibility of undoing it is one that can never enter a sane mind. A legislative revolution so slowly and gradually elaborated, and so tranquilly consummated, bears the unmistakeable stamp of legitimacy, inevitableness, and finality. Its credentials are in its history. It is certificated against all attempts at reaction and counter-revolution—guaranteed against all political casualties. There it is, and there it will be, in all its grandeur of principle, beneficence of tendency, and fruitfulness of result—as truly an integral element of our national being as the steam-engine, the printing press, or the House of Commons.

That this vast and beneficent change in our national policy has not been effected with absolute national unanimity—that, even to the last, a few voices are feebly raised, in dissent and "protest," against the dictates of policy and justice—is too much in the ordinary course of things to excite any strong emotion either of surprise or indignation. We should, of course, have liked to see it otherwise; but it is impossible to be angry with men whose offence carries with it its own punishment. It is penalty enough for the would-be taxers of the people's bread, that they are doomed to sulk while the country rejoices, and that their share in the legislative revolution of the age has been only that of unavailing and impotent obstruction. We cannot be hard upon them. The retributions of history will be sufficiently prompt and painful to answer all the ends of justice. That the Stanleys, and Richmonds, and Buckinghams think proper to commit themselves by formal and solemn "protest" against an act of legislative wisdom and moral right which places this country in the front rank of the world's civilisation, is much more their business than it is ours. If noble lords will register themselves, in the archives of the empire, in the singularly disadvantageous character assumed by these protesting peers, there is no help for it. The time is not distant when their lordships will regret having taken pen in hand for so silly a purpose, and will vainly wish that it were possible to erase from the journals of their house, and from the memory of their country, all record of the fact, that in the year 1846 they deprecated food as a nuisance to be abated—obstinately resisted the people's claim to earn and eat their bread in their own way—and pledged their credit and reputation to absurd predictions of the misery and ruin consequent on an "inundation" of edible products. As we are, however, in no mood for re-opening a closed controversy, and would like to part pleasantly from our old opponents, we content ourselves with wishing them, one and all, a speedy conversion to wiser and happier views, and moral courage to proclaim such conversion to the world. We have much faith in the efficacy of "three years' experience."

Of an event so wide and far reaching in its bearings, both present and future, as that which it is this day our happiness to record—an event which will ever constitute one of the great dates in the history of this country—it is difficult to speak fitly and adequately, on the spur of the moment. Our readers are probably, with ourselves, disposed just now rather to enjoy the "great fact," than to theorise on its consequences and tendencies. The tone of congratulation is that which best befits the hour of victory. And from our hearts do we congratulate all classes and parties of our countrymen on the achievement of a blessing in which, quite irrespectively of their share in the toils and sacrifices of the conflict, ALL will substantially participate. To those tried friends and fellow labourers who have borne with us the burden and heat of the day—who have fought with us this fight from the beginning—battled for a true, just, and generous principle, through evil report, and through good report—and lived to see it espoused by the collective statesmanship of the empire, and finally written on the statute book; to those more recent converts who, by their timely and efficient aid, have fairly won that equal share of the meed and honour of success which a high authority assigns even to labourers who begin their working day only at the eleventh hour; to all ranks and orders of the industrial community of Englishmen, who, whether conscious or unconscious of their own enfranchisement, are this day liberated from the bondage of a most grievous yoke, and from the pressure of a most fatal hindrance; to the hardworking agriculturists, in particular, who are now again placed in their true and natural relations to their countrymen, and re-enter on equal terms the great fraternity of British producers; to the landowning gentry and aristocracy, who have cleared themselves of the odium of enacting laws for their private pecuniary advantage, and making a class "interest" of national impoverishment and misery; and to the statesmen who have, once for all, cast off a responsibility too vast and onerous for any human rulers to sustain, and are no longer charged with the awful task of "regulating the supply of food to the people;" to ALL our countrymen, of every rank and degree, do we tender our most fervent congratulations on a triumph which opens a new career of progress to our common country, widens and brightens the horizon of our national future, and more than any other act or event of this age, re-asserts for England her old prerogative of TEACHING NATIONS HOW TO LIVE.

THE PROTEST OF 1815 AND THE PROTEST OF 1846.

Before our labours conclude we are anxious to place on record, in striking contrast, Lord Grenville's protest against the establishment of the Corn Laws and Lord Stanley's protest against their repeal. The experience of thirty years has established the truth and wisdom of every syllable of the former. The latter is one of those documents likely to puzzle posterity, by rendering it doubtful whether it emanated from a Lord Stanley, of the nineteenth century, or from some unlettered baron of the darkest of the dark ages.

LORD GRENVILLE'S PROTEST.

DISSENTIENT,—

1. Because we are adverse in principle to all new restraints on commerce. We think it certain that public prosperity is best promoted by leaving uncontrolled the free current of national industry; and we wish rather, by well-considered steps, to bring back our commercial legislation to the straight and simple line of wisdom, than to increase the deviation by subjecting additional and extensive branches of the public interest to fresh systems of artificial and injurious restrictions.

2. Because we think that the great practical rule, of leaving all commerce unfettered, applies more peculiarly, and on still stronger grounds of justice as well as policy, to the corn trade than to any other. Irresistible, indeed, must be that necessity which could, in our judgment, authorise the legislature to tamper with the sustenance of the people, and to impede the free purchase of that article on which depends the existence of so large a portion of the community.

3. Because we think that the expectations of ultimate benefit from this measure are founded on a delusive theory. We cannot persuade ourselves that this law will ever contribute to produce plenty, cheapness, or steadiness of price. So long as it operates at all, its effects must be the opposite of these. Monopoly is the parent of scarcity, of dearth, and of uncertainty. To cut off any of the sources of supply can only tend to lessen its abundance; to close against ourselves the cheapest market for any commodity, must enhance the price at which we purchase it; and to confine the consumer of corn to the produce of his own country, is to refuse to ourselves the benefit of that provision which Providence itself has made for equalising to man the variations of climate and of seasons.

4. But whatever may be the future consequences of this law at some distant and uncertain period, we see with pain that these hopes must be purchased at the expense of a great and present evil. To compel the consumer to purchase corn dearer at home than it might be imported from abroad, is the immediate practical effect of this law. In this way alone can it operate. Its present protection, its promised extension of agriculture, must result, (if at all) from the profits which it creates by keeping up the price of corn to an artificial level. These future benefits are the consequences expected, but, as we confidently believe, erroneously expected, from giving a bounty to the grower of corn, by a tax levied on its consumer.

5. Because we think the adoption of any permanent law for such a purpose, required the fullest and most laborious investigation. Nor would it have been sufficient for our satisfaction, could we have been convinced of the general policy of a hazardous experiment. A still further inquiry would have been necessary to persuade us that the present moment is fit for its adoption. In such an inquiry, we must have had the means of satisfying ourselves what its immediate operation will be, as connected with the various and pressing circumstances of public difficulty and distress with which the country is surrounded; with the state of our circulation and currency, of our agriculture and manufactures, of our internal and external commerce, and, above all, with the condition and reward of the industrious and labouring classes of our community.

On all these particulars, as they respect this question, we think that Parliament is almost wholly uninformed; on all we see reason for the utmost anxiety and alarm from the operation of this law.

Lastly, Because, if we could approve of the principle and purpose of this law, we think that no sufficient foundation has been laid for its details. The evidence before us, unsatisfactory and imperfect as it is, seems to us rather to disprove than to support the propriety of the high price adopted as the standard of importation, and the fallacious mode by which that price is to be ascertained. And on all these grounds we are anxious to record our dissent from a measure so precipitate in its course, and, as we fear, so injurious in its consequences.

LORD STANLEY'S PROTEST AGAINST THE CORN BILL.

The following is the Protest of Lord Stanley against the Corn Bill, which was laid on the table of the House of Lords last night:

DISSENTIENT,—

1. Because the repeal of the Corn Laws will greatly increase the dependence of this country upon foreign countries for its supply of food, and will thereby expose it to dangers against which former statesmen have thought it essential to take legislative precautions.

2. Because there is no security nor probability that other nations will take similar steps; and this country will, therefore, not only be exposed to the risks of failure of supply consequent on a state of war, but will also be exclusively subject to an unlimited influx of corn in times of abundance, and to sudden checks whenever short crops shall reduce the ordinary supply from the exporting countries, or their Governments shall deem it necessary to take precautionary measures for their own protection, thus causing rapid and disastrous fluctuations in the markets of this country.

3. Because under a system of protection the agriculture of this country has more than kept pace with the increasing demand of its increasing population; and because it is to be apprehended that the removal of protection may throw some lands out of cultivation, and check in others the progress of improvement which has led to this satisfactory result.

4. Because it is unjust to withdraw protection from the landed interest of this country, while that interest remains subject to exclusive burdens imposed for purposes of general and not of special advantage.

5. Because the loss to be sustained by the repeal of the Corn Laws will fall most heavily on the least wealthy portion of the landed proprietors, will press immediately and severely on the tenant farmers, and through them, with ruinous consequences on the agricultural labourers.

6. Because indirectly, but not less certainly, injurious consequences will result to the manufacturing interest, and especially to the artisans and mechanics, from competition with the agricultural labourers thrown out of employment, but principally from the loss of the home market, caused by the inability of the producers of grain, and those dependent on them, to consume manufactured goods to the same extent as heretofore.

7. Because the same cause will produce similar evil results to the tradesmen, retail dealers, and others in country towns, not themselves engaged in agricultural pursuits, but mainly dependent for their subsistence on their dealings with those who are so engaged.

8. Because the effect of a repeal of the Corn Laws will be especially injurious to Ireland, by lowering the value of her principal exports, and by still further reducing the demand for labour, the want of which is among the principal evils of her social condition.

9. Because a Free Trade in corn will cause a large and unnecessary diminution of annual income, thus impairing the revenue of the country, at the same time that it cripples the resources of those classes on whom the weight of local taxation now mainly falls.

10. Because a general reduction of prices, consequent on a reduction of the price of corn, will tend unduly to raise the monied interest at the expense of all others, and to aggravate the pressure of the national burdens.

11. Because the removal of differential duties in favour of Canadian corn is at variance with the legislative encouragement held out to that colony by Parliament, on the faith of which the colonists have laid out large sums upon the improvement of their internal navigation; and because the removal of protection will divert the traffic of the interior from the St. Lawrence and the British ports of Montreal and Quebec, to the foreign port of New York; thus throwing out of employment a large amount of British shipping, severing the commercial interests of Canada from those of the parent country, and connecting those interests most intimately with the United States of America.

12. Because the adoption of a similar system with regard to other articles of commerce, will tend to sever the strongest bond of union between this country and her colonies, will deprive the British merchant of that which is now his most certain market, and sap the foundation of that colonial system, to which, commercially and politically, this country owes much of its present greatness.

THE CORN MARKET.—The accounts from the Continent lead us to expect a continuance of the demand for wheat for shipment to Belgium, Holland, and the Rhenish provinces. The present stocks appear much exhausted; and the accounts of the growing rye crop are more unfavourable. Throughout Belgium and Holland, and along the banks of the Rhine, the crop has been ascertained to be bad for some weeks past, but these letters not only confirm those accounts, but extend them to Pomerania, and other more important grain growing districts of Germany; and the opinion is confirmed that a very serious deficiency will this year be experienced in this most important grain for Continental consumption, which will lead to a demand for inferior and cheap wheat.—Morning Chronicle.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Twenty-third Week, ending Saturday, June 27.

Thursday night, the 25th of June, 1846, must be memorably marked in the political calendar. On that night Sir Robert Peel carried, in the House of Lords, his bill for the ultimate repeal of the Corn Laws, and his bill for the further revision of our commercial tariff. And on that night, the same minister was defeated in the House of Commons by a majority of SEVENTY-THREE. Such a concurrence of events on the same night in both houses of the Legislature is unparalleled in our political history. It shadows forth the enormous difficulties of Corn Law repeal, and yet the power of that political opinion which has compelled it; and though Sir Robert Peel has fallen on a Coercion Bill ("true 'tis pity, and pity 'tis true") there is no reason to suppose that he could have much longer retained political power. He has redeemed all his past errors by sacrificing his political life for the service of the people; and the gratitude of a commercial people, emancipated from the stern grip of monopoly, will follow him into private life, and attest, as Mr. Cobden did, on Thursday night, their sense of that "steady perseverance, unswerving firmness, and great ability," with which he has conducted to a triumphant conclusion the most "magnificent reform" of modern times.

It was agreed that there was to be no division in the House of Lords on the third reading of the Corn and Customs' Bill. It was felt to be useless; and the whole debate was therefore dry and empty. There was a speech from Earl Wicklow; the Earl of Ripon briefly defended the financial course of the Government; the Duke of Cleveland deplored; Earl Stanhope objurgated; Lord Feversham lamented; Lord Gage vaticinated; and the Duke of Richmond threatened. Then came the question, "That this bill do pass." "Content," exclaimed some voices; "Non-content," replied others; and then the Lord Chancellor gravely said, "the Contents have it." So the Corn Law repeal bill was passed; and will probably have received the royal assent before our paper is in the hands of our readers.

Below the bar of the House of Lords it was interesting to mark the groups that were awaiting the final sanction of the legislature to the long and arduous struggle that has so incessantly absorbed public interest and attention for the last seven years. Members of the House of Commons crowded around the bar—amongst whom we remarked, with more than joyous aspect, the hon. member for Durham, Mr. Bright, engaged probably in exchange of congratulations with Mr. Gibson; the veteran member for Salford, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Thornely, Mr. Moffat, and many other well-known Free Traders. A little behind the front ranks Lord John Russell stood, apparently in jocular conversation with the hon. member for Stockport, and as the words "that this bill do pass," fell from the lips of the Lord Chancellor, a suppressed cheer ran through the ranks of the Free Traders within the strangers' gallery; amongst the foremost of whom we observed the Chairman of the League, Mr. George Wilson, Mr. Rawson, the Treasurer of the League, Mr. Paulton, Mr. Lees, and several members of the Council.

The Customs' Bill was passed in a similar way; and after this serious and important work, the House of Lords adjourned, and the House of Commons pursued its course of defeating the Government.

The long protracted debate on the Coercion Bill was dragging along, when messengers from the Lords announced that their lordships had agreed to the Corn and Customs' Bills, without amendments. The members on the Opposition benches marked their satisfaction by a loud burst of cheering. The debate then went on, its dulness redeemed by an excellent speech from Mr. Charles Buller, and a sparkling one from Mr. Shiel. It was fitly concluded by Mr. COBDEN, whose speech, short and pithy, placed the whole question in so clear a light, and so clearly expounded the rational of the ministerial defeat, that it will be read by every man desirous of understanding it. Then came the important division—

For the second reading of the bill . . . 219

Against it . . . 292

The Government, therefore, being defeated by a majority of SEVENTY-THREE.

After the division in the commons a considerable number of Free Traders remained in the lobby of the house, and as Sir Robert Peel passed through to the cloak room he was greeted with several rounds of most enthusiastic cheers.

On Friday, after an aimless discussion raised by the Duke of Richmond, about giving to tenants the right of vacating leases, and for which he proposed and withdrew clauses (a mere piece of claptrap on the part of the Duke of Protection), the Corn Bill safely passed through committee, and was reported, without amendments. The peril was therefore over; and nothing remained but the third reading, which was then fixed for Tuesday, though on the subsequent Monday it was postponed till Thursday, Lord Stanley giving an assurance that the Protectionists did not mean to divide on it, but simply to content themselves with entering a protest on the Journals.

On Monday, by agreement, Lord Ashburton brought forward a motion, the object of which was to prevent bonded corn from being entered for consumption at the low rate of duty, should the bill pass. Here it is, in precise terms:—

tion of foreign corn, it is the opinion of this house that the sudden admission of the large quantity of wheat and wheat flour now in bond at a very low rate of duty, while the prices are moderate, and the prospect of the approaching harvest is promising, may be productive of great injury and injustice to the cultivators of the soil of the United Kingdom; and that some better provision against such a calamity should be provided than is contained in the bill now before the house.

In support of his motion, Lord Ashburton attempted to frighten their lordships by a speech which the Earl of Dalhousie characterised as "dark in alarm, and fruitful in prophecy, but utterly destitute of argument." Not only were there 2,500,000 quarters of grain in bond, but more was to come in upon them like a flood, and literally to swamp us all. It is painful to look upon Lord Ashburton, now an old man, muttering gibberish which, in his younger days, he despised. Despair is too strong a word, for the beginning of the speeches of Mr. Thomas Baring, in the House of Commons, were always flatly contradicted by the conclusion; but, at all events, Mr. Thomas Baring uttered more sense and shrewdness than ever Lord Ashburton has done.

The Earl of Dalhousie, on whom has devolved the conducting of the Corn and Customs' Bills through the house, answered the speech of Lord Ashburton. Instead of there being in bond 2,500,000 quarters, the quantity was only 1,900,000; while under the sliding scale there had been imported, in 1842, in the short space of four weeks, no less a quantity than 2,180,000 quarters. In 1841, also, there had been in bond at one time no less than 2,017,000 quarters. But the point which struck Lord Ashburton hardest, was the fact that the lord of the breeches-pockets had voted for the amendment proposed by the Earl of Wicklow for imposing a fixed duty of 5s.; and all the stock now in bond would be admitted, under the new law, at precisely a similar rate of duty! The Earl of Dalhousie also reminded the house that the Government were not to blame for any alleged accumulation of stock in bond. The following is an abstract of the debate:

Lord ASHBURTON said he would not enter into the general policy of the great change about to be made in our commercial law, and particularly the Corn Law, after the opinion which had been twice expressed by their lordships upon the principle of the measure. But assuming they were right in the general policy and expediency of this great change, he wished to call their attention to the want of caution exhibited in the hasty, inconsiderate manner in which the measure had been conducted, and to contrast it with the proceedings of former Governments and Parliaments in analogous cases. Their lordships were about to take away, he did not say all protection, but every safeguard against the shock and oscillation of prices which must be occasioned by the vast quantity of corn and flour now in bond coming at once upon the market. That quantity was some time ago not less than two million quarters, and since then foreign corn had been pouring in every day from all parts of the world, exceeding all power of absorption by the effectual demand in this country, where there was, moreover, every prospect of an abundant market. Upon an average of six years, we had required only about 100,000 quarters of foreign wheat in aid of our own produce, and they were now going to open the flood-gates and let in recklessly, without the slightest precaution to prevent individual ruin, at least two millions and a half actually in bond. This had not been the course pursued by Mr. Huskisson in 1822 when proposing a much less change than this; which, whatever supposed advantage might accrue from it, showed very little feeling towards the cultivators of this country. They might suspend the operation of the bill till prices reached 60s.; but he suggested no particular plan; he merely proposed a simple resolution, that whatever their lordships did, they would take care not to expose the country to any unnecessary risk.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE observed, that the speech of Lord Ashburton was dark in alarm and fruitful in prophecy, but a speech more bare in facts, or less supported by argument, it had never been his fate to hear. His noble friend had talked of some unheard of and dangerous amount of foreign corn that was to come into this country; whereas the latest accounts from the Custom House showed that the quantity of wheat and wheat flour together in bond is under 1,900,000 quarters; and so far from there being any anticipation that this quantity would be unduly or inordinately increased by imports from foreign countries, the very reverse is the fact; for from every quarter of the world the Government had the same information as in the last year—namely, that there was a short-coming harvest; Nature appearing to set herself in array in her various elements against us by an excess of wet in one quarter and drought in another. He showed that the quantity of foreign corn in bond, and actually admitted, under the existing law, had been greater than 1,900,000 quarters. In reply to the complaint of Lord Ashburton regarding the hasty and reckless manner in which this measure had been conducted, he reminded their noble lordships that the measure had been announced a quarter of a year back, at the time when Sir Robert Peel proposed that the same rule should be applied to the gradual admission of corn as it was customary to apply to other merchandise when the duties were altered. But this was objected to, and Sir Robert, finding it not according to precedent in respect to corn, withdrew the proposition, and Lord Stanley had given him credit for so doing. He believed the proposition of Lord Ashburton to be unjust in principle, and that, so far from benefiting, it would injure those who were affected by it. How did the noble lord propose to deal with the subject? He spoke of "better provisions"—what provisions? His resolution was in the teeth of our whole warehousing policy, whilst, by an ex post facto law, it would inflict gross injustice. Whatever effect this measure might have been expected to produce upon prices had been produced already; and if their lordships intended to make this change in the Corn Law, it should be done as much as possible at once; for experience had shown that the worst thing that could be done was to hang up such a measure over the heads of those who were affected by it.

Lord KINSAIRD confirmed the argument he had urged upon a former occasion, by stating that the price of wheat at Mark-lane, at 2 o'clock this day, was 1s. higher, with a short supply.

Earl GREY trusted that the house was not going to consent to this resolution without an explanation of its practical consequences. How did the noble Lord who proposed it intend to work it out? If it was adopted, did he mean to say their lordships must not then agree to the third reading of the Corn Bill? If so, this was an indirect way of throwing out the bill. (Lord Ashburton disclaimed this design.) Then, if they were to pass both this resolution and the bill, the former would be a dead letter. Nay, it would be worse than useless, for it held out a threat that the legislature meant at some time to check the admission of corn in bond, the consequence of which would be, that the holders of corn would not lose an hour in getting their corn out of bond; so that the resolution would defeat its own object.

Lord REDESDALE defended Lord Ashburton from the suspicion of desiring to throw out the bill by a trick, and contended that some provision was absolutely necessary to protect the farmers of this country from ruin.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH observed, that delay in this measure was now deprecated by all, yet this resolution must interpose delay. Lord Ashburton had supposed that because corn in bond became saleable, therefore it would be brought to market; but this was contrary to experience. Every year, after harvest, from 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 quarters of corn became saleable, though a very small quantity came to market. He believed that a week or two after the corn in bond became saleable there might be an influx, for the same reason that brought corn to market after harvest, namely, the distress of the holders, who were anxious to realise the value.

The Earl of WICKLOW confessed that his opinion had been influenced by what had been stated by Lord Dalhousie. If instead of 2,500,000 quarters in bond, there were but 1,900,000, and the prospects of the Continental harvests were so unfavourable, the necessity for the resolution fell to the ground; and he agreed that great inconvenience would result from the procrastination of this measure.

Lord ASHBURTON shortly replied, and their lordships divided, when there appeared—

For the resolution	47
Against it	70

Majority against the resolution .. 23

The next business was the consideration of the Customs Duties Bill in committee. This was the opportunity for the Duke of Richmond to shine—his last grand effort to prove that the question was not a mere landlord's one. He held in his hand the got-up petition from the Spitalfields weavers, praying to be heard by counsel at the bar against the proposed reduction of the duties on silk. He had secured the aid of Lord Brougham; and felt so sure of success that a learned counsel (Mr. Sergeant Talfourd), armed with a ponderous brief, was in attendance to endeavour to arrest, by his eloquence, the progress of the bill; and a body of Spitalfields weavers stood below the bar. The question having been put that the house should go into committee, and the duke having presented his petition, and made his motion,

The Earl of DALHOUSIE said it was ungracious to oppose this motion, but with reference to convenience and to precedent, their lordships should not agree to it. The usage and practice of the House precluded the hearing of counsel on a Customs' Bill, or a measure of general policy.

Lord BROUGHAM denied the existence of such a rule, and appealed to the precedent of the orders in council, when he had been heard as counsel in the house.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH said their lordships must take care not to establish a dangerous precedent which would obstruct business.

The Duke of WELLINGTON also reminded their lordships that they could not consent to any alteration of the details of the Tariff Bill in committee without an infraction of the rules of proceeding between the two Houses of Parliament.

The Duke of RICHMOND protested with some warmth against this doctrine, and declared he would divide the house upon the question.

The division showed the following numbers:

For the motion	74
Against it	78

Majority against the motion .. 4

The motion having been negatived by the proxies (the majority of the peers present being in favour of the motion), a warm discussion ensued as to the rules which regulated proxies, and as to the expediency of that mode of voting.

Lord STANLEY, before the house went into committee upon the Tariff Bill, addressed their lordships upon its principle, and with reference to some articles embraced in it. The Earl of Ripon had declared the principle of Free Trade to be the great rule of the Government; yet, after taking off all protection from corn, they brought forward this bill, which recognized the principle of protection, and it was because (Lord Stanley) found that principle recognized in the bill that he should support it. But it was on the score of revenue that he should deal with this bill. The Government calculated upon a very small surplus, and there was great danger next year of a deficiency of revenue. In these circumstances, they proposed to repeal or reduce duties on articles which produced last year 2,739,187*l.*, and the probable loss of revenue would be 1,400,000*l.* If there was one financial maxim better recognized than another, it was that those duties should be the last reduced which were in a state of progressive productiveness to the revenue, showing that they did not press upon consumption. The noble lord pointed out various articles in which, under the present duties, the revenue was increasing and competition was becoming day by day more brisk; and, therefore, there should be some explanation of the reason why so large and unnecessary a sacrifice of revenue is made.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE denied that this measure was introduced as a Free Trade measure. He had admitted that there were various anomalies and exceptions to the principle of Free Trade in the bill, the object of which was to remove all duties from articles of food and of the first necessity, as well as from raw materials; and with respect to articles not of prime necessity, but which entered largely into consumption, to reduce the rates of duty as far as practicable. Upon some articles, for various reasons, the principle was not worked out, and he admitted that the tariff did not profess entirely to depart from the principle of protection. The noble earl then replied in detail to the specific objections of Lord Stanley, observing that it did not follow because the importation of an article was increasing, or the revenue collected upon it augmented, that this was a healthy increase; high duties created an illicit trade, which deranged all calculations.

Earl STANHOPE, whilst he predicted the most ruinous consequences to British industry from the operations of the Tariff Bill, expressed his conviction to be that the full principle of Free Trade had not been carried out in it, simply because, though the agriculturists allowed themselves to be led like cattle to the slaughter-house, the ministers durst not treat the manufacturers in the same way.

The Earl of RIPON neutralised the apprehensions of Lord Stanhope, by exposing the groundless vaticinations with which he had been overwhelmed at the introduction of the tariff of 1842, by deputations from the glovers, the dealers in salt provisions, and the milling interest, some of whom had since assured him they had found that he (Lord Ripon) was right and they were wrong.

Lord MONTEAGLE observed, that there was one matter which had not been noticed by Lord Dalhousie, namely, the connection of this measure with the question of finance. Their lordships had a right to know what it was expected would be the financial result of these measures. Did they expect the possibility of the removal of the property tax; or was it not a matter of inevitable necessity that that tax must be perpetuated? He lamented that Lord Stanley should lend the authority of his talents to the opposition offered to this measure; it was inconsistent with his past conduct; and his arguments applied to 1842 and to the Canada timber measure. He denied the principle laid down by Lord Stanley, that taking off the duty upon the raw material and levying a duty upon the manufacture was protection, which our manufacturers did not want. The noble lord pointed out some defects in the tariff, but he vindicated its general policy.

The Marquis of SALISBURY mentioned some facts which showed that the tariff of 1842 had not worked so advantageously as the Earl of Ripon supposed, and he contended that for every farthing by which articles were cheapened to the consumer by this bill, so much would be taken out of the pocket of the English artisan.

After a few observations from Lord Colchester, in opposition to the bill,

Lord ASHBURTON warned their lordships, upon every trustworthy authority, against the reckless dealing with finance which these measures discovered. The application of the broad general principle of Free Trade would be fatal to the national industry, though as far as raw materials were concerned, the removal of duties was good policy in a manufacturing country.

The house then went into committee. Upon the second clause

Lord STANLEY said the house was asked to sacrifice, in the article of timber alone, 400,000*l.* out of 1,000,000*l.*, which it was unnecessary to throw away, and he moved that the clause be omitted.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE, upon the results of official accounts of the timber trade, refuted the arguments of Lord Stanley, and contended that the admission and consumption of foreign timber did not diminish the importation of colonial timber; and that the duty of 15s. was a fair duty.

The Committee divided, when the numbers were—

For the original clause	64
For the amendment	52

Majority in favour of the clause .. 12

This was the division, as announced in the gallery, and as given in all the daily papers. But it seems there was an error, the numbers being only 54 to 52, giving to the Government the narrow majority of two.

All the clauses were then agreed to, as far as the schedule when

The Duke of RICHMOND objected to proceeding further.

Lord STANLEY said that, after the decisions which their lordships had come to upon the Corn Bill, it was not intended to prolong the discussion upon that measure, or to divide upon the third reading; but he and other noble lords would record a protest, setting forth their objections to the bill.

On Tuesday the great question of the silk duties, and some minor ones, were debated.

On the articles "butter and cheese,"

Lord HARDWICKE moved that they be struck out of the table, as an act of justice to the poorer classes of farmers in this country and in Ireland. The importation of butter amounted to 2,000,000 cwt., the value of which was 80s. per cwt., and the reduction of duty, 10s. per cwt., would be so minute and insignificant a relief to the consumer, as not to be felt, whilst it would take 500,000*l.* a year from the farmers of Ireland, and cause a serious loss to the revenue.

Lord DALHOUSIE said, if the Government had had no other object in view than revenue, the argument of Lord Hardwicke might prevail; the schedule, however, had not been framed with that view; but, precisely upon the ground upon which Lord Hardwicke conceived the existing duty should be retained—namely, the benefit of the poorer classes—the Government considered it ought to be reduced.

Lord STANLEY contended that the reduction would put a large sum into the pocket of the foreign grower, without affording any benefit to the people of this country.

The committee then divided; the numbers were—

For the omission	33
Against it	50

Majority for the abolition of the duty .. 17

The Duke of RICHMOND then proposed the omission of "hops," in the cultivation of which a large capital was invested. Sir Robert Peel had triumphantly appealed to the few foreign hops which had been imported since the last reduction of duty; but it took three years to get a good crop of hops upon new land. During the last year, however, samples of foreign hops had been produced, and were only kept out of the market by the duty. He founded his objection to the reduction on the ground of the large capital and numerous population employed in the cultivation of hops. If cheap hops were wanted, why not take off the Excise duty?

Lord DALHOUSIE was so far from agreeing with the Duke of Richmond that the amount of duty had been unduly reduced, that he had expected to be told that it was still too high, and that this was one of the anomalies of the measure. Hops might certainly be brought from Belgium and the south of Prussia; but, in addition to the duty of 25s., they would be substituted to the Excise duty of 19s. 7d., which afforded a protection to the home-grower of 60 per cent.

Lord WICKLOW hoped that the Excise duty would be repealed—the only instance in which an Excise duty was levied upon a growing crop.

Lord ASHBURTON condemned the reduction as a wanton experiment, not justified by any argument hitherto employed.

After some observations from Lords Colchester, Stanhope, and Ripon,

The Duke of RICHMOND urged that the only sure means of giving the people cheap beer was to repeal the duty upon malt.

Lord FITZWILLIAM concurred in this suggestion. Beer was just as much part of the food of the people as bread, and the repeal of the malt duty would be a great boon conferred upon the landed interest. The noble Earl was led to touch upon the general question of protection to British industry, in which he was followed by Lord Ashburton, but no new argument was employed by either.

Lord RADNOR supported the reduction of the duty upon hops, and the amendment was negatived without a division.

Lord STANHOPE objected to the reduction of the duty upon thread lace and pillow lace, which would destroy a branch of domestic manufacture carried on in cottages by poor industrious women and children. He declared his determination to take the sense of the committee upon this item.

The Duke of RICHMOND likewise deprecated the sending the cottage lace makers into cotton factories.

Lord DALHOUSIE considered that the effects which the two noble peers had ascribed to a reduction of duty from 13l. 2s. 6d. per cent. to 10l. per cent. were extravagant. These were articles of great value, easily smuggled, and the effect of the reduction would be to prevent their illicit introduction.

Lord STANLEY ridiculed the idea that a reduction of three per cent. could check smuggling. The reduction was unnecessary, whilst it took away pro tanto an extravagant protection from an humble but deserving class of manual labourers.

Lord FITZWILLIAM observed, that nothing was less conducive to the nurture of the young mind under the eye of a careful parent, or tended more to foster immorality, than employment in home lace making, in which the earnings were small, and which rendered the persons engaged in it unfit for other female employments.

The Earl of GALLOWAY confirmed the above observations.

The gallery was then cleared for a division, but none took place, and the item passed.

Upon the item of paper-hangings,

Earl STANHOPE objected to the reduction from 1s. to 2d.

Lord ASHBURTON could not see what possible object could be gained by this reduction. The manufacture of the higher and tasteful descriptions of ornamental paper had been entirely given up in this country. He entered his protest at the manner in which this measure was carried out for the mere pedantry of political economy.

Lord DALHOUSIE could only meet this sweeping assertion by a general denial.

Upon the article of silk,

The Duke of RICHMOND came to the table with a brief before him, which he stated had been prepared for the counsel on behalf of the Spitalfields silk-weavers, and proceeded to show the depressed condition of the petitioners, who were threatened already by their masters with a reduction of wages. The protection of 15 per cent. retained to them, they contended, would not amount to more than 9 per cent. upon the finer articles; and they stated that the gross annual value of the silk manufactures at home was less than in 1824 by 2,000,000l. or 3,000,000l. The noble duke lamented that this loyal and deserving class were not allowed to have their case stated by counsel at the bar; and he concluded by reiterating his former arguments in favour of protection to the artisans of this country, and proposing that the article of silk should be left out of the bill.

The Duke of CLEVELAND, reverting to the case of the lace-weavers, observed it was a strange argument to urge their immorality, when the immorality in cotton factories was tenfold greater.

Lord DALHOUSIE expressed his regret that he had been constrained, upon precedent and for public convenience, to resist the prayer of the petitioners, whose case, however, had not suffered in the hands of the noble duke. The petitioners had complained that, whilst the bill professed to retain a duty of 15 per cent. upon foreign silks, on many articles it amounted to only 9 per cent. The noble lord explained the difficulty of adjusting exactly the duty upon so large a number of articles, varying so much in value; but he believed that 15 per cent. was, as far as it was possible to fix it, the general amount of duty. With respect to the allegation of the petitioners, that twenty years ago the legislature began that alteration in the silk trade from which they dated their depression, if, the noble lord observed, capital had been withdrawn from this trade, the importation of the raw material had diminished, and the demands of the home-market and of the foreign trade had decreased, the petitioners might have a case founded upon their past history; but if in all these respects the very reverse was the fact, the petitioners were not borne out in their statement, and their prophecies were groundless. The noble lord then demonstrated the truth of his assertions from official accounts laid before Parliament. The fact of silk manufacturers being exported from this country to France, which excelled in silk fabrics, was itself a triumphant proof of the ability of our manufacturers to maintain a competition with foreigners. The noble lord then demonstrated the truth of his assertion from official accounts laid before Parliament. The fact of silk manufactures being exported from this country to France, which excelled in silk fabrics, was itself a triumphant proof of the ability of our manufacturers to maintain a competition with foreigners. The noble lord showed that our silk trade had prospered during the last three months, since the reduction of duty had been actually in operation, and stated that there never was a time when, as a whole, those who were employed in the silk trade were in a greater state of prosperity. In Spitalfields itself advertisements for hands were put up, and the throwing-mills in the country could not get them in sufficient number. The very night on which the Duke of Richmond was to have presented the petition of the silk weavers (a fortnight ago), a meeting of those weavers was held to consider whether they should not ask an increase of wages; the meeting was held, a rise of wages asked, and many masters in Spitalfields had acceded to the demand.

Lord STANLEY asked, if the silk trade had been so prosperous, why it should be interfered with? But he differed with Lord Dalhousie as to the facts, and as to the effect, said to have been produced, having been produced, not by diminishing the duty upon the raw material, but by the concurrent reduction of duty upon the manufactured article. Lord Stanley then produced counter statements of the silk trade since the year 1824. Lord Dalhousie, he observed, had spoken of the vast increase in the importation of raw silk; but whilst the quantity had increased from 1,388,000 lb., the average of 1815, 1816, and 1817, to 3,884,000 lb. in 1824, in 1844 it only reached 4,600,000 lb.—an increase of 800,000 lb. in twenty years, instead of 2,000,000 lb. in six years; and of this quantity great part consisted of knubs and husks—a specimen of which his lordship exhibited, observing, that of this rubbish the largest portion of the boasted exports to France had been made. The noble lord, in like manner, showed that, in the export trade and the import of finished goods, the evidence of the success of Mr. Huskisson's measure in 1824 was equally equivocal. After pointing out various instances of the practical inequality of the silk duties, he stated that there was only one article in this trade in which wages had not fallen and were falling, and that was figured velvet, which had a high protective duty of 1l. 7s. 6d. per lb., and that was now to be reduced to 9s. The noble lord contended that the alteration was neither called for by policy, nor justified by the arguments of Lord Dalhousie, and its effect would be to injure the revenue by reducing one-half duties which now produced 300,000l.

The committee then divided, when the numbers were—

For the amendment	50
Against it	75

Majority against the amendment .. 25

After a smart dialogue respecting a deputation from the silk-weavers to the Board of Trade, the schedule was agreed to; the bill was reported without amendments, and ordered to be read a third time on Thursday.

Their lordships then adjourned.

On Thursday the Earl of RIPON moved that the Corn Importation Bill be read a third time.

The Earl of WICKLOW said, as they were now at the last stage of these proceedings, and were about finally to conclude this dreadfully long chain of the commercial policy of this country, he begged to direct the attention of Government and their lordships generally to two points on which, it appeared to him, that no information had been afforded to their lordships in the course of these proceedings, and on which he thought that both to the country and their lordships information was due from the Government. The first of these respected the promises made by the first Minister of the crown to confer certain equivalents or compensations, which, it was stated, should accompany this measure. They had now reached the last stage of it, and yet up to the present time he had not been able to ascertain that in either house of Parliament anything like a proposal as to any of these matters had been made. It appeared that this point was not considered by the Government of small importance at the time of the measure being introduced, for ministers then represented that the equivalent to be proposed would in some degree compensate the landed interest for the loss which they would sustain. How was it, then, that they had now come to this period of the session, and that no notice had been taken of the subject in either house of Parliament? Was it the intention of ministers that the session should close without any proposal of compensation being brought forward? One such compensation had been promised to the country with which he was connected, which, though not equivalent to the landed gentry or tenantry for the injury to their interests which would be inflicted by the Corn Bill, was in itself of some little importance; and it ought to have been brought forward by the Government, independently altogether of this measure, for it was one of the bills strongly recommended to the Government by the commission of which Lord Devon was at the head. He referred to the proposition by which the whole of the constabulary force of that country was to be thrown on the consolidated fund, and the various counties relieved from any portion of the expense. Upon that subject they had heard no proposition of her Majesty's Government made to either House of Parliament. He, therefore, thought, before they agreed to the third reading of this bill, it was incumbent on some member of the Government to explain to their lordships what was their intention with reference to any measure to be brought forward. He now came to the second point, which appeared to him infinitely more important. Allusion had been occasionally made to the subject in that house, especially by his noble friend opposite (Lord Montagu), but no explanation had been afforded by her Majesty's Government. When Sir R. Peel brought forward in the House of Commons his proposition for an income-tax, he obtained the consent of the house to the tax for three years on the especial ground that he was then effecting great financial changes and extensive reductions in the customs, which would inevitably lessen the amount of the customs' duties, so as to require for a certain short period a means of taxation in lieu of them. But the right honourable baronet held out strong hopes to Parliament that by the end of three years those reductions would so much increase the produce of the customs' duties as to render it unnecessary to renew the income-tax. It was solely on this ground that the right honourable baronet had obtained a three years' income tax, for he believed that no other Minister who had governed this country for many years would have obtained it on any grounds whatsoever; but the great confidence reposed in the right honourable baronet as a financial minister by Parliament and the country, induced them to waive the strong objection which prevailed against an income-tax in time of peace, and so far to confide in his promises that the operation of the reductions would be successful, as to concede the renewal of the tax. The right honourable baronet's promises, we knew, had remained unfulfilled, but Parliament was induced to extend the period for which the tax had been granted, from a belief that by the reductions in the customs' duties the revenue of the country would be so increased as to make the continuance of the tax unnecessary. He believed this would have been the case if things had gone on as they were then doing, for the revenue was improving, and the state in every department was flourishing. But most unfortunately, in the present session, partly owing to the very increase which had been thus predicted, the right honourable gentleman and his government were determined by a sense of duty not to remain content with the alterations they had made, but to make those other alterations which their lordships had been considering during the last three weeks. His noble friend at the head of the Board of Trade (the Earl of Dalhousie), by the able manner in which he had conducted these proceedings—and he gave his noble friend credit for having done so in a most masterly manner—had shown himself an able statesman, a great debater, and capable of conducting affairs in any department which might be entrusted to him; but his noble friend had never ventured to hold out to their lordships that the result of the measures he proposed would ever raise the revenue beyond the point which it had attained previous to the reductions, for he had swept away, in a great measure, the income derived from the duties which they affected. His noble friend only proposed his reductions in the hope that in the course of years the buoyancy of the public resources and the augmentation of trade might raise the revenue, not up to the amount anticipated by Sir Robert Peel, but up to the point at which the revenue stood at the present time. The financial minister, in bringing forward his budget, held out to the country no prospect of any surplus whatever. The whole amount of the surplus for the present year, including the remittance from China, which would be of course confined to this year, did not reach more than 700,000l. Had they not a right to demand that her Majesty's ministers should state their expectations with respect to the future revenue of the country? Was it not perfectly clear, on their own showing, that the customs' duties would not rise to the point at which they had formerly stood? Had not their lordships a right to know if it was the intention of Government to renew the income tax? If it was not their intention, they had a right to know to what sources of revenue Ministers intended to look as a compensation for the taxes they were now abolishing. If it was their intention, they were bound to announce it fairly (hear, hear). A new Parliament would be chosen before the expiration of the present tax; and if Ministers intended to propose a renewal of the tax, it must be to a new Parliament. He asked them, did they believe that a new Parliament would ever sanction that tax as a permanent tax? If it was not their intention to propose it, they must have some other measure to propose which they ought to let the house know. But did they believe that any Parliament that would ever meet in this country would sanction the imposition of the income tax as a permanent tax? He believed the contrary. He believed that no Parliament would ever sanction that direct mode of taxation as a permanency. See to what this would drive them. If they determined to adopt the direct mode of taxation, and to abolish that indirect mode which had hitherto been looked upon as the most proper for a commercial, or indeed for any country, then it became absolutely necessary that the whole, or almost the whole, of the taxation of the country should be derived from that source. It was impossible that another Parliament, if it sanctioned that measure, would ever allow the malt tax to continue, or that tax which they had been discussing lately, the duty on hops (hear, hear). It was impossible that Government, in considering the measures they had brought forward, should not have fully and distinctly deliberated on these matters. Was it fair or just that they should now conclude these measures without any information whatever being given respecting the points to which he had called their attention? Let him not be told that the financial ministers in the other house were the proper persons to answer those questions. There was his noble friend at the head of the Board of Control (the Earl of Ripon), who had been Chancellor of the Exchequer, and without whose full sanction no measure of this kind could be proposed to Parliament. His noble friend at the head of the Board of Trade was also perfectly capable of giving an answer, and if they declined, on this last stage of the measure, to give an answer, the country would draw its own conclusions from their silence. Let it not be said because ministers were going to resign, they would throw the affairs of the country in an embarrassed state into other hands. Let it not be said that because they had received the affairs of the country in an embarrassed state from their predecessors, they would retaliate by leaving them in a similar condition. Such an excuse would not be received by the country; it would be tampering with public feeling to offer it; but he knew that his noble friends were men of too high honour to be influenced by such considerations. He said that, before the measure passed, ministers were bound to give their lordships the information upon these subjects which they must possess, and he called on his noble friends to give him an answer on the two points he had stated, which he considered of vast importance to the country.

The Earl of RIPON and Lord Ashburton rose together but the call of the house for the former noble lord being unanimous, he proceeded to address their lordships accordingly, and said that as he had no right to object to the questions which had been put to him by the noble earl, and as he had no fault to find with the manner in which they had been put, he would endeavour to give them an answer. The first question which the noble earl had asked was whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to carry into effect those measures which were stated by them at the commencement of the present session as being intended to accompany the alteration in the Corn Laws, and which were considered by them as measures calculated to be beneficial to the agricultural classes—not as equivalents or compensation for those alterations, but as right in themselves, and as far as they went, tending to diminish the cost of production to those whose capital was employed in the land. The Government felt then as they had done when they proposed the measures to Parliament, and were bound to adhere to them, and though it might be quite true that they had not yet passed, he believed that some of them would not require an act of Parliament, except in so far as the sum, to be raised from the consolidated fund, instead of in other ways, was concerned. Besides this, there were other measures of considerable importance proposed with respect to the removal of paupers; but they were in themselves quite independent of the question of the Corn Laws, and would have been exceedingly good and proper measures to adopt whether the Corn Laws were passed or not. Those measures had been brought forward in the other House of Parliament, and he could not say when they would be brought up to their lordships' house. With respect to the remarks of the noble earl on this point, he (the Earl of Ripon) thought the noble earl might understand that those measures could not, from their very nature, have been brought forward in this house. The noble earl having asked those questions, proceeded to inquire what it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to do as to the continuation of the property tax. Now, under all circumstances, he apprehended that no Government could undertake to give answers or pledge themselves in reply to such questions as these. The property tax had been brought in for three years; it had been since renewed, and he thought it would be exceedingly unwise to give any pledge that it would not again be renewed (hear, hear). Looking on the question in that light, he must therefore decline answering it. But he would make one or two remarks on the observations of the noble earl as to the actual condition of the revenue with respect to the effect of the reductions which he had made within the last four years. He thought that having made those observations the noble earl could hardly have attended to the document that had been laid on the table of the house, and which would explain the grounds on which he trusted that the reductions they were about to make would not only not be attended with loss to the revenue, but that in point of fact they were entitled to count on them as being productive of a considerable increase. He thought from the history of past reductions to be able to satisfy the noble earl that such was the case. In the year 1842 the amount of customs' duties had been 19,661,000*l*. In that year those duties had been reduced by 1,338,000*l*., which would have reduced the amount of customs in a corresponding degree the following year, unless there had been an increase in the amount of goods, so that the customs in 1843 should not have amounted to more than 18,323,000*l*. if the revenue underwent the full loss of that reduction. But in that very year 1843, the customs' duties produced 20,275,000*l*., being an increase of 614,000*l*. on the preceding year. In the year 1843 the customs had been still further reduced, to the extent of 171,000*l*. Had the customs of 1844 suffered that entire loss? Not by any means. The amount of duties for that year had amounted to 21,460,000*l*., being in effect 1,800,000*l*. more than the duties for 1842, notwithstanding the immense reduction which had been made in that and the subsequent years. In 1844 the duties had been reduced still further, to the extent of 286,000*l*., and the products of those duties in 1845 certainly had not amounted to as much as in the two preceding years; but in 1845, their lordships would recollect that a great reduction had taken place, the extent of 2,418,000*l*., in the customs' duties, and as that reduction did not take place until late in the year, a great portion of the loss would take place in that year itself. Notwithstanding all this, the amount of duties had been 19,329,000*l*., exceeding the absolute amount even in 1842, by about 200,000*l*., although in the course of the four preceding years duties had been removed to the amount of upwards of 4,000,000*l*. If then there had been no increase in the receipts connected with the reduction of duty, the sum which stood at 19,691,000*l*. in 1842, should have been only 15,661,000*l*. in 1845; whereas it had actually been 19,329,000*l*. Had not the Government then, with those facts before them, a right to anticipate that that there would not be a permanent reduction in the customs to the amount of the duty which would be removed? His noble friend would observe that the increase had not been confined to any particular period, but had been spread over the whole of the years of diminished duties. In the excise, to which the noble earl had alluded, reductions had also taken place. In 1842 the excise had produced 12,517,000*l*., and in 1843 had amounted to 12,879,000*l*. In 1844 a reduction had been made to the extent of 70,000*l*., and in 1845 a further reduction of 913,000*l*. had taken place. But, notwithstanding these reductions, the excise in the subsequent year amounted to 13,585,000*l*. He did not apprehend that the whole loss of those reductions would take place in the course of the year; but the excise of 1845 exceeded that of 1844; the excise of 1844 exceeded that of 1843. The sum total of the excise and customs in those four years had been—32,178,000*l*. in 1842; 33,152,000*l*. in 1843; 34,711,000*l*. in 1844; and 33,450,000*l*. in 1845; while the total amount of duties removed had amounted to 5,197,000*l*., notwithstanding while the receipts in 1845 had exceeded those of 1842 by upwards of 1,000,000*l*. (hear, hear). He thought the experience of those four years, therefore, tended to show there were rational grounds for assuming that the total amount of the reduction, great as it might be, would not cause a reduction in the amount of the revenue. That was the basis on which the Government went, and he thought they were justified in going upon it. He was sure that the same principle had been acted upon before, and therefore he did not think his noble friend had just grounds of complaint against the Government for not putting the general ground on which they had brought forward those measures before Parliament. He believed that in making those reductions an equivalent would be made up for what had been lost in the course of a limited number of years; but it was impossible to suppose that the amount of those reductions would be made up immediately. The Government, therefore, intended to make up the loss by the income tax, to which there were, he admitted, grave objections not only to the tax itself, but because it had been introduced in time of peace, and not of war; still, in introducing it, the Government had fair reason to think that the amount of those losses would be made up as years went on, so as to dispense with that tax. He must, however, decline expressing any opinion or giving any pledge on the subject; but of this he was quite certain, that Parliament would never be unwilling or afraid to pass any measure which might appear to them to be necessary for preserving the revenue of the country, so as to enable it to meet all demands upon it, and the heavy expenses it had to incur. It was deeply to be lamented that there was but little chance of there being reason to hold out the prospect that those expenses were to be diminished. But as to one source of these expenses, there had been considerable reduction. He meant the charge of the national debt, which had been reduced by the amount of 1,100,000*l*.; and which, considering the state of our finances, was a circumstance of material importance. He had thus endeavoured to answer all the questions which had been put to him. He had brought no papers with him, not having expected the discussion to take such a turn; but, recollecting there was a document on the table from which he could satisfy their lordships, he had availed himself of the information it contained to do so.

Lord FEVERSHAM denied the assertion that the tenant farmers were in favour of those new measures. The assertion had been made, and had been several times repeated, but nothing had been shown to prove or corroborate it. What had they done? They had held meetings all over the country, at which they had passed resolutions that indicated beyond the possibility of doubt what were the real feelings of their body. The noble lord then read extracts from resolutions passed at protectionist meetings in Doncaster, in the North Riding of York, in Lincoln, at Spalding, and in Dorsetshire, which were strongly condemnatory of Free Trade in corn. These were the opinions of the tenant farmers, who were said to be favourable to the bill. But, said the supporters of this measure, they have nothing to fear; the land which will be thrown out of cultivation by the operation of the bill, must be of the worst and poorest soil. Why, it was that poor soil which required the greatest number of labourers for its tillage (hear, hear). So that the evil of diminished employment would be increased instead of lessened. No one knew what the price of corn would be reduced to. When a member of the Government in that house had been asked what the probable price of corn would be, he replied that he would not hazard any prediction on the subject. That might be satisfactory to the noble lord, but he doubted if it would satisfy the house. Indeed, it did not appear that Government had taken any pains to calculate the price of corn under the new law. He had lately spoken to an intelligent American gentleman, who assured him that corn could be exported from America under 30*s*. a quarter. He could not at all concur with those who thought this measure would be so conducive to the improvement of the labouring classes. A much more useful measure, in his opinion, would be the Ten Hours' Bill, which would be a benefit to them in every way. That bill had been introduced into the other house of Parliament, where it had been rejected by a very small majority, aided by the Government; but he believed the time was not very far distant when it would receive the sanction of that house. When it should come up to their lordships, as it was but a measure of policy and justice, he hoped they would give it their favourable consideration. As to the bill before them, he regretted they had passed it, as in effect they had done, and more particularly that the majority of the right reverend prelates had supported it, because he believed it had been very greatly through their influence and votes that the measure had been successful. Their lordships' house and the agriculturists had always supported the rights and privileges of the Established Church, of the right reverend prelates, and of the rural clergy, and he therefore regretted it. This bill was a premium to agitation. It had been brought forward by the ministers of the Crown, but they could not be said to be its originators or promoters. Those who really originated and promoted it were the manufacturers and masters of Stockport and Manchester. It was nothing but concession to intimidation and agitation to pass this bill. He looked upon it as a downward movement, calculated not to uphold, but to overthrow the constitution (loud cries of "hear, hear"). It was impossible, he maintained, to say which of the great institutions of the country would not be subject to attack after their lordships had given their consent to a bill like the present, which had been commenced by a great agitation, which had been carried by a betrayal of great public trusts, and which would be regarded as a concession to that agitation, and a record of that betrayal (hear, hear, hear). In conclusion, he begged leave to enter his decided protest against the third reading of the bill.

The Duke of CLEVELAND said that on this, the last stage of the memorable Corn Law debate, he did not wish to create any further delay, but merely rose to protest in the most solemn manner against the policy of the measure. After all the debate and lengthy arguments they had heard he was still of the same opinion. Scarcely had any measure ever passed the house on which so many of their lordships had given their opinions à la voce, and the occasion would, on that account, be memorable in history; but still more memorable would it be for the sacrifice of private opinion to party interest. The house was constituted by three distinct parties, two of which had been hitherto the rival parties of the state, but being agreed on this subject, had overcome any opposition which could be made to them. Many noble lords on the other side of this house said that this bill was not quite suited to their ideas, but, nevertheless, they had not moved any amendment upon it. With respect to noble lords on his own side of the house, so many of whom had changed their votes but not their opinions (hear)—many of them had very prudently recorded their votes in silence. No one could doubt the prudence of that course. Some noble lords, however, had not followed that course, among whom was the noble lord the President of the Board of Control, who had been the author of the bill of 1814, and who hitherto had always advocated protection to agriculture. There was a third party, to which he belonged, and which was opposed to this bill on principle. They had given the grounds of their opposition. Though their lordships had decided against them by a large majority, he hoped he might claim credit for his party for consistency, for independence of conduct, for fairness in their actions, and honesty in their intentions (hear, hear). He had taken the liberty at an early period of the discussion of appealing to the episcopal bench as the representatives of the parochial clergy. That appeal was responded to by a right reverend prelate, who said the parochial clergy were not justified in opposing this bill; first, because they were a small body, and next, because they had taken no part in the agitation against it; extraordinary reasons he must take leave to say, and the latter of which not doing much credit to the right reverend prelate's charity. If the bench of bishops had voted with his party they should have had a majority of those present against the bill. The number of proxies was large—35, and a majority were in favour of the bill. It was not his intention to deprecate the system of proxies. It was founded on long and established usage. That was the only ground of its justification; for voting in any society by proxies was not in accordance with public taste at present. If they meant to preserve this privilege they should take care not to abuse it (hear, hear). It was true that noble lords resident in this country might be as capable of forming a judgment on a public measure if they resided 200 miles from town, as if they attended in that house. But that the proxies of lords in different parts of Europe, who never heard of this measure, or never imagined that such a measure would be brought forward, should be resorted to, he thought a most extraordinary proceeding. He should give one instance. There was the Marquis of Tweeddale, Governor of Madras, who had been absent for four years from this country, and who was so engaged by the late war in India, that he doubted whether he ever heard of this measure. The lamentable part of this measure was, the loss of confidence which it inspired in the humble followers of leading men like himself. His political life had not been a short one. For half of it he attached himself to the Whig party; but in 1833, he found himself unable, on the Reform Bill, to go as far as the Government was inclined to go. Far be it from him to say there was any breach of faith on that occasion by the Whigs. From that time to the present he had supported Sir R. Peel, whom he looked on as one of the greatest men this country had produced, whose talents he admired, and in whom he had placed implicit confidence. It could be easily supposed what his feelings now were at finding himself deserted and standing aloof, as it were, from both parties. But he had some consolation in the fact there was still left a leader whom he could follow, and that a man of no mean talents—he meant the noble lord near him (Lord Stanley). He had no hesitation in saying that he should for the future look up to that noble lord as not only his guide but his polar star (hear, and a laugh). He had no favour to expect from him, nor had he received any; but he had the greatest possible admiration for his talents, and for what he considered much more essential to a statesman—honesty in his professions. He had sat a long time near his noble friend in the other house, and he had always heard him speak without hesitation or equivocation, and he had never seen him look for a loop-hole through which he might one day escape (hear, hear). He must say the Government had been, in his opinion, guilty of an uncalled for and thorough breach of faith (hear).

The Earl of DALHOUSIE wished to notice a remark of the noble duke as to a noble and gallant relative of his—the Marquis of Tweeddale. Whether it was right or not to preserve proxies, so long as they continued they amounted to a delegation of the mind of the peer, in whose name they were given, to the person who held them. It mattered not, therefore, whether the peer who sent his proxy was in India or dining in Belgrave-square. As to this vote being at variance with his noble relative's opinions, the noble duke forgot that this question was substantially before the country for seven months, and that the period of communication with India was six weeks. He begged to assure the noble duke that during this whole discussion he had been in possession of the sentiments of his noble and gallant relative, and it was his firm conviction that if present he would have voted for the second reading. He would frankly state that his noble and gallant relative would, in his opinion, have supported the proposal for a fixed duty; and had their lordships assented to the noble earl's (the Earl of Wicklow's) proposal, and that it was proposed to reserve it on the third reading, he should not have felt himself at liberty to use his noble relative's proxy to negative a proposal for a fixed duty.

Lord GAGE said the Government had but one valid argument in favour of this measure—power. The independent exercise of their lordships' functions was gone, and it was idle to talk of the balance of estates. Where did those who called themselves the Liberal party mean to stop? Could they go the length of saying that they, the protectionists, were not justified in opposing a measure which they thought would destroy themselves without doing any good for any part of the community? It was not merely for rents that they opposed this measure, but for the sake of the yeoman and farmer, who would be ruined by it. How was the revenue to be collected—the touchstone of our existence as a state? Was there a suspected enemy of the church, state, and crown, that was not a supporter of this bill (hear)? If they approved of this bill, as nine-tenths in their hearts disapproved of it, notwithstanding their votes, it was their duty to stand firm until they heard the constitutionally expressed voice of the country (hear). No institution in the country could be safe from the results of such agitation. Its continuance and encouragement would lead to the destruction of all order and property. The noble and gallant duke opposite, while giving them his advice to yield this bill, also said that it might be the last time that he would counsel them. The pain given him by that hint was not lessened when he considered the elevated character of the noble duke who uttered it. He had long venerated that character as displayed and illustrated in the noble and gallant duke's splendid volumes of despatches, and he deeply grieved that the last triumph of so great a general should be one over his own political friends and allies (hear, hear).

Earl STANHOPE urged that the measure before the house had been carried by a monstrous and unnatural combination of parties. The agricultural classes had now a right to demand that they should not be subjected to any exclusive taxation—to any land-tax, or malt, or hop duties. Indeed, even if the bill had not been proposed, the agricultural interest would be justified in demanding an equitable revision of their peculiar burdens—of the county rates, highway rates, and other imposts now levied upon them. If they were to have Free Trade in corn, he did not see why they should not have Free Trade in all agricultural produce—why they should not be allowed to grow tobacco, and extract sugar from beetroot. It was quite impossible for the farmers to stand against foreign competition, without an enormous reduction of taxation. The noble earl concluded by solemnly warning the house of the consequences—consequences involving nothing short of ruin and revolution (hear, hear).

The Earl of SELKIRK observed that it was said that this was to be the last time that this question was to be debated in the legislature. He did not believe that (protectionist cheering). If his views were correct, he trusted that their lordships would not hesitate to reconsider the subject, and to entertain fresh measures with respect to it (hear, hear).

The Duke of RICHMOND said that as no noble lord had moved that this bill be read this day six months, and that as he should be sorry to see the measure become law without some such amendment appearing upon the journals of their lordships' house, he should take upon himself to make the motion in question (protectionist cheers). He should wish now, in reference to what had fallen the other night from the noble lord the President of the Board of Trade, to put a question to noble lords opposite. His noble friend had stated that Government still intended to persevere in the introduction of the bill giving what was called compensation to the agricultural interest for the measure now to be enacted. What he (the Duke of Richmond) had to complain of was, that these bills were not yet introduced into Parliament at all (hear, hear). The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in bringing forward his budget the other night, said not a word about the sums to be paid out of the consolidated fund in aid of the county rates (hear, hear). He wished distinctly to know whether her Majesty's Ministers still maintained the opinions uttered by Sir Peel, when he stated his conviction of the justice and necessity of the compensatory measures in question (cheers). He thought, however, that it was possible, that when these acts were brought forward, if they were brought forward, it would not be by the present advisers of the Crown, and then the fact would be, that their lordships would have given a third reading to the Corn Bill without any security further than speeches, and they knew the value of speeches as pledges, that the other measures which were to accompany that before their lordships would ever be introduced (hear, hear). He agreed with the noble lord who had just spoken that this would not be the last time that the question would be debated by their lordships (hear, hear). It was out of the question that this measure should be a final one (cheers). Did they think that the great majority of the farmers and the middle classes of the country would sit down patiently under the injustice now heaped upon them? No. They would agitate—not for the miserable sliding scale of the present bill being made permanent, or for any nonsensical 4*s*. duty they would agitate for an adequate degree of protection to agriculture, and not only to agriculture, but to every species of national industry (loud cries of "hear, hear, hear").

For his own part, he would try to persuade the farmers not to yield, but to behave like men; he would recommend them to be up and stirring—to agitate for the remission of local burdens, and if they did not take his advice, he did not understand their character (cheers). He denied utterly and positively that the farmers were indifferent to this measure. He denied, too, notwithstanding what had been said the other night by a right reverent prelate connected with Wales, that the parochial clergy were indifferent to the measure. True, they had not met in bodies to oppose it, and they acted wisely. He objected as much as any man to large meetings of the clergy on political subjects; it was better for them to avoid entering into such disputes. But the clergy had done what they had a perfect right to do—they had agreed with their parishioners on this subject, and had headed the lists of signatures to petitions against the bill, petitions which had been presented in such numbers by himself and by other noble peers. Indeed the case of the working-clergy was a peculiarly hard one. They were a highly meritorious and most deserving class. He had always found them doing their duty by their poor parishioners, and practising what they preached. They ought certainly to be the last body of men to be treated in the way in which it was now determined to use them. The noble duke went on to express his doubts as to whether the ministry contemplated, when they introduced the Corn and Customs' Bills, that their ultimate effect would be to break up the cabinet. The Government would pass the Corn Law and the Customs Duties Bill, and they would have the satisfaction of reflecting that they had broken up a powerful party in this country, and that, for some time at least, there would not be a strong Government, and that the business of the country must be carried on by an administration which could count on a majority of perhaps half a dozen votes. He was glad that the Government were going to resign, because it would show future statesmen that they could not break the pledges which they had given with impunity (hear, hear). Although this disruption of the cabinet might disappoint those 110 followers, he for one was not very sorry to find that those 110 gentlemen would not gain anything by their conversion.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH said that a question had been put by the noble duke to the members of her Majesty's Government, and he thought that it was inexpedient that it should remain without an answer. As he understood the noble duke, his object was to inquire whether the views of the Government had undergone any change with respect to those measures which had been announced at the commencement of the session as intended to accompany the present measure. He believed he could most distinctly state for his colleagues that their opinions on those subjects had undergone no change (cheers), and he could say for himself individually that his own opinion was not changed, and that he should feel himself bound to do all in his power to ensure the passing of every one of those measures (hear, hear).

The amendment was then put, and negatived without a division, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

On the motion that the Customs' Duties Bill be read a third time,

The Duke of RICHMOND moved as an amendment that it be read a third time that day six months. The noble duke said that he rose chiefly for the purpose of putting a question to his noble friend at the head of the Board of Trade on the subject of the Spitalfields weavers. He wished to know whether his noble friend would object to receive a deputation from that body, for the purpose of hearing a statement of their case. Their lordships were aware, from what fell from his noble friend the other evening, that his noble friend considered the statement which had been made respecting that deputation as one that affected his personal honour (hear, hear, hear). It now appeared, however, that a deputation of the petitioners went to the Board of Trade at a time when his noble friend was ill in bed. The deputation were received by the Vice-President of the Board of Trade and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and they left those right honourable gentlemen with the impression that the statement of their case had produced a considerable effect. He believed that the official answer given was, that the case would be considered (cries of "hear, hear," and a laugh). He understood from the petitioners that they had asked for precisely the same classification which had been granted to the Coventry silk-weavers, the justice of whose case had been admitted by his noble friend. He wished to ask his noble friend, therefore, whether, during the short time that he would stay in office, he would receive a deputation from the Spitalfields weavers, and whether, if their case should turn out to be similar to that of the ribbon-weavers of Coventry, he would propose, or at any rate support, a bill to place them in the same position? He thought he had a right to appeal to the Government to rectify a mistake which he must say had occurred through the negligence of the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, who ought to have informed his noble friend of what had taken place. With regard to the present bill, he must say that he objected to the whole of it, with the exception of that part of it which related to the colonies.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE said that the noble duke had adverted to what had been stated the other night with respect to the deputation of the Spitalfields weavers. He (the Earl of Dalhousie) stated on that occasion that he was not aware that the deputation had attended at the Board of Trade. The noble duke had stated correctly, as appeared now, what had occurred. Their lordships, however, must permit him to offer a defence of his right honourable friend the Vice-President of the Board of Trade. He (the Earl of Dalhousie) was ill at the time when the deputation called; but although it was true that his right honourable friend did not acquaint him with the circumstance, he was not liable to the imputation cast upon him by the noble duke, because the noble duke had assumed what was not the fact, namely, that these parties had not had a full hearing. The deputation, however, had had a full hearing from that officer of the Government with whom rested the final determination upon their case, he meant the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As their lordships, therefore, would perceive, these parties had not been left without a hearing, and their case having been determined on, he should be mocking them if he were to propose to see them now, and hear their case.

After a few words from Lord Stanley and the Earl of Dalhousie,

Lord ASHBURTON, who spoke with his back to the gallery, and was almost totally inaudible, was understood to ask whether there would be any means of ascertaining the amount consumed at home of those articles which would now be relieved from an import duty.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE said that a record was kept of all articles that passed the Custom-house, although no duty was paid upon them, and by comparing the record of imports with the record of exports, the quantity which was entered for home consumption might be easily ascertained.

The amendment of the Duke of Richmond was then put and negatived, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

HAYDON AND SIR ROBERT PEEL.

(From the Times.)

Our columns of yesterday detailed the particulars of one of those terrible catastrophes which occasionally burst upon the nation, and startled the most giddy and unheeding by a transient but fearful glimpse of the miseries that are doing their deadly work below the smooth surface of our social state. A gentleman of high talent, untiring industry, exemplary temperance, and fervent piety, has fallen by his own hand, having been unable to preserve his reason amidst the complicated embarrassments of mental trouble and intellectual toil, or under the prospect of overwhelming difficulties and imminent distress. It is impossible to peruse, without feelings of inexpressible pain, the notes which this unfortunate gentleman has left of his daily hopes and emotions, his successive struggles and disappointments, through the last months of a cheerless professional existence. With exertions and efforts of the most exhausting kind—exertions of the intellect under circumstances of harassing and distracting trouble—he had completed a laborious task, to which he looked with the natural confidence of his profession and position as promising a release from his perplexities, and a recompense for his pains. He offered to the public the first of a series of paintings on a noble and national subject, conceived, at least, with grandeur, and directed towards the highest objects of his art. When the days of trial came he saw his hopes dashed and his efforts spurned; while the patronage which would have ransomed his pencil and restored his peace, was lavished on a rival exhibition of the most puerile and offensive character. The display of a disgusting dwarf attracted hordes of gaping idiots, who poured into the yawning pockets of a Yankee showman a stream of wealth one tithe of which would have redeemed an honourable English artist from wretchedness and death. It is terrible to think, that in the London "season" of this century, in the heart of the greatest city, and under the eyes of the wealthiest people in the world, such should have been the lot of a gentleman who, if he wanted those pliant qualities which sometimes supersede both talent and merit in worldly success, had almost merit and talent enough to compensate the deficiency, and failed in no other of the requisites for competence and fame. These are the events which impel even sober-minded men towards the conviction that this condition of society should no longer exist, whatever be the cost of the change.

One circumstance connected with this melancholy transaction was disclosed at the inquest which must leave a deep impression on all who heard it. The unhappy man, as his troubles closed around him, attempted a few despairing applications to the rich and powerful of his friends. One of these appeals met with an instant reply, and secured kind commiseration and unhesitating aid. The person who thus answered a call of distress without the delay of an hour was the Prime Minister of this kingdom. From the midst of criminations and controversies, under a pressure of unexampled burdens, in the hour of peril, and in the day of defeat, Sir Robert Peel found time for an act of charity. And if this should be among the last acts of his official life, it will be more to his comfort in his chamber, that he cheered the last moments of a dying artist with the means of leaving a little legacy to his desolate family, than if he had carried all his measures over the heads of an exasperated house, and crushed his combined foes with the sweep of a conqueror into a helpless and humiliated mass.

CORONER'S INQUEST ON HAYDON.

EXTRACT FROM THE DIARY OF MR. HAYDON.

"And this Peel is the man who has no heart."

"May 21.—Worked hard at my picture, and advanced immensely. Felt uneasy because I could not give my dear son money to go and see his college friends.

"June 3.—Called on my dear friend Kemp, who advanced me some cash to get over my difficulties. By the time my pictures are finished they will be all mortgaged; but never mind so that I can get them done.

"June 13.—Picture much advanced; but my necessities are dreadful, owing to the failure of my exhibition at the Hall. In God I trust. It is hard—this struggle of 42 years duration; but Thy will and not mine be done.

"June 14.—O God! let it not be presumption in me to call for Thy blessing for my six works. Let no difficulty on earth stay their progress. Grant this week Thy divine aid. From sources invisible raise me up friends to save me from the embarrassments which want of money must bring upon me, and grant that this day week I may be able to thank Thee for my extrication.

"June 15.—Passed in great anxiety, after harassing about for several hours in the heat of 5 o'clock staring at my picture like an idiot; my brain pressed down by anxiety and the anxious looks of my family, whom I have been compelled to inform of my condition. I have raised money on all our silver to keep us from want in case of accident. I have written to Sir Robert Peel, to —, and to —, stating that I have a heavy sum to pay. I have offered 'The Duke's Study' to —. Who answered first? Tormented by D'Israeli: harassed by public business; up came the following letter:

"(Sir.—I am sorry to hear of your continued embarrassments. From a limited fund which I have at my disposal, I send, as a contribution for your relief from these embarrassments, the sum of £50.

"I remain, Sir, your obedient Servant,

"ROBERT PEEL.

"Be so good as to sign and return the accompanying receipt."

"That's Peel. Will —, —, or answer?"

"June 17.—My dearest wife wishes me to stop the whole thing and close payment, but I will not! I will finish my six pictures, by the blessing of God!

"June 18.—This morning, fearing I should be involved, I returned to a young bookseller some books for which I had not paid him. No reply from — or —! And this Peel is the man who has no heart!

"June 21.—Slept horribly, prayed in sorrow, and got up in agitation."

The next was the last entry made, evidently, immediately before the world closed upon the unhappy man; it ran thus:

"June 22.—God forgive me. Amen.

Finis.

"B. R. HAYDON.

"Stretch me no longer on this rough world."—Lear.

"The end of the 26th volume."

The reading of the above extracts having been concluded, The Coronersaid, he could not suppose that the jury would now require any further witnesses. For himself, he felt the case to be too distressing for remark. They must all agree that the deceased had committed an act of self-destruction, and the only question for the jury was the state of mind in which the unfortunate man was at the time. In leaving the case in the hands of the jury, he could not fail, however, to remark on the munificent act of Sir Robert Peel towards the unfortunate deceased. He thought it must speak to the heart of a great many thousand persons, that whilst others were so to speak, attempting to destroy his own mind, and amidst a pressure of public business almost unparalleled, Sir Robert Peel had not forgotten the sufferings of others.

The Rev. Mr. Hyman here begged permission to state that he had not yet said all that he could in reference to the generosity of the right hon. baronet. Subsequently to the deceased's death, Sir Robert, addressing one of the executors, had enclosed a check for 200*l.* from the Royal Bounty Fund, in order, as he stated in his letter, that the family might not be molested before a public appeal could be made in their behalf; the right hon. baronet added, that when that was done, of course he should be most ready to come forward so far as his private purse and personal influence were concerned.

The Coroner, after having again remarked on the munificence of the Premier, inquired whether the jury were unanimous on their verdict.

The Foreman, on behalf of himself and the rest of the panel, replied in the affirmative, and the following return was accordingly recorded:—

"We find that the deceased, Benjamin Robert Haydon, died from the effect of wounds inflicted by himself, and that the said Benjamin Robert Haydon was in an unsound state of mind when he committed the act."

The proceedings, which had lasted nearly four hours, and excited the greatest possible interest, here terminated.

Appearances indicate that the next general election will take place upon the ensuing register of voters. The residents in boroughs, to be entitled to vote, will have to pay the assessed taxes, and poor-rates, on or before the 20th July. This requirement of the Reform Act it is most important should be complied with, as no person can vote without being inserted in the register, and the safety of the present and the success of future measures will mainly depend upon the progressive party in the next House of Commons.

HERBERT'S PICTURE OF THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE.—We have been gratified by an opportunity of seeing the progress made in this historical picture. Mr. Herbert has nearly finished the portrait of Mr. Cobden, and it is the most striking likeness we have ever seen of that gentleman. The artist has not only portrayed the features, but he has caught the intellectual expression of the countenance, that undefinable combination of minute touches which at once marks and reveals character. There is a thoughtful mildness in the face which evinces conscious possession of truth, and resolution to maintain it without any intolerance of opposite opinion. Should Mr. Herbert proceed as he has begun, his production bids fair to rank as high in the annals of art as the event he commemorates does in the history of commerce.

PEDIGREE OF THE PEEL FAMILY.—We have seen a copy of a beautifully-executed genealogical tree, showing the pedigree of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel and the Peels of Lancashire, extending backwards about two centuries and a half. This curious piece of workmanship has been executed by Mr. John Davies, printer, of this town; the collection of the materials having imposed on him an amount of labour and research which only those who have trodden the same path before him can fully appreciate. Mr. Davies successfully proves that the Latin proverb, ne sutor ultra crepidam, is not always true, for the printer has in this case been a more successful tracer of pedigrees than many who have been educated in the Herald's College. His inducement to undertake the task was the letter written by the late Sir Robert Peel to Mr. John Corry, the Lancashire historian, wherein the worthy baronet, speaking of his family with all humility, says—"It is not in my power to furnish you with any particulars of much interest." The research expended by Mr. Davies may be estimated when we mention that hitherto history-men have sought eagerly, but without success, to trace the Peel pedigree. The family, consisting of four married brothers, William, John, George, and Thomas Peel, came from Craven, in Yorkshire, and settled at Hoyle-house, Blackburn, somewhere about 1600. The first baptism in the county is that of George, son of John Peel. It is probable that the family were accompanied from Yorkshire by their father, as the first burial of the name is "1608, Robert Peele." The late Sir Robert Peel was the son of Robert Peel, of Oswaldtwistle, now called "Peel Fold," whose father, William Peel, was the fourth in descent from the eldest of the family above mentioned. Mr. Davies's justification for expending the time necessary to consult so many parish records and to complete the connecting links of a family chain, in the achievement of which he had no personal object to gain, we give in his own words:—"he feels 'assured that the leisure hour of an unlettered artisan thus employed would create fewer enemies, and lead to self-gratification in having pursued pleasure unalloyed with pain.'"—Manchester Guardian.

A most remarkable circumstance occurred on board the Lindsey steamer, on her passage from Hull to Gainsborough, on Friday morning week. When she reached opposite Gunthorpe, a large swarm of bees settled on her, taking up their position near the chimney, where they remained as passengers till she reached her destination; they were then conveyed to Captain Johnson's garden, Little Church Lane, and may now be seen "gathering honey from every opening flower."—Hull Advertiser.

DESTITUTION IN IRELAND.

(From the Economist.)

Much has been said as to the exaggeration of the destitute state of Ireland, in consequence of the failure of the potato crop, but very little or no evidence has been produced to confirm the statements of the asserted abundance, or even of the ordinary plenty, in the present, compared with former years. It is asserted that Ireland borders on a state of starvation in some part or other of every year; and that sufficient of the produce of no year is retained to sustain the people till the gathering of the next crop. Unwilling to judge by bare assertions, we have looked for some unquestionable test of the real state of the case, which could not be suspected of being influenced either by a desire to make out a case for the repeal of the Corn Laws, or for reproach to a Government. Now, we take the surest test of abundance or scarcity to be the quantity of potatoes supplied at the chief markets, and the prices obtained in these markets. No one will suspect that the Irish farmers will hold back their produce from a market giving a high price, or that the buyers in those markets will consent to give a high price, merely to justify the policy of a Government.

We find that it is the practice in Cork, the chief market for potatoes in Ireland, to make a return to the magistrates of the quantity supplied on each market day, and of the prices at which they are sold. These returns are published in the Cork Southern Reporter, from which we extract the following table of the quantities and prices for the last month; and of the corresponding month of last year:

Potatoes brought to Market.		Prices of White Potatoes.
		1845.	1846.
		Loads.	Loads.
		Per Stone.	Per Stone.
May 13	90	32	41 to 44
15	51	12	34 40
16	527	215	34 40
19	43	54	3 4
21	149	76	24 4
23	26	8	3 5
25	59	45	34 4
27	40	10	34 4
29	31	7	34 4
June 1	110	24	3 4
4	111	18	24 4
6	459	153	3 4

It would be difficult to find more conclusive evidence of scarcity, and the consequent high prices to which scarcity leads, than is furnished by the above table. But it is a very unfair test to take the facts as they at present exist, bad as they are, of what would have been the condition of Ireland, had no precautions been taken by the Government. No one can deny the strong case which existed in the autumn and winter of last year for the apprehension of scarcity and famine. There was not a farmer or dealer throughout the whole of this kingdom whose personal observation and experience did not lead him to anticipate great scarcity, and there was scarcely a Government in Europe that did not feel it an incumbent duty to make unusual preparations to protect its subjects against the consequences of a general blight. Our Government followed the example of others, and not only took precautions against the immediate evil, but wisely determined to do so against the recurrence of such an evil in future, as far as human efforts could do so. How far the timely warning of the great extent of the potato rot, which was ascertained and made known to the country by the Government commissioners, has acted as an inducement to care and economy in the use of that article, and has thus contributed to a greater abundance in the later part of the season it is difficult to say, but certain it is that there is much evidence that potatoes which are usually used for the feeding of stock and for other inferior purposes have this year been preserved for human food. Moreover, how far the introduction of Indian corn and meal at a small nominal duty early in the spring, have had the effect of saving Ireland from suffering, it may be difficult precisely to measure; but the evidence of dealers connected with the provision trade in Ireland all agrees, that this article has exercised a most extraordinary check upon the rise of prices of other articles of food. Still, after all the precaution and all the care which have been used, the above table of the supply of potatoes and their prices for the last month in the largest markets of Ireland, shows that the cure has been very inadequate to the evil. Still this is the case which the Government are now charged with having exaggerated.

The truth is, that the Minister who has sagacity to foresee an evil, and who provides against it, will seldom receive much credit for doing so. Mankind never properly estimate an evil until they suffer under it. We are always ready enough with our censure, when public misfortunes occur without any provision against them; and, when provision has been successfully made to avert a threatened disaster, we are only too prone to underrate the danger which existed. In our estimation, the present Government were seriously to blame for not, at a much earlier period, taking the necessary guarantee against famine, after their experience of 1842; but they have now made such ample and unreserved reparation for former neglect, as to recommend them to the warmest gratitude, especially of the labouring population, as well in Ireland as in other parts of the country.

FUNERAL OF MR. JOHN DYSON FERNLEY.—The remains of Mr. John Dyson Fernley were interred in the family vault, Teviotdale Chapel, on Monday morning last. The interment took place about twelve o'clock, and the interest, depth of feeling, and even excitement, which prevailed among all classes of society, was most extraordinary. The funeral cortege moved from Mr. Fernley's house in Greek-street, down the Wellington-road and Heaton-lane, and almost every available inch of space was thronged by persons anxious to catch a sight of it. There were four mourning coaches in the procession, besides eight private carriages, and these were followed by friends of the deceased once connected with him either in business, or in the schools and other concerns of the Wesleyan Methodist Society, to the number of about 130. On the arrival of the procession at Teviotdale chapel, the spacious gallery was found to be nearly filled with spectators. The burial service was read by the Rev. J. Nelson, after which, the Rev. Dr. Hannah, D.D., Professor of Theology in the Wesleyan Institution, Didsbury, delivered a feeling and appropriate address, in which, while he lamented the early and sudden death of one so promising and useful, he pointed out the duty of submission to the divine will, and urged upon all, but especially upon the junior part of the assembly, the advantages of early piety, which, in the deceased, had been illustrated so strikingly, and had proved the cause of all his usefulness and success. After the interment, the immense assemblage of persons quietly dispersed.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE AND THE LEAGUE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—In an article under the above title, in your last Number, you have made a statement which I know to be incorrect, and think it sufficiently important to request you to insert this contradiction of it. In reference to the Anti-Corn-Law meeting held in Stevenson-square, Manchester, in June, 1841, and which was opposed, as you think, from corrupt motives by many of the Chartist leaders, you state, "Every Chartist leader of any notoriety was brought to Manchester from places as distant as Leicester and Sunderland." Now, in justice to the character of the Chartists of this borough, but more especially to certain individuals, to whom (from their prominent position in connection with that body in this place at that period) your statement will probably be considered to refer, I beg to assure you that no Sunderland delegate or leader was present at the meeting referred to, nor did the Chartists of this borough then, or at any other period as a body, countenance the protectionists' doctrines.

Though in principle an ardent Chartist, I am deeply sensible of the great service the leading Free Traders have rendered to the interests of industry; and I feel therefore an honest pride in subscribing myself,

A CHARTIST AND FREE TRADER.

Sunderland, June 15, 1846.

Sheffield, June 17th, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—Your remarks about Duncombe's associates aroused me, and this morning I penned the enclosed. I am prepared to prove some of it, and to swear to the whole of it. Perhaps I can prove the whole. At all events, those who know me will require no further proof than my deliberate declaration. You may do what you like with it. I think its publication would do good.—Yours faithfully,

To A. W. Paulton, Esq., Wm. IBBOTSON.
67, Fleet-st., London.

SIR,—In the first page of your last week's journal, I noticed your remarks respecting Mr. Duncombe and his associates. The fact which you repeat relative to the payment of money to the Chartist leaders, you are aware has been long known to the public, and doubtless furnishes abundant proof that at least some of the Chartist leaders were paid by Conservative landholders.

It is an old saying, that those who pay the piper ought to choose the tune, and it is fair to presume that the Chartists were prompted, instructed, and directed, by those who paid them; and that their constant efforts to create disturbance and to carry amendments at Free Trade meetings was simply done in compliance with the instructions they received from those who employed them.

Sir, it occurs to me that this is a subject of great national importance, and I think it must be so regarded by every honest man who loves his country. I therefore conclude that it is a duty which I owe to society to contribute something further on the same subject.

Some months before the Chartist agitation was commenced, a gentleman, greatly distinguished as a talented politician, who mixed with men of the highest rank amongst the Conservative class, presented himself to me with letters of introduction. Having previously read reports of this gentleman's opinions and speeches, his name was familiar to me; and whatever might be my doubts as to the correctness of his views, I could not but admire his talents, and I gladly availed myself of the opportunity thus presented to me of making his acquaintance. I had long and repeated conversations with him, and although I suspected him of being strongly Conservative, yet, as he repudiated party, and since I considered myself as a Liberal in the best sense, at his urgent request, I procured him a highly respectable and numerous meeting, which consisted of men of every shade of politics, to hear his statements.

After a familiar and lengthened intercourse, I found that he was in daily correspondence with Conservatives of the highest rank. At length he strongly urged me to adopt his views, and publicly co-operate with him. This I declined, but urged as a reason that neither my abilities nor my influence were worth his acceptance. I suggested the policy of his inducing his noble friends to adopt his peculiar views, and to devote their efforts and influence to the promotion of his object.

Mark his reply. It was this: "I would rather have the energies and influence of a respectable manufacturer, who enjoys the confidence of his neighbours, than of all the nobles in the land."

This remark was rendered emphatic by the style in which it was delivered, and was made still more striking by other remarks with which it was associated. It instantly flashed across my mind, if these are the opinions of our Tory aristocracy, most assuredly some plan will be devised, and some attempt will speedily be made, to lessen the power and influence of this class of men.

I questioned the gentleman as to the extent and prevalence of his opinion, and I found in his view at least it was universal amongst the highest ranks of society. When subsequently repeating these remarks to my contemporaries, I declared if this gentleman was correct, soon some attempt would be made to lessen our power. About this time a Tory magistrate, of great talent, but who was still more notorious for cunning and perfidy, prevailed upon some artisans, by liberal promises of reward, to get up some cases and apply to him for warrants against their employers. They did so, and when he and his man Friday heard the various cases, as was fully expected, they were all decided against the masters.

On this occasion, before leaving the bench, he made a formal speech to the men, denouncing manufacturers as the greatest tyrants in the world, and concluded by assuring the workmen they had only to bring their employers before him, and he would do them justice.

This man's speech was amply discussed in the neighbourhood, both by artisans and agricultural labourers; many of the latter were heard to say, how happy they should be to exchange the services of this kind and paternal magistrate for the services of these tyrant-manufacturers, since in that district the artisan, by less labour, got two-thirds more wages than they could obtain as agriculturists. Not many weeks after, these proceedings were reported to me by the suffering masters. I found in the newspapers the report of a speech delivered to the working classes by a man who subsequently became notorious as a Chartist leader. I was really startled to find that he adopted the very form of words, verbatim, which had been used by the magistrate before referred to; and he, in like manner, applied them to manufacturers with scarcely any variation. As the first speech had not been printed, and as the second speaker had probably no knowledge of the first, it was natural to conclude that they both derived the matter from one source, and I therefore at once concluded that my predictions were fulfilled, and that landholders, or rather the party men who represented them, had adopted this plan to lessen the power of manufacturers.

It is not necessary to notice the progress and movements of the Chartists; and I beg now to state a fact for the introduction of which the preceding remarks have been made.

A few months after the Monmouth riots, I one evening met in a neighbouring city a distinguished gentleman, whom I had previously known. He requested I would spend the evening with him. I accepted his invitation, and waited upon him at his hotel, when he introduced me to a number of honourable associates. On looking round, I perceived all the appearance of the committee of some public company. A secretary sat at a side table, which was covered with books, papers, and letters. I was scarcely seated when the chairman of the company, if I may so term him, introduced the subject of Chartism; and he astonished me beyond measure with the knowledge which he manifested of all their movements and designs. I listened with attention for hours to his statements, until he entered into details so minute, that I began to suspect some person had been practising upon his credulity. I gradually and delicately made him acquainted with my suspicions, when he seemed somewhat excited with the idea that I should doubt his authority; and, turning to his secretary, he asked for a parcel which lay on the table addressed to a noble lord. This parcel he cut open. It contained nothing but a large batch of letters, all open and neatly strung together, and probably from 1½in. to 2in. thick. He placed these letters in my hand, requesting I would read them; and then he assured me I should know from whence he received his information.

I complied and read the whole of these letters, which occupied me two hours. I found they were a regular series for weeks and months past, dated from various towns in Great Britain, bearing the names of the towns, and the postmasters of the places where it was professed they were written, and they were all signed by well-known Chartist leaders.

These letters contained reports of the proceedings of these leaders and their associates. The movements they made—the effects they produced—the writers acknowledged the receipt of money—they repeatedly urged the necessity of more being sent—they answered numerous inquiries, and solicited opinions in return. In short they were regularly employed and paid by this party.

Perhaps I need not say more, unless it be that subsequently I had substantial proof that these Chartists and the party referred to formed one party. These gentlemen also subsequently acknowledged to me that they were members of a notorious Conservative Club in London. They never informed me from whence the money was derived which kept the Chartist leaders in operation. I put one question which they did answer. Do all the men who receive money know from whence it is derived? The reply was no; only a select few know that. The other men act according to instructions, because the money comes with those instructions; but they are ignorant of the parties supplying it.

You may judge of my feelings when after this I read in the papers, from week to week, reports of the speeches made by these very men, who, though employed, instructed, and paid by Conservative landholders, were occasionally pretending to attack them with severity; but I did remark that landholders were attacked generally, while manufacturers specially. I have said sufficient to induce all classes to pin their faith to no one, but to judge for themselves. If they do follow any man, let him be a well tested and tried neighbour. If any portion of what I have stated should be questioned, I am prepared with proofs to satisfy a few men of honour.—I remain, sir, your most obt. servant,

Sheffield, June 17, 1846. Wm. IBBOTSON.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—I never was more surprised in my life than in reading in THE LEAGUE the statement that "Kent got its name from Canute the Dane," in the first letter of "One who has Whistled at the Plough." Really, Sir, I considered that every tyro in his country's etymology was aware that long prior to the era when the Romans, the most deceptive and imposing people that ever lived, planted their eagles upon its soil, Kent rejoiced in the name of Cantium. As I am writing this note on board one of the Gravesend steamers, I have not Cæsar at hand for reference. I believe his words are—The inhabitants of "Cantium," or the "Canti," are more civilised than those of the interior, on account of their connection with the Gauls. Horace, in the Augustan age, alludes to the Cantii; so also Tacitus, in his "Life of Agricola," written after the decease of Domitian.

It is, Sir, as you well know, a vexata questio how far Cæsar marched into the country. Mr. Dunkin maintains in "The Chronicles of Kent," that Cæsar misalled "the Medway" the "Thames;" and he partially founds his reasoning upon the circumstance that "Tamesis" literally translated from the Celtic gives "Tam-ys," a winding river.

The Rev. Mr. Barry asserts that Cæsar's autobiography consists entirely of garbled statements; and he most satisfactorily proves in his "Cæsar and the Britons," that the Roman general was disgracefully beaten in all three of his Kentish invasions. Geoffrey of Monmouth, in the earliest British Chronicles we have, asserts that there were three invasions; in which statement the modern antiquaries I have named coincide.

Sir William Betham, the Ulster King-at-Arms, abides in his "Gael and Cymri" with Cæsar in only enumerating two expeditions; but as his work was published some years prior to Messrs. Barry and Dunkin's labours, it is hardly fair to bring him into the arena.

As, Sir, I am treating of Kent, it may be as well to mention that the discovery of the City of Cassivelaunus or Casswallon in the woods near Crayford and Dartford within the last three years has done more to set the question at rest than pages upon pages of the massive lore which annually appears in the Archæologia would ever have done. From this happy accident it is clear that Cæsar never in any of his expeditions (be they two or three) went out of Kent; it also evidences that the Medway was the river instanced in his "Commentaries."

ARRIVAL OF SPECIE.—On Wednesday the steam-ship Victory arrived at the St. Katherine's steam-packet wharf, from St. Petersburg, with a large quantity of specie on board, amounting to nearly 200,000*l.*, packed in twelve large cases. It is consigned for a number of merchants in the city, and the greater part has already been entered.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS.—

No. LVIII. AND LAST.

TO GEORGE WILSON, ESQ.

Sir,—With whose name can I more appropriately close this series of letters than with that of the Chairman of the Anti-Corn-Law League? With you, that chairmanship has been no merely formal and honorary office. Yours has been a real presidency, both in the crowded meeting and in the Council Chamber. The public has become accustomed to a sway always efficient and never obtrusive. The densest multitudes have been hushed into stillness by the waving of your hand; and the quiet tones of your voice, while you were making statements always most lucid, or enforcing principles ever most important, have never failed of ensuring eager attention and prompt response. The still rarer aptitude for direction and organisation which induced the Council to place you at its head, can only be in any degree appreciated by those who have inspected the arrangements at the principal League Offices; and have discovered in them a perfectness of order, and a facility for dealing with the most multifarious combinations, well worthy of imitation in the bureaux of an empire. Fully to appreciate your worth in the functions you have discharged, required that familiarity with the foresight of your suggestions, the readiness of your resources, the calmness of your temper, the soundness of your judgment, and the determination of your character, to which they who have enjoyed it most bear the strongest testimony. Partaking in that general quiescence which has been deemed the fittest policy since the introduction of the Corn and Customs' Bills into Parliament, I have ceased to occupy my wonted place in this Journal, except in the letters on the approaching close of their heroic labours addressed to Richard Cobden, Esq., and John Bright, Esq.; and now that the conclusion has actually and happily arrived, I have only, as one of the millions for whom the victory has been achieved, to record, in connection with your name, a final expression of gratitude and gratulation.

The peculiar character of the agitation over which you have presided, will command the attention of future historians. It was the first of its kind; may the wisdom of the ruling classes allow it to be the last. No violence has stained its course. No party alliances have been purchased by unworthy compromises. No base tendency has been appealed to, for the exercise of intimidation, or the accession of seeming strength. The great agency has been that of instruction. The power relied upon was that of truth and justice. No prejudice has been flattered, whether of the few or the many. Zeal has been directed in channels sanctioned by morality and known to the institutions of our country. Only wise, just, and beneficent means, valuable in their immediate and incidental as well as in their direct and ultimate result, have been employed for the accomplishment of a wise, just, and beneficent end.

That end is attained. The royal sanction, noblest act of Queen Victoria's reign, is given to bills which avowedly constitute Free Trade the policy of the country. The cries of the destitute are heard and answered. The speculations and hopes of philosophers have grown into practical realities. Relieved from artificial pressure, the springs of industry will soon play freely. Labour receives the charter of its rights. Unfounded apprehensions fade away like shadows in the dawning. A great example is given to the nations. They are invited to that unrestricted interchange which makes the teeming earth, and the productiveness of human art, subservient to universal good. Free Trade, spreading over the world, will become the pledge of peace and the bond of brotherhood. Let the moral, as is its tendency, follow the material good, and earth will rejoice in the renewal of the primeval benediction.

The instruments and agencies of this change have done their work, and will pass away. The League may be dissolved; but what shall dissolve the memories of that season of anxious consultation, of harmonious co-operation, of strenuous effort, of heartfelt unity, of sincere devotedness? Or of those mighty and unprecedented gatherings, when the popular mind expanded under the growing light of knowledge, and the popular heart vowed itself to the cause of mercy and of justice?

The history of the League is a bright and affecting chapter in the philosophy of humanity. It comprises much to make us love our fellow-creatures, and reverence, in them, our common nature.

Until the new laws have thoroughly established themselves, by their tried and satisfactory operation, some danger, though I trust but slight, must remain of attempts to revert to exploded monopolies. On you, Sir, the public will rely for watchfulness. From you they will expect the signal of peril that shall call them to the rescue.

"Tho' no longer the hurricane rave o'er the deep;
The skies tho' no longer black tempests deform;
In fancied security shall we then sleep?
No! look to the pilot that weathered the storm."

Your call, should there unhappily be occasion, will be responded to by millions, through the length and breadth of the land; and the Anti-Corn-Law Agitation present itself revived in all its formidable power, to crush the faintest hopes of monopoly. But that time can be but short. An unlimited time follows, during which your name will be gratefully looked to, as it introduces the list of those who, in winning commercial freedom for their country, became the benefactors of all succeeding generations.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

THE LOTHIAN FARMERS, THEIR MEN AND THEIR BEASTS.

The tenant farmers who met in the county town of Haddingtonshire last week to speak and to act against the Game Laws, have again attracted public notice to that distinguished section of their country known as East Lothian, which they well cultivate.

My present intention is not to dwell on their speeches and resolutions; these will, perhaps, be inserted in another part of this paper; and if not, the omission will be of no great consequence, as their arguments against the preservation of game are similar to those which have frequently appeared here. But as we are now almost at the end of our Anti-Corn Law journey, within sight of the point which was once so far from us that human penetration could neither tell where it lay nor how far off; having as few days between us and the end as the League had years when the League began; having overcome all obstacles, left behind those who cried to us to halt, shaken off those who never advance but by clinging to the skirts of some other party, walked steadily away from those who ran by our sides, before and behind, and among our feet to trip us up, covered with scorn those bolder enemies of progress who stood in front, not alone as the dolers out of a nation's bread, but bullying as if they would knock the nation's teeth out should the nation seek bread elsewhere than from them; having passed all such opposition, and gathered more associates of progress from the opposition—more a thousand times told than all who now linger like idle boys throwing stones, and calling ill names to decent people, we have nothing to do but walk leisurely onward to the place of rest. All the attention now requisite is to keep a look out, which must be done to the last step of the journey. We may therefore breathe more freely, look around us more leisurely, and speak of what we see or expect to see beyond the point to which we are at present bound. The fact of the East Lothian farmers being the first farmers in the kingdom to associate together to put down the last remnant of feudal injustice—the stocking of a man's land with game for the pleasure of another man who bears none of the expense of feeding it, suggests several considerations both as to what that county has been and what it may yet be.

In the year 1750 the first turnpike bill for Scotland was an Act of Parliament obtained for repairing the post road from Dunglass on the eastern boundary of the county to Ravenshough on the western boundary. It was long after that before there was any sign of that great agricultural success since characteristic of the county; but the first element of good agriculture there as elsewhere was the formation of good roads.

On Thursday, the 18th of this present month of June, being the day previous to the meeting of farmers held to denounce the feeding of wild beasts for the sport of the landlords as a relic of barbarism, the North British Railway was opened from Edinburgh to Berwick-upon-Tweed, entering this county on the west at or near Ravenshough, and passing from it at Dunglass. This line will soon communicate with Newcastle-upon-Tyne and with all the manufacturing districts of England and the metropolis. Already, by the steamers from Leith to London, occupying forty-eight hours on the passage, mutton and beef are sent to London, fed in the Lothians and killed at Edinburgh, to compete, and to compete successfully, with the beef and mutton fed within fifty miles of the metropolis. Here we see what farming capitalists who have security in their farms can do for agriculture. With a soil fully equal to the best of the Lothian soils, and superior to the average soils in East Lothian, with a better climate, and paying less rent by at least one-third than the Lothian farmers pay, living within two or three hours' journey of the metropolis where the best markets of the world cry to be supplied, the tenant farmers of Essex, Kent, Herts, Bedford, Bucks, Berks, Surrey, and Middlesex itself have as little, many of them less, profit from their farms than the Lothian farmers four hundred miles distant, whose cattle and sheep have hitherto travelled as far to Edinburgh as the Essex cattle and sheep travel to London; have been there killed, and then sent to London five hundred miles by sea. The absence of those feudal privileges of the landlords and the enormous inventions of the farmers which weigh down the English farmers (chief of which are occupation of the farms without any security of tenure, and the legal obligation to do nothing new for the improvement of fertility), the absence of these in Lothian, and their consequent evils, make the chief difference between the profits of English and Scottish agriculture. The Lothian farmer is still, like his English brother, afflicted with the vermin which the Game Laws bind him to preserve; but he is now in motion to throw off even that remnant of feudalism. It is not improbable that when the Game Laws go down, the English farmer and the Scotch farmer will be relieved of them at the same time. But the English occupier of rumble-tumble barns and stables—here a one on the farm, there a one, few of them more than a wooden shell—and the farms overrun with waste ditches, waste land, hedge-rows which encumber many acres on each farm but perform not the uses of a fence; and legal covenants which encumber everything, and perform not in one instance the uses of a security to the man who most needs security—the cultivator of the soil—the English occupier will, if the Game Laws were abolished to-morrow, and all the game now breeding were in the pot, still be a poor farmer in any sense of the designation. Security to employ capital, and riddance of the rules of agriculture made in the legal chambers of Lincoln's Inn, will still be far from him.

On the other hand, the Lothian farmers with their secure leases, with corn rents which always bear relation to the prices of produce, with improved markets opened by improved roads, with the great meat markets of England opened to them by the new railways just made, and in progress of making, will more effectively than ever employ their science and capital to the augmentation of produce and profit. The greatest obstacle to a more rapid extension of sheep and cattle feeding, has been the distance from populous places. The market towns in the county have little trade, and not many well paid or well fed inhabitants. But the very effort to supply distant places, now that railways make it possible so to do, may improve the ability to consume at home. Take the small town of Dunbar as an instance. It is a town with little trade, and, for the present, with the appearance of less, so far as the opening of the railway will deprive it of its coach-road traffic. But it stands in the richest corner of East Lothian, where turnip-fed cattle and sheep fatten numerously and fast. Is it too much to suppose that they may yet be sold and slaughtered there, and the carcasses sent off to London, where they will arrive in sixteen hours (at intermediate English towns in a time proportionate to the distance), instead of forty-eight hours, as per Leith steamers at present? The reduction of time will completely carry the question of killing meat, against that of carrying live animals.

The town of Dunbar—and I particularise it as a specimen of many others similarly situated in districts of rich agriculture—is likely enough to be the port that will bring to the Lothian farmers ships loaded with the oats and barley, and peas and beans, and maize, which, perhaps, with flax-seed of their own growth, instead of the oil-cake they now buy, they will feed their cattle with, united to those large crops of roots which they now grow. Their land is already too valuable, and their system now on the increase of feeding more cattle and growing less corn will make it more so, to grow the inferior kinds of grain. A ready supply of these from the countries opened by the abolition of the Corn Law will greatly augment the feeding system, improve the trade of the district, enlarge the supply of the best manures, spread over thousands of more acres the culture of turnip and other root crops, make the production of good wheat more profitable, employ more people on the farms, and give the general population of the kingdom a supply of butcher's meat, which only needs to be abundant and regular to be readily paid for and consumed.

The fact of East Lothian being at present in advance of any other agricultural district of like soil and situation is not suggestive that it will linger where it is until others reach up with it. On the contrary I look upon its present superiority as the best evidence that it will advance, and advance fast. The race of agriculture is yet to come; Lothian is saddled, bridled, and ready for the race. It is on its feet, while four-fifths of all England are yet dreaming with the nightmare of the feudal ages on them, and not dreaming of what agriculture will some day reach to in England; not even dreaming of what it is already in East Lothian.

Although there are no factories nor public works in the country, save some of inconsiderable extent in the market towns, and a few collieries in the western parts of the county, the stranger on crossing the Lammermoor hills, is surprised to see on every farm a steam engine, its tall chimney, and occasionally its smoke rising above the farm buildings, and these, laid out in squares on parcellotowns, the outside of which are again surrounded with large corn-stacks, as neatly built, thatched, and finished, as if each farmer had an architect on the farm.

The late William Cobbett, in his "Northern Tour," described very well such parts of East Lothian as he saw—not so well what he did not see. He did not see the villages and churches, as they do not happen to stand by the side of that great post road, which is more modern than the villages; so he concluded that East Lothian has no villages nor churches. But he saw the turnip fields, the corn fields, the corn stacks, and the houses, or hovels, or styes, or dens, or whatever they may be called, inhabited by the farm labourers; and all these he describes as they were then, and, as with very few exceptions, they are now. He says:

"We entered into what is called East Lothian, and just at a little village called Cockburnspath, where there is the second church which I have seen since I quitted Berwick. We set into the county of Haddington, where we see the sea all along upon our right until we get to Dunbar; and such corn fields, such fields of turnips, and turnips in those fields, such stackyards, and such a total absence of dwelling houses, as never surely were before seen in any country upon earth. You very frequently see more than a hundred stacks in one yard, each containing on an average from fifteen to twenty English quarters of wheat, or of oat, all built in the neatest manner; thatched extremely well, the thatch bound down by exterior bands; spars not being in use, owing to the scarcity in wood. In some of these stacks the thrashing machine is worked by hot sea, but in the greater part by steam; and where the coal-are at a distance beyond the power of horse, in 1846 they were all worked by steam, except in a very few cases where there is a good mill of water." So that in this country, the finest land that ever was seen, all the elements seem to have been put into the admirable system of manuring the people from the bowels of the earth, in order that the great amount of the produce may go into the hands of a small number of persons, that they may squander it at London, at Paris, or at Rome. Before we got into Dunbar we found the road, which was very fine and broad, actually covered with carts, covered with men with one horse, all loaded with sacks of corn. For several miles it appeared to be a regular cavalcade of carts, each carrying about twelve English sacks of corn, and all going to Dunbar, which is a little seaport through a large town (not a very large town), apparently made for the express purpose of robbing Scotland of all its produce, and of converting it away to be squandered in scenes of dissipation, of gambling, and of every other vice tending to vitiate men and enfeeble a nation."

These last words suggest a remark. The corn carted into and sold in Dunbar was not sent out of Scotland to be squandered in scenes of dissipation and gambling. It was sold and sent out of Scotland to help to supply London with bread, where there is a very great demand for it, where working people certainly work as hard and deserve as well to be supplied with bread in return for the money they earn as any working people whatever. The farm labourers of Lothian could have kept as much wheat at home as they chose for their own use, if their wages had enabled them to pay the price paid for it by those who sent it to London; but their wages did not, and do not now, enable them to buy the wheat they want, nor any wheat, therefore they do not eat wheaten bread. The question is between wages and rent. The Lothian farmers pay low wages and high rents. If less wheat was sold and sent away from Dunbar, lower rents might be paid, but there would not be higher wages, and wheat would be still farther out of the labourers' reach, for the general markets would rise, and wheat be dearer when the supply was less. In all countries of the world where least of the produce is sold, the people are poorest. Even in East Lothian, when less was sold than now, the people were still poorer than now. Cobbett's error is that of those who despise the principles of political economy up to the present day. He thinks, and they think, that agriculture is and may be the chief interest of a nation. Now the converse of their belief is true. The more people who buy the produce of agriculture, and who earn the money to pay for it by producing something else than corn, the richer will the nation be, and the higher the price of agricultural produce.

The disproportion between rent and wages on the Lothian farms is greater than anywhere else that I know. Rent is fully three times the amount of what it was fifty-five years ago in that county, and wages are now as then; food enough to live and work upon, with the means of getting clothes enough to wear for use, but hardly for ornament. Yet both the food and the clothes have improved in quality within that time. There should be more animal food used by the farm workers; but it is no hardship to them to use oatmeal porridge, at least for breakfast. Food more wholesome and better relished than oatmeal porridge is not used anywhere.

But how are the hinds of Lothian to get better suppers than potatoes and salted herrings? Surely they should have better. And how are they to get better dinners than their barley bread and butter and milk three or four times a week, or their potatoes and "kail and flesh" two or three times a week; the "kail" being three or four gallons of liquid, with greens and barley, and about two pounds weight of salt pork boiled in the water? I say how are better dinners and suppers (save when a family can afford to use oatmeal porridge for supper as well as for breakfast) to be got? Lothian farmers pay their way; but do they not get rich? The less they pay their labourers the more they pay their landlords; and if we are to turn to the landlords to ask them to raise wages, we must, I fear, wait until we have raised in them sentiments which they do not possess—which are in fact not common to mankind. The only practicable means of augmenting wages, whether in manufactures or in agriculture, whether in well-cultivated Lothian or ill-cultivated Devonshire, is to enlarge the demand for men by extending employment. The more men we can take away from agriculture by employing them better otherwise, and the more agricultural employment created for those remaining (such as a great increase in the stall feeding of cattle will create) the better will wages be, and the more power will every one have to consume good food and pay for it.

But the houses in which the farm labourers live in Lothian are the landlord's property; and the hinds cannot live elsewhere than in those houses. But it is a misuse of the word to call them houses. Here is their description by Cobbett—literally true, every word, and rather under the truth as regards the hinds' houses on some of the best cultivated and highest rented farms in the county, where the most complete and appropriate buildings have been erected for the lodgment of the four-footed beasts of the farm which ingenuity can devise, and where the lodgment of the human beings has never cost the owner of the land a thought, beyond the thought of how human habitations may cost him the least money. Cobbett is addressing a letter to the "chopsticks of the south of England," and describing to them this famous county of East Lothian. He says:

"With the exception of about seven miles, the land is the finest I ever saw in my life; though I have seen every fine vale in every county of England and in the United States of America. I never saw any land at tenth part so good. (He, like many other strangers, who only pass through the best of the district, attributes that to native fertility of soil, which is mainly attributable to co-operation and energy.) You will know what the land is when I tell you that it is by no means uncommon for to produce seven English quarters of wheat upon one English acre, and forty tons of turnips upon one English acre; and that there are almost in every half-mile, from fifty to a hundred acres of turnips in one piece; sometimes white turnips and sometimes Swedes, all in rows, as straight as a line, and without a weed ever to be seen in any of these beautiful fields. Oh! how you would wish to be here! 'Lord! you will say to yourselves, what pretty villages there must be there!—what nice churches and churchyards! Oh! what and what precious nice old houses! Come, Jack, let us set off to Scotland. What nice gardens shall we have to our cottages there. What beautiful flowers our wives will have climbing up about the windows, and on both sides of the path leading from the wicket up to the door; and what prancing and barking pigs we shall have running out upon the common; and what a flock of geese grazing upon the green.' 'Stop, stop! I have not come to listen to you, but to make you listen to me.'"

Upon a steam engine farm there are perhaps eight or ten of these married men. There is at a considerable distance from the farm-yard a sort of barrack erected for these to live in. It is a long shed, stone walls and painted roof, and divided into a certain number of bouthies, each having a door and one little window, all the doors being on one side of the shed, and there being no back doors; and as to a privy, no such thing for them appears ever to be thought of. The ground in front of the shed is wide or narrow, according to circumstances; but quite smooth, merely a place to walk upon. Each distant bouthie is about 17 feet one way, as nearly as my eye could determine, and 15 feet the other way. There is no ceiling and no floor but the earth. In this place a man, his wife, and his family have to live. When they go into it there is nothing but the four bare walls and the tiles over their heads, and a small fire-place.

Mr. Cobbett should have added, not even a grate nor a cupboard; and as regards some of the hovels farther south in Scotland, and in Northumberland, on the princely domain of the Percys, and others not less proud if less princely, which he also described in his Tour, he might have added to the deplorable picture by stating the fact, that even the window, if glass there be, is carried from one hovel to another by the tenant hinds when they remove; the window being but a single small pane in some instances, and seldom fitting the place in which it is fixed, letting in the weather, keeping out the sun, and just allowing a bird's eye view, literally so, of such as Haggerstone House, or Alnwick Castle, whose inmates boast of having as many windows as there are days in the year. Of the hinds' sheds in East Lothian, Cobbett continues:

"To make the most of the room, they, at their own cost, erect berths like those in a barrack room, which they get up into when they go to bed; and here they are, the man and his wife, and a parcel of children, squeezed up in this miserable hole, with their meal (oatmeal store) and their washing tackle, and all their other things; and yet it is quite surprising to behold how decent the women endeavour to keep the place. These women, for I found all the men out at work, appeared to be most industrious creatures, to be extremely obliging and of good disposition, and the shame is that they are permitted to enjoy so small a portion of the fruits of all their labours, of all their cares."

This is true to the present time; for though signs of improvement in the sheds erected for the Lothian ploughmen to live in are beginning to appear, the sheds erected for cattle being long ago of the best kind, yet progress is very slow.

Mr. Hope, of Fenton Barns, though only a tenant, has improved the dwellings of his workpeople at his own expense, by building an apartment with a back door and window to each. There Cobbett's chopsticks would see pretty flowers "all a growing and a blowing."

There are also some pretty cottages in the neighbouring village of Dirlerton. Still, taking Lothian all over, the men of the farms are housed more meanly than the beasts.

Having noticed that East Lothian was the first county in Scotland to improve its roads by Acts of Parliament, and that it has since kept ahead in all its improvements; and further that it has now taken the lead in associating the farmers against the Game Laws, it is also proper to remember that it gave the League, from the pen of a farmer, the first of the prize essays, showing the injury done to tenant farmers and labourers by the Corn Laws. More of the men of capital and science who farm in that county, have declared for Free Trade, than in any other county.

And now that men of all opinions in politics meet together there to put down the Game Laws, it is pleasing to see them giving the lead to Mr. Hope, the father of the prize essayist, who is a distinguished agriculturist, who instilled into his son from childhood the errors of the system mis-called protection.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

THE STRIKE IN THE BUILDING TRADES.—As we anticipated in our last, the men are going in, and the strike is rapidly drawing to a close. In one builder's establishment, 20 have gone to work, consisting chiefly of men from Stalybridge, Ashton, and other neighbouring places, with some few of the turn-outs. Many others have applied at the same place for employment; but they have been told, what is the fact, that the full number have been engaged, and that there is no room for any more. At another establishment, where, from the commencement of the strike, there has been an obvious holding back of applicants, a number of men are to resume work to-day. The resumption of work is attended with one circumstance which distinguishes the close of all strikes:—There are more applicants for work than can possibly obtain it; as during the turn-out many strangers have been engaged, and the masters will not discharge these men in order to accommodate their former workmen, who, by exercising their undoubted right of ceasing to labour, have exposed their employers to great inconvenience and loss. In this state of the labour market, the masters are exercising their right in turn, of engaging the best workmen of those turn-outs who are now seeking employment, and declining to employ the less skilled hands,—who, as has often been observed, are usually the most strenuous advocates of trades' unions and strikes. Under these circumstances, it is clear that the turn-out here must be nearly at an end. In Liverpool, we understand the bricklayers, joiners, plasterers, and plumbers have generally resumed work at the old rates, both as to hours and wages; but the master masons of Liverpool, owing to the great demand for masonry work at public works, and to the want of co-operation on the part of the two dock companies of Liverpool and Birkenhead, have been obliged to comply with the demands of their men, both as respects increase of wages and diminution of labour. We understand that the present wages of joiners and carpenters, it has been agreed, shall not exceed 28s. in Birkenhead, 27s. in Liverpool. The hours to be 60 per week, which is the same amount as before, only differently arranged. The men commence work now at six instead of seven on Monday morning; breakfast from 8.20 to 9 A.M.; dinner, one to two; ceasing work at six; on Saturday, at four o'clock. In Birkenhead they are paying the best joiners 26s.; bricklayers chiefly 27s.; plasterers 24s. and a few 25s., and even 26s.—Since writing the above, we have seen a placard, addressed "To the master bricklayers in Manchester and Salford, journeymen not in the bricklayers' union, and others." It states that:

"A number of journeymen bricklayers having received grievous and oppressive treatment from the trades' union of journeymen bricklayers, beg to acquaint the masters of Manchester and Salford, that, in order to protect themselves from the oppressive interference of such body, they are about to establish a society unconnected with it; hoping to meet with their countenance and support."

They announce the first meeting, and trust that the parties addressed "will unite to resist the rule and oppression of the present union."—Manchester Guardian.

THE CROPS ABROAD.—Accounts from Holland and Belgium state that the rye crop is in a very precarious state in both countries, the plant having changed its colour, and ripened before the seed was properly formed. This will be a great loss to those countries where, as well as in Germany, rye bread is still generally eaten, and even preferred to wheaten bread, as it was in the north of Lancashire half a century ago. The use and growth of rye have now almost ceased in this country; but a few patches which we have seen this year are unusually luxuriant in their growth, and promise to yield abundantly. Much of the straw is upwards of six feet high. The potato crop seems to be failing this year in Portugal, Tuscany, and other parts of the south of Europe. In Portugal the weather has been unusually wet, whilst in Italy it has been unusually dry. It thus appears that either extreme is fatal to the plant. The same fact has been observed in the United States, and it strongly confirms the opinion that the sets of the plant now in use are in a weak and degenerate state, and therefore unable to resist any kind of extreme in the weather.—Liverpool Times.

AGRICULTURE.

THE MONOPOLISTS' LAST HOWL.

Probably before this meets the reader's eye, the bill, which will eventually relieve the farmer from the incubus of protection, will have become law; and farmers will do well to mark the foolish and helpless opposition offered to the measure by his self-styled friends, the political monopolists. Perhaps the most entirely absurd amendment which has been proposed is that offered by the Duke of Richmond on Friday, the 19th inst., when the Corn Bill finally went through the committee in the House of Lords. The proposal was to insert a clause—

"That in six months after the passing of this Act, the tenant shall have the power of giving to the landlord six months' notice of his intention to quit his occupation, that then arbitrators shall be agreed upon between them, and, if the arbitrators shall not agree, that then the matter shall be left to the decision of the commissioners under the Act for the inclosure of commons, who shall value the unexhausted improvement of the farm."

Now, had this clause been proposed in sober seriousness it would have betrayed great ignorance of the condition and business of farmers on the part of its proposer and supporters. But it was not seriously proposed. It was a mere sham, or, perhaps, we should say it was a puerile exhibition of effete rage on the part of the monopolists. Nevertheless it exhibits their utter ignorance of agriculture in a strong light.

First, it may be observed that in England comparatively few farmers hold leases at all; consequently the clause would be, as to them, inoperative. Then is it to be supposed that in six months after the enactment of the law, the farmer, who has embarked a large capital in his business, and who has arranged his plans for several years onward, will hastily determine to throw up his lease? Why, the real effects of Free Trade will not be known till February, 1849. Depend upon it the farmers jump to no such hasty conclusions as the monopolist landlords, who misrepresent them, would have believed. Except from peculiar causes, affecting individuals, there would be no farmers who would avail themselves of the power of surrendering their leases.

The farmers have already lost the apprehensions of Free Trade they once entertained, and are now anxious to get leases rather than give them up. They feel that new exertions and a difference of system may be necessary under Free Trade, and therefore they demand security of tenure, not so much to shield them from foreign competition as to protect them against their landlords. The Duke of Richmond says he shall offer to release his own tenants from their leases; and states that he did the same thing in 1842, but he forgot to tell the house that not a single tenant accepted the offer.

In contending for his sham clause, however, the monopolist duke made some admissions which tell rather awkwardly against the monopolists. He said:

"The tenant farmers of this country feel most strongly that this measure—which, I fear, must now pass this house—will very seriously diminish the price of their produce—and that they must naturally be anxious to be enabled to get rid of those engagements which have been entered into upon faith of Acts of Parliament—that protection should continue to be the policy of the Government of this country. My lords, it is no fault of theirs, for I must remind you, that in 1841, the farmers of this kingdom returned representatives to Parliament for the sole object, at all events for the great object, of maintaining protection to our domestic industry; and you cannot blame them, my lords, because some few of them may have been either seduced or converted. But it is surely very hard, my lords, when, after a farmer shall have entered upon a twenty or thirty years' lease of a farm when wheat was at from 50s. to 56s. a quarter, that that farmer shall, when wheat comes down to 40s. a quarter, be bound to carry on his lease. This, my lords, is very unfair."

Be it so, most sapient duke. But what say you of the fairness of those legislators who have promised the farmers prices for wheat, varying from 80s. a quarter in 1815, to 56s. in 1842, without the slightest power of performing such promises? When the law promised 80s., did not the price fall in October and November 1822, below 39s. per quarter?

How was it that the law of 1828, which was to secure to farmers at least 65s. a quarter, and induced them to enter into engagements "upon the faith of Act of Parliament" prices, left them in December, 1835, with an average price of 35s. 4d. a quarter?

So, in 1842, when the "Act of Parliament" promised 56s., the actual price was only about 44s.

Who then is to be taunted with deceiving the farmers and "consigning them to entire ruin,"—so far as the law can do so,—they who teach them to rely on such Act of Parliament promises, or the Minister, who now, though late, tells them that all such promises are vain things, idle impossibilities?

The answer is practically given by the fact that farmers are quietly preparing for the more natural and wholesome state into which their trade is about to be brought; and we believe that the coarse virulence, which the violent and feeble party, represented by the Duke of Richmond in the Lords and Lord George Bentinck in the Commons, have exhibited, arises from their consciousness that their influence over the farmers has been annihilated. That influence was based on a delusion now pretty well, and soon to be completely, seen through by those it has deceived.

ANTI-GAME-LAW MEETING.

FARMERS MUST HELP THEMSELVES.

It is difficult to conceive a law more obnoxious to the farmer than the game law, or a practice more injurious to his business than game preserving. And upon this point farmers are perfectly unanimous. They may differ on all other subjects, yet on this they will be found to agree. Game is the farmer's grievance. It is the badge of his social serfdom. It forms both an injury and an insult, and the effort by which he frees himself from this wrong will go far to emancipate him from the lingering habits of feudalism by which he is oppressed.

We have always said the farmers must stir themselves in order to obtain relief from the game nuisance; and we are right glad to find that the farmers of East Lothian have begun to move upon the subject. This is as it should be; the foremost farmers of Great Britain have taken the lead against the most intolerable evil by which agriculture is afflicted. The meeting consisted of proprietors and tenant farmers, and was called on a requisition signed by more than one hundred of the principal tenants of the district. It was held in the Court House of Haddington:

"Hugh Francis Caddell, Esq., of Cockenzie, was called to the chair. Among those present, in addition to the chairman, we observed the following:—Sir George Grant Suttie, Bart. of Balgone; John Martin, jun., Esq., Morham Bank; Provost Dodds, Haddington; Messrs. Waugh, Eweford; Johnston, Westfield; Miller, Gilchriston; Tweedie, Deuchray; Dodds, Pathend; Begbie, Queenstonbank; Burns, Bonnington; Bruce, Woughton; Hogg, Begbie; Miller, Newhouse; Hope, Fenton Barns; Shepherd, Gleghornie; Stevenson, Redside; Dodds, Nunra; Richardson, North Berwick Abbey; Mylne, Bolton; Stenhouse, Quarryford; Waterston, Balgonie Barns; Harvey, Stevenson Mains; Christie, Markle; Roughhead, Myreside; Russell, Beaunstone; Brodie, Fortune; Handyside, West Fenton; Ferme, Barney Mains; Henderson, Longniddry; Deans, Penstone; Hood, Woodhall; Howden, Traprairie; Howden, Boggs; Cuthbertson, Penkithland; Ritchie, Dunbar; Turnbull, Coulston Mains; Skirling, Luffness; Johnston, Westfield; Hepburn, Whittingham; Mylne, Luggate; Wilson, Sheriffside; Peacock, Papple; Ferme, Duncrahill; Learmouth, Fortune Bank; Todd, Castlemains; Rate, Lampockwell; Kilgour, Hoprig; Rate, Milton; Howden, Wintonhill; Henderson, Byres; Ainslie, Samuelstone; Skirling, Muirton; Pringle, Seggersdean; Bell, Townhead; Douglas, Athelstonmains; Welsh, Spott; Reid, Balloncrief; and many other tenant farmers."

The chairman, after reading the requisition, remarked that the names of the requisitionists made it plain that they were not actuated by any political opinion whatever, but simply by a desire to represent the oppressive system of the Game Laws. After observing upon the harshness of the law in general terms, he gave some particular instances:

"He might mention that of a small farmer in the centre of the Lammermoors. He had very great difficulty in bringing to maturity a crop of oats; and when he did succeed, he found that the moor game preferred his oats to the juniper berries. Well, one morning he took his gun, and killed two or three of these birds; but no sooner had he fired than a gamekeeper, who had secreted himself in the tenant's own premises, made his appearance, and gave immediate intimation to the Tax Office, when he was fined in the sum of 10l. and expenses; and all this for preserving his laboriously reared crop of oats from the ravages of these destructive birds."

Again:

"Another instance that he (Mr. Caddell) happened to have heard of happened to a tenant not far from Haddington. His crops being much destroyed by the excessive number of the rabbits, he received permission from his landlord to trap and snare them. One morning a hare got into the trap. The tenant's proceedings were watched by the gamekeeper of an adjoining property, who gave immediate information, and the result was as in the previous case; the farmer was fined in a heavy penalty. These circumstances showed the extreme harshness of the law."

And he most justly said:

"The fact was, that no sooner did the farmer take measures to frighten away the game from destroying his crops, than another description of vermin, not much better than the other—he meant gamekeepers—made their appearance; and unfortunately these individuals were too much listened to by their employers, in the misrepresentations which they not infrequently made of what actually took place."

Mr. Hope, of Fenton Barns, whose good service in the cause of Free Trade is well known to our readers, followed. He had personally no complaint about game, but knowing the "incalculable mischief" and the demoralisation caused by game, he could not remain silent. He said:

"Had this matter been merely a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, betwixt landlords and tenants, I for one would not have been here to-day; but it has other, and, to me, far more interesting bearings, and I feel that if knowing to do good, and doing it not, to me it would be sin; besides. I consider it the duty of each and all of us to use our utmost endeavour to bring all laws more and more into harmony with the noblest conceptions of the highest minds. Why, what are these Game Laws but the arbitrary selection of certain wild birds and beasts by their legislators, which they declare to be game, for there is no inherent difference in the animals selected from many of those omitted, except, perhaps, they have chosen those most ravenous and destructive to crops. They might have included rats and hedgehogs with rabbits and hares, blackbirds with blackcocks, parrots and popinjays with partridges and pheasants, for all might have been 'tabooed' with equal justice."

Game are now styled property by preservers. But are they so till caught?

"Are they not bred on one estate, and too frequently fed on another? If they stray, can you go after them and bring them back? Are you liable in damages for not keeping them at home? Nothing of the kind. Oh; but they are the property of the person whose land they chance to be on for the time. What! they are your's just now; they fly over the hedge, or hop across the road, then they are another's, and thus our poor partridge may have belonged to some score of people during one forenoon (loud applause). Curious property!—very different from sheep or pigs, or barn-door fowls. If wild animals really are yours, put your brand on them—keep them at home, do not let them roam the country at large (hear, hear). But it is utterly ridiculous to expect that ordinary people ever look upon game as property in the usual acceptation of the word."

It was only a few years ago that game was legally made saleable, though it might before have been bought in every poulterer's shop.

And he added:

"What, I wonder, was the opinion of our legislators then, regarding this sort of property, which you durst neither buy nor sell, without being liable to penalties? Did the community at large view game as property, would bands of armed men sally forth at night to attack the well-guarded preserve in preference to the unprotected sheep fold, or the almost open hen-roost? It is a crying evil for which our legislators are seriously responsible, this attempt to confound right and wrong. They have no title to expect any law whatever to be respected, unless it carries on its forehead the broad impress of truth and justice, and which the law under consideration certainly does not."

Mr. Hope thus referred to a case which happened to one of his own men:

"I may tell you of a case which makes me indignant whenever I think of it. One of my men was prosecuted some years ago, for firing at a rabbit with a ball, when on his way to Linton to shoot for an eight-day clock on that high festival, Auld Hansel Monday. It was on a farm where his father resided; and not that he hit the vermin—he scarcely frightened it—for he had never fired a gun half a dozen times in his life, and I do not suppose he has touched one since, yet it cost him one-twelfth part of his year's earnings, which, to a working man on 10s. a-week, and with a wife and four children depending on him for bread, is no joke."

The tenants are not unwilling to keep a moderate stock of game:

"I am certain that it would be far better for them, as well as the whole community, were a tenant enabled to show his gratitude to a landlord fond of field sports, by voluntarily preserving for him a moderate head of game, as I am sure every tenant in the room would be happy to do, in place of being grateful, as some are at present, that they are not wholly eaten up. A friend has assigned that as a reason to me for not joining us to-day. He quite approved of our meeting; but if his laird chose to increase the game a little more, he asked what would become of him. I rejoice that we have cast the stone into the still lake; the circling wave of truth will extend, and be ever succeeded by another and another, until justice, love, and mercy take in the whole expanse."

Mr. Roughhead said:

"We assemble here in a constitutional manner to give expression to our sentiments regarding one of the most obnoxious laws that was ever placed upon the statute book of a free country. I oppose the Game Laws because they are oppressive and unjust in their principle, and in their spirit tyrannical, and have ever been a great bane to agriculture, and it is full time in this enlightened age that such a thorn were extracted from her side (hear, hear). I oppose the Game Laws because they are injurious to the interest of the landed proprietor. In many cases they have been the means of preventing agricultural improvements going forward, of keeping up a bad feeling, and causing much discontent to exist between the landlord and tenant, and preventing that harmony and co-operative spirit that ought ever to subsist between those contracting parties."

He thus referred to the position of the game-ridden farmer:

"I can conceive no case of hardship equal to that of the tenant farmer paying a high rent for his lands, spending his capital—wasting his time and talents in order to produce an abundant crop; and, at the very time when he expects to be paid for his toil, to see his fields run over with useless vermin, of game against whose ravages he is not entitled by law to protect himself; nor when he has sustained the injury, to demand damages against the landlord who claims a right of property in the game. But the hardship of the tenant farmer has of late in many cases been made doubly hard by some proprietors preserving the game upon their estates, not as it was intended by the legislature when the Game Act was passed into a law, for affording the proprietor a fair day's sport, but in order to have the poulterers' shops well supplied; in fact, forcibly laying hold of the capital of their tenants, and justifying their proceedings under the shade of unjust and ill-defined Acts of Parliament."

The damage by game is enormous:

"I shall be bold enough to state in this meeting, where I can be so easily contradicted, that, throwing the amount of damage done by game to the crops of grass, turnips, oats, and barley, entirely upon the wheat crop, upon the average it is not under 10s. per acre. Now, if it is allowed that the average produce of that crop is seven bolls per acre, certainly the Game Laws puts a direct tax upon the staff of life to the extent of from one-fourth to three-eighths of a penny upon each four pound loaf that is consumed (applause). And for what is the people of this country so taxed? Certainly not for the preservation of life or property, or for any advantage to science, art, or education, but to give to a mere fraction of the population a most unchristian and barbarous amusement."

He thus vindicates the labourers from the imputations of game preservers:

"I have heard it objected against our proceedings that the tenant farmers will be in a worse position if the Game Laws were repealed, by having their fences destroyed and their flocks disturbed by every idle trades' lad in pursuit of sport; but did it never occur to those who have raised this objection that the Legislature could alter the law of trespass, and make it a criminal in place of a civil offence? But should the right of game be thrown open to all, I fear no loss. I form too high an opinion of the labouring class to think that for the mere purpose of procuring a good day's sport they will wantonly destroy the property of their neighbour (hear, hear). Yes; I have yet to learn that because a man is poor he is an inferior animal. I have also yet to know that because a man is poor he cannot possess proper feelings of honour."

And he addressed this argument to the protectionists:

"I regret to see so few landed proprietors attending this meeting. I must say that I think it inconsistent in the protectionist party not to give us their aid; for if they are anxious to protect native industry from the importation of foreign corn, they ought to consider it as great an evil to have native industry destroyed or weakened by the operation of the Corn Laws."

Sir George G. Suttie opposed the resolution on the ground that to abolish the Game Laws would be a confiscation of the property of the landlords, and that game would become common property; and he thought the resolution should be confined to hares and rabbits. Mr. Stevenson referred to the returns on this subject, which cannot be brought too often before the public. He said:

"I will refer you to the returns moved for by Mr. Mainwaring and Mr. Bright. The one is for the number of inquests and verdicts of the juries; the other is for the number of persons convicted for offences against the Game Laws. I consider these to be the most melancholy documents ever submitted to this country. From these I find that the number of deaths of gamekeepers was 42, from the year 1833 up to 2d April, 1844. The number of convictions at the assizes for the year 1833 was 152; at the quarter sessions 4877, making a total of 4929. Here you have something like 4529 persons made criminals annually for game. Are the people of Great Britain sensible that they have a budget to pay, with a frightful regularity, of fines, prisons, banishments, and murders, and all to protect them? Is this not a question that every one must have an interest in—the question of the expenses of convictions, of building jails, and the keeping and maintaining these prisoners, irrespective of the expenses of those who had been banished? Is this only a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence? There is, however, another question of a more serious nature, namely, that of engendering crime."

After commenting on some of the statements in Mr. Grantley Berkeley's pamphlet, he spoke of the necessity of total abolition:

"If game could be made property, and if you could identify them when they went astray, and prove them to be the property of a particular person or spot of ground, this might be all very well; but seeing this is impossible, what is the next best course to adopt? Say, to secure to the tenant an equal right with the landlord to kill game. Now, this is at present quite in your power, for don't take land except under such conditions, and you require only to make your bargain accordingly. But observe, although the laws were altered to the extent of giving you an interest in the game, proprietors would at once state, as they do at present, 'There is my form of lease, and I will part with my property under no other condition.' I need not remind you that there have been hitherto no lack of tenants willing to take land upon almost any terms. The following are specimens of leases lately granted containing clauses in reference to the preservation of game: 'The said noble earl binds and obliges himself to use all due means for keeping down and destroying rabbits on the lands hereby let, and otherwise preventing the crops growing thereon being injured and consumed by rabbits, it being hereby specially provided and declared that the said tenant and his forebears shall not be at liberty to kill or otherwise destroy rabbits or any game; and except what damage may arise from an undue fulfilment by the said noble earl of the foresaid obligation undertaken by him, he the said TENANT RENOUNCES ALL RIGHT OF DAMAGES FROM GAME OF EVERY SORT OR KIND.' Here is another copy of a lease: '1st, If said tenant keeps a dog, he must be tied up. 2d, If said tenant has a gun, he is bound by his lease not to put ball into it. 3d, His lordship's gamekeeper has a right to examine said gun at his pleasure.' After denouncing this treatment of the tenant, Mr. Stevenson said—I was rather struck with the observations of a factor upon this same agitation; he stated to me that I was wrong in stirring in the matter, for that there never was yet an alteration in the Game Laws which did not make them more stringent. Mr. Stevenson, in conclusion, called upon the meeting to beware of agitating merely for tenants' right to the game stopping short of total abolition of the Game Laws. It was only by doing that that they would obtain the support of the rest of the community. It required only public attention to be directed to the subject till the majority of the people would demand the total abolition of the Game Laws."

Mr. Sheppard referred to the reluctance with which farmers had moved in the matter:

"Indeed, although throughout Scotland and England the suffering to the farmers from this source has been so cruel, and so long, if I mistake not, this is the first public meeting of farmers that ever was convened on this subject. There is no class of men in any other department of business that would have suffered in silence so long. Not that I would infer from this that we possess any patient merit—if merit it be—beyond other classes. I only mention it to show with what timid reluctance we ever venture on any political measure that may be offensive to our landlords."

The preservation of game is inconsistent with modern husbandry:

"The landlords proclaim every day that all this is at an end—that your connection and holding with them is of a purely commercial character (hear)—that long continuance upon their grounds, though a long life has been spent there, though the landlord has never lost by you, is matter of no account, and there is to be nothing founded on this circumstance—and that when the expiry of your lease shall come, this is a matter of no moment whatever—and that if a stranger from the other end of the island shall offer a shilling an acre more than you, that stranger shall have the farm (hear, hear, and applause). Now, I am far from presuming to object to this. No one will deny the perfect right of the landlords to do this. I do not even say that they are wrong in doing this—in insisting that their whole connection with their tenants shall be of a purely commercial character. But what we would presume to insist on here is, that if the connection is to be a commercial one, it shall be worthy of the name—it shall be one in good faith—that it shall not be infringed indefinitely by the one party without the possibility of recompense to the other. We think that, through the instrumentality of those enactments which we are met here to-day to protest against, that the rights of the tenants are frequently, and to a most serious extent, infringed upon. It is a fact that they have been ruinously infringed upon by the Game Laws. It is a fact that, throughout the country generally, there has been sore and galling annoyance, and loss, and wide ruin inflicted through game—for which no recompense is allowed, and the damages caused by which can never be properly valued, even if it were allowed (hear, hear). It is notoriously the fact, that there has been manifested no proper anxiety by the landlords generally to prevent the tenants' suffering from this cause, but rather the contrary. For if a tenant complains of excess of game (and you are all aware with what unwillingness he ventures to do this, and how much he will submit to rather than run the risk of displeasure in consequence); but if he does so complain, you all know there is but little readiness to inquire into the case, for the honourable purpose of redressing the grievance (hear). But, on the other hand, if a tenant has been reported against by a gamekeeper for interfering with the game, how instant and angry a measure will find its way to the tenant."

Landlords and tenants do not stand on equal terms:

"The landlord is guarded at all points by law against the machinations of his tenant; but the tenant is not guarded by law against the abusive exercise of his privileges by the landlord. In regard to this matter of game in particular, the tenantry are left wholly in the power of every thoughtless heir who may be cast up to rule over them. It is astonishing that the landlords choose to have an imputation of this sort resting on them—that they will for a moment submit to the dishonourable allegation of soring their vermin upon their disabled tenantry."

The damage by game can't be fully ascertained:

"You hear people talking of valuing the damage caused by game. The injury so caused can never be properly valued. Such valuation at the best is no other than a vague guess, even if we were allowed to get remuneration in this way. And if tenants were all in a condition to insist strictly on their rights, this process of estimating damages would have to be renewed every season, and probably more than once in a season; but it is a fact that the Court of Session has never yet granted recompense for injury caused by game; and if they did, it is absurd to think that the tenants are to be for ever fighting with the landlords in this way. In the vast majority of cases, they are unable or afraid to do so. Rather than risk disputes of this fatal nature, we all know what withering injury will be submitted to by the weaker party. They never can, and they never will, fight with their landlords in this manner. There is no remedy but repeal. It is undoubtedly for the good of all parties, and the peace and profit of all parties, of the landlord as well as of the tenant, that these vindictive enactments should be utterly and for ever repealed (applause). We have heard the statement of Sir George Grant Suttie, that the repeal of the Game Laws would be equal to a confiscation of property. I deny that, in point of fact, game is private property at all (applause). Every one knows, although not in their leases, that game is public property; and therefore cannot be confiscated. But, says Sir George, unless you are prepared to substitute something for these laws, you ought not to go the length of proposing their repeal. Sir George, in making this statement, overlooks the important fact that these laws, from their very nature, do not require any substitute at all; and why? Because they are an unmitigated evil (hear). I am confident that the majority of this meeting do not think that they require any substitute whatever."

And he added:

"The only case resembling injury from their repeal is that of the proprietors of highland districts, whose income from leasing the right of shooting is often as great as from farming the land. But his rights and whole interests could be as well guarded by means of the law of trespass as by means of the Game Laws."

What are the means used for getting rid of the Game Laws? Mr. Sheppard says:

"These means are of two kinds. We may content ourselves simply with petitioning, or we may in addition to this, in our respective districts, use what influence we can in the event of elections to Parliament, to obtain the return of candidates whose sentiments harmonise with our own, and this last is the mode especially recommended in the resolution. But the question is, when shall we get a representative who shall subscribe to these terms?"

But it is said that if you demand such a strict pledge on the Game Laws, no fitting member of the aristocratic body will so far violate fashion as to submit to come forward on such terms. I am not of this opinion. But if it shall so turn out that, while they are ready to pledge themselves to any amount to the parties who are in the possession of power and patronage in London, they shall nevertheless scorn to acquiesce in so moderate—I submit so reasonable—a request on the part of their constituents, as that which we now presume to insist on, they certainly do not deserve either the name or the situation of representatives at all. And, perhaps, by far the best thing that could happen to stamp with effect the resolution to which this meeting has now come, would be that of our using the freedom of selecting one of our own class, on whose hearty and faithful advocacy of this and other good measures we could securely rely. He would, indeed, be the first member of our class that ever entered St. Stephens. I say, perhaps, by far the best way of producing a strong moral effect in the country on this question, would be to have to resort to the novel and heretofore unheard-of impudence of selecting for the important county of East Lothian a farmer for once to be its representative in Parliament till this question shall be disposed of. But whoever should be selected, let us at all events show to the country that we are in earnest in this matter, by making choice of no one whose opinions on this subject are in the smallest degree doubtful (hear, hear). In reference to the class called gamekeepers, who have been so often alluded to, there was an expression used by the late Sir John Dalrymple, of North Berwick, which deserves to be quoted on this occasion. Sir John said that he did not know what use gamekeepers were for an estate, except to breed, not game, but mischief, between landlord and his tenant (applause)."

The Game Laws can't be modified:

"Although this is the first meeting of farmers that I suppose was ever assembled in Scotland for such a purpose—and though a few anonymous and stray appeals in the public prints, and now and then a poorly signed petition to Parliament, are the only forms in which our complaints have yet been put before the public, there is perhaps no question, nevertheless, on which the public mind is more fully matured and ripened than on this, as to what should be done with the Game Laws. It is no longer a question with other classes of the community, any more than it is with us, as to what should be done with them. Modify them! Why not modify them? What modified good have they done? They have worn down the farmer. They have demoralised the labourer. They have wrought no good. They have produced nothing but distress, and dissension, and crime, and misery. And why should we modify them? And in the public mind, as I have said, this question is already disposed of;—repeal—instant repeal—without any mistake."

This is a good beginning; and we trust this example will be followed in every county in Great Britain.

The farmers must resolve to vote at the next election against every man who preserves game, and who will not pledge himself to a total repeal of the Game Laws.

We deem this question so important to the farmer, that, notwithstanding the length of our extracts, we reprint the resolutions. Let others adopt them:

"I. That it is the opinion of this meeting that the Game Laws are unjust in principle—cruel and oppressive in their penalties—and that their whole working is fraught with great moral and social evil to the community.

"The resolution being put to the meeting, was unanimously adopted—Sir Geo. Grant Suttie dissenting.

"II. That a greater bane to agriculture than those laws can scarcely be conceived, as by their means the landlord retains power to consume and destroy the crops on the lands which he lets for arable husbandry. Thus they have ever been, and must continue to be, the source of dissensions and unkind feeling betwixt landlord and tenant—depriving the latter of every motive for exertion, and too frequently even of the means of improving his farm.

"III. That these laws being iniquitous in principle, and tyrannical in operation, it is hopeless to attempt their amendment. It is the opinion of this meeting, therefore, that they should be utterly abolished.

"IV. That in order to carry into practical operation the above resolutions, this meeting determines to use its influence to obtain the return of Parliamentary candidates whose sentiments harmonise with their own on this most important question. It further resolves to form an association to receive subscriptions, and to use such other means as shall be deemed proper for effecting the repeal of those injurious enactments.

"The meeting then named the following committee, for the purpose of carrying these resolutions into effect, viz.:—Mr. Cadell, of Cockenzie; Messrs. Miller, Newhouse; Harvey, Stevenson; Watterston, Balgobarns; Hope, Fentonbarns; Ronghead, Myreside; Henderson, Longmiddy; Myle, Bolton; Stevenson, Redside; Shepherd, Glegborne; and Ainslie, Samuelston; with power to add to their number—five a quorum. Mr. Cadell, convener.

"The meeting direct these resolutions to be published in the Edinburgh Courier, Scotsman, Witness, and North British Advertiser, and Mark Lane Express.

"Upon the motion of Mr. Watterston, Balgobarns, the cordial thanks of the meeting were voted to Mr. Cadell for his conduct in the chair. H. FRAS. CADELL, P.S.

"The committee appointed Mr. Alexander Matheson, writer, Haddington, their secretary and treasurer, with power to receive subscriptions."

IMPORTATION OF GOLD FROM RUSSIA.—The Victory steam ship, William Pedder, commander, belonging to the London and St. Petersburg Steam-ship Company arrived in the river on Wednesday last, from St. Petersburg, after an unprecedented passage of seven days and a few hours, including the usual detention at Copenhagen in clearing the Sound. She brings with her, besides a general cargo and 20 passengers, 380,000l. in gold coin and bars, exceeding by 100,000l. the quantity imported last month by the Company's vessel the Maguet.

CONDITION OF THE PEASANTRY IN DORSETSHIRE.

(From the Correspondent of the Times.)

In pursuance of the duty assigned me, I shall to-day lay before you the result of my inquiries in Stourpaine, a parish about two miles distant from Blandford, and forming part of the district to which the public attention has been drawn.

The first feature which attracts the attention of a stranger on entering the village, is the total want of cleanliness which pervades it. A stream, composed of the matter which constantly escapes from pigsties and other receptacles of filth, meanders down each street, being here and there collected into standing pools, which lie festering and rotting in the sun, so as to create wonder that the place is not the continual abode of pestilence—indeed the worst malignant fevers have raged here at different times. It may be sufficient to add for the present that the inside of the cottages in every respect corresponds with the external appearance of the place. I will, however, come to the consideration of that point hereafter.

As the subject of "grist" will form a prominent feature in this letter, it is necessary that I should give an explanation of the term. "Grist," or "tailings" as it is usually called in other counties, is that portion of the wheat which remains after the best, which is designed for the market, has been separated from the mass. It then undergoes a second separation, and the dirt and useless stuff is removed. It is the custom in several parts of the county for the farmer to allow his labourer to take a bushel of this article as often as his wants require it, at 1s. below the market price of the best wheat. This is one of the "advantages," as it is termed, of the labourer, and I am ready to admit that when conducted on fair principles, it may deserve the name. My researches in Stourpaine have, however, taught me that in that village at least, so far from "grist" being an advantage to the labourer, he pays for it a sum equal to, if not exceeding, the price of the best wheat, and in support of this assertion I will now enter into an examination of the "grist" system as practised in this parish.

As the wages in this place, in very few instances, exceed 7s. per week, it may readily be seen that under such circumstances the labourer is often without food or money. What is to be done? He cannot allow his wife and children to starve. The shopkeeper will not trust him. In such a place the shopkeeper himself is generally a needy man, and his customer has 7s. a week and a family. He takes the only course open to him. He goes to his master, and, as the phrase is, "gets a grist," the price of which is generally 7s. a bushel, which is stopped from his wages on the ensuing Saturday. In some few instances I have found the price to be 6s. 6d. per bushel. Thus it will be seen that in most cases the whole amount of his wages is at the end of the week withheld in payment for his bushel of "grist."

I have before me a weekly return of the price of the best wheat in Blandford market for the last two years, ending Lady-day, 1846, by which it appears that in 1844 the average price of a bushel of wheat was 5s. 11½d., and in 1845, 6s. 7d. Thus it is clear that the labourer, pressed by want and necessity, of which the farmer takes an undue and dishonest advantage, pays for this second or third-rate article a sum exceeding the average price of the best corn during the last two years. So much for the price of "grist;" the quality now demands attention.

A few days since I had a conversation with a miller who resides and carries on his trade near the place, and to whom the labourer is in the habit of bringing his "grist" to be ground. I will give you his description of it, as nearly as I can recollect, in his own words:

"Some of the stuff they bring is very bad; I do not think it is worth 3s. a bushel. I don't much like having anything to do with it, for I am obliged to keep a separate pair of stones to grind it. If it is ground by the same stones that I use for the finer sort of wheat, it fouls the better sort and spoils it."

With this remark of the miller's I close my observation for the present on "grist" and its "advantages."

Although it must be apparent to every one how dreadfully insufficient the usual amount of wages in these parts must be for the support of a labouring family, the following extract from Mr. Austin's "Report on the Counties of Wilts, Dorset, Devon, and Somerset" (p. 59), will perhaps render that clearer which was but too obvious before. A gentleman of Wiltshire (his remarks will apply equally well to this county), in his examination, says:

"The wages are certainly insufficient. Even when there are only two children it requires good management to keep them decently out of 8s. a week. Take any standard of comparison, and it will show the insufficiency. Perhaps the fairest is the cost of the paupers' food in the Union workhouses, where the articles are such as usually form the poor man's food at home—bacon, bread, and potatoes, without beer or other luxuries, and where the quantity is supposed to be absolutely necessary to keep the inmates in health. If the labourer has not so much food as the pauper, he ought to have. In our Union the cost of each individual, taking the average of men, women, and children, is 1s. 6d. for food only; and buying by tender and in large quantities, we buy at least 10 per cent. cheaper than the labouring man can. But without considering this advantage, apply the scale to the poor man's family. A man, his wife, and two children will require, if properly fed, 6s. weekly, then rent, at least 1s., and fuel will very nearly swallow up the remainder. But there are yet many things to provide—soap, candles, clothes, and shoes. Shoes to a poor man are a serious expense, as he must have them strong, costing about 12s. a pair, and he will need at least one pair in the year. When I reckon up these things in detail, I am always more and more astonished how the labourer contrives to live at all."

Another witness says:

"I never could make out how they live with their present earnings, after examining accurately the accounts of their necessary weekly expenditure, and trying to compare it with their weekly earnings, in all cases that I have tried their expense seems to exceed their earnings. This problem several of us have tried, but without success."

In the above extracts a man is supposed to be earning 8s. a week, which is to support a family of two children. In Stourpaine unfortunately the families are generally much larger, and the rate of wages a shilling a week lower. The conclusion which, therefore, must necessarily be drawn is, that during a part of the week at least the labourer must be starving. A labourer's wife, in the course of my progress through the village, told me she had eaten nothing since the previous morning. It was about 11 A.M. when she gave me the information.

Another fruitful source of misery, as well as immorality, is the great inadequacy of the number and size of the houses to the number of the population, and the consequently crowded state of their habitations, which in Dorsetshire generally, and in Stourpaine particularly, afford the most limited accommodation. It is by no means an uncommon thing for the whole family to sleep in the same room, without the slightest regard to age or sex, and without a curtain or the slightest attempt at separation between the beds. In one instance which came under my notice, a family, consisting of nine persons, occupied three beds in the same bedroom, which was the only one the house afforded. The eldest daughter is 23 years of age, the eldest son 21. I am enabled to give you the dimensions of the room into which these nine persons are nightly crammed. It is 10 feet square, not reckoning two small recesses by the sides of the chimney, about 18 inches deep. In some few instances, when circumstances admitted of it, I have seen most ingenious and laudable attempts to effect a barrier between the sexes, but in general there does not appear to exist any anxiety on the subject; and indeed in most instances the size and form of the rooms, and the number of beds required for the accommodation of the family, render all such attempts futile. It will be easily imagined that the nightly and promiscuous herding together of young people of both sexes is productive of the most demoralising effects, and it is no matter of wonder that there are more illegitimate children in Stourpaine than in any village of equal size in the Union of Blandford. In case of a death occurring in a family, should there be but one bedroom, which, I think, generally the case, the inmates of the house are compelled to pass their nights in the same room with the corpse until the time of burial. A gentleman informed me that he once inquired whether, in such cases, there was not much difficulty in reconciling the children to such an arrangement. The answer he received, from the deep tone of philosophy which pervades it, is particularly deserving of attention:

"Why, sir, in such cases we let the children get dead asleep before we take them to bed, and in the morning we pull them out of bed and hurry them down stairs before they are properly awake. It is worse for the grown folks than for them."

The rent of these hovels vary, with few exceptions, from 1s. a week up to 3l. and even 4l. per annum; but it should here be stated, that the rent of all cottages belonging to the chief landed proprietor have lately been considerably reduced.

It may be useful to give a few examples of the miserable and degraded state in which the inhabitants of this village pass their lives. I should premise that every case came under my own personal observation, and that I generally obtained my information from the labourer's wife, but sometimes from himself.

Silas Upward.—Has 7s. a week, out of which house rent takes a shilling weekly. There are seven in family. This man's house was a miracle of littleness. John Allen.—Has eight in family; wages 7s. a week; house-rent, 3l. per annum. William Hew.—Has six children, all under 14 years of age; wages, 8s. a week; rent, 3l.; one bedroom, in which all the family sleep; pays 7s. for grist. Robert Hayter.—Wages, 7s.; gives 7s. for grist; has four children living, and has buried five; rent, 1l. 5s. a year. George Ball.—Has six children under 12 years of age; wages, 7s. a week; pays 7s. for grist; one bedroom. James Ainsworth.—Pays 4l. rent; wages, 7s.; has six in family; the eldest girl is 15 years of age, and the eldest boy 14; all these sleep in one room; pays 6s. 9d. for grist. —Jeans.—Has 11 in family; two bedrooms in the house; in the first the husband, wife, and six daughters sleep; the eldest daughter will soon be 20; in the smaller room three boys occupy the same bed, the eldest of whom is 19, the next 16, and the youngest 7 years of age; wages, 8s.; rent, 2l. William Jeans.—Family consists of seven persons; there is one bedroom, which contains three beds, in one of which the husband and wife sleep; the second is occupied by three boys, the eldest of whom is 15; and the third by two girls, of the respective ages of 19 and 16; pays 2l. rent; wages, 7s.

These are a few of the numerous examples I am enabled to produce, but I think these are amply sufficient to illustrate the horrible mode of existence which prevails here. I could also produce instances of the most frightful depravity which it is evident must be the inevitable consequence of this disgusting and indiscriminate herding together of so many persons of both sexes into one common and confined sleeping apartment, but I prefer suppressing them, more especially as they may be easily imagined. The want of proper ventilation in these houses must be to the last degree detrimental to the health of the inhabitants; the atmosphere, especially of the sleeping apartments, to an unpractised nose is almost unsupportable. It is perhaps worthy of remark that dishes, plates, and other articles of crockery, seem almost unknown; there is, however, the less need for them, as grist bread forms the principal, and I believe only kind of food which falls to the labourer's lot. In no single instance did I observe meat of any kind during my progress through the parish. The furniture is such as may be expected from the description I have given of the place—a rickety table and two or three four-legged chairs generally forming the extent of the upholstery. Want, famine, and misery are the features of the village, and yet I am credibly informed that the peasant of the Vale of Blackmore and the western parts of the county is as hungry, emaciated, and squalid a being as the denizen of Stourpaine.

From the picture of a Dorsetshire parish, it may be readily gathered that apathy and indifference on the part of the landed proprietor, and the grasping and closefisted policy of the farmer, are the causes of the prevailing distress. The default of one is apparent in his neglect to provide proper habitations in which the labourer may bring up his family in comfort and decency. In no county, notwithstanding the universal increase of population, is the want of new cottages so apparent, and the neglect of the landlord, in this point at least, so conspicuous. The latter, in withholding from the man who serves him a just and reasonable reward for his services, is acting neither wisely nor honourably. Both seem to have forgotten, or at least to have shut their eyes to the undoubted fact, that one of the surest methods of consulting the public advantage is to secure to the lower class comfort and competence.

DUBLIN, JUNE 21.—THE HARVEST—POTATO DISEASE.—Further accounts have been received, of the extension of the disease amongst the early kinds of potatoes, which had entirely escaped the pestilence last year. The disease has appeared, in the most unequivocal manner, in the vicinity of Dublin. At Roebuck, two miles from this city, is a field of potatoes, a portion being sown with early bangors, of the kidney kind. The steward of the owner had previously reported the breaking out of disease amongst this description. The leaves were quite withered, and vegetation seemed entirely destroyed. On digging out, the disease was quite manifest, a brownish spot appeared on the side of the tuber, and on cutting it, the interior, down to the heart, was corroded by the disease. The blight commenced at the end of the side, and has been moving upwards. These potatoes were sown from excellent and perfectly sound seed.

REVIEW.

The Philosophy of Magic Prodiges and apparent Miracles. By A. T. Thomson, M.D. London: Bentley.

This very interesting work is taken from the French of Eusebe Salverte, but with so many alterations, both of omission and addition, that it has fair pretensions to originality. Salverte's theory is that the prodigies recorded as miracles by ancient writers may be generally received as facts, and that they may be explained by supposing that the priests and magicians were in possession of a scientific secret which enabled them to produce phenomena that to the uninitiated passed for miracles. Let us take a pretty notorious instance.

"It is often related in ancient history, that distinct words have been uttered by a child at the moment of its birth; that trees' also and statues have spoken; and that sounds have been spontaneously uttered in the sombre gloom of a temple. The phenomena of ventriloquism affords a satisfactory explanation for many of these stories, but not for all of them. It is, therefore, more natural to admit that these sounds, the origin of which is not perceptible, are the effects of art; and to attribute these to the invention of the Androides, which, although, in our own times, explained in well-known works, yet has, under the name of the Invisible Girl, excited the admiration of the vulgar, and even of those who are unwilling to class themselves among the ignorant. Questions are addressed, in a low tone, to a doll, or a head made of card-board or of metal, or even to a glass-box; in a short time replies are heard which appear to proceed from the inanimate object. Acoustics teach us the methods which enable a person, at some distance, to hear and to be heard as distinctly as if he occupied the place whence the doll apparently speaks. It is not at all a modern invention; for more than two centuries have elapsed since Porta explained the principles of this invention in his Natural Magic; but, in more ancient times, its principles were kept secret and only the wonders performed by it presented for the admiration of the multitude.

"Towards the end of the fourteenth century, a speaking head, made of earthenware, excited in England the astonishment of the curious. The one made by Albertus Magnus, in the thirteenth century, was of the same material. Gerbert, who under the name of Sylvester the Second, occupied the papal throne from the years 999 to 1003, constructed a brazen head possessing a similar property. This masterpiece of art was the cause of his being accused of magic; perhaps the accusation was not unfounded, if they applied the same meaning to the word as we do; it was the result of science concealed from the knowledge of the common people."

Salverte assigns very strong reasons for believing that the ancients were acquainted with the practice of distillation, and that ardent spirits were employed in the mysteries of these temples. On this point, Dr. Thomson makes some acute remarks, which deserve to be extracted:

"In the opinion of the Editor, the reasoning of our author as to the introduction of the art of distillation into Asia Minor, Etruria, and Greece, from Hindostan, is by no means necessary in order to account for the knowledge of ardent spirits by the priesthood, and, their employment in some of the mysteries of the temples. It is a well known fact, that there is no variety of the human race, of however low a grade, that has not some means of inducing intoxication, by means of beverages. In the Friendly Islands, when Captain Cook first visited them, the natives made an intoxicating beverage, by chewing the root of the Kava plant, and, mixing the juice thus extracted with water. The Tartars make Araka, a strong liquor, from the fermented milk of the cow and the horse: in Egypt Araki is the produce of the date, and in India that of the flowers of the Madhuca tree (Bassia butyracea). The Siamese become intoxicated with lau, made from rice: the Chinese with show-choo, a species of brandy, distilled from the lees of mandarin, a rice wine; the Mexican on a spirit made from pulque, the fermented juice of the Agave Americana; and the Kamshatkains on Slutkaia trava, a spirit made from a sweet grass, and another from the juice of the whortle berry, mixed with that of the Amanita Muscaria. Now all inebriating liquors, however produced, and whether obtained from vegetable or from animal substances, derive their inebriating properties from alcohol; and, if that opinion be admitted, it is easy to conceive that as, when these liquors were heated or boiled, they must consequently have become weaker, and lost much of their intoxicating properties, those who observed this effect would be led to suppose that something was driven off with the vapour during the boiling, and without this the liquors ceased to intoxicate. The natural result of such an observation would be an attempt to regain this important ingredient, by condensing the vapour; and the possibility of doing this would be observed almost as early as the discovery of its being carried off by the vapour: hence the first step to the performance of the process of distillation. It is, therefore, probable that the discovery of ardent spirits is coeval with civilization; and that the process of procuring them was known in many countries, without being communicated from other nations; and, consequently, must have been familiar in the temples, the repositories of all the science and learning of antiquity."

The effects produced by intoxicating liquids in kindling enthusiasm are best illustrated by the history of the Assassins, of which Dr. Thomson gives a brief summary:

"The followers of Hassan were bound to the most rigid obedience to the precepts of Islam, or Abdallah Maimon, the projector of the sect. It is unnecessary here to describe the rules which were requisite to be practised by the aspirants, proselytes to the faith of the society. Assassination was an obligation on the Ismailite Fedavee, one of the divisions of the sect; any one of whom, ordered by a superior to assassinate a stranger, was obliged to obey; and, in the performance of the order, the wretched Fedavee firmly believed he was promoting the cause of truth. It has been supposed that the name Assassins, given to the society, originated in this obligation; but the appellation is derived, according to M. De Sacy, from the Oriental term Hashishcen, corrupted by the Crusaders into Assassins. This term implies takers of Hashiché, a species of hemp, from which an intoxicating drug was compounded, which the Fedavee took previously to their engaging in their daring enterprises; and which procured for them the delicious visions of Paradise, promised to all the followers of the Sheikh-el-Jebel. This Paradise was typified on earth, according to Marco Paulo, who travelled over the East in the thirteenth century, by gardens of the most luxurious description, stored with the most delicious fruit and fragrant flowers and shrubs, and containing palaces inhabited by exquisitely beautiful and highly-accomplished damsels, clothed in the richest dresses, and educated to display every grace and fascination that could captivate the senses.

"The Chief, in discoursing of Paradise to his followers, persuaded them that he had the power of granting admission to it; and to prove the truth of his assertion, he caused a potion of a soporific kind to be administered to ten or twelve of them at a time, and when they were sound asleep, he had them conveyed to the palaces in the garden. On awaking from their sleep, their senses were struck with the beauty and splendour of every object upon which their eyes rested; their ears were ravished with the most harmonious voices; and their fond glances at the lovely damsels were returned with the most alluring caresses; until, truly intoxicated with the excess of enjoyment, they believed themselves actually in Paradise. After a time they were again thrown into sleep, and carried out of the garden. They were questioned before the whole Court as to where they had been, and what they had seen; and having detailed all the pleasures they enjoyed, the Chief assured them that those who yielded implicit obedience to him should inherit such a Paradise for ever.

"The effects of such an imposture display, most strikingly, the lengths to which credulity and superstition will conduct mortals. The following anecdote powerfully elucidates this remark. 'An Ambassador from the Sultan Malek Selah having come to Alamoot to demand submission and obedience of the Sheikh, Hassan received him in a hall in which he had assembled several of his followers. Making a sign to one youth, he said, 'Kill thyself!' Instantly the young man's dagger was plunged into his own bosom. To another he said, 'Fling yourself down from the wall.' In an instant his shattered limbs were lying in the castle ditch. Then turning to the terrific envoy, he exclaimed—'I have seventy thousand followers who obey me after this fashion. This is my answer to your master.' These victims died in the full conviction that they were immediately to pass into that sensual Paradise, of which they had received a foretaste in the gardens of the Sheikh."

The influence of imitation in propagating and supporting fanatical delusions and similar hallucinations is thus elucidated:

"A thousand instances might be brought forward to demonstrate the influence of imitation. One of the most remarkable was the dancing mania which prevailed all over Europe in the fourteenth century, and which actually grew into a real epidemic. It is only requisite to relate two or three instances of more recent date in this kingdom. At a cotton manufactory, at Holden Bridge, in Lancashire, a girl, on the 15th of February, 1787, put a mouse into the bosom of another girl, who was thereby thrown into convulsions, which lasted for twenty-four hours. On the following day, six girls, who had witnessed these convulsions, were affected in a similar manner, and on the 17th six more. The alarm became so great, that the whole work was stopped, under the idea that some particular disease had been introduced in a bag of cotton opened in the house. On the 18th three more and on the 19th eleven more girls were seized. Three of the whole number, namely twenty-four, lived two miles from the factory, and three were at another factory at Clitheroe, about five miles off, but who were strongly impressed with the idea of the plague, as the convulsions were termed, being caught from the cotton. Dr. Sinclair relieved all the cases by electrifying the affected girls. The convulsions were so strong, as to require four or five persons to hold the patients, and to prevent them from tearing their hair and dashing their heads on the floor or on the walls.

"Upwards of a century ago, a woman in Shetland, labouring under epilepsy, was attacked with paroxysms of the disease in the church; the result was, that many adult females and some children became affected in a similar manner; and the disease has continued to occur very frequently, ever since, during divine service. When Dr. Hibbert visited the Island of Unst, and was attending the kirk of Balnasta, a female shriek was heard; but the person was carried out by the desire of the clergyman, who also requested any woman, who felt that she might be similarly affected, to leave the church. Dr. Hibbert says, 'On leaving the kirk, I saw females writhing and tossing about their arms, on the green grass.'"

Most of our readers will remember that the Roman historians declare that Numa, their second king, was instructed by certain Etrurian deities in the art of drawing down the lightning from heaven, and rendering it harmless, but that Tullus Hostilius, his successor, was destroyed in a similar attempt. Salvete thus explains the matter:

"To render lightning less hurtful, and to make it descend without danger from the bosom of the clouds, was, both in effect and in end, obtained by Franklin's beautiful discovery, as well as by the religious experiment repeated many times with success by Numa. Tullus Hostilius was less fortunate. 'They relate,' says Titus Livy, 'that this Prince, when perusing the notes left by Numa, found among them some instructions on the secret sacrifices offered to Jupiter Elicius. He attempted to repeat them; but in his preparations for, or celebration of them, he deviated from the sacred rite; and being thus exposed to the anger of Jupiter, aroused by a defective ceremony (sollicitudo prævia religione), he was struck by lightning, and consumed in his own palace.'"

"An ancient annalist, quoted by Pliny, explains this event much more explicitly, and justifies the liberty I have taken in deviating from the sense commonly given to the words of Livy by his translators. 'Guided by Numa's books, Tullus undertook to invoke the aid of Jupiter by the same ceremonies employed by his predecessor. But having performed imperfectly the prescribed ceremony (parum rite), he perished, struck by thunder.' Instead of the term ceremony, if we substitute the word experiment, we shall perceive that the fate of Tullus was similar to that of Professor Reichman. In 1753 this learned man was killed by lightning while repeating, with too little caution, one of Franklin's experiments."

We think it much more likely that the Etrurian priests were acquainted with some explosive compound similar to gunpowder, of which many are known to exist, and that Tullus Hostilius fell a victim to want of caution in its use. There can, however, be little doubt that many mechanical, chemical, and even electrical combinations which pass for modern discoveries were tentatively known to priests and wonder-workers of ancient times, and were kept profoundly secret as a means of working on the credulity of the people. But we think that Salvete has carried his theory too far, and has not made sufficient abatement for the exaggerations of ignorance in the accounts given of prodigies. Lane has very ably shown that the wonders related in the voyages of Sinbad the sailor are mostly exaggerations of real phenomena in the Eastern seas. The tale of the "Three Black Crows" is more than fulfilled when the superstitious give an account of what has actually passed before their own eyes, and still more, when tradition gets hold of the prodigy, and repeats it with its usual habit of exaggeration. In the recent discussions on the Corn Bill we have found tales gravely told by those who pass for statesmen even more wild than those of the Arabian Nights. Aladdin's palace is not one whit more extravagant than the supernatural abundance of Tamboff, and Sinbad's Old Man of the Sea is but a tame invention when compared with the imaginary burdens on land of which we have heard so much. Had Salvete lived, he would have witnessed in our day a proof of his favourite theory, that occult sciences pass into real sciences so soon as protection is withdrawn.

Margaret Russell: an Autobiography. London: Longman and Co.

We know not whether this interesting narrative has had any foundation in fact, but there is an air of life and truth in the incidents, and a consistency in the characters, which we rarely find in works of pure imagination. The lady by whom the work is written may not have passed through the ordeals she has described, but she has so vividly delineated the feelings which such situations must produce, that we are persuaded she drew more from the experience either of herself or of some intimate acquaintance than from the simple suggestions of fancy. Margaret Russell describes herself as forced to seek refuge with a maternal aunt, under whose roof her mother dies. The character of this aunt is one which too many will recognise among their acquaintances:

"Although a person who, in her own opinion, exercised an important influence, both by precept and example, in her own immediate neighbourhood, yet so perverse were the principles upon which she acted, and so constantly were her efforts to inculcate lessons of piety counteracted by the method she took to impart them, that it would have been difficult to say what real good she did, or what specific purpose she fulfilled in the scale of being. She was one of those who are content to 'act religion instead of doing it.' Her love,—if indeed she could ever condescend to love what she termed 'corrupt humanity,'—was not heart-warm; there was no pulse of life in it. Her charity was the mere charity which ministers to the wants of the body, while it leaves those of the mind uncared for; and in this her means would not allow her to indulge. That a generous sympathy for the distress of the afflicted, generally, and a forbearance even towards those who are sufferers from the consequences of their own evil passions, were necessary portions of the creed she professed, seemed never to have occurred to her. If she visited the sick, she left the cottage of the labourer more desolate than she found it; for she gave only that of which the heart of the sufferer was full—prayer; while she took away that of which it is most barren—hope, the two-fold hope of the sinner against sinning, the hope of sympathy on earth and of mercy in heaven. If she entered the Sunday-school, it is true that the children were awed by her presence, that they put on a graver aspect, and lifted up their little voices in the Sabbath-song of praise with a more solemn intonation; but the image of the Deity in their minds was in a moment transformed from a God of love to a God of fear, by the sudden apparition of this—to them—severe herald of his displeasure.

"In her own household the same cold, harsh measures were pursued. For the house itself, a gloom seemed to rest on everything, animate and inanimate, within its walls. And as for the servants,—God help them! I pitied them from my heart. Like the inhabitants of Chorasin, they were driven to worship with the scourge. Not only their actions, but their words, their looks, their dress,—nay, if possible, their very thoughts, were ruled over with a strictness of supervision that would have done honour to an Inquisitor."

Another aunt who "had suffered persecution, and learned mercy," came to share Dorothea's protection with Margaret:

"Excluded from all sympathy where it should have been most abounding, the mourner, ever gentle and uncomplaining, instead of resenting a coldness which nevertheless she felt acutely, only turned with a more relying tenderness to the bosom ever ready to give sigh for sigh, and tear for tear. And now as time went on, beautiful was the affection which sprang up between the motherless child and the childless mother.

"I call her childless, for unchilded she was in a double sense, although her son yet remained to her; since, by of one those unaccountable turns and shifts in the strange machinery of fate, this child, at the very thought of whom her whole soul overflowed with tenderness, had been torn from her.

"Her husband, some time previous to the boy's birth, had exhibited unequivocal signs of insanity. His family termed these occasional aberrations, 'eccentricity of manner;' some hesitated not to attribute them to hereditary disease; while others, with more reason, supposed his derangement to arise from a local injury, the result of a severe attack of brain fever, from which he had never wholly recovered.

"As these symptoms increased in strength and frequency, the mania—for such in reality he was—began to evince an intolerable aversion to his unoffending wife. This at first showed itself merely in avoidance of her society. No sooner, however, was his son born, than, seizing the opportunity to deal a cruel and deadly blow, he immediately made over the boy to the care of his own family; and, with the cunning natural to the insane, set about making a will, by which the mother was to be debarred from the presence or knowledge of her child until he should come of age. The reason he alleged—for he was still plausible enough to himself all the privileges of a person of sound mind—was, that women were, from want of capacity, unfit to have the guardianship of male children.

"Soon after this he died, utterly and hopelessly deranged. But the time of appeal was past.

"His family, tremulously alive to the taint of insanity resting upon their name, which it would have done had the validity of the document been called in question, acted up, in every point, to the instructions contained in it. And as the bereaved mother, the only person whose interest it was to contest the will, refrained from doing so, the wrong, as usual, prevailed, and injustice triumphed."

Alice was re-united to her son so soon as his majority allowed him to act on his own impulses; but her frail frame did not long sustain her struggles of feeling.

"It soon became evident to herself, although we were yet unconscious of the pang which awaited us, that nature was gradually sinking; and that, however she might rally for weeks, or even perhaps for months, the seal of death was no less assuredly set upon her brow.

"And now all the beauty and the truth, the trust, the devotedness of her woman's nature were daily and hourly developed. Although life was becoming every moment more endeared to her, not a complaint, not a murmur was ever heard from her lips, that could indicate how sorely she felt the doom which was to shut her out from it for ever. She was yet in the matronly prime of her years; and much as she had undergone, her feelings had never been deadened or unyouthed. She had not to sink into the grave with the comforting thought that she was laying down a burthen greater than she could bear; she had to go down to darkness with the thrilling consciousness of an increased power of enjoyment strengthening within her. The passage to the grave, too, was to be trodden alone, without the sympathy which smooths the bed of the dying. None knew but herself what was going on within. She did not regret this; she rejoiced at it; but not the less did she feel it. She assumed a cheerfulness which was but a mask for the melancholy that devoured her. Like the poor Hindoo, while writhing in the pangs of her self-imposed penance, she scattered flowers around her. She smiled; but her smiles were but as sun-rays upon the tomb: they might gladden and chase the thoughts of corruption from those who were without,—but she was within its shadow.

"Her whole thoughts were now directed to the future prospects of her son. Fortune he would have none, beyond the little she could bequeath him at her death. His father had been a younger brother, and brought up to the church. After passing his best years as a poor country curate, he eventually obtained a small living, barely sufficient for the maintenance of himself and family; and at his death his widow would have been left wholly unprovided for, but for the small patrimony which had been settled upon her at her marriage.

"It is true, that the uncle with whom Francis had been reared, himself childless, had always declared his intention of making him his heir; and, under this idea, had not educated him for any profession. But Sir Richard Bruce was a man of strong passions, haughty, and overbearing; and any offence, however unintentional, on the part of his nephew, might at once place him beyond the pale of his uncle's favour."

Alice died almost in the arms of Francis and Margaret—a circumstance which naturally developed and strengthened the growing affection of the cousins. Just at this crisis, however, Dorothea informs Margaret that she was not, as she believed, an orphan, but that her father was a convicted felon, sentenced to death for forgery, but allowed to escape with transportation for life. Her resolution not to involve her cousin in any portion of the disgrace attached to such a parent, and her self-devotedness in rejecting all his offers, are very powerfully portrayed, but a fresh trial is in store for her; the father secretly returns to England, lives in daily dread of being delivered up to justice as an escaped convict, and tries to drown his fears and his shame in the most degrading dissipation. She quits her aunt to share her father's poverty. It was at a time when pestilence ravaged some of those haunts of wretchedness in London, commonly called "rookeries," and we extract one picture of misery, such as London could alone produce, to illustrate what many still call "the short and simple annals of the poor."

"Day by day the pestilence increased. A constant cloud, deepening towards night into a fog, thick and stifling as an Egyptian plague, hung overhead. Silence, unbroken save by the everlasting toll of the death-bell, reigned within and without the dwellings of the dead and dying; while, amongst the survivors, the stupefaction of despair made them seem, as they walked abroad upon the earth, almost as corpse-like as the forms that rotted beneath; till the sleep of the living became more awful than the sleep of the dead.

"That such scenes should have an engrossing and absorbing interest for one who was but newly, as it were, rescued from the very grasp of death, is scarcely to be wondered at. It was something better than the mere vulgar craving for horrors, for excitement, that now led me to look intently upon the life that breathed,—or rather gasped, on every hand about my path. It is probable that I might, in happier days, have shrunk from such fellowship; but my present lot had cast me, as by a magic, into the darker places of the world,—among the stern and gaunt realities of life; and, emerging as I was, slowly, out of pain into a renewed existence, I paused and looked around me to see if out of that darkness, light might be struck.

"I was yet very feeble; weakened in body, and with scarcely the energy of mind needed for the formation of new plans or resolves for the future. My spirit for the time was broken; but still I longed for action, or rather for the capability of acting. It occurred to me that, subdued as I was, and unfit for any continued exertion of body or mind, I might still be of some use to the wretched beings I saw around me. Much as I had heard talked of poverty, I had never till now met it face to face; never known more of its sting than belonged to the mere absence of wealth. Here a new chapter in the history of man was opened to me, and I could not pass it by unread,—dared not say to my own soul—“What is this page of humanity to thee?”

“Far from finding my advances repulsed when, on being once more able to move abroad, I sought the dwellings of those with whom I had a fellowship in suffering, my offers of personal assistance were, in most cases, gratefully accepted. I had no difficulty, therefore, in gaining access to the abodes of poverty and wretchedness by which I was encompassed, and in studying the phases of human life, as they were here presented to me, devoid of that veil with which civilisation, in the better ranks, hides man from his fellow man.

“The first house I sought was that where lived the parents of the child who had so tenderly nursed me during my illness, and to whose ministry, together with the occasional aid of her mother, I owed my life, helpless and otherwise untended as I was.

“Crowded together in a single room, of a size which those who are accustomed to the merest decencies of life would have considered too close and unwholesome for a single occupant, I found the entire family, consisting of the parents, an aged woman, the mother of the man, and their four children. One wretched bed, if bed it could be called, which was composed of a few rugs huddled together on the floor, served for them all. Two of the children—one, and the fairest of whom was my poor little favourite, already mentioned as having passed her previous years away from the city, and who had been brought up by an aunt, since dead,—were in the last stage of the fever. Another, and apparently the eldest lay a corpse in the midst of them, the coffin resting upon two chairs within a few inches of the bed where the others were passing out of life. Here, by the lifeless remains of its brother, played—as only the children of the very poor do play, especially the city poor—with a heart and a step alike joyless and unchilded, the last and only one of the four yet untouched by disease.

“Of the two already signed and sealed for death, my little woodland flower was the first to perish. I stood by her side when her tender spirit passed away. She was dreaming of the green fields she had left behind, and her prattle was of woods and flowers. Her sense was drinking in the odours from the bean-field at the end of the little garden paddock—the ripple of the brook waters trembled into her ear. Her pale hands moved to and fro,—she was weaving in thought fairy-chains of the golden king-cups.

“She died. They buried her in a pit heaped up with putrefying bodies, over which a little earth was shovelled, in that noisome place,—the churchyard of a city. The solitary candle that lighted her to her last resting-place, was extinguished by the noxious gases that exhaled and steamed up into the faces of the mourners as they lowered her into her grave. A few hasty words were muttered over her coffin, as ‘dust’ was given to ‘dust,’ and she from whose clay flowers should have sprung was left to fester almost beneath the eyes of her parents, poisoning the air they breathed.”

We need not tell the rest of the history, for we hope that the little volume will become generally known. Its high moral tone, the lessons of purity and self-devotion which it inculcates, united to the spirit and powers displayed in its portraiture, will, we hope, command, as we are sure they must, an excellent circulation.

VISIT OF ELIHU BURRITT, THE LEARNED AMERICAN BLACKSMITH.

In our last number we gave a brief sketch of this wonderful man, this “walking polyglot,” as Byron said of Mezzofanti. It is proper our readers should know that he is a most devoted advocate of Free Trade. Referring to our journal of the 30th ult., we now give a few more extracts from his letters, a few more sparks from his anvil. We understand he is expected to arrive in Liverpool to-morrow, by the Boston steamer; and that his visit to this country will be made subservient to the great cause of unrestricted commerce. Considering the circumstances under which he acquired his stores of learning and knowledge, he may perhaps be looked upon as the most extraordinary man living:

THE LEARNED AMERICAN BLACKSMITH'S PROPOSED VISIT TO ENGLAND, AND PEDESTRIAN TOUR.
(From the Christian Citizen.)

“For some time past, the idea has been running in our mind, that a voyage to England and a short visit in that country would much benefit our outward man. We have been much confined during the last two or three years, and thus deprived of the physical exercise which our earliest habits have rendered constitutionally necessary to our health. We have thought, therefore, of this plan, which we would now submit to the committee of the whole list of our readers and friends. About the first of June, we propose, under certain conditions, to take steamer or pack-trail for England. On our arrival, we propose to take a private hickory staff and travel on like Bunyan's pilgrim, through the country, at the rate of about ten miles a day.

With a pocket for my wheat, and a pocket for my rye, And a bag of water by my side, to drink when I am dry, Passing thus leisurely on foot through the agricultural districts, we anticipate the opportunity of looking through the hedges and into barn yards; sometimes into the kitchens of the common people, once in a while into a blacksmith's shop to smite at the anvil. In fact, we intend to pull at every latch-string that we find outside the door or gate, and study the physiology of turnips, hay-ricks, cabbages, hops, &c., and of all kinds of cattle, sheep, and swine. We propose to avoid the lions of the country, and confine our walks to the low lands of common life; and to have our conversation and communion chiefly with the labouring classes. Perhaps we might get together a knot of them some moonshiny night and talk to them a little on temperance, peace, and universal brotherhood. During such a pedestrian tour, we think we might see and hear some things which a person could not do while whizzing through the country on the railroad at the rate of thirty miles an hour.”

“I rejoice with joy unspeakable at the appearance of new stars of hope and promise in the heavens of humanity. Brethren, the morning of a new era has illumined the horizon of mankind. Free Trade, the commercial harbinger of the millennium, with its white, world-wide wings, is crossing the threshold of this hate-seared world, to fuse the nations into one peaceful and happy brotherhood. The prospect of unrestricted social and commercial intercourse makes my heart palpitate for joy, especially in view of the interesting and intimate union in which it will merge our two great nations.

“Let Free Trade, in its simplest sense, be declared between us, in the enriching commerce of friendship; let no restriction, no narrow-minded thrift, be longer imposed on the wealth of our good will; let not the commerce of cotton, corn, and manufactures absorb all the correspondence carried on between us; but let humanity and universal brotherhood speak in tones that shall make music to the ears of the enslaved.

“It is not the fault of our western brethren if their voice is not loudest, and their hearts warmest for peace and amity with Great Britain. Occupying a region capable of supplying the whole human family, they have been almost entirely shut away from your country, and from every other one on the globe. The stunted commerce which has slipped through the iron fingers of restriction, has hardly opened a channel larger than that which might run through a rye-straw, for the swelling ocean of their agricultural productions. The opening of the British ports to these productions will have a moral effect on their attitude towards your country and in this, and make them the greatest peace-makers in the Union.

“I watch with the deepest anxiety every movement that tends to increase our international commerce and comity. I look upon the increasing number of letters exchanged, as a favourable omen; of passengers in the steamers, &c. I long to see more steamers put on the Atlantic, to cheapen and popularise the communication between us. I have watched with earnest hope for the repeal of your Corn Laws, as a great peace measure, which would take immediate effect on the most warlike portion of the Union. It would have a great influence here, and serve to extinguish the war-spirit in its very heart.”

“A PROBLEM FOR THE PEOPLE.—More than half the commerce of the United States is with Great Britain. British ships carry across the ocean nearly half of our exports. On whom does it devolve to protect these merchant ships into British ports?—on Great Britain or the United States? In case of war with England, would not the navies of the two nations be on the same side in protecting this commerce, which they own in partnership?—and would it not be binding on both nations to send each a fleet of armed vessels to convey the cotton of the United States to English ports, either directly or by way of Hamburg? In such a war, would it not be perfectly consistent for half-a-dozen British seventy-fours to lead the van, and as many of the United States to bring up the rear, of a squadron of cotton-freighted ships?”

“THE COTTON STRING OF BROTHERHOOD.—The value of the produce shipped from the United States to Liverpool for six months of the past year, was 39,000,000 dollars, of which 36,000,000 dollars was in cotton. A large hawser, that, to be severed by the sword, before the two nations may swing clear of each other. If Christianity and civilisation should help to moor the two kindred countries together with a cable of equal strength, all the swords that War ever sharpened could not cut apart these Anglo-Saxon Twins.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Friday Evening, June 26, 1846.

On the same night that Sir Robert Peel brought to a triumphant issue the greatest, the most important, and the most beneficent measures ever introduced to a British Parliament, he was defeated on a different question by a majority of 73, and his tenure of power was thus brought to a close. It is no small merit of the right hon. baronet that he foresaw this issue from the very beginning, and was aware that the prosperity of his country could only be purchased by a greater amount of self-sacrifice than was ever yet required of any Minister. He had devoted years of patient toil and anxious thought to the construction of a Conservative party from the wreck of the party which had opposed the Reform Bill. He undertook to inspire the despairing with hope, and the timid with courage; to win confidence from constituencies, the enfranchisement of which he had opposed, and to obtain influence in a system which he had resisted and denounced. No other leader could have organised such a party; his caution prevented the excesses into which unexpected success tempted many of his followers; his prudence checked the violence with which the desire of vengeance inspired others. He showed his adherents that discipline was the great element of success in party warfare; and he maintained that discipline by winning confidence, not by inspiring fear. In executing this task, he was sadly hampered by the nature of the materials with which he had to deal; he was stunted in the choice of his associates and his instruments, and he was generally under a stringent necessity of withholding from them the confidence which he required for himself. He was thus a leader from circumstances, a chief chosen by his party, not because they loved or sympathised with him, but simply because they could not do without him. Peel was with the Conservatives, but not of them; he shared not in the selfishness of monopoly or the bigotry of ascendancy, but he taught both that their gains and their privileges could only be maintained by occasional and graceful concessions. As a leader of opposition, he had to suppress occasional murmurs and to check incipient mutinies. Though his policy at that time was simply “to obstruct,” there were those around him who would have pushed their obstruction so far as to stop the entire business of the nation; they would thus have infallibly produced a reaction which would have given back to the Whigs all their waning popularity and all their declining power. To such men he was reluctantly compelled to concede more than his prescient view discovered to be either prudent or politic, for he was too wise a statesman not to foresee that an anti-Irish cry in England would infallibly produce an anti-English cry in Ireland.

The differences between Peel and his party, latent to some extent so long as it was only necessary to oppose, became rapidly developed when accession to office compelled them to act. Sir C. H. Williams once compared party to “a snake,

Where the tail moves the head.”

In the present case, the “tail” typified by the Duke of Richmond laid claim to the direction of the movement, and significantly declared that “the power which had made could also unmake a Cabinet.” The Premier spurned a servile tenure of office. He was the Minister of a Queen at Windsor; he would not be the serf of a duke at Goodwood. He looked to the country; he saw that the country was to be gained; but that in the attempt the party must be lost.

Sir Robert Peel felt himself isolated, though surrounded by a crowd of supporters. He knew them, but they did not know him; and he was conscious that the hour of explanation would be also the hour of division and separation. But circumstances rendered it dangerous, if not impossible, to keep silence any longer. The season of scarcity began, that of famine cast lengthening shadows before. His sense of duty as a Minister was strengthened by his depth of feeling as a man; and with noble resolution he declared that he would no longer be a party to the maintenance of artificial starvation.

Lord John Russell had preceded the right hon. baronet in the same declaration, and had similarly disregarded the ties and obligations of party. We discuss not the relative merits of the rival statesmen—in their conduct at this crisis we equally admire both. We are neither remiss in gratitude nor deficient in respect to the noble member for London, whose efficient aid in this struggle we have ever thankfully acknowledged, when we state that the right honourable baronet made far the greater amount of sacrifice, and encountered far the fiercer hazards. During six months he has been the butt for every shaft which faction could aim, disappointment wing, and malignity tip with poison. But his part was taken. With untiring perseverance he laboured for one great object, the emancipation of British industry; and he held to his position as firmly as the ocean-rock, unmoved by the billows that fret, foam, and dash against its cliffs. He was a pilot adhering to the helm, regardless of the storm and heedless of the ignorant clamour of a mutinous crew. He has steered the craft of which he had charge into a haven of safety, but those whom he rescued are ignorant of the impending danger from which they were saved. For if monopoly had continued, nothing short of a miraculous interposition could have saved monopolists from destruction. He descends from power just as he had attained the summit of popularity, as if it were part of his pride to pay in person the price which the salvation of England's prosperity required. He sinks like the tropic sun, with light unshaded and heat undiminished, leaving earth to enjoy the growth he has cherished, and the fruits he has ripened.

We cannot conclude without directing attention to Mr. Cobden's speech. It is a tribute equally worthy of the giver and the receiver; and we have no hesitation in declaring that it embodies the sentiments of every member of the League.

Mr. COBDEN then rose, and was received with loud cheers. He said: I am not going to argue the question; but I wish to say one or two words as to the spirit of the votes we are going to give. I shall find myself in the lobby to-night—and probably in a majority—with three classes of voters. The first class are those gentlemen who voted against the first reading, because they were opposed to the principles of legislation for Ireland which the measure involved; the next are those hon. members on this side of the house who voted for the first reading; and the third, to my great surprise, are a large number of gentlemen below the gangway, who also voted for the first reading. Now, I don't intend to offer one word in the way of putting a construction upon the motives of hon. gentlemen who are to vote differently upon this occasion; but as such a combination may seem rather odd, and may be looked upon by the country with some suspicion (hear, hear), I wish to clear myself at all events, and probably in doing so, I may also render some service to other hon. members by showing that the construction which may be put upon the vote about to be given by the noble lord, the member for Lynn, at all events does not apply to us. The noble lord has told us very frankly what he considers the object of the majority to be,—that we are joining together to do justice to the right honourable baronet for his policy during the present session. I think he said that it must be the object of every honest man to inflict summary punishment upon the traitor, although some of us may like the treachery (hear, hear). That I humbly think is not acting upon the merits of the question. It is a vote of censure upon the right hon. baronet in the estimation of the noble lord. Now I beg to repudiate for myself (loud cheers) and for many hon. gentlemen on this side of the house, such an unjust and unfair construction upon the votes we are giving (renewed applause). We should be acting very inconsistent indeed with popular opinion, and we especially affect to represent popular opinion, if we were to give such a vote as this (hear, hear). Because I apprehend there will be no dispute on this point, that the right hon. baronet has been the means of passing this session one of the most popular measures that any Minister could possibly undertake (cries of "Oh, oh," and cheers). We should be outraging public opinion if we allowed such a construction to be put upon our vote at this moment, on the very day that this great measure has been brought down to this house from another place. Yes, I can imagine the noble lord feeling that there is a sort of poetical justice in carrying a vote of censure at the very moment of the passing of the Corn Bill; but I beg to say that he must not put this construction at all events upon my vote (cries of "Divide.") I do not mean to say one word on the merits of the bill. But it seems the right hon. baronet attaches so much importance to the bill that, according to general report, he has determined to stand or fall by it. With that I have nothing to do (cheers); for I have resolved that I shall not imitate the noble lord, and stultify myself by voting that black is white, merely to serve another purpose (cheers). I said two months ago that I believed it possible that before the Corn Bill passed the House of Lords, the right hon. baronet would be put in a minority by a cross vote, for I said then, as I say now, that the hon. gentlemen below the gangway were prepared to give any vote consistent with their personal honour, which we must not question in this house, for the purpose of throwing out the right hon. baronet. I therefore feel that it would be quite hopeless for any man to seek to keep a party in power by giving a single vote against his convictions, because we should then be soon again put to the test by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and we should go on voting black was white to no purpose (hear, hear). Now, I beg to assure hon. gentlemen opposite that this state of parties will ere long receive a solution out of doors (loud cheers). We cannot continue with three parties in this house, neither party being able to carry on the Government. There must be a fusion of two parties. I see no immediate prospect of an amalgamation between the gentlemen below the gangway and their late friends on the other side; and I must say that I am very glad to think so (cheers). There is nothing which I should regret more than to see the right hon. baronet forced into an alliance with that rearward party. But there is another alliance which I imagine, in some shape or other, must take place here, and which has already taken place in the country. There is no distinction in the country, so far as I am aware, between those who follow the noble lord the member for London and those who give in their adhesion to the policy of the right hon. baronet (cheers from the protectionists). I don't understand the logical inference to be drawn from that cheer. I don't think it holds out a cheering prospect to the hon. gentlemen below the gangway. But I augur that if this fusion has taken place out of doors, and the rank and file of those who follow these two distinguished leaders are found mingling in their ranks and fraternizing with each other throughout the country, there cannot long be a separation between the two chiefs themselves, and the result will be an abandonment of their strife, and a fusion between the two parties in this house (cheers). Well, I apprehend that this will give us a Government and a majority—which will not be a protection Government, at all events. Now I have only to say, in contradiction to the noble lord, that if the right hon. baronet chooses to retire from office in consequence of this vote, he carries with him the esteem and gratitude of a larger number of the population of this empire than ever followed any Minister that was ever hurled from power. [Mr. Rashleigh.—"Not of the working classes."] The hon. member for Cornwall says, "not of the working classes." [Mr. Rashleigh.—"And I repeat it."] I am sorry the hon. member is so excited in making the declaration (cheers and laughter); but has he the same expression of opinion to give with regard to the voting classes (cheers)? I think the right hon. gentleman has shown great forbearance to hon. members below the gangway, in not having availed himself of the strength he has with the country, and taking them at their words, before he abandons office, appealing to the country (cheers). But should he not do so, I am not misinterpreting the opinion of the people, not only of the electors, but especially of the working classes, when I tender the right honourable baronet, in my own name, as I might do in theirs, my heartfelt thanks for the unwearied perseverance ("oh, oh!"), the unswerving firmness ("oh!") and the great ability with which he has during the last six months conducted one of the most magnificent reforms (cheers, and "oh, oh!") ever carried in any country, through this House of Commons (cheers).

The house then divided, the numbers were—

For the second reading 219
Against 202

Majority against the second reading —73

The division was received by the house in silence.

Our task is nearly accomplished. It will in all probability be our duty, next week, to bid our readers farewell; and we cannot now give vent to the feelings which such an event inspires.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, June 22.—We have again short supplies of all British Grain to this day's market. The Free Wheat in the hands of factors is small in quantity, and they are not quite willing to quit without an advance of 2s. or 3s. per qr., which is consequently paid. In Foreign Wheat no alteration. Barley is about 1s. dearer. Beans are 2s., and Peas, 1s. dearer, except White, which are unaltered in value. In Oats there is more activity than for some time past; Free Corn fetches fully 1s. over the prices of this day week; Bonded, of which the arrivals are fair, is not dearer, but holders are unwilling to make extensive sales, though there is rather more inquiry than has been experienced for these descriptions lately. FRIDAY, JUNE 25.—The third reading of the Corn Bill took place last night, and it is fully expected that duties will be payable by the new scale to-morrow. The market is in a very unsettled state, there being no confidence as to the future range of prices. There was a very brisk inquiry for all kinds of corn at the beginning of market. English Wheat, of which the show is trifling, was neglected. Foreign was offered free at 2s. lower than late free prices; but millers were uncertain what to bid, and but little business has been transacted. The last remark applies necessarily to every branch of the trade. Buyers of Oats bid about 2s. to 2s. 6d. less than on Monday for free corn. On the other hand, holders of Foreign ask 1s., and the new duty of 1s. 6d. over the bonded prices of Monday, which checks business. We cannot expect settled markets for a few days. In Barley, Beans, and Peas no alteration can be quoted. S. H. LUCAS.

IMPROVED COTTAGES FOR THE INDUSTRIOUS CLASSES.—We have been favoured with a sight of some plans, and sections, of a design for improved cottages for the industrious classes. They are the production of Mr. Robert Owen, of Manchester, and are intended for the use of the Freeholders' Building Society of that town. Mr. Owen's principal object has been to obtain a thorough ventilation in the cottages built for the society; but in addition to the attainment of this object, he has made some architectural improvements, and given greater convenience to the inhabitants than is usually to be obtained in cottages of the same size. The houses can be built back to back, with the same advantages as with a passage between. The present offensive state of back accommodation among the working classes is done away with by these designs, a greater number of sleeping rooms is secured, unpleasant smells are prevented or provided against, and everything is done on the principle of a sanitary improvement. The cost of a pair of these houses is variously estimated at from 200l. to 240l. Altogether the designs appear unexceptionable—nay, highly advantageous. Here we appear to have as much convenience as possible, on the least possible ground, and at the smallest possible cost; and these are no inconsiderable advantages to districts so populous as Manchester and its vicinity. Mr. Owen is entitled to the warmest thanks of his fellow members in the society, and of all who are interested in the sanitary improvement of our towns. The members of the Freeholders' Building Society cannot but be proud of the co-operation of Mr. Owen. His services have been indeed valuable, not only in the production of these designs, but also in his active exertions for the establishment and prosperity of that very successful society. We believe the plans may be purchased at a low figure of the secretary to the society.

T. RIDDELL'S PATENT ECONOMICAL MICA-CEOUS LINING for the protection of Bonnets, Caps, and Hats from the injurious effects of the natural and artificial moisture of the hair. Ladies and gentlemen, before purchasing such articles, should see that they are provided with this elegant and inexpensive article, which may be imperceptibly introduced into the most delicate hats, and thereby preventing the very unsightly stains produced by perspiration, oil, &c., being a non-conductor of heat, it will be found invaluable in warm climates, especially in the East and West Indies, preventing the effects of a sun de soleil or stroke of the sun, which has proved so fatal to Europeans especially. To be had of all respectable hat and cap makers, hatters, outfitters, hosiers, &c. W. Patterson, 104, Wood-street, Cheap side, London, is licensed to supply wholesale houses only. Price One Shilling.

FOR FILLING DECAYED TEETH.

DALE'S ENAMEL, price 2s. 6d.—This preparation is confidently offered to the public as the best material ever discovered for filling decayed teeth, which it effects without giving the least pain or inconvenience, becoming, in a short time, as hard and as durable as the tooth itself, and, by perfectly excluding the access of air, it arrests all further possible progress of decay. The preparation, by its use, is in a soft state, and continues so for a short time; and it may therefore be used by any person with perfect facility, and is warranted to succeed in every case, however large the cavity. Prepared by John Dale, analytical chemist, Manchester. Sold in packets at 2s. 6d. each, by most respectable druggists and medicine vendors in the kingdom. Directions for use are inclosed with each packet.

Wholesale Agents: Mottershead and Roberts, Manchester; Barclay and Sons, 95, Farringdon-street, London.

"AN ADVERTISEMENT HERE CAN CONVEY but a faint idea of the excellence of this manufacture for wear or use, nor can it show the saving in actual money on the various articles. In the aggregate this is over fifty per cent. The Catalogue, with 150 illustrations, gives the pattern and the price against every article." All housekeepers should have this book; and, by addressing C. WATSON, 41 and 42, Abchurch-lane, 16, Norton Folgate, near the Eastern Counties Railway London Terminus, it will be forwarded Gratis and Post Free.

JONES'S 44. 48. SILVER LEVER WATCHES warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week, are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset-house. They combine the truth of a mathematical instrument with the elegance of an ornament of taste. On receipt of a Post-office order for 1s. above the price, a Watch will be sent free for any part of the kingdom. Read Jones's "Sketch of Watch Work," sent free for a 2d. stamp.

SHOWER BATHS, with curtains, 9s. each.—Purchasers of any description of BATH should visit WILLIAMS, BURTON'S late Rippon and Burto's) bath show room, which contains, besides toilet sets, japanned in imitation of fancy woods, china, &c., in enormous variety, all the requisites for a season, so arranged in one room, devoted exclusively to articles of that character, that patterns, sizes, and costs can be instantly selected, and at 20 per cent. under any other house where attention is paid to the quality. Full-size portable shower bath, very strong and japanned, with curtains and copper valve, 9s. each. Pillar shower bath, with copper conducting tubes, brass force-pump and top, complete with curtains and japanned, from 60s. Hand shower bath, japanned, 2s. 6d. The omnidirective bath. Detailed Catalogues, with engravings, as well as of every ironmongery article, sent per post, free.

WILLIAMS, BURTON'S (late RIPPON and BURTON'S) stock of general furnishing ironmongery and baths is literally the largest in the world, and as no language can be employed to give a correct idea of its variety and extent, purchasers are invited to call and inspect it.—39, Oxford-street (corner of Newman-street). Established in Welles-street, 1820.

LUXURY IN SHAVING.

JOHN GOSNELL and CO.'S AMBROSIAL SHAVING CREAM (Patronised by Prince Albert). This inestimable Cream possesses all the good qualities of the Finest Naples Soap, without the disagreeable smell inseparable from that article in a genuine state. It is of a white pearly silvery appearance, produces a creamy lather, which will not dry on the face, and emits in use the delightful flavour of the almond. In Pots, price 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., &c. Perfumers in Her Majesty's 12, Three King-court, Lombard-street, London. Manufacturers of Combs and Brushes of the best quality, and on the most approved principles.

G R E Y H A I R.—The nourishing properties of ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in the restoration to its original colour. It is the only article that really possesses nutritious virtues for promoting a luxuriant growth of the human Hair, preventing it from falling off, or turning grey, and for cleansing it of scurf and all impurities.

CAUTION.—The words "ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL" are on the wrapper of each genuine bottle. * * * ALL OTHERS ARE FRAUDULENT IMITATIONS!!

THE ATHERLATORS, or LIQUID HAIR DYE, the only dye that really answers for all colours, and does not require re-doing but as the hair grows, as it never fades or acquires an unnatural red or purple tint common to all other dyes. ROSS and SONS can, with the greatest confidence, recommend the use of this dye, as an infallible means of their establishment, and the sole and exclusive privilege of it is registered, to bring a friend or servant with them, to see how it is used, who will enable them to do it afterwards without chance of failure. Several private apartments devoted entirely to the use of the dye, are some of them, established having usually the dye in use, and at 2s. 6d. at once, so that they think it necessary to add that by attending strictly to the instructions given with each bottle of dye, numerous persons have succeeded equally well without coming to them.

Address Ross and Sons, 119 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, the celebrated Perruquiers, Perfumers, Haircutters, and Hairdressers. N.B. Parties attended at their own residence, whatever the distance.

NOTICE.

All persons having claims upon the COUNCIL of the LEAGUE are requested to send in their accounts forthwith to the Offices, Newall's Buildings, Manchester, that they may be discharged.

By Order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

FAREWELL ADDRESS.

Our task is concluded, our labours are at an end. We have seen the great principles for which we have struggled through seven years of doubt and difficulty brought to a triumphant issue, and permanently established in the legislation of the empire. The records of Parliament are the evidence of our services; the freedom for which wise men wrote, and good men sighed, and brave men struggled, has been won peacefully, honourably, and completely. Laws devised by a jealous, monopolising, and ungrateful spirit to restrain the bounties of Providence, and fetter the energies of an industrious, a brave, and a loyal people, have been swept from the statute-book to take their place in the records of unhonoured history. We have extended the right hand of fellowship to every nation upon earth, and laid the foundation of a brotherhood which will unite the whole family of man.

Compared with such a victory the triumphs of conquerors and the achievements of heroes sink into insignificance. Our march has been stained by no blood—our success is sullied by no tear. There is no regret in the bosom of the victor, and there soon will be none in the heart of the vanquished, for ours is the triumph not of force but of reason; not of ambition, but of benevolence; not of a party, but of the united empire; and we might add, of universal humanity. As there is nothing to cloud the joy of present success, so is there no painful association connected with the history of the agitation by which that success was obtained. Our march from the starting point has been steadily onwards; our course has never swerved from the single object which we had resolved to pursue, and our means have been as noble as our end.

For the first time in the world's history a great revolution has been accomplished without physical force being so much as mentioned in the whole struggle. Convinced of the power of intelligent opinion, we set ourselves to develop that intelligence and to form that opinion. We foresaw that our mission should be educational, and we accepted its conditions. The League undertook to instruct the people, to reform the economic creed of the country, and to overthrow the fallacies devised by an ignorant selfishness, and supported by an unthinking credulity. We had no bribes to offer our converts; on the contrary, large sacrifices were required from all who joined our cause. So hopeless did our enterprise appear when first undertaken, that it was regarded as something little short of insanity. Hope and encouragement, however, grew rapidly around us. We asked men to inquire, to investigate, and to examine, and we found that every one who thus exercised his mind ended by adopting our sentiments.

The system of lectures was an early and necessary part of our educational course; the gentlemen employed for this purpose by the League spread the doctrines of Free Trade through the length and breadth of the land, and the reception which they everywhere met convinced the Council that there was a mass of sound opinion spread over the country which only required to be organised and concentrated to attain its object. Nothing was more surprising than the rapidity with which sentiments of sympathy and confidence were developed among Free Traders. Community of feeling became the bond of friendship, and it was cemented by community of suffering.

The financial and manufacturing distress which the Free Traders clearly saw would be the result of a perverse code of commercial legislation after sending before it a premonitory shadow, spread a deep gloom over all the branches of British industry, but more especially over those engaged in the production of textile fabrics. The ministers of religion met to protest against a system which violated the first principles of Christianity, and outraged every precept of the gospel. Appeals were made to the Government of the country by deputation after deputation, but instruction had not penetrated into high places—the educational mission of the League remained still incomplete. An outbreak of a singular character in the manufacturing districts equally attested the distress of the operatives and the strength of their moral principle. The League held out to them hope and encouragement; they were saved from the wild excesses of despair, and tranquillity was restored without bloodshed. Men at a distance were astonished and perplexed by such a phenomenon. They called for inquiry, and it was granted; the investigation only showed that physical suffering had prompted to the movement, and that moral principle had brought it to a peaceful end.

The crisis passed over; a more prosperous period arrived produced by the causes which the League had accurately predicted, and attended by all the circumstances which it had minutely foretold. The soundness of our principles had thus been tested by the two extremes of fortune; our own confidence in their truth was strengthened; the process of conviction was accelerated; and new converts gathered around us every day. We had multitudes of recruits, and not a single renegade; countless volunteers, and not one deserter. The League had taught the lessons upon which events supplied a commentary; the evidence of the truths we inculcated was brought within the daily range of every man's experience.

For a long time the monopolists viewed the progress of Free Trade opinions with apathy or indifference; sound opinion had already taken a deep root in the country before they showed themselves conscious of its existence. At length they discovered their danger, and began to prepare for defence. All the fallacies which Adam Smith had exposed, and his followers demolished, were dragged from obscurity and obstruction, and were reiterated in nearly the same words and syllables at every farmer's dinner and agricultural association. But the Free Traders had gained an immense advantage by forcing the monopolists to speak out. Fallacy after fallacy was demolished as fast as it appeared; farmers began to think, and labourers to reason; they saw the monopolists ever shifting their ground—driven from pillar to post, and from post to pillar—while the Free Traders constantly preserved the same simplicity and consistency of truth.

Publication was one of the earliest modes of diffusing sound principle which the League adopted. Tracts were disseminated through a large portion of the electoral body, and a journal was established in Manchester as a record of proceedings. When the increased importance and interest of the debates on Mr. Villiers's motion gave evidence that the time of a decisive struggle was approaching, the journal was removed to London, where it took the name of THE LEAGUE. Like the body which it represented the journal strictly confined itself to the discussion of Free Trade and its collateral topics, holding itself independent of every political party, unawed by the frowns of power, and inaccessible to the blandishments of seduction. No man, no journal, and no institution, can be expected to please every body; but there never was a journal so widely circulated against which fewer complaints were made, either in public or in private. Whatever may be thought of our pretensions to talent, we believe that no one will contest our claims to temper and discretion, even under circumstances which might have rendered a little warmth excusable, if not justifiable. It is neither our wish, nor our purpose, to enter into any details of the management; but we may state that it is an unprecedented event in literary history for a journal, devoted exclusively to a single topic, to maintain a permanent interest for its readers through anything like the period over which our publication has extended. A progressive increase of demand is, at least, some evidence of sustained influence; and though the paper was published at a price which rendered it unprofitable as a pecuniary speculation, we have reason to know that this was more than compensated by the subscribers it procured to the general fund.

There was one department of the business of the League, unconnected with its educational mission, which has excited much attention on account of its constitutional importance; we mean the registration. Sir Robert Peel was the first to proclaim that the battle of the constitution should be fought in the registration courts, and his party found the benefit of following his advice. As the League depended for success solely on constitutional means, it was necessary, as the combat deepened, to investigate the means which the constitution had placed at their disposal. By the ancient laws of the realm the possession of a forty shilling freehold confers a vote in a county; and hence Free Traders were urged to procure such freeholds, the League providing proper agency to facilitate their acquisition. It has been absurdly supposed that some of these freeholds were purchased from the League fund; but in every instance they were bought and paid for by the individual Free Trader, the League only procuring for the purchaser legal aid and guidance in effecting the transfer. Had the existence of monopoly been protracted to a new Parliament, we have little doubt that the League system of registration would have been found as effective in other counties as it proved to be in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

The announcement of the ministerial measures just brought to a successful issue under the guidance of Sir R. Peel, tested the strength and consistency of the League. It was supposed that it should of necessity declare either for one party or the other; but it held to its independent course, and submitted to the house its demand for total, immediate, and unqualified repeal. When that motion was rejected, it refused to play the factious game of the monopolists, but steadily supported the Minister who "paid 17s. 6d. in the pound, and gave good security for the remaining half-crown."

Let it be remembered that the Free Trade agitation was the only movement exclusively originating with, and conducted by, the middle classes recorded in British history. The League sought no aristocratic leader, and submitted to no titled guidance; it was perfect democracy with all the unity of a despotism; it had no recognised head in whom its powers were concentrated, no absolute leader by whom its proceedings were uniformly directed. When any business was to be done, the fit man was found to volunteer without the trouble of a search; and he took the lead in his selected department until his mission was accomplished. Mutual agreement and mutual confidence supplied the place of command and obedience; and hence the steadiness of the power applied effectually prevented any derangement of the machinery. Everywhere in the League the spirit of self-sacrifice destroyed the spirit of selfishness so often apparent in other associations. The desire of all was to have the good effected; but the individual instrumentality was never brought into question. But the League itself was founded in self-sacrifice to an extent unparalleled in the world. The members of the Council were not idle men of fashion, on whose hands time hung heavy; as little were they professional politicians, taking up an agitation as a means of opening paths to place and power. They were all merchants and manufacturers to whom their counting-houses, their warehouses, and their factories were more valuable and precious than any offices which it is in the power of the Crown to bestow. Splendid as were their pecuniary donations, their devotion of their time and toil to the cause was a far heavier tax, and involved a greater amount of loss. They had no ambition to gratify; and, as the event proves, so far from seeking to make the League a leverage for personal elevation, they have resolved on its dissolution the moment that its object has been accomplished.

Many zealous friends of the cause will no doubt grieve over the dissolution of the League, and regret that its machinery was not applied to effect some other social improvement. But the League has never broken faith with the public. The most precious point in its history is its unsullied honour; and this must be preserved not only without taint, but without suspicion. To preserve the organisation and machinery of the League, and hand over the direction to some other association formed for a different object, however beneficial, would be inconsistent with the promises made from the beginning of the agitation, and would violate, if not the letter, most certainly the spirit of the League's engagements. Hitherto there has been the most perfect unanimity in the working of the League. Never was there so large a body in which there was so little, not merely of dissension, but even of difference of opinion. But this unanimity would be at an end the moment that it became necessary to choose a new subject for new exertions, and the result would exhibit a majority with little reason to boast, and a minority with much reason to complain.

Singleness of object has been one of the chief elements of the success which has crowned the efforts of the League. There were many occasions in the course of the struggle when a large addition of strength seemed likely to be gained by allying our cause with other demands more or less popular, but the seductions of temporary advantage were resisted, for the League relied for success more on strength of argument than on strength of numbers. Truth must in the long run prevail, and its progress would be retarded if it had been presented to the public mind in such a form as to distract attention. To have superadded another topic to our legitimate demand would have alienated many whose aid was desirable, not merely to increase our strength, but to smooth down the prejudices of adversaries. We sought to win our way, not by conquest, but by conviction; our victory has therefore been noiseless, and for that very reason is likely to be perpetual in its results. The silent ebb and flow of ocean produces eternal changes on the continents of the earth, but the effects produced by the storm and the tempest are either effaced by time or again altered by the next convulsion of the elements. Truth, like its Divine Author, is to be found neither in the whirlwind nor the earthquake, but in the still small voice.

That on some occasions more violent language was used than the occasion required, or than strict decorum might sanction, may safely be confessed; the immensity of the means was inseparable from the excess. An agitation spread over the whole extent of Britain must have occasionally fretted and foamed, like the tide when it passes over a shoal or is impeded by a rock; but these aberrations were lost in the general advantage; the dashing of the spray was but an incident in the onward flow of the mighty waters. There was an element of safety present in the very worst of these perils—the perfect publicity of the League's proceedings; and publicity is the best means to keep men innocent and to keep them rational. In none of the League's proceedings was there any vulgar denunciation against the Government, or any mysterious admiration of revolution; we had no crime to conceal, and no folly of which we should be ashamed.

The objects of the League were national, not selfish; they sought to protect the rights of the industrious from the wrongs of the idle; to secure to every man who sought to earn his subsistence "a fair day's wages for a fair day's work," and they sought this as earnestly for the labourers of Dorsetshire as for the operatives of Lancashire. They showed that protection deprived labour of its fair remuneration, and they listened to the cry of distress which the agricultural labourers uttered in their homely but forcible language, "We be protected, but we be starving." If the country is now convinced that the condition of the agricultural population imperatively demand investigation and redress, it is owing to the League;—if the Arcadian pictures of rural felicity which floated before the poetic vision of lords and squires have been dispelled to reveal the naked realities of misery and degradation they concealed, it is owing to the League; if the ravages committed by game on the property of the farmer, and the moral ruin brought by Game Laws on the character of the labourer, have been so exposed as to render the continuance of such a system impossible, it is owing to the League; if the wrong which insecurity inflicts on the tenant, and the limitation which the same insecurity affixes to the amount of employment for the labourer be now notorious and palpable, it is owing to the League. In fact, the League has done more for the agricultural than for the manufacturing interest; and ere long farmers will hallow its memory more affectionately and more devotedly than traders.

Our association, like every other institution, must perish when its destiny is fulfilled; but it leaves to the world the rich bequest of a bright example. Henceforth let no labourers in the cause of enlightened philanthropy despair of final success. The stripling with his stone and sling has proved adequate to the overthrow of the mighty giant. Noble ends sought by noble means more than compensate for any original disproportion of physical strength and power. The League is truly a great fact—a fact gained for humanity, and established as an eternal precedent in human improvement. "Recorded honours shall gather round its monument," for its origin was in rectitude, its course in justice, and its end in blessing.

A GLIMPSE INTO THE NEW ERA.—

In terminating our labours, we have the cheering satisfaction, that we have not merely achieved one vast reform, and uprooted one gigantic wrong, but laid the foundation, and cleared the way, for a wide variety of social and moral blessings. The benefits of the repeal of the Corn Law do not begin and end with the removal of a single vicious and oppressive enactment from the statute-book—nor even with the definitive establishment of just and true principles of economical legislation, applicable throughout the entire range of our commercial and industrial interests. They are not measurable by the rules and terms of economical science; they transcend altogether the formulas by which that science expresses the growth of the wealth of nations; they are not to be described in the statisticians' dialect of "facts and figures." Our commercial and industrial reform will be found very fruitful and far reaching in its scope and tendency—more so, perhaps, than any of us have yet habitually realised to our thoughts. The repeal of the Corn Law opens up a wide future of hopeful and beneficent endeavour to the philanthropist, the educator, the social reformer, and—as inclusive of these, in the new social era on which we are about to enter—to the statesman.

The great fact that will ever render this year, 1846, memorable in our annals may truly be called a "revolution." History has given the name to many and many a political event far less worthy of it—containing far less of the elements of social change and progression. It is characteristic of this revolution of ours, that it implies a fundamentally new conception, on the part of the ruling power of these realms, of the legitimate functions of legislation and government. The whole science and art of statesmanship are simplified. A fallacy which absorbed the time of the legislature, misdirected its attention, wasted its strength, perverted its morality, and fatally damaged its character and influence, is for ever swept away. Once for all it is ruled, that legislation and government have henceforth nothing to do with taking care of special class interests. Parliament is relieved of the endless, hopeless, profitless, and impossible task of making special statutory provision for the lucrativeness of this, that, or the other line of business. Never again will Parliament concern itself with guaranteeing the profits of any class of traders or producers—never again will it be regarded as among the duties of a statesman to settle the selling price of wheat. From this time forth, the legislature will no more think of controlling and regulating the supply and price of the people's food, than of controlling wind and regulating the rain. The law of Parliament will no more meddle with the law of trade than with the law of tides. The merchant, the manufacturer, the farmer, will mind his business—and the statesman his.

A great deliverance this! Having rolled away this enormous obstruction from the path of legislation and statesmanship, we have now a clear field for those social reforms, which have so long lain in abeyance, while our politicians were vainly harassing themselves about matters with which politicians have properly nothing to do. The repeal of the Corn Law has set free all the best minds of the country for the highest work that can engage the thoughts and efforts of public men. The intellectual and moral forces that have fought and won the battle of economical truth and justice, are at length liberated for other and yet nobler service. It is now open to our reformers to gird themselves to the task of assailing and subduing social and moral ills which it seemed little better than hopeless to attack so long as the spirit and power of evil had the vantage ground of a law that perplexed every social relation, made the enjoyment of every social blessing precarious, and poisoned the very breath of society by tainting the moral atmosphere with injustice. We are now at liberty to carry the war against ignorance, vice, crime, and misery. Sanitary reforms, criminal-law reforms, plans for the more effectual prevention of crime, and reformation of the criminal, may now be hopefully pressed on the attention of a legislature and a public released from the labours of assailing or defending a law for giving corn-growers a higher price than their corn is worth. We are now at leisure to grapple with the difficulties of that which is coming to be the first and foremost of national questions—THE EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE;—as the people themselves will be placed, by the improved conditions under which their industry will henceforward be carried on, in a better state to receive the blessings of education, and to appreciate and respond to the endeavours of an enlightened Government. We may say, of all questions of domestic policy affecting the intellectual, moral, and social amelioration of the people, that they will now, for the first time within the memory of man, begin to have fair play.

It will ever be matter for animating and joyful reflection to those who have toiled and struggled together in the great cause now happily triumphant, that they leave their country in a more hopeful condition than they found it, with reference, not merely to those economical interests which have been the more immediate aim of their agitation, but to all the higher ends of philanthropy and patriotism. The one great and decisive reform which we have leagued ourselves to achieve will be, directly or indirectly, the fruitful parent of an endless series of beneficent and peaceful changes. The whole social atmosphere is purified. An enlightened and invigorated public opinion—new securities for that physical and material well-being of the industrious millions which is the indispensable pre-requisite of social and moral improvement; an abolition of the old traditional landmarks of party contention—and a treaty of peace and amity between classes whom a false and vicious legislation had placed in temporary relations of antagonism;—such is the legacy of the expiring ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE to that NEW ERA which dates from its euthanasia of victory.

ANNALS OF THE LEAGUE.

If there be anything unusual in noticing works which are as yet unpublished, and to a great extent unwritten, we have to plead in excuse that when they are completed and published, our Journal will have ceased to exist. No one will deny the great interest and importance of an accurate record of the great Free Trade movement which has been just brought to a successful issue; and there is not among all who have taken part in its proceedings a gentleman so peculiarly qualified to become its historian as Mr. A. W. Paulton. He sat by its cradle, he shared in all the toils of its life, and he has largely contributed to its glorious consummation. Seven months before any society had been formed to organise agitation, the lectures on the Corn Laws which he delivered under peculiar circumstances at Bolton directed public attention to the food monopoly as the great source of mercantile and manufacturing distress; and the public meetings he subsequently held in all the principal seats of our national industry, during the autumn and winter of 1838, led to the formation of associations for emancipating trade from the injurious restrictions with which it was fettered. Mr. Paulton was in fact the immediate precursor of the League, and it was chiefly through his exertions that delegates were assembled from the principal manufacturing districts during the spring of 1839, at 'Brown's Hotel, in Palace-yard, from which assembly the League sprang. The preceding months may be regarded as a period of gestation, during which the League was struggling into existence; its proper birth-day was the 19th of March, 1839, the day after the rejection of Mr. Villiers's motion in the House of Commons. For the last three years Mr. Paulton has acted as the managing director of the League resident in London, and has superintended all its metropolitan proceedings. The ability with which these were directed, afford as decisive a proof of his competency as his position does of the unrivalled opportunities he had for acquiring minute and accurate information. His work will come before the public with all the weight of official authority. No other writer could possess equal advantages, and we know of few prepared to use such advantages with equal diligence, equal talent, and equal integrity. Such a historical record, as we are certain of obtaining at his hand, will be in literature what Herbert's historical picture will be in art, the only memorial of our great agitation, sanctioned by the approbation and assisted by the personal evidence of the great leaders of the movement.

THE "ECONOMIST" AND "OUR READERS."

The Economist newspaper, as our readers will learn on reference to our advertising columns, is about to enlarge its sphere of usefulness by the immediate addition of several new and important features. These changes have been rendered necessary in some measure by the great reform that has just been achieved in our commercial policy. The principles of Free Trade, adopted to so large an extent in the Corn Bill and Tariff, are no longer the main or exclusive objects of public interest. Devoted to the advocacy of these principles during a period of three years, the Economist has laboured with a zeal, ability, and fidelity, that has contributed in no small degree to the triumphant issue of our long struggle. No tribute that we could pay to the able conductor of that journal would adequately express our sense of the powerful aid he has rendered to our cause and principles. Whilst thus acknowledging our obligations, we are anxious at the same time to testify our future confidence in the integrity and vigilance with which the further application of these principles will hereafter be maintained. A wide futurity of fruitful reforms remains yet to be accomplished in our commercial and financial policy. An important, if not the chief portion of the business of the legislature for some years will necessarily lie in this direction. The Economist needs no vindication from us of its well-merited claims to public confidence and support. We are, however, about to close our labours as journalists. The work for which the League was organised is accomplished. Whatever remains to be done, the silent and steady growth of public opinion will speedily realise. As a guide for that opinion—as the just and fitting depository of that confidence which has been reposed in ourselves, we are anxious—most anxious, to recommend to our readers the claims of the Economist newspaper. It has already a large and influential circulation throughout the mercantile, manufacturing, and banking establishments of the country. We should rejoice to extend its influence among the great bulk of the middle and trading classes. It is impossible to estimate too highly the importance of popularising effectually the principles of which it has been so logical and practical an exponent.

As one means of conducing to this result, the changes contemplated by the Economist are most opportune. It is intended to associate all the elements of a perfect political and family newspaper, with the less attractive but most valuable department of commercial economics. Every member of the family circle will herein find its appropriate food. Each department, whether commercial, political, or literary, will be rendered as complete as possible, and conducted we have no doubt with an ability equal to that which has hitherto characterised its main features. It will therefore combine advantages which we will venture to say few other newspapers can adequately contest. For further particulars we must refer to the prospectus in our advertising columns, and content ourselves with thus cordially recommending the Economist to the confidence and support of our readers.

FREE TRADE CLUB.

This establishment, we are glad to learn, is in a prosperous and growing condition. Since the commencement of the present year, there has been a large accession of town and country members, and there is little doubt that the Free Trade Club will be one of the most numerous and widely supported institutions of the kind in the kingdom. It is, as most of our readers are aware, a Club composed of gentlemen who seek the abolition of all protective and differential duties, and has been brought into existence for the purpose of enabling such persons to come into friendly contact with Member of Parliament, and others who are interested in the emancipation of capital and industry from the restrictions which have been placed upon their productive powers.

We are exceedingly happy that this Club survives the dissolution of the League. In the progress of the great struggle for the abolition of the Corn Laws, men of all political parties, in every part of the country, have been brought acquainted with each other; and while they have been zealously labouring for a common object, now happily achieved, they have been led mutually to desire that their communion should not terminate with the disbanding of the great League army. We have ourselves strongly participated in this desire, and we know that such is the feeling also of every gentleman in Parliament and out of Parliament distinguished for his efforts to obtain the victory we are now celebrating. The FREE TRADE CLUB now presents itself as a place of occasional resort for all who have in times past fought shoulder to shoulder in the holy war. The terms of admission (which we give below) are such as to enable Free Traders throughout the kingdom to belong to it without inconvenience; and its advantages are such as to offer ample compensation for the annual fee, though the visits of a country member to the metropolis should be seldom and brief. Here, then, we hope to meet, from time to time, those who have been our fellow-labourers in the cause of Free Trade. Already the Club numbers amongst its supporters and regular frequenters the men to whom the nation is returning its thanks for the greatest national benefit ever obtained by peaceful means; and we cannot doubt that many hundreds will hasten to enrol themselves on the same list, and so perpetuate their connection with Free Trade measures, and Free Trade men:

TERMS.

Resident Members (within fifty miles of London)
Entrance Fee	£5 5
Annual Subscription	2 2
Non-Resident Members (beyond fifty miles from London)
Annual Subscription	2 2
No Entrance Fee is required from non-resident members.

RULE V. Each candidate for admission shall be proposed as a Free Trader, by one member (on personal knowledge) and seconded by another; and the candidate's name and usual place of residence, his rank, profession, or other description, must be forwarded to the Secretary (Mr. A. Moore) at the time of application.

The situation of the Club House, 27, Regent-street, is peculiarly convenient for country members—intersecting, as it does, the great thoroughfares of Piccadilly and Regent-street. Public conveyances to all parts of the town and its suburbs pass the door at all times of the day and night.

A list of sleeping apartments, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Club, is kept by the Secretary, and members intending to come to town can, by writing to him, and stating particulars, have an apartment engaged, and ready for them on arrival.

Having thus placed before our readers the objects, the principles, and the terms of the Free Trade Club, it only remains that we should recommend it to the attention of our friends throughout the country, who, we feel persuaded, have only to be aware of the facts we have placed before them to be induced to join it.

HERBERT'S PICTURE OF THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE.

We have great pleasure in recording the progress of this truly national work. Mr. Herbert has nearly completed the likeness of Cobden, and has sketched the heads of several other leaders. His portrait of Cobden has an intellectual life, such as we have rarely seen in the works of modern artists, and is one of the most revealing of mental character which we have ever beheld. The grouping is pre-eminently artistic; it conveys those ideas of earnestness and attention which were the marked characteristics of every meeting of the Council, and there is a delicacy in the management of the light and shade which makes all the accessories of the picture subservient to the principal design. We may now safely predict that Mr. Herbert's work will have very few rivals in the English school of historic art,—a school to which it essentially belongs by the singularity of purpose which is manifest in every part of the artist's delineation. We may also add, that the undertaking is one highly creditable to the spirit and enterprise of Mr. Agnew, who has entered into the speculation at his own individual risk, and who looks for no other patronage than that which the interests and merits of the work will win from a discerning public. We earnestly hope, indeed we confidently believe, that Free Traders throughout the empire will be anxious to possess a historical memorial of the greatest social victory that has ever been obtained by peaceful means; and that Mr. Agnew will obtain the reward due to his patriotic anxiety to render this pictorial record worthy of the great event which it commemorates.

THE MAN THAT PLAYED PUNCH.

(From the Nonconformist.)

When the noisiest of puppets has talked his fill, and the dog Toby has snarled and snarled through the part which was the consideration for his supper and the cracked trumpet is still, there is a shuffling of something like a curtain, and out there steps a man as little resembling any of the preceding performers as fancy could invent, whose entrance was undeniably the spring and mover of all that has been squeaked, or barked, or with less decorous inarticulate explosion discharged upon the public ear.

Let now, when the game is up, the drawing of the curtain reveals the authors and movers of the agitation which men mistook for Chartists. The protest of the protectionist peers has been made with paste and scissors, from the bills in which the migratory orators of the Northern Star went to challenge to wordy war the travelling preachers of the League. Not a word is omitted of what is weak, nor added of what is strong. Surely neither Punch nor his managers will ever be made ministers.

It is serious matter of hope, that none who have been capable of committing themselves to such a protest, will ever be found in a position to influence the fortunes of the country. In a few years the matter will have grown into a burlesque; or men at large will have so outgrown it, that it will be like those dresses of our ancestors which cannot in these days be looked upon with a grave countenance. The West Briton who wanted to lengthen his coat by sewing at the bottom a piece taken from the top, will be held only a type of a lordly protectionist and his commercial policy. Our children's children will wonder at what school men were educated for such a process of arithmetic; and most of all they shall admire the fatality by which, being simple, they could not refrain from chronicling their simplicity.

OUR EARLY FRIENDS.—In a recent article upon the House of Lords, we stated that only three peers of the realm had joined the League, viz., Lords Radnor, Ducie, and Kinnaird. A correspondent has, however, reminded us of the services of Earl Buchan, a peer of Scotland, who has for many years been a consistent supporter of our cause, and who joined the League, and presided at our meetings at a time when it was very unfashionable to do so. We should be sorry if, in the exultation over new converts, we should lose sight of one of our early friends.

MANCHESTER REFORM ASSOCIATION.—At a numerous meeting of this association on Tuesday, held at the Albion Hotel, Mr. Alderman Potter was elected chairman of the association, in the room of his father the late Sir Thomas Potter; and Mr. John Moorhouse was elected secretary of the association, in the place of the late Mr. Richard Webb.

REPRESENTATION OF NEWCASTLE UNDER-LYNE.—Mr. Geo. Graville Francis Egerton, the eldest son of Lord Francis Egerton, and nephew of the Duke of Sutherland, has announced himself, in the following terms, as a candidate for the representation of this borough:—"Having seen in the newspapers a letter addressed to you by one of your present members, declaring his intention of retiring from the representation of your borough in the event of a dissolution of Parliament, I take the liberty of announcing my intention of becoming a candidate for the honour of your suffrages at the earliest opportunity; and I shall venture to hope that the explanation of my political views and opinions will be such as to secure for me your confidence and support." Although the political views of the honourable candidate cannot be gathered from the above address, it is understood that he will come forward upon independent principles, irrespective of party, adopting the conduct of his noble father as the guide of his political life. The high claims of the noble family with which Mr. Egerton is connected—Trenttham, the seat of the Duke of Sutherland, being within four miles of Newcastle—are of themselves sufficient to insure the hon. gentleman's success.—Times.

EXPORTATION OF WHEAT.—Some time ago, in remarking upon the state of the corn markets in England, we expressed an opinion that some of our wheat in England would be exported to that country. During the last week, we find that about 20,000 quarters of the lower qualities have been bought at prices from 34s. to 40s. per quarter for that purpose.—Morning Chronicle.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE
SESSION OF 1846.

Twenty-fourth Week, ending Saturday, July 4.

A few years ago there was a gentleman in the House of Commons, whose manners were much more eccentric than his judgment was profound, and who, in this respect, was a tolerable rival of one of those gallant colonels, whom Mr. O'Connell has transmitted to future ages in an immortal parody. The name of the senator may be recollected from the fact, that in 1837 he was committed by the Lord Chancellor for contempt of the Court of Chancery; and the House of Commons refused to interfere in his behalf. On one occasion, our worthy representative made a vehement speech, though we doubt if it has been embalmed in Hansard. It was on some really unimportant matter, which, however, to his perceptions, seemed to involve the ruin of our glorious constitution. With vehement action, and in excited language, he declared his determination to stand by that flag which, he affirmed, had floated over us, unaltered and unchanged, for a thousand years. A thousand years is a long time for a flag to float, unaltered and unchanged. Lord Brougham, on a recent journey in the south of France, took shelter from the noon-day sun in the porch of an old church, situated in a secluded rural district. Here he was struck by an affiche, or placard, nearly as perfect as it had come from the printer's hands, and which contained a copy of a Government edict issued during the first French revolution. The document had remained undisturbed and undestroyed for half a century. But this was in the "sunny south;" and our damp climate, and restless spirits, are ill adapted for the preservation of literal or metaphorical flags or placards. Even in the British Museum the vivid colours of the paintings from the tombs of the Pharaohs are fading; and the Corporation of the city of London find it very hard to scrape a marble statue (Queen Anne, to wit) into pristine purity, when once it has been coated over with the coal-dust of ages. No wonder, therefore, that those present in the House of Commons laughed when they heard of the metaphorical flag of the constitution floating unaltered and unchanged during a thousand years. The monomania, like the leprosy, has disappeared; and if ever it should again exhibit itself, the humanest method of cure will be to move that the honourable member subject to the attack be ordered to read patiently and continuously the whole series of the "statutes at large."

Yet Lord Stanley was very near being violently affected by a fit of the "unaltered and unchanged." In that great speech of his, which he himself regards with some complacency, he answered that the principle of PROTECTION had been recognised by the legislature during five centuries. There is something excessively droll in such an impudent assumption. Dark and barbarous as were the notions and the customs of our ancestors, the great object of early legislation, however stupidly it was attempted, was to cheapen the price of food. No doubt the Richmonds, the Ashburtons, the Stanhopes, the Bentincks, and the Stanleys say, that modern protection is identical in spirit with ancient protection, namely, to secure and to cheapen home-grown produce. But the darkest night is not more different from the brightest day, than the circumstances of England now, and five centuries ago. The people of London can now get corn with more certainty from Australia than they could then from Lincoln, to say nothing of the ten thousand other considerations which affect the question. The possession of the soil has, of course, been always an important matter in this country: but PROTECTION, in its true, genuine, modern acceptance, only began when increase of population taught landlords the value of their property; when, by BOUNTIES on exportation, they enhanced the price of their produce, by getting the nation to pay them for sending corn abroad; and at last, when the population had outrun their ability to supply, changing the bounty on exportation into a PENALTY on importation, and thus tying down a great nation to deal, almost exclusively, at one chartered corn shop. Happily, we are now reverting to a state of things, and to a state of feeling, which will lead a House of Commons, as in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, to stare with amazement at the idea of BREAD being put amongst the "patents."

And even since 1815, what a curious and amusing history might be made, out of legislative doings and wriggings with respect to corn! The Corn Bill of the latter year just mentioned, with its prohibition of importation so long as prices remained under 80s.; the rise of the price in 1816-17—say in eighteen months—from 53s. 1d. to 112s. 7d., and then the rapid fall from 112s. 7d. to 74s., thus combining the baffling of the landlords, with the punishment of the people; the cry of agricultural distress during 1820-22; the grave proposal of Sir Thomas Lethbridge that there should be levied on all foreign corn a permanent duty of forty shillings a quarter; the no less grave proposal of Mr. Bennett (who lives to weep over the ruin of his beloved protection) that there should be a permanent duty of twenty-four shillings a quarter when the averages had reached 80s., and a drawback of 18s. on every quarter exported; the object being the same as that of the bounty system, to tempt exportation, and keep up home prices. Add to all this, that a Select Committee of the House of Commons, in 1821, had under its consideration a proposal for withdrawing the permission to warehouse foreign wheat or any other foreign grain in England; and when, in 1822, it was proposed that one million sterling in Exchequer bills should be applied by the Government for the purpose of buying up British wheat, and placing it in store. Indeed, the alternate BULLYING and WHINING of the agricultural interest, ever since 1816, remind us of the Lincoln's Inn beggar, as described by Gay, who whined over his crutch in the day-time, but used it for knocking down at night. Thus does Gay, in his Trivia, or "Art of Walking the Streets of London," published in 1712, caution the metropolitan pedestrian:

"Where Lincoln's Inn, wide space, is railed around,
Cross not with venturous step: there oft is found
The lurking thief, who, while the daylight shone,
Made the walls echo with his begging tone;
That crutch, which late compassion moved, shall wound
Thy bleeding head, and fell thee to the ground.
Though thou art tempted by the linkman's call,
Yet trust him not along the lonely wall;
In the mid-day he'll quench the flaming brand,
And share the booty with the pilfering band."

We say this in no spirit of taunt or of triumph. The moral victory we have won wholly indisposes us to trample on a fallen foe. Animated not by the lust of conquest, but by the spirit of conviction, we have fought to bring, not merely our friends but our adversaries, under the beneficent reign of sound principle. We have done this, as Sir Robert Peel has avouched, by "appeals to reason;" and the exultation of our triumph is, or at least ought to be, a reasonable one. Nevertheless there are good grounds for historical reminiscences. If the children of Egypt were to remember for ever the Egyptian bondage out of which they were brought, the people of England (and we use the illustration with reverence, though at the risk of being termed "blasphemous" by an Earl of Warwick) should never forget the dark days of monopoly. The agricultural mind has been pre-eminent for proving that "Tenterden steeple do be the cause of Goodwin sands;" and we are not yet fairly launched into the great ocean of Free Trade. Should anything occur while we are on the slips of the three years' probation, there are Bentincks and Stanleys on the watch, ready to tell the farmers that if a sheep be stolen, or a stack takes fire, it is all owing to the want of protection! Public opinion must, therefore, remember what has been, as well as observe what is; and in that case, we may safely conclude that agricultural protection will be consigned to a dictionary of obsolete phrases, and its history and meaning only hereafter to be found in some volume of the "Curiosities of Economic Legislation."

The legislative action of the ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE on public opinion commenced in 1839. At that time, on the subject of protection, the House of Commons was a too faithful reflection of the House of Lords. The question of the Corn Laws had all but died out of recollection; and though the present SPEAKER of the House of Commons, Mr. C. S. Lefevre, in a report which he drew up in 1836, recommended a moderate fixed duty, it was quite true what Mr. CORDEN subsequently said, that in 1835 the eloquence of a Demosthenes would not have attracted attention to the importance of Free Trade. But, at the close of 1836, occurred the commercial collapse, arising out of the monetary crisis in the United States, and its action on our own commerce; and this collapse was accompanied by a slightly deficient harvest. The foreign exchanges turned against us. Yet the cause or causes were very imperfectly understood. A large exportation of bullion was going on; and this compelled a great contraction of commercial accommodation, which was aggravated by the discredit thrown on the best houses, owing to the American revulsion. But men abused the Bank of England, and forgot the sliding scale; they talked much of currency, and said little about corn. We struggled through 1837, and seemed to be recovering, when the deficient harvest of 1838 plunged the country deeper into gloom and suffering. By this time, thinking men were laying their finger on the true cause of all our disasters. Colonel THOMPSON and Dr. BOWRING originated the Anti-Corn-Law crusade; and Mr. PAULTON commenced the first of that series of "appeals to reason" which have ended in so signal a moral triumph. On the 13th of December, 1838, the Manchester Chamber of Commerce agreed on a petition to Parliament, praying for the total and immediate repeal of the corn and provision laws; and in January, 1839, the first meeting of deputies was held in Manchester. This led to the delegation which assembled in London on the commencement of the session—the memorable Anti-Corn-Law Parliament which met at Brown's Hotel, Palace Yard, in the spring of 1839. Dr. BOWRING was placed at the head of an EVIDENCE Committee; Mr. VILLIERS was selected to lead the battle in the House of Commons. Mr. VILLIERS moved "That this house will immediately resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to take into consideration the act regulating the importation of foreign corn." He did not obtain even a respectful hearing. The division was called for, amidst the wildest hootings and outcries; and 344 against 197 rushed into the lobbies to silence a national demand.

In truth, we can hardly wonder at it. Protection had shot its roots into the soil; capital had been invested; mortgages made; incumbrances created; settlements assigned; leases contracted—all on the faith of the unjust and exclusive possession of the home market. A strong self-interest was the foundation of protection; and that foundation has become concrete. The "agricultural mind" sat in its arm-chair of statutory law; and the daughters of fraud and delusion, whose names are fallacy, clap-trap, and sentiment, waited upon the portly personage. When public opinion came into the presence of the "agricultural mind," fallacy stepped forward, and spoke of capital invested in the soil, of labourers employed, of great incomes spent, of money circulated, and of a home market, the loss of which would bring ruin to millions.

Then Clap-trap sung a song, the burden of which was "independence of foreigners," and which implied that in the event of a war, our snug little island would supply us with all that we wanted, and enable us to laugh at all our enemies. And Sentiment, with grave aspect, would point to the "broad acres," and the village rustics, blooming with health, and redolent of content, all dancing on the village green; while in the dim distance tall chimneys vomiting clouds of smoke, partly disclosed and partly concealed the squalid regions where avarice counted its money bags, and ground humanity into "devil's dust." Public opinion was somewhat bewildered; and retired, muttering that "much might be said on both sides."

We know not that we can better exhibit, in a few lines, a more vivid condensation of the fallacy, clap-trap, and sentiment which were associated with the Corn Laws than by quoting a celebrated passage from a celebrated speech, which, in 1839, drew thunders of applause from all parts of the House of Commons. The orator has since bravely recanted his error. He has since applied his vigorous mind to the question, has spoken with a power and an eloquence which have been of immense benefit to the cause in its last struggle, and has proved his sincerity by submitting to the penalty which has followed his change of opinion and of action. With no feeling of disrespect towards Sir JAMES GRAHAM, but the reverse, we quote the passage, because it embodies all that poetry could achieve in defence of a Corn Law, and represents to us historically the nature of the feeling prevalent in the minds of not a few of the working, a considerable portion of the middle, and nearly all the higher classes, in the year 1839:

"What change more cruel could despotism itself inflict than a change from 'the breezy call of incense-breathing morn,' to a painful and grievous obedience to the sad sound of the factory bell; the relinquishment of the thatched cottage, the blooming garden, and the village green, for the foul garret or the dark cellar of the crowded city; the enjoyment of the rural walk of the innocent rustic Sabbath, for the debauchery, the temptations, the pestilence, the sorrows, and the sins of a congregated multitude? Where were their moralists, that their voices were not raised against the fearful consequences that would follow in its train? Talk of sending the Poles to Siberia, or the Hill Coolies from Coromandel to the Mauritius—the authors of the proposed change contemplated the perpetration, 'within the limits of their native land, of a cruelty far more atrocious.' It was the first step towards making England the workshop of the world, dependent for its daily support upon Continental supplies."

In this passage Sir James Graham re-echoed the prevalent feelings and opinions of a great bulk of the British public. That he was sincere in 1839 we have no reason to doubt; that he is sincere now we have ample evidence to show. Since 1839, "appeals to reason," official experience, the force of circumstances, the results of legislative experiment, and deliberate investigation, have shown him the fallacy of his fears; and the greatness of the change wrought in public opinion may be inferred from the fact, that, with the approbation of a majority of the House of Commons, and the admiration of the British people, Sir James Graham concluded one of his many able speeches in 1846, by a quotation from Pope, as to the probable results of Free Trade:

"The time shall come, when free as air or wind,
Unbounded Thames shall flow for all mankind,
Whole nations enter with each swelling tide,
And seas but join the regions they divide;
Earth's distant ends our glories shall behold,
And a new world launch forth to meet the old."

Amongst the most formidable of the antagonists which the Anti-Corn-Law League had to overcome, in the earlier portion of its career, were the believers in the "abstract" truth of Free Trade doctrines, but who denied their applicability to such a country as this. Strong minds are apt to undervalue this class of reasoners, and to speak of them with contempt. Of this, a somewhat whimsical example is given by Mr. Austen, in his "Province of Jurisprudence Determined." Speaking of the usual fallacious disjunction of theory and practice, he bursts out in the following characteristic way: "'Tis true in theory, but then 'tis false in practice. This says NOODLE. And this he propoundeth with a look of profundity that were enough to make ye split. But with due and discreet deference to this worshipful and weighty personage, that which is true in theory is also true in practice."

So no doubt it appears to minds that can reason like Mr. Austen. But in the early stages of a great national controversy, before public opinion has been enlightened on the subject, that generic creature whom Mr. Austen contemptuously terms "Noodle," is really a "worshipful and mighty personage." For "Noodle" embraces a large portion of the average respectability and intelligence of the nation—cautious bankers, quiet merchants, sober shopkeepers, who revolve a new opinion a long time before they can persuade themselves to take it up—men who prefer being led to being driven, and who like to lean on authority. And we are not sure but that Sir Robert Peel himself, in the early stages of the Corn Law controversy, was a light and an example of Noddledom. He never denied the "abstract" truth of Free Trade principles—nay, he admitted them. In 1825, he joined with Mr. Huskisson in partially applying them in practice. As leader of the Opposition, he repeatedly told his followers that there was no special virtue in the sliding scale; and declared that he would not pledge himself to maintain it. His memorable speech of the 27th of August, 1841, contained a distinct declaration to that effect; and he even went the length of putting a hypothetical case, in which he said, alluding to the condition of the country, that if any sacrifice on the part of the agricultural interest could prevent their being the "real cause of the distress—could prevent the continuance of it—could offer a guarantee against the recurrence of it—I would earnestly advise a relaxation, an alteration,—nay, if necessary, a repeal of the Corn Laws.” But hail-stones pattering on a pent-house make no impression; and abstract belief has little influence on many minds, until they come into positive contact with circumstances. When Sir Robert Peel assumed office in 1841, the responsibility of having to provide for a state of things indicated by the appalling state of Paisley, of Stockport, and of the manufacturing districts generally, made an indelible impression on him. He studied the report of the Import Duties’ Committee, made in 1810; he tried the experiment of reducing the sliding scale; he revised the tariff; he listened attentively to Free Trade debates; and again and again his countenance indicated the effect which the speeches of Mr. VILLIERS, Mr. COBDEN, and Mr. BRIGHT, made upon him; his defence of the Corn Laws, growing feebler every session, indicated it still more; until at last, compelled by the force of argument, the power of truth, the demonstration of experience, and the danger to which the country was exposed from a deficient harvest, he plucked the idol from its niche, and dashed it on the ground.

During 1840, the Anti-Corn-Law League continued its up-hill work; and though Mr. VILLIERS again brought forward his annual motion, and was again defeated, by 300 to 177, the controversy was mainly carried on out of doors. Innumerable were the pamphlets, the speeches, and the lectures. Grave, and even reverend men, rushed into cheap tracts, conjuring the working classes not to listen to selfish manufacturers, who, for an inappreciable fractional reduction on the price of a loaf, contemplated the ruin of the upper classes, and the bondage of the lower. Philosophic economists started unsolved problems, and in letters addressed to men high in office or station, expressed apprehension that this country could not “fight hostile tariffs with free imports.” Professional men, attorneys and doctors, assailed the “millocracy.” Cotton lords would prove, so it was said, far worse despots than landlords. The Standard newspaper thought that England would be as happy and glorious, if all our manufacturing towns were razed to the ground. Yet in 1840 appeared Mr. Hume’s Import Duties’ Committee Report, one of the most memorable legislative “appeals to reason,” by which the great contest has been carried on. And though Free Trade seemed to suffer a reverse at the general election of 1841, it must not be forgotten that the present Parliament was opened with a Free Trade Royal Speech; and Lord John Russell, even in the act of laying down his power, declared to the citizens of London his strong conviction, that though the people of England had repudiated the principles of commercial legislation proposed by the Whigs, yet they would discuss, hesitate, pause, and deliberate over, and finally adopt them!

The general election of 1841 gave us what was thought to be a protective administration; but it gave us, also, RICHARD COBDEN as a legislator. In 1842, the controversy which had been carried on chiefly out of doors, was transferred to the floor of the House of Commons. We had passed through a dreadful winter. The manufacturing districts were in an appalling condition. Paisley was living on public bounty. Whole streets in Stockport were depopulated. Bolton endured a “famine siege.” Workmen, wandering about idle and hungry, cheered the expression of the hope that “Captain Swing would take command.” The commercial distress reached the metropolis; and the poor-rates in the city of London shot up enormously, because crowds of despairing creatures, flying from the “wolf” behind them, thought to find bread or food in the vast and wealthy capital of the country. A “Queen’s Letter” called on the more fortunate to contribute to the support of the poor; the churches resounded with exhortations; thousands of pounds were collected, and speedily disappeared. Thus opened the year 1842; and all were waiting on the plans of Sir Robert Peel. He had not then made himself up to part with the sliding scale—that was still too bold a step. So, on the 9th of February, 1842, when he propounded his new edition, which, last week, went out of print, the minds of the swarming country gentlemen were relieved of dreadful apprehensions; and the only voice which, on that evening, spoke of the measure, was that of Mr. COBDEN, who denounced the modification as “an insult to a suffering country.”

But the first real Free Trade movement made by Sir R. Peel, was when he propounded his new tariff on the 11th of March, 1842. In carrying through that measure, which occupied a great portion of the session, the Prime Minister had the high honour of receiving the approbation and the support of Mr. D’ISRAELI. The member for Shrewsbury sat immediately behind the Treasury bench; his speech is preserved in Hansard, wherein he proved that Lord Shelburne and Mr. Pitt were our first legislative Free Traders, and that the Whigs, including Burke, Fox, Grey, Sheridan, had opposed themselves to a relaxation of our commercial policy, when Mr. Pitt proposed it. True, Mr. D’Israeli changed his place, and altered his opinion; but thereby the speech of 1842 is not deprived of one particle of its cogency, because the measures of 1842 are surpassed by the measures of 1846.

The tariff of 1842 nearly led to a disruption in the Conservative camp, Sir Richard Vyvyan, the member for Helston, in particular, denouncing Sir Robert Peel in strong language, especially through the medium of a publisher’s letter. Mr. Miles was also valiant on the subject of foreign cattle, which, for the first time, were permitted to land on British shores, on the payment of a duty of 1*l.* per horned head—a duty now swept away by the greater tariff of 1846. The late Lord Western bitterly complained in the House of Lords that the agriculturists had been deceived by Sir R. Peel, in his introduction of the new Corn Law, although Sir R. Peel, not eight months previously, had told a crowded House of Commons that he would not accept the support of the agricultural interest of the condition of maintaining all the details of the law of 1828. And the Dukes of Buckingham, Richmond, and Cleveland, Earl Stanhope, and Lord Beaumont, poured out, in 1842, lamentations, ejaculations, and objurgations, precisely as they did in 1846, and with as little effect. The Free Traders in the House of Commons were not idle. Manifest were the amendments proposed, and the discussions raised, and the “distress of the country” afforded a theme for animated and earnest debate. Mr. Ward raised the subject of “special burdens.” Mr. Cobden moved that as it was beyond the power of Parliament to regulate the wages of labour, it was unjust to pass an act to regulate, with a view to raise unnaturally, the price of food; and Mr. Villiers had his annual debate on the Corn Laws. The session of 1842 thus laid the legislative foundation of Free Trade. Imperfectly, as the tariff of 1842 realised the doctrine, the people saw in the Customs’ Act of that year a very decided attempt to carry out the principle of “buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market; while the admissions of Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Gladstone, and the arguments of Mr. Villiers and Mr. Cobden deepened the impression.

Meantime, the protracted discussions of the session of 1842 had the effect of aggravating commercial embarrassments, for trade and commerce were all but suspended, waiting the passing of the Tariff. We had already witnessed five harvests in succession, more or less deficient; and the moist heavy rains of July threatened us with another. Lord Palmerston gave warning of the danger. Sir Robert Peel nervously assured the house that in some favoured nook of the south of England, “the harvest had already begun.” And Mr. Cobden protested against closing the doors of Parliament, proclaiming, in thrilling accents, that “the country was drifting on to confusion without rudder or compass!” But the doors of Parliament were closed; the insurrection of the working classes in the north broke out; though Providence, in his mercy, saved us from the horrors of a sixth deficient harvest in succession, the month of August proving one of extraordinary heat and dryness, filling the grain, and ripening the crops.

The speculators in foreign grain had fully made up their minds that we should have another deficient harvest; and they made extraordinary preparations. A large stock in bond was lying, ready to be taken out at the critical moment. Prices, instead of going up, went down; stock had to be taken out of bond at a high instead of a low duty, in order to satisfy the Lombard Street bankers, who had made large advances: enormous loss instead of profit was the result; a commercial pestilence swept Mark Lane. The abundant harvest was of itself sufficient to cause a considerable fall in price, which was increased by the great quantity of foreign grain poured on the market; and the farmers had now to encounter a phenomena with which, ever since 1836, they had not been familiar. They had hitherto been in some sort compensated for diminished consumption by high prices; now low prices and limited demand came together; and the “agricultural mind” was driven into imperfect cogitation on the causes of distress.

Notwithstanding agricultural distress, the winter of 1842-3 was got over much easier than previous winters. Cheapness of food had something to do with this; while commerce and trade received some impetus from the news of the termination of the war with China, and the opening of its ports to our manufacturers. Still at the opening of the session of 1843, the state of the country was such as to justify the Government in stating in the Royal Speech that the “diminished receipts from some of the ordinary sources of income” was “attributable to the reduced consumption of many articles, caused by that depression of the manufacturing industry of the country which has so long prevailed.” Little was practically done in 1843 for Free Trade; but much was effectively said. In the famous debate on Lord Howick’s motion, Sir James Graham admitted that the principles of Free Trade were recognised by every man of common sense; and this declaration was confirmed, in subsequent debates, by other members of the Cabinet. Mr. Goulburn said that the “abstract” truth of Free Trade principles had never been disputed; and Mr. Gladstone assented. It is true, that in the debate on the annual motion of Mr. Villiers, another Cabinet Minister advanced to the table, and gravely stated that one of the reasons why the Corn Laws should be kept up was that landlords should be enabled to keep their position in society, and provide marriage settlements for their daughters. If one did not know that Sir Edward Knatchbull was perfectly sincere and serious in this, it might be suspected that he was enacting the part of a Parliamentary Dean Swift, and battering down the Corn Laws by a stroke of imitable humour. But though little was done in 1843, the session was not wholly barren. Mr. BRIGHT appeared in the House of Commons, having made at Durham, as the Marquis of Londonderry recently assured the House of Lords, “the very best speech that ever was heard, on the subject of the repeal of the Corn Laws.” [Doubtless, that speech laid the foundation of the conversion of the noble marquis.] Lord Stanley, too, introduced his Canada Corn Bill, the loss of which, by the measures of the present session, seems to have caused him so much chagrin; Mr. Gladstone repealed the restrictions on the exportation of machinery; and those discussions on SUGAR began which are not yet terminated. Towards the close of the session Mr. COBDEN delivered a powerful speech on the relative value of our colonial and foreign trade, and startled the house with one of his pithy sayings—“It is with people we should deal, and not with barren wastes!”

Commercial prosperity, slowly returning, made its presence palpable in the autumn of 1843. Short-sighted people then indulged in the delusion that Anti-Corn-Law agitation would “die.” Little did they know the energy, the earnestness, and the faith which inspired the leaders of the League. In this department we cannot properly intermeddle with the history of the Anti-Corn-Law League outside the walls of Parliament. The fund, first of FIFTY THOUSAND, then of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUNDS; the issue of ten millions of tracts; the deputations to the agricultural districts; the electioneering movements; the removal to London—all these events will be fully recorded by Mr. PAULTON, himself one of the earliest of the actors in this great movement. But though commercial prosperity did not abate the ardour of the leaders of the League, they were so far discouraged by Parliamentary apathy as to advise that for the present the agitation should be carried on rather in the country than in the House of Commons. That this was a mistake was soon seen, and remedied afterwards; for however hostile the House of Commons might be on the subject of corn, the fiscal reductions which Sir Robert Peel effected in 1844 on glass, vinegar, currants, coffee, marine insurances, and wool, showed that the Prime Minister was steadily pursuing his course of financial reform: while the memorable debates on the Ten Hours’ clause in the Factories Bill, and the no less memorable phrase used by Sir James Graham about the “HOUSE OF CARDS” (the significance of which was immediately discerned by Mr. COBDEN) caused a deep impression to be made on the public mind. But it would be quite wrong to convey the impression that in 1844 the Anti-Corn-Law League did nothing in Parliament. It was on the 12th of March of that year that Mr. COBDEN moved for a select committee to inquire into the effects of protective duties upon the interests of tenant farmers and farm labourers. The speech which the member for Stockport made on this occasion was one of those creative things which give a new aspect to a controversy, and a fresh impetus to the national intellect. The country gentlemen, who attended in crowds, and sat in silent amazement, listening to their teacher, showed by their interest at once the power of the orator and the novelty of the subject; and though Mr. Gladstone opposed the motion, that speech of Mr. Cobden’s sank at the time into the heart and soul of Sir Robert Peel, and prepared the finale of the Corn Laws.

At the commencement of the session of 1845, the public of London rushed in crowds to hear Sir Robert Peel propose still more sweeping financial reductions, repealing the cotton, glass, and 430 other duties, lowering the duty on sugar, and otherwise amending our tariff. All this, of course, furnished abundant opportunity for keeping up the Free Trade discussion; while the conduct of the lauded interest on “GREASE,” “LARD,” and other infinitely small matters, plunged them into the mire of public odium. The annual motion of Mr. VILLIERS was met by speeches from Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham, in which there were clear indications that they were on the eve of surrendering the citadel. Then followed the cold wet autumn; the potato rot; the apprehended scarcity; and the cabinet “crisis.”

The results of the session of 1846, not yet brought to a close, are too fresh in the recollection of our readers to require recapitulation. Throughout the whole of the present Parliament, from the autumn of 1841 till the present time, we have had the opportunity of attentively observing the conduct of the Parliamentary leaders of the ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE. Never shrinking from seizing every available opportunity for discussion, they have never frittered away their resources. All their “appeals to reason” have been conducted with due deference to constitutional and Parliamentary forms. They never turned the debate into a bore, by keeping it up beyond all reasonable length. They never lowered the dignity of their cause by coming unprepared. They always watched the suitable time (a matter of great importance in the House of Commons) so that no use of the forms of the house could throw ridicule on their efforts. Their first quality has been earnestness; their second perseverance; their third patience; their fourth, intellectual ability and incessant effort; and their fifth, moral power. But admirable as has been their conduct throughout, it has been surpassed during the present session. From the moment that the Prime Minister came forward to repeal the Corn Laws, the Anti-Corn-Law League was quiet. The leaders did not rush forward with vulgar haste, exclaiming to Sir Robert Peel—“That’s our thunder!” Nor did they ostentatiously parade their support of the Government; their speeches were few, and to the point, made not to show that they were the authors of Corn Law repeal, but simply to afford the needed aid at the fitting time. And they have their reward. The Prime Minister proclaims to the world that the repeal of the Corn Laws is due neither to himself nor to Lord John Russell, neither to Tory nor to Whig, but to that combination of moral and intellectual power, of which the type is the name of RICHARD COBDEN.

END OF THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

SIR R. PEELE at half past five o’clock entered the house amid profound silence and took his seat. In a few moments he rose and spoke as follows: Mr. Speaker—Sir, I feel it to be my duty to avail myself of the earliest opportunity of notifying to this house that, in consequence of the position of her Majesty’s Government, and especially in consequence of that vote to which the house came on the night of Thursday last, by which they refused to give to her Majesty's Government those powers which they deemed necessary for the repression of outrage and the protection of life in Ireland, her Majesty's servants have felt it their duty to tender their resignation to a gracious Sovereign. The resolution to tender that resignation was the unanimous resolution of her Majesty's servants, adopted without hesitation. Sir, if I had any complaint to prefer with respect to the course pursued by the house, this is not the occasion on which I should venture to prefer it. It is impossible not to feel that that occasion by which a great change takes place in the councils of a great empire, affecting for weal or for woe, the welfare of many millions of the Queen's subjects, in almost all parts of the habitable globe—it is impossible not to feel that that is an important, I might almost say a solemn occasion—and it is not on such an occasion that one word ought to be said by a Minister, acting in homage to constitutional principles, which can by possibility revive controversies of an acrimonious character. Sir, such controversies would be wholly unsuited to the magnitude of this occasion, and I must also say, the provocation of any such controversy would be wholly at variance with the feelings which influence me in addressing this house (cheers). These feelings would rather prompt me to acknowledge with gratitude the many occasions on which, speaking of the great body of the gentlemen on this side of the house, at periods antecedent to the present session, I and my colleagues have received a generous and cordial support. These feelings would also rather prompt me to acknowledge with gratitude the occasions on which, from those gentlemen opposite, in omission of party differences, her Majesty's Government have received, for measures of which those gentlemen approved also, a cordial support; and I trust therefore, Sir, that nothing will escape me in explaining the course which her Majesty's Government have thought it their duty to pursue which can run the risk of provoking those controversies which I so deprecate. Sir, her Majesty has been graciously pleased to accept that tender of resignation, and her Majesty's servants now only hold their offices until their successors shall have been appointed. Sir, I said that if I had complaints to prefer, this would not be the occasion on which I would prefer them; but I must also say, that I did not propose those measures connected with our commercial policy at the commencement of this session without foreseeing that, whether those measures succeeded or failed, they must cause the dissolution of the Government which proposed them; and therefore, Sir, I rather rejoice that her Majesty's Government have been relieved from any doubt by an early decision of this house, as to the course it would be their duty to pursue; for I do not hesitate to say that, even if that vote had been in my favour, I would not have consented to hold office by sufferance or by the evasion of any principle (great cheering). I believe that it is not for the public interest that a Government should remain in power unable to give practical effect to the measures which they consider necessary to the public welfare; and in the position in which her Majesty's Government was placed, by the withdrawal, perhaps the natural withdrawal, of the confidence of many of those who had heretofore given them their support, I do not think it probable that even if the vote to which I refer had been in my favour, her Majesty's Government would have been enabled, with credit to themselves and with advantage to the country, to continue in the administration of public affairs (great cheering). Sir, we have advised her Majesty to accept our resignations without adopting that alternative which we might have adopted, viz., recommending to the Crown the exercise of its prerogative, and to dissolve the present Parliament. We have preferred the immediate tender of resignation to the adoption of that alternative. Sir, I do not hesitate to say, speaking with a frankness which I trust will offend no one, that if her Majesty's Government had failed in carrying in all their integrity, those measures of commercial policy which it was my duty to recommend, I do not hesitate to say that there is no exertion I would not have made (loud cheering) in order, if not to insure their ultimate success, at least to give the country an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion on the subject (loud cheers). In that case I should have felt myself justified in advising a dissolution, because I think that the continuance of doubt on such a subject would have been a greater evil than resorting to a constitutional expression of opinion by the people of this country (cheers). But there is no necessity for a dissolution on this ground:—those who dissented from those measures have withdrawn their opposition, and I am bound to say it was not a factious or unseemly opposition, to them; simply protesting against them, they have given finally their consent to those measures, and those measures having passed into law, I do not feel I should have been justified, for any subordinate consideration, for the interest of the Government merely, in advising the exercise of the prerogative to which I refer, and dissolving the Parliament (hear, hear). Because I feel strongly this,—that no administration is justified in advising the exercise of that prerogative unless there be a fair, reasonable presumption, even a strong moral conviction, that after a dissolution they should have had a party powerful enough in this house to enable us to give effect practically to the measures which we might propose. Now, I don't mean a support founded on mere temporary sympathy with our position on the part of those who, otherwise, are opposed to us; I do not mean a support founded on a concurrence on one great question of domestic policy, however important that may be. I think we ought not to dissolve without having a full assurance that we should have the support, not of those who differ from us on almost all questions of public policy, agreeing with us in one, but that we should have the support of a powerful party united to us by a general concurrence of political opinion (cheers). And I am bound to say, that in the general division of parties, and after all that has occurred, I did not entertain a confident hope that a dissolution of Parliament would have given us that support (hear, hear). I must also say that, after all the excitement which has taken place, and after the stagnation of trade consequent upon our protracted discussions, it did appear to us that this was a period when it would not be judicious to take such a step (hear, and cheers). Upon these grounds, we preferred instant resignation to the alternative of a dissolution. We were left in a minority on a question connected with Ireland (hear). Now I should lament, not merely because it is an Irish question, but I should most deeply lament if it could be thought that the measure which we proposed for the repression of outrage in Ireland was an indication that her Majesty's servants held any different opinion with regard to the policy to be pursued in Ireland from that which I declared towards the close of the last session of Parliament (hear, hear). To the opinions which I then avowed—to those opinions which had a practical effect given to them by the Charitable Bequests Act, and by the additional vote for the endowment of Maynooth—to those opinions I, now about to relinquish power, entirely subscribe (great cheering). We brought forward that measure, believing that resistance to the contagion of crime and the vigorous repression by law of the offences which disgrace some parts of Ireland, were not measures calculated permanently to improve the social condition of that country; but we thought they were measures which could be taken in conjunction with others necessary for the purpose of giving effect to legislation upon that subject (hear, hear). The house has, however, decided, and I am not about to impeach their decision. I only deprecate any inference, which would be unjustifiable, that, because we proposed those measures, which some called measures of coercion, which we call measures for the protection of life, therefore our views with regard to the policy to be pursued towards Ireland have undergone any change. Speaking for myself, I do not hesitate now to say that, in my opinion, there ought to be established between England and Ireland a complete equality (great cheering) in all civil, municipal, and political rights (renewed cheers). When I say complete equality, I don't mean, because I know it is impossible, to have a literal equality in every particular. Here, as in matters of more sacred import, it may be that "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life;" I speak of the spirit, and not of the letter, in which our legislation with regard to the franchise and other privileges should be conducted (hear, hear). I mean, there should be a real, substantial equality, in political and civil rights (cheers); so that no person, viewing Ireland with perfectly disinterested eyes, and comparing its franchise with the franchise either of England or Scotland, should be enabled to say, "A different law is enacted for Ireland, and on account of some jealousy or suspicion, Ireland has curtailed and mutilated rights." That is what I mean by equality of political franchises. Does any gentleman think I am making a reserve (cheers, and cries of "No, no")? I speak of the spirit in which we should legislate. I think it ought to be impossible to say that there is a different rule, substantially, with regard to civil or municipal franchise in Ireland from that which prevails in England (cheers). Now, Sir, with regard to our executive administration in Ireland, I think the favour of the crown ought to be bestowed in that country, and the confidence of the Crown, without reference to religious distinctions (loud cheers). It has not been from entertaining a different opinion that there may be, in our case, the appearance of partiality. Where we have taken the opportunity of manifesting confidence in some Roman Catholics, I cannot say that justice was always done to our motives, nor has the position of the individual in accepting favour from us been altogether such as to create an anxiety for the repetition of similar favours (hear, hear). Those who succeed us may have different means of carrying that principle into execution; but if they do act upon that principle, and bestow the favour and confidence of the Crown, without reference to religious differences of opinion, they shall hear no complaint from me on that ground (loud cheers). Then, Sir, with respect to the spirit in which our legislation should be conducted; adhering to all the opinions which I have expressed on the greater and more important points of Irish policy, yet I must say I, for one, am prepared to co-operate with those who feel the present social condition of the people in respect to the tenure of land, and the relation between landlord and tenant, to be one that deserves our immediate and most cautious consideration (cheers). I think it may be impossible, by legislation, to apply any immediate remedy to the state of things which unfortunately prevails in that country; but, even if the benefit is remote, if it is of a permanent character, so far from being deterred from measures calculated to afford a remedy, the distant period at which the benefit may be derived ought to operate as no discouragement to us to apply our minds most sedulously and impartially to the consideration of the subject (loud cheers). Again, with respect to legislation on all those matters connected with the tenure of land and the relation of landlord and tenant—while upholding the rights of property, which I believe you will find no advantage in violating, yet, on the whole, I think the course we have taken during this session of extreme pressure of public business is a sufficient proof that there has been no disinclination on our part to consider that subject (hear, hear). Neither will there be any disinclination to co-operate with those to whom the practical administration of affairs may be committed (hear, hear, and cheers). Sir, I have reason to believe that the noble lord the member for the city of London has been commanded by her Majesty to repair to her for the purpose of rendering his assistance in the formation of a Government (hear, hear). Sir, I presume the general principle upon which the Government formed by the noble lord will act, so far as a commercial policy is concerned, will be the continued application of those principles which tend to give us a freer commercial intercourse with other countries (loud cheers). If that be the policy which will be pursued, as I confidently expect it will be, I shall feel it to be my duty to give to that Government, in pursuance and execution of that policy, my cordial support (immense cheering). I presume, therefore, that her Majesty's Government will adopt that policy—and that, if other countries choose to buy in the dearest market, it will be no discouragement to them to permit us to buy in the cheapest (cheers). I trust that they will not resume the policy which they and we have felt most inconvenient, namely, haggling with foreign countries, instead of taking that independent course which we believe to be conducive to our own interests (cheers), trusting to the influence of public opinion in other countries, that our example, with the practical benefit we derive from it, will at no remote period insure the adoption of the same course, rather than hoping to obtain commercial privileges as an equivalent for the reduction of particular duties ("hear" and cheers). Sir, when I say I presume that these general principles will influence their commercial policy, I do not of course mean to say that the adoption of these principles is at once to overrule every moral consideration, and at once to subject every part of the inhabitants of this empire to unequal competition with other nations. I speak generally as to the tendency of our commercial policy, and I trust that every step that is taken will be towards the relaxation of restriction upon trade. I, for one, shall not urge upon them a hasty and precipitate adoption of principles sound in themselves, if they are likely to incur the risk of a great derangement of the great social system. I shall bear in mind, that great experiments have been recently made under the present administration; that the surplus amount of revenue is smaller than I could wish it to be, consistently with the permanent interests of the country, and while I offer a cordial support in enforcing the general principles of commercial policy which have received the sanction of Parliament in the present session, I shall not urge them to any such simultaneous and precipitate adoption of them as may be either really injurious to interests from special circumstances entitled to some continued protection, nor shall I urge them to any such rash and precipitate adoption of them as would incur the risk of deranging the finances of the country. Speaking thus, I am bound to say that I am rather indicating my own intentions and the course I shall pursue, than that I have had the opportunity of conferring with others and speaking their sentiments. I cannot doubt, however, that those who gave their cordial concurrence to the measures which I proposed will be ready to give their general acquiescence and support to measures of a similar character to be proposed (loud cheers). Sir, I do not know that it is necessary that I should make any other declaration than those I have made. I wish to draw no invidious contrast; I wish to make no unseemly allusions; but I cannot surrender power without making at least this observation,—that I do hope, during the five years for which power has been committed to our hands, neither the interests nor the honour of this country have been compromised (cheers). I think I may say with truth that, during that period, the burden of taxation has been equalised, and the pressure which was unjust and severe has been removed from many classes of her Majesty's subjects (cheers). I think I may say with truth, that many restrictions upon commerce injuriously affecting the trade of this country have been removed (cheers). I think I may say that, without at all interfering with legitimate speculation; without at all paralysing or deranging the credit of the country, stability has been given to the monetary system of this country, through the cordial support which again (without reference to party distinctions) the measures I proposed with regard to the Bank of England, the joint stock banks, and the private banks of this country, received in the year 1843. Sir, I trust also that the stability of our Indian empire has not been weakened by the policy we have pursued; and that the glory and honour of the British arms both by sea and land in every part of the world have been maintained, not through our exertions, but through the devoted gallantry of the soldiers and sailors of this country (cheers). Sir, although there have been considerable reductions, great reductions made in the public burdens, yet I have the satisfaction of stating to the house, that the national defences of this country have been improved both by sea and land, and that the army and navy are in a most efficient state. I trust I may also congratulate the house, that notwithstanding the great reductions in the fiscal burdens of the country, our finances are in a prosperous and buoyant state; and that, on the 5th of July next, the return which will be made to the house will be, that notwithstanding the reduction of taxation, the increased consumption of articles of Customs and Excise and the general prosperity of the people have supplied the void which might otherwise have taken place (cheers, and loud cries of "hear, hear"). Sir, lastly, I think I may say, that without any harsh enforcement of the law, without any curtailment either of the liberty of the press, speaking of Great Britain, there has been as much of obedience and submission to the law as there ever was at any period of our history (cheers). Nay, I will say more: in consequence of the greater command of the necessities and minor luxuries of life, in consequence, too, of confidence in the administration of the law, there has been more of contentment, less of seditious crimes (hear, hear, hear), less necessity for the exercise of power for the repression of political outrage, than there ever was at any antecedent period in this country (cheers). I said, lastly,—but I have reserved one topic, on which I also think I may, without any unseemly boast or invidious contrast, say a few words. I think I may take credit to her Majesty's Government, at least to that distinguished member of it, less prominent, perhaps, in debate, than others, but as deserving of public honour and public credit for the exertions which he has made in the maintenance of peace (loud cheers)—I mean my noble friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (loud cheers)—he has dared to avow that he thinks in a Christian country there is a moral obligation upon a Christian Minister to exhaust every effort before incurring the risk of war (loud cheers). But while he has not shrunk from the avowal of that opinion, I will in justice to him say this—it is perfectly consistent with that opinion, as to the moral obligation of maintaining peace while peace can be maintained with honour, that there never was a Minister less inclined to sacrifice any essential interest, or to abate anything from the dignity and honour of this country, for the purpose of securing even that inestimable blessing (cheers). Sir, I do hope that we leave the foreign relations of this country in a satisfactory state (loud cheers)—that, speaking not only of France, but speaking of the other great powers of Europe, there is confidence in the intentions of this country, and a real desire on the part of the Governments of other powers to co-operate with us in the maintenance of peace (cheers). Sir, it is that mutual confidence in the honour and intentions of public men which most facilitates the maintenance of peace. We come in conflict with France in distant parts of the world: there are heated partisans naturally and justly jealous of the honour of their respective countries; quarrels, small in themselves, might be magnified by the spirit of jealousy, and a too nice rivalry about national honour might easily be fomented into a cause of war, desolating nations, unless the counsels of the great powers were presided over by those who, feeling peace to be the true interest of the civilised world, are determined that the heated passions of angry partisans shall not involve their respective countries in warfare (loud cheers). Sir, if anything could have induced me to regret a decision on the part of the house prematurely terminating the existence of the Government, it would have been the wish that we should have survived the day when intelligence might be received from the United States (loud cheering) as to the result of, perhaps, our last attempt to adjust those differences between this country and the United States, which, unless speedily terminated, might have involved us in war. The house will probably recollect that, after we had offered arbitration, and that offer had been rejected, the President of the United States sent a message to the houses of Congress in that country, which led to discussions with regard to the termination of that convention which provided for a temporary adjustment of our differences,—at least, for a temporary avoidance of quarrel,—and enabled the two countries jointly to occupy the territory of the Oregon. Sir, the two houses of the American Congress, although advising the President of the United States to signify to this country, as he was empowered to do, the termination of the existing convention, by giving a year's notice, added to that advice, which might perhaps, have been considered of an unsatisfactory or hostile character, the declaration that they advised the notice for the termination of the convention to be given, in order that it might facilitate an amicable adjustment of the dispute. We thought the addition of these words by those high authorities, the expression of a hope that the termination of the convention might the more strongly impress upon the two countries the necessity of amicable adjustment—yet thought those expressions removed any barrier to a renewal by either country of the attempt to settle this difference. We did not hesitate, therefore, within two days after the receipt of that intelligence of a wish expressed by the houses of Congress that efforts might be made for the peaceful termination of these disputes, although the offer of arbitration had been rejected—we did not hesitate to do that which, in the present state of the dispute, it became essential to do—not to propose renewed and lengthened negotiations, but to specify frankly and at once what were the terms on which we could consent to a partition of the country of the Oregon (cheers). Sir, the President of the United States, I must say, whatever might have been the expressions heretofore used by him, and however strongly he might have been personally committed to the adoption of a different course, wisely and patriotically determined at once to refer our proposals to the Senate—that authority of the United States whose consent is requisite for the termination of any negotiation of this kind; and the Senate, again acting in the same spirit, has, I have the heartfelt satisfaction to state, at once advised the adoption of the terms we offered them (loud cheers). Sir, perhaps from the importance of the subject, and considering this is the last day I shall have to address the house as a Minister of the Crown, I may be allowed to state what are the terms of the proposals we made to the United States on the Oregon question. In order to prevent the necessity for renewed diplomatic negotiations, we sent a convention, which we trusted the United States would accept. The first article of that convention was to this effect, that

"From the point on the 49th parallel of north latitude, where the boundary had been in existing treaties and conventions between Great Britain and the United States terminates, the line of boundary between the territories of Her Britannic Majesty and those of the United States shall be continued westward along the said 49th parallel of north latitude to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence southerly through the middle of the said channel, and of Fuca's Straits, to the Pacific Ocean; provided, however, that the navigation of the said channel and straits, south of the 49th parallel of north latitude, remain free and open to both parties."

Those who remember the local conformation of that country will understand that we proposed the continuation of the 49th parallel of latitude till it strikes the Straits of Fuca; that it should not be continued across Vancouver's Island,—thus depriving us of any part of Vancouver's Island,—but leaving us in possession of the whole of Vancouver's Island. Sir, the second article of the convention we sent for the acceptance of the United States was to this effect—that

"From the point at which the 49th parallel of north latitude shall be found to intersect the great northern branch of the Columbia river the navigation of the said branch shall be free and open to the Hudson's Bay Company, and to all British subjects trading with the same, to the point where the said branch meets the main stream of the Columbia, and thence down the said main stream to the ocean, with free access inland through the said river or rivers, it being understood that all the usual usages along the line thus described shall in like manner be free and open. In navigating the said river or rivers, British subjects, with their goods and produce, shall be treated on the same footing as citizens of the United States, it being, however, always understood that nothing in this article shall be construed as consenting, or intended to prevent, the Government of the United States from making any regulations respecting the navigation of the said river, or rivers, not inconsistent with the present treaty."

Sir, I will not occupy the attention of the house with any more of the details of this convention (cheers). I would only state that, on this very day on my return from my mission to her Majesty to offer the resignation of her Majesty's servants, I had the satisfaction of finding an official letter from Mr. Pakenham, intimating in the following terms the acceptance of our proposals, and giving an assurance of the immediate termination of our differences with the United States:—

"Washington, June 13, 1846.

"My Lord,—In conformity with what I had the honour to state in my despatch No. 68, of the 7th instant, the President sent an message on Wednesday last to the Senate, submitting for the consideration of that body the draught of a convention for the settlement of the Oregon question, which I was instructed by your lordship's despatch, No. 19, of the 18th of May, to propose for the acceptance of the United States.

"After a few hours' deliberation on each of the three days, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, the Senate, by a majority of 22 yeas to 12 nays, adopted yesterday evening a resolution advising the President to accept the terms proposed by Her Majesty's Government. The President did not hesitate to act on this advice, and Mr. Buchanan accordingly sent for me this morning, and informed me that the conditions offered by Her Majesty's Government were accepted by the Government of the United States, without the addition or alteration of a single word.

"I have the honour to be, &c.,

"R. PAKENHAM.

"The Right Hon. the Earl of Aberdeen, K. T., &c."

(Lord and continued cheering). Thus, Sir, these two great nations, impelled, I believe, by the public opinion, which ought to guide and influence statesmen, have, by moderation—by the spirit of mutual compromise, averted that dreadful calamity of a war between two nations of kindred race and common language (loud cheers), the breaking out of which would have involved the civilised world in calamities to an extent it is difficult to foresee (not one year—probably not one month of such a war, but would have been more expensive than the whole territory that had called it forth); but they have averted that war, I believe consistently with their true interests—consistently with perfect honour on the part of the American Government, and on the part of those who have at length closed, I trust, every cause of difference between the two countries (loud cheers). Sir, I may say, also, to the credit of the Government of this country, that, so far from being influenced in our views in regard to the termination of these disputes about the Oregon by the breaking out of the war with Mexico, we distinctly intimated to Mr. Pakenham, that although unexpected events had occurred, it did not affect, in the slightest degree, our desire for peace (cheers). Mr. Pakenham, knowing the spirit of his Government, being aware of the occurrence of these hostilities, having a discretionary power in certain cases, if he had thought this offer would have been likely to prolong negotiations, or diminish the chance of a successful issue, yet wisely thought the occurrence of Mexican hostilities with the United States, was not one of the cases to which we had adverted, and therefore most wisely did he tender this offer of peace to the United States on his own discretion, and the confidence of his Government. Now, let me say, and I am sure this house will think it to the credit of my noble friend, that on the occurrence of these hostilities between Mexico and the United States, before we were aware of the reception which this offer on our part would meet with, the first packet that sailed tendered to the United States the offer of our good offices for the purpose of mediating between them and the Mexican Government (loud cheers). Sir, I do rejoice, therefore, that, before surrendering power at the feet of a majority of this house, I had the opportunity of giving them the official assurance that every cause of quarrel with that great country on the other side of the Atlantic is terminated before we retire from office (loud cheers). Sir, I feel that I have now executed the task which my public duty imposed upon me. I trust I have said nothing which can by possibility lead to the recurrence of those controversies I have deprecated. Whatever opinions may be formed with regard to the extent of the danger with which we were threatened, I can say with truth that her Majesty's Government, in proposing these measures of commercial policy, which have disintegrated them to the confidence of many of those who heretofore gave them their support, were influenced by no other desire than the desire to consult the interests of this country (cheers). Our object was to avert dangers which we thought were imminent, and to avoid a conflict which we believed would soon place in hostile collision great and powerful classes in this country. The love of power was not a motive for the proposal of these measures; for, as I said before, I had not a doubt that, whether these measures were accompanied with failure or success, the almost certain issue must be the termination of the existence of this Government. Sir, I am not sure that it is not advantageous for the public interests that this should be so—I admit that the withdrawal of confidence from us by many of our friends was a natural result of circumstances; and I do think that, when proposals of such a nature are made, apparently at variance with the course which Ministers heretofore pursued, and subjecting them to the charge or taint of inconsistency—upon the whole, it is advantageous for this country, and for the general character of public men, that the proposal of measures of that kind under such circumstances should entail that which is supposed to be a fitting punishment—namely, expulsion from office. I, therefore, do not complain of it; anything is preferable to attempting to maintain ourselves in office without a full measure of the confidence of this house (cheers). I said before, and I said truly, that in proposing those measures I had no wish to rob others of the credit justly due to them. Now, I must say, with reference to hon. gentlemen opposite, as I say with reference to ourselves, neither of us is the party which is justly entitled to the credit of them (cheers). There has been a combination of parties, and that combination, and the influence of Government, have led to their ultimate success; but the name which ought to be associated with the success of these measures is not the name of the noble lord, the organ of that party, nor is it mine (cheers). The name which ought to be, and will be, associated with the success of those measures, is the name of a man who, acting, I believe, from pure and disinterested motives, has, with untiring energy, by appeals to reason (loud cheers), enforced their necessity with an eloquence the more to be admired because it was unaffected and unadorned (cheers);—the name which ought to be associated with the success of those measures is the name of Richard Cobden (loud and protracted cheering). Sir, I now close the address which it has been my duty to make to the house, thanking them sincerely for the favour with which they have listened to me in performing this last act of my official career. Within a few hours, probably, that power which I have held for the period of five years will be surrendered into the hands of another—without repining—I can say without complaint—with a more lively recollection of the support and confidence I have received than of the opposition which during a recent period I met with (cheers). I shall leave office, I fear, with a name severely censured by many hon. gentlemen, who, on public principle, deeply regret the severance of party ties—who deeply regret that severance, not from any interested or personal motives, but because they believe fidelity to party engagements—the existence and maintenance of a great party—to constitute a powerful instrument of Government; I shall surrender power severely censured, I fear again, by many hon. gentlemen who, from no interested motive, have adhered to the principle of protection as important to the welfare and interests of the country; I shall leave a name execrated by every monopolist (loud cheering from the Opposition), who, from less honourable motives, maintains protection for his own individual benefit (continued cheering); but it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of good will in those places which are the abodes of men whose lot it is to labour, and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow—a name remembered with expressions of good will, when they shall recreate their exhausted strength with abundant and untaxed food, the sweeter because it is no longer leavened by a sense of injustice (loud and vociferous cheering, during which the right hon. baronet resumed his seat).

FREEHOLDERS' BUILDING SOCIETY, MANCHESTER.—The seventh monthly meeting of this Society was held on Wednesday evening last. About 1500 members were present. The amount of money received was 4331l. 18s. 1d. The number of shares sold amounted to nearly 4000l.

PROPOSED FREE TRADE CELEBRATION IN MANCHESTER.—The following is a copy of a requisition to the Mayor of Manchester on the subject of some particular day being set apart for a general holiday, in connection with the passing of Sir Robert Peel's Corn Bill. The requisition has already received the signatures of a number of influential gentlemen:

"TO HIS WORSHIP THE MAYOR OF MANCHESTER.

"From an extensive acquaintance with the opinions and wishes of a large portion of the inhabitants of this town and neighbourhood as to the propriety of your recommending a holiday-demonstration in commemoration of the eventful passing of the bill for the repeal of the Corn Laws, we are induced respectfully to address your worship on the subject. We need say little—the people, we assure you, are most anxiously looking for some early official announcement containing a proposition for some particular day to be set apart for cessation from labour, and for recreation upon this joyous occasion; and we are persuaded that no recommendation would be so proper in itself, and so universally well received, as one issuing from yourself, holding as you do the highly-important office of chief magistrate of this borough, and enjoying as you do the good opinion of all classes of the people."

Amongst the gentlemen who have signed this requisition are Mr. Cobden, Mr. J. B. Smith, Mr. Henry Ashworth, Mr. Alderman Callender, Mr. Alderman Walker, and a number of manufacturers and merchants.

It is stated in Preston that the protectionists of that town are about to forward a requisition to Lord Stanley's son to become a candidate for the borough, in the event of a general election taking place.

A BLUSH FOR MONOPOLY.

In looking over a very old work, entitled "Luckombe's History of Printing," we find the following allusions to the introduction of some of the early monopolies. Printing itself seems to have been a favourite object of monopoly from a very early period, and continued so less or more to a very recent date; indeed, some of the old patents are still not yet expired:

"Towards the close of Queen Elizabeth's reign a patent was granted to Thomas Morley for printing music; but it being much the same with Talia and Birde's before mentioned, we forbore reprinting it. Patents were also granted to John Spilman, to make cards; to Richard Watkins and James Roberts, to print almanacks; to Richard Wright, to print the History of Cornelius Tacitus; to John Newton, to print Speculum Britannia; to Sir Henry Singer, touching the printing of schoolbooks; to Thomas Morley, to print songs in three parts; to Thos. Wight and Bonham Newton, to print law books; Edward Derry, for cards; &c. In the debate concerning monopolies, when that of cards was mentioned, Sir Walter Raleigh blushed. Upon reading of the list of patents, Mr. Luckwell, of Lincoln's Inn, stood up, and asked, 'Is not bread there?' Bread! says one. Bread! says another. 'This request seems strange, says one of the members. No, not in the least, says Mr. Hacket; for, if not speedily prevented, a patent for bread will be procured before the next session of Parliament.'

Sir Walter Raleigh blushed at the mention of a patent for cards, and to most members of the House of Commons the bare allusion to bread being included in the list of monopolies of the day, "seemed strange." How easily is the most unjust and impolitic imposition converted by time and habit into a strenuously asserted right!—Economist.

THE POTATO MURRAIN.—A correspondent in the immediate vicinity of this town, states, "That the potato disease, so prevalent in the past last year, has again manifested itself, a great quantity of the forward kinds being affected, particularly kidneys; and when it is remembered that the early potatoes last year were scarcely affected, it gives rise to fears that had as the disease was last year, it is very probable it will be worse this." We sincerely hope that our correspondent's fears will prove groundless, but a few weeks will determine the matter.—Kendal Mercury.

SCARCITY OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS IN BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.—The cutting of the grass has, in many instances, been impeded by the great difficulty of obtaining mowers. Although the price of labour has been advanced, still men could not be obtained. We have heard of a case where mowers have refused 5s. 6d. per acre for cutting grass, which is a great increase of wages over those paid at other seasons.—Aylesbury News.

THE MAYOR OF BORDEAUX.—Those who have taken any interest in the progress of the Free Trade movement in France, will know that that country does not possess a more earnest and thorough Free Trader than the present mayor of Bordeaux, M. Dufour Dubergier. This gentleman being in England, has been attracted to Manchester by the present triumphant position of the principles of commercial freedom; and on Tuesday he spent some time in the offices of the Anti-Corn-Law League, where he had interviews with several of the principal members of the Council of the League, amongst others with Mr. Cobden, Mr. J. B. Smith, Mr. Henry Ashworth, &c.; and Mr. Cobden and Mr. Thos. Bazley, the President of the Chamber of Commerce, was introduced to his worship. The Mayor of Manchester and the Mayor of Bordeaux were mutually introduced, and the latter expressed the gratification he derived from a visit to Manchester at so auspicious a moment. M. Dufour, we believe, was educated in England, and speaks English with considerable fluency. His admirable speech in advocacy of Free Trade attracted considerable attention at the time on both sides the Channel. Amongst fourteen gentlemen named as intended to be promoted to the dignity of peers of France on the 6th July, there are two mayors—those of Bordeaux and Lisle; and by those who are qualified to judge, it is said that the elevation of M. Dufour to the upper chamber of France, will give great satisfaction to his fellow-citizens, and to the friends of Free Trade throughout France.

FREE TRADE JUBILEE.—We understand that from all parts of the kingdom letters have been received by the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League, expressing a hope that they would appoint or recommend a general jubilee, in celebration of the passing of Sir Robert Peel's Corn Importation Bill. In some towns preparation has already been made for this celebration in various ways. At Rochdale, they have determined to celebrate the occasion by a general holiday. The holiday proceedings there are to include the closing of the mills and other places of business, and a grand procession through the town. At Newcastle-on-Tyne, it was at first proposed to have a Corn Law repeal banquet, and to invite Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright; but as those gentlemen could not attend a title of the similar celebrations there are likely to be in the various large towns of the United Kingdom, the hope of having their presence was ultimately abandoned; but it was determined, nevertheless, to have the banquet on some early day, and a committee has been formed to make the requisite preparation for giving all clat to the celebration.

RELEASE OF BONDED CORN.—Monday, being the first of the operation of the new measures, was a busy day at the Liverpool Custom House. We understand that the duty received up to the close of the day was about 35,000l. above the daily average receipts from this source. A very large quantity of grain of all sorts, say upwards of 200,000 quarters, must, therefore, have come at once into the market in this town alone.—Liverpool Standard.

THE CORN BILL AND WAGES.—We have heard of one instance of the influence which the passing of Sir Robert Peel's Corn Importation Bill has had on wages, which we commend to the consideration of monopolists throughout the kingdom. A large manufacturer, who employs from a thousand to twelve hundred hand-loom weavers, in the neighbourhoods of Preston, Chorley, &c., went amongst them on Monday last, and announced, that in consequence of the passing of this measure, he had come to the determination to advance their wages. The week's work commencing the following day (Tuesday), the manufacturer in question has not lost a single day in making the announcement and the advance. If, as the monopolists have tried to persuade people, repeal of the Corn Laws means low wages, this is certainly an extraordinary mode of accomplishing their prediction.

Farmers, in the south of England, are this year obliged to make a considerable advance in the rate per acre paid for mowing, owing to the difficulty of obtaining mowers. It is said that in some parts of Middlesex 7s. per acre is paid for cutting meadow grass; which is 2s. 6d. above the average rate paid last year.

TO THE ELECTORS OF STOCKPORT.

The following Address has been sent by Mr Cobden to the Electors of Stockport:

GENTLEMEN,—The state of my health, and other private considerations, induce me to seek a temporary withdrawal from public life. With this view, I have obtained leave of absence from Parliament for the remainder of the session; and it is my intention, after making the necessary arrangements for leaving home, to go abroad for a twelvemonth.

I therefore most respectfully beg to be considered in the enjoyment of the privileges and immunities of private life; at the same time, I feel it my duty to place my seat at your free disposal in case a dissolution should occur during my absence from England.

Allow me to take the present opportunity of expressing the grateful sense I entertain of the confidence and kindness with which you have honoured me. To your favour alone have I been indebted for the opportunity of advocating, however humbly, in the British legislature, the now happily-triumphant principles of Free Trade. I thank all and each of you for the considerate forbearance with which you have allowed me to devote myself uninterruptedly to one absorbing question; and assuring you how deeply I regret that a necessity should arise for suspending my connection with your important borough.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,

Your faithful Servant,

RICHARD COBDEN.

Manchester, 3d July, 1846.

FINAL MEETING OF THE LEAGUE COUNCIL.

SUSPENSION OF PROCEEDINGS.

MANCHESTER, JULY 2.—An important meeting of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League took place in the Town Hall, on Thursday, being a meeting not only of the executive body resident in Manchester and neighbourhood, but of the general body throughout the kingdom. The meeting was called by circular, and its object was stated to be "for the purpose of considering what course the League shall take now that the Bill for the repeal of the Corn Laws has received the royal assent." The proceedings commenced soon after eleven o'clock. No less than 500 gentlemen were present; and for wealth, talent, and moral standing in the country, perhaps it was such an assemblage as has never before been congregated, even in this extraordinary movement. George Wilson, Esq., occupied the chair; and amongst the gentlemen present we observed Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; J. Brotherton, Esq., M.P.; Wm. Brown, Esq., Liverpool, the new candidate for South Lancashire, in the place of Lord F. Egerton, who is elevated to the peerage; William Rawson, Esq., Treasurer of the League; W. R. Callender; J. Mellor, Esq., Liverpool; W. Bickham, Esq.; A. Ashworth, Esq., Torton; W. R. Greg, Esq., the Mayor of Bordeaux; W. Hargreaves, Esq., Milnthorpe; G. Thomas, Esq., of Bristol; C. Thomas, Esq., Bristol; W. Tooty, Esq., Bristol; J. Mullineux, Esq., Liverpool; W. Evans, Esq.; T. Woolley, Esq.; J. B. Smith Esq.; A. Prentice, Esq.; P. A. Taylor, Esq., London; J. Finch, jun., Esq., Liverpool; F. Pennington, Esq.; C. Rawdon, Esq.; James Harvey, Esq.; Robert Mather, Esq.; John Mather, Esq., Liverpool; T. Mather, Esq., Glynn Abbott, Holywell; B. Pearson, Esq., Manchester; W. Rathbone, Esq., Liverpool; Thomas Taylor, Esq., Liverpool; H. Rawson, Esq., Manchester; J. T. Crook, Esq., Liverpool; C. J. S. Walker, Esq.; J. Simpson, Esq.; R. H. Greg, Esq.; W. A. Wilkinson, Esq., London; R. R. Moore, Esq.; J. Lord, Esq., Bacup; W. B. Watkins, Esq., mayor of Manchester; J. Cheetham, Esq., Stalybridge; W. Foden, Esq.; D. Jerrold, Esq., London; T. Thomasson, Esq., Bolton; S. Lees, Esq., Manchester; R. Steuart, Esq.; E. Smith, Esq., Sheffield; A. Henry, Esq.; J. Whitaker, Esq., Hurst; S. Bean, Esq.; J. The CHAIRMAN rose amidst loud cheering, and said:—Gentlemen, I have no doubt that all the members of the Council who have received invitations to attend here this day are prepared to expect that the special business of this meeting will have reference to the course which this great organisation shall adopt, now that the chief purpose for which it was established is virtually accomplished (hear, hear). There will, therefore, be submitted for your consideration resolutions which have engaged the anxious attention and consideration of the Executive Council. I would, by no means, have it for one moment supposed, that because they are so introduced and so recommended, that it is intended to restrict the opinions of any gentlemen, members of the Council, who may entertain different opinions, or who are disposed to discuss the propriety of the course which we propose for your consideration, but that on this, as on all previous occasions, the fullest and freest discussion is invited by the members of the Executive Council, from those of the general governing body (hear, hear, hear). I rejoice, as all members of this association must do, that we meet no longer to sharpen our weapons, or to prepare to concentrate our forces for another attack upon that absurd system of legislation which has for seven years invited our special opposition. The corn monopoly, thanks to the last bill which has passed the legislature, has now its days dated and numbered; although, perhaps, if the League had been invited to prepare that measure, or if they had been consulted on its preparation, they would not have allowed the prolongation of its existence for a single day. Yet, as provision has been made for its final extinction in 1849, as during the time intervening all its horrors will be removed, we propose to take a common sense view of the subject, and discuss it as if it was altogether done away with (hear, hear). It is due then to ourselves, and to the public who have entrusted us with such unlimited authority for the last seven years, that we should inquire, whether in the administration of their affairs we have ever violated a single pledge, or departed on one single occasion from the principles which it was our duty to support, and lay before them (hear, hear). We all know that the only restrictive provision of our organisation were these—that we should seek on all occasions the total and unconditional abolition of the Corn Laws, and that we should seek it peacefully, legally, and constitutionally (cheers)—that, on the one hand, all men who joined this association, should join it, knowing that they should be privileged from being dragged into the consideration of any other question; and that in doing so, they should be free from penal and legal responsibility. Now, perhaps, if we were called upon to defend ourselves, I might say, what other question has the League touched or interfered with? And I might ask, what man has suffered penal or legal consequences, from becoming a member of this association? But as it will only take a few moments to show you that from the first we have adhered to our principles, I propose, in a few words, to show you the means we have made use of, and leave you to judge, whether they have been such as are likely, with the least delay, to secure the accomplishment of our object. We all know the origin of the League; we all know that at a meeting in September, 1838, held in this town, at which that accomplished gentleman, Doctor Bowring, was present, a number of gentlemen resolved to form an Anti-Corn Law Association,—that that association grew larger and larger, extending its influence. Shortly after its formation the merchants, traders, and manufacturers of Manchester held a meeting near this place, and there voted for the purpose of supporting the Manchester Anti Corn Law Association 3000*l.*, which was afterwards increased to 6000*l.* Thus armed, the Anti-Corn-Law Association convened a meeting of delegates from all parts of the kingdom,—they assembled in Manchester, and resolved to form an Anti-Corn-Law Association throughout the kingdom. The delegates returned home; they empowered the Manchester Association to convene a meeting in London in February, 1839. This meeting took place, and then it was resolved by the merchants, traders, and delegates there assembled, to petition Parliament that they might present evidence at the bar of the House of Commons. Mr. Villiers made a motion to that effect; the petitioners were Mr. Greg, Mr. J. B. Smith, and others. The motion was negatived, and the delegates separated. A month elapsed, when they were again invited to meet at Palace Yard. They met. Mr. Villiers brought forward a resolution inviting the house to agree to the formation of a committee for the consideration of the abolition of the Corn Laws. That motion was again negatived; whereupon the delegates assembled, and there and then resolved, at the suggestion of Mr. Cobden, to form this association which we have now met to dissolve. They voted that its head quarters should be at Manchester, and that for the sake of communicating with its members and introducing notices of all its proceedings to the public, an Anti-Corn-Law Circular should be established, the first number of which was published in April, 1839. Thus armed, the Executive Council at once proceeded to work. We engaged lecturers, sent them throughout the country; they held meetings and discussions; they were interrupted; they conquered; Anti-Corn-Law Associations were formed throughout the country, and at the end of 1839 upwards of one hundred towns joined the Anti-Corn Law League. Our course of proceeding during that year was simply confined to lectures, the distribution of stamped publications, and public meetings. In 1840 we commenced those large assemblies for which Manchester has been since so famous. In January of that year there was erected on the spot that is now occupied by the site of the Free Trade Hall a pavilion, where on the 13th a public dinner was given, at which 4000 of the members and friends of the association were present; and on the 14th, 5000 operatives. Delegates attended that meeting from all parts of the kingdom. On the morning of the 15th the delegates resolved again to assemble in London, at the opening of Parliament: they met in London, when Mr. Villiers again brought forward his motion. The debate closed without a division. The delegates separated and returned home, and made their reports to those who had delegated them. In March of the same year they again assembled at Brown's hotel, Palace Yard. Mr. Villiers again brought forward his motion, and it was negatived by a great majority. The delegates again separated, resolving to adopt other means for insuring the success of this great agitation. To the end of 1840 few changes took place, our proceedings being confined to lectures and the distribution of publications; but in November, 1840, the delegates again met, and voted confidence in the Executive Council, and recommended us further to proceed. In 1841, as you all know, Lord John Russell gave notice of his resolution for wheat to be admitted at a duty of 8*s.*, and other things in proportion. A dissolution took place, and our question went before the country. The monopolists throughout the counties gained their elections. During that election we were numerically worse than we were in the previous Parliament, but there was sent to Parliament one ally to Mr. Villiers, whose return was worth a score of those we had lost during the election (hear, hear). Previous to the meeting of Parliament, and well knowing the great majority against the League, we applied for aid to those who, in the times of privation and distress, had shown it to be their special duty to attend to the wants and privations of the poor—the dissenting ministers; and in August of that year there was held for four days an assembly of men which, I am prepared to say, speaking the opinions of all who had the privilege of listening to their discussions, has never yet been equalled on any subject in this country. Parliament met; the Ministers were defeated; Sir R. Peel was restored to power; they were proposing to separate without the slightest consideration of the relaxation of the corn duties, when a meeting was held in this Hall in September, to protest against the prorogation of Parliament until the subject of the Corn Laws had been again considered. A deputation was appointed by that meeting to wait upon Sir Robert Peel, and to him was conveyed the resolutions they had passed. Thus was finished 1841. Most in Parliament were hostile to us; we had only a few who sympathised with the principles of the League. In the House of Commons we had two able men, who were prepared on all occasions to discuss this question; and it was discussed, and the benefits arising from the discussion consequent upon the dissolution are such as will form an era in the agitation of this question (hear, hear). The winter of 1841 now exhibited an increasing amount of distress, suffering, and privation, and then for the first time the ladies of this and the principal towns in England met together and agreed to canvass from house to house and door to door, to promote a memorial to her Majesty, humbly imploring her to instruct her Ministers to bring in a bill for the relief of the distressed community. In the depths of winter, in this town, the ladies, who were not otherwise engaged in behalf of the bazaar, canvassed and obtained upwards of 100,000 signatures to their memorial. They did more in 1842; they had a bazaar in the Theatre-Royal, Manchester, from which was netted, for the use of the League, during the succeeding year, a sum greater than the revenue of the League for any previous year, amounting to 10,000*l.*

Thus armed, we commenced the year 1842. As before, our principal movements were petitions, lectures, and publications, but in the commencement of 1842 Sir R. Peel brought forward another amended sliding scale. The delegates again met in London, and they denounced this sliding scale; a meeting was convened in Manchester, for the same purpose; it was there denounced, and the principles of the League were voted to be the only principles upon which a good bill could be framed, and in every town this principle of the repeal of the Corn Laws was introduced without opposition. Mr. Villiers then brought in a measure for the first time, proposing that all duties upon the importation of foreign corn should cease and determine. It was rejected, 395 voting against it, and 92 for it, leaving 303 majority against total repeal. Following this came the disturbances, to which I will not refer beyond this, that every attempt was made in that critical time by the monopolists to connect the League with the promotion of that disturbance. It is due to the League to say that it suspended its ordinary meetings in consequence; but it is also due to the League to say, that immediately after that it commenced its weekly meetings; those meetings which have since formed so important a movement in the promotion of this object. In 1842 we closed, having made little progress in Parliament, and under the persuasion that other measures must be used forthwith in the commencement of the new Parliament, to induce the legislature to adopt our principle. At the end of 1842 we again met, and resolved to hold a weekly meeting. We resolved, on a review of the previous session, to distribute information much more freely, especially among the farmers and farm labourers, and we resolved, for the purpose of the coming agitation, that a sum of five times the amount of the previous subscription should be asked for, namely, 50,000*l*. The weekly meetings became more important, and were removed to the Corn Exchange, and then was erected that building which now stands a monument of the energy of the men who conduct the League,—THE FREE TRADE HALL (cheers). 50,000*l*. was a large sum to collect in those days, without the object for which it was asked being especially explained to those who contributed. For that purpose, and at the invitation of the principal merchants, and influential persons in almost every town in the country, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright visited, assisted by Col. Thompson and Mr. Moore, all the large towns of Scotland, and most of the large towns of England, and received contributions which flowed in, exceeding our expectation. We opened the Free Trade Hall in January, 1843, announcing that 44,000*l*. had been collected. We then commenced a most important year. We resolved to adjourn our ordinary meetings of the Council for a month to London; also the weekly meetings. We then commenced at the Crown and Anchor; from thence we proceeded to Freemasons' Hall; and then, invited by that distinguished man, Mr. Macready, took possession of Drury Lane Theatre. From week to week these meetings were being held; our tract distributors were at work, traversing hill and dale, delivering to every elector in the register a packet of tracts, containing an exposition of our principles; and over and beyond this, the first broadside was given to the agricultural monopolists by Mr. Cobden, announcing his intention of holding a series of agricultural meetings. These meetings were continued, and, with one questionable exception, in 31 or 32 open county meetings, the monopolists, on their own ground, were overcome and defeated (hear, hear, and cheers). We thus closed the year 1843. We had lectured to the people; deputations had waited upon Government; deputations had called upon the Ministers; information had been spread widely and freely to the people; and our county meetings had every one, save one, declared in our favour. We made a report to our constituents, and then we proposed that which they at once conceded, that the fund to be collected for the next year should be 100,000*l*. It was agreed upon at a meeting held in this room, and presided over by Mr. Greg, when 12,000*l*. was given at one collection. It was afterwards increased to 20,000*l*. I shall not go over a detailed history of our proceedings for 1844; they were in almost all respects similar to those of 1843—public meetings, agricultural meetings, lectures, and the distribution of publications; nor shall I refer to the proceedings of the League during 1845, because they were in all respects, save the agricultural meetings, of the same character as those of 1844. Nor will I refer for one moment to that extraordinary exhibition of man's ingenuity and woman's devotion, the Anti-Corn Law bazaar, which was held for 21 days in the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden. But in order, after having educated the country, that we might bring all the influences of the past agitation to bear on the legislature, we projected the last and greatest movement—the registration. I may say of that movement, much as it has been objected to, that every vote which has been acquired according to the suggestions laid down by the League, has been pronounced, when presented for the consideration of the Lord Chief Justice, good in every respect (hear, hear); that the desire and disposition of the operatives or others who may seek to possess the franchise have been said by the same eminent authority to be laudable and commendable (cheers). I have thus gone over the principal plans pursued by the League: they were confined to few leading operations; it is for you to judge whether those operations are such as should entitle any man to say they were at variance with the principles on which this League was established, or in any respect than legal, peaceful, and constitutional (hear, hear). It has been a glorious thing that to the men of Manchester and to those of other large towns, who have connected themselves with the League, the country is mainly indebted for the abolition of the Corn Laws. It would have been glorious to have carried our flag over the heads of our hostile opponents to victory; but surely it is more glorious, more desirable, to see our forces recruited, and our armies led, by men who all their lives, and up to the present moment, have opposed the abolition of the Corn Laws (hear, hear), and that the flag of Free Trade should wave in peaceful triumph over the heads of a reconciled and united people (cheers). The chairman then called upon Mr. Cobden, who was received with the most enthusiastic cheers, which lasted for some minutes.

Mr. COBDEN: If this were a meeting for any other purpose than that of business, in the strictest sense of the word, I am quite sure that I should feel more embarrassed at meeting you on this occasion than I have done at any previous time; for I feel myself almost oppressed with the consciousness of the importance of the events we have been passing through lately, and of the great interest which is involved in the present meeting; and I am sure I could not do justice to the feelings which are now affecting me. We are met here on the present occasion as a meeting of the Council of the League. We have, in the working of this body, as you are aware, an executive committee of gentlemen living in Manchester, and also the Council of the League, consisting of the subscribers of 50*l*. and upwards. The Executive Council of the League have called you, the Council, together, for the purpose of taking your opinion as to the course we shall now pursue: and I think the importance of that question is such that I shall confine myself as strictly as possible to business details in what I have to say, because I do not wish to prevent the many gentlemen who have come from distant parts the opportunity of giving their advice and assistance on this occasion. The Executive Council of the League in Manchester have talked over the matter repeatedly, and are now prepared to submit their views; and as I may as well put you in possession of what the general purport of all the resolutions is, I will just explain the substance of the whole (hear, hear). We propose to recommend, not that the League shall be absolutely dissolved in the strict sense of the word, and yet we propose to take such steps as amount to a virtual dissolution of the League, unless the protectionist party compel us again to revive our agitation. We propose to ask from you the authority and instruction to wind up and suspend the affairs of the League. We recommend that you should pass a resolution, absolving all those gentlemen who have put their names down to the large guarantee fund and paid their first instalment, from any further liability. We propose that you shall pass a resolution, authorising the gentlemen in Manchester, who have acted on the Council of the League, in case they should see any serious efforts made by the monopolists to revive the system of protection, or to induce Parliament to retrace its steps, then to request these gentlemen again to call the League into active existence. Gentlemen, we have thought that the course by which we shall fulfil our duty to the general body of subscribers, and likewise our pledges to the public. We have pledged ourselves not to retire from this agitation, or disband the League until the Corn Laws were totally and immediately abolished. We are therefore not competent to dissolve this League. At the same time I ought to say, that with reference to our practical operations, it would be exceedingly difficult to draw a line between a total suspension of the League and a partial suspension. If we continue active operations at all, it must be on a large scale, and at an enormous expense. I do not think you can draw a distinction between 500*l*. a week and nothing. We have been spending the last three years at least 1000*l*. a week. Under these circumstances, I think it is a fair practical question to consider, what can be the object gained if we continue the active agitation of the League. In two years and a half the Corn Laws will be abolished by an Act now upon the statute book; and let us entertain the supposition that our efforts in agitation out of doors should be ever so successful, it is hardly possible that in less than two years and a half we should succeed in altering the law which now exists; therefore I do not see that any practical good can result from continuing the agitation in any form whatever (hear, hear). Now many people may say, "Are you safe in disbanding this great organization; are you safe in taking off your uniform (if I may use the expression), of casting aside your weapons of moral warfare? Will not the protectionists gain strength and confidence if they see you abolish the field?" I am of opinion that there is no danger of anything of the kind (hear, hear, hear). I look upon it that the mere boasting and vapouring of a few of the less wise part of the protectionist party may be very well excused by us. It is quite natural that men who felt worsted in an argument, and in all the tactics of political action during the last seven years, should console themselves with the promises of what they will do the next seven years. But I hold that you may as soon abolish Magna Charta, or do away with Trial by Jury, or repeal the Test and Corporation Act, or the Catholic Emancipation Act, as ever re-entertain protection as a principle again in this country (cheers). Some people say we go back in this country. I maintain that we never go back after a question has been discussed and sifted as ours has (hear, hear). You have never gone back in any of the great questions; if settled once they have been settled altogether. People do say that we went back after the Reform Act was passed. I will tell you what we did. We got hold of a machine which we did not know how to use, and the proper use of which we are now learning, but we never went back. Nobody ever proposed the repeal of one enactment of the Reform Act. Therefore I hope our friends everywhere will bear this in mind, and if they should hear a noble lord, or even a poble duke, talking of what they will do, not let their nervous system be excited or alarmed. They must raise a fresh crop of statesmen to carry out their principles, for we have all the statesmen now on our side of the question (hear, hear). Such being our position, we have very good grounds for gratulation on the present occasion. I confess, I hardly know whom to thank, or how to account hardly, for our present position; there has been such a combination of fortunate accidents, that I must confess that I am disposed to thank that Providence which has overruled so many apparently conflicting incidents for this great and mighty good—(hear, hear). I believe, gentlemen, we at all events may say, that humanly speaking we owe a debt of gratitude to our gracious sovereign, the Queen (hear, hear, and cheers). I believe it is not in strict etiquette to allude to our Queen's personal views and feelings in any matter, but it is well known that her Majesty's predilections are strongly in favour of the cause we have been agitating. Then, there's her late first Minister. Well, gentlemen, along with our success, we have seen the downfall of that Minister. Some people say he has lost office by giving us Free Trade. Well, if he has lost office, he has gained a country. For my part, I would rather descend into private life with that last measure of his, which led to his disfigurement, in my hand, than mount to the highest pinnacle of human power (hear, hear, hear). Well, among the statesmen, we owe a debt of gratitude to Lord John Russell (hear, hear). Individually, I believe, we owe to him and his firmness, to his letter, and to his firmness during the intrigues of the last six months in London. I believe we owe it to his individual firmness that we had the support of the Whig aristocracy at all in this measure (hear, hear). I am anxious as an individual on this occasion that I should lose sight of nobody to whom the country is indebted for the passing of these measures, because I do feel there has been a disposition to make one of us a great deal more a monopolist in this matter than he deserves (no, no). I speak of myself, and I say, that when I entered upon this career we found the road very much prepared; the mighty impediments had been removed by the labours of others; we had had men preceding us who had been toiling to beat down great prejudices, and destroy fallacies, and prepare a path for us which we had simply to macadamize to win our way to victory. There are many of these men here around me. I would not forget men who, like the late Mr. Deacon Hume, Mr. Macgregor, and Mr. Porter, in the privacy of their closets, furnished the world with statistics, arguments, and facts, which, after all, have swayed mankind more than any declamation or appeals to the passions can possibly do. There is one man especially whom I wish not to forget: it is Colonel Thompson (hear, hear). Colonel Thompson has made more large pecuniary sacrifices than any man living for Free Trade, and we all know his contributions in an intellectual point of view, which have been invaluable to us—we will not forget the worthy Colonel amidst our congratulations amongst each other. Gentlemen, I said I should not detain you with a long speech, and in fact I cannot do it, for I do feel oppressed with the feelings which now pervade my mind (hear, hear). I believe we are at an era which in importance, socially, has not its equal for the last 1800 years. I believe there is no event that has ever happened in the world's history, that in a moral and social point of view—there is no human event that has happened in the world more calculated for the enduring interests of humanity than the establishment of the principle of Free Trade,—I don't mean in a pecuniary point of view, or as a principle applied to England, but we have a principle established now which is eternal in its truth and universal in its application, and must be applied in all nations and throughout all times, and applied not simply to commerce, but to every item of the tariffs of the world; and if we are not mistaken in thinking that our principles are true, be assured that those results will follow, and at no very distant period (hear, hear, and cheers). Why, gentlemen, it is a world's revolution, and nothing else (hear, hear), and every meeting we have held of this League, and this its last meeting probably, may be looked back upon as the germ of a movement which will ultimately comprehend the whole world in its embrace (cheers). I see and feel, and have always felt, the great social and moral importance of this great question (hear, hear). I believe many who have taken an active part in this question have been influenced solely by its moral and social consequences (hear, hear). Gentlemen, we have amongst us on this occasion a gentleman who has come from a neighbouring country, France, an eloquent advocate of Free Trade there, Mous. Duffour Dubergier, the Mayor of Bordeaux (hear, hear, and loud cheers). Gentlemen, it is gratifying that we should attract by a kindred sympathy the visit to our meeting of so distinguished a man (hear, hear); and I know he will go back, not with fresh emotions of sympathy towards our cause, for those he has entertained already, but I have no doubt he will go back inspired by what he sees here, and that he will be anxious that France should not stand long apart from England in this glorious career, but that we join hand to hand in setting nations the example of the mutual advantages of peace and prosperity (loud cheers). Well, gentlemen, this League must dissolve—it must suspend. Our elements must be scattered. Well, I cannot help saying personally for myself, that the greatest pleasure I have found in the course of those proceedings has been in the acquaintances I have formed with, and the kindness I have received from, the men connected with this association (hear, hear). If I could ever have despaired of this country, after the acquaintances which I have made with the men in connection with this question—men who will be found the salt of this land in whatever good is to be accomplished—having known what I do of my fellow-countrymen in this agitation, I shall never despair of this moral power to conduct this good ship through whatever storm may arise, which will save us from anarchy at one end, or tyranny at the other of society (hear, hear). I am going to be egotistical; but I will say that, so far as I myself am concerned—so far as my tastes go—a release from an active life of agitation will not be unacceptable to me (hear, hear). I ought, in order to enjoy the full pleasure of an agitator, to be differently constituted; and I don't think nature ever intended me for that line (laughter). I say it most unaffectedly, that I entered upon the career of agitation without the slightest idea that it would ever have conducted me to the point to which I have arrived (hear, hear, hear). I had not the most distant idea of it. I don't think circumstances would have warranted myself in taking the step eight years ago if I could have seen what it would lead to (hear, hear). We got into the groove, and were pushed along, and we found ourselves carrying a train of good hardy spirits who would not leave us; and having given us their support we were impelled forward in the groove at an accelerated speed, and with a constantly accelerated sympathy. Well, gentlemen, for myself, you will hardly credit it, when I say that with respect to myself, I have precisely the same feeling now with respect to the ordeal of public meetings that I had when I began this agitation. It is a matter of great reluctance and difficulty for me to appear before an audience at all (hear, hear). Many people would think that we had our reward in the applause and ecclat of public meetings; but I declare upon my honour that it is not so with me, for the inherent reluctance I have to address public meetings is so great that I don't even get up to present a petition in the House of Commons without reluctance. I therefore hope I may be believed when I say that if this agitation terminates now it will be very acceptable to my feelings; but if there should be the same necessity; the same feeling which has impelled me to take the part I have will impel me to a new agitation,—ay, and with tenfold more vigour, after having had a little time to recruit my strength (cheers). Well, gentlemen, we are going to dissolve; those good spirits must disband, and I am not quite sure that it is not wise and proper that it should be so. Now we have been kept together for seven years without one single dispute, without anything to cause the slightest alienation. We have had the bond of freemasonry and brotherhood so closely knit about us, that I don't think there has been a keen word in the happy family of the Anti-Corn-Law League (cheers). Well, that is the spirit in which we should break off. Were we to continue our agitation, when the object for which we associated is gone, I am afraid that the demon of discord would be getting in among us. It is in nature so. It is in our moral nature necessary that when an organised body has performed its functions, it must pass into a new state of existence, and become differently organised. We are dispersing our elements to be ready for any other good work; and it is nothing but good works that will be attempted by good Leaguers (cheers). Our body will, so to say, perish, but our spirit is abroad, and will pervade all the nations of the earth (renewed cheers). It will pervade all the nations of the earth because it is the spirit of truth and justice, and because it is the spirit of peace and good will amongst men (cheers). I move:

"That an Act of Parliament having been passed providing for the abolition of the Corn Laws in February, 1846, it is deemed expedient to suspend the active operation of the Anti-Corn-Law League; and the Executive Council in Manchester is hereby requested to take the necessary steps for making up and closing the affairs of the League with as little delay as possible."

JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., M.P., rose to second the resolution, and was greeted with loud cheers. He spoke as follows:—I need not say that I participate to the fullest extent in the feelings which have been expressed by Mr. Cobden; feelings which must arise, I believe, in the hearts of most of us, when we contemplate the fact that this is in all probability the last meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law League (cries of "hear, hear, hear"). I am at this moment impressed with a feeling of the greatest possible delight that the object for which we have been banded together is at length accomplished; but that feeling is tinged with one of another character, when I remember that in all probability we are now about to separate from friends with whom we have been long connected, and that have no longer in pursuit an object which has been the dearest and most cherished of our lives (hear, hear). At such a meeting as this, and in such circumstances, I would be the very last man to utter one syllable of unworthy exultation over those who have been defeated (hear, hear). I would not add one word to the unpleasant sensations of a party whose hopes have been altogether destroyed; I would not say anything that should add to the exasperation and the bitterness which have unfortunately been introduced to some extent between various classes of this community during the protracted struggle which is now concluded; but I am of opinion that this final meeting may have some result beyond that of merely determining to wind up the affairs of this League; that it may have some result, and that by it we may point a moral, and we may learn a lesson, we may contemplate the past, and we may for a little survey the future (hear, hear). To the public, the men, especially, who don't think very deeply, the object of the Anti-Corn-Law League is accomplished when the Corn Law is repealed; but if a thinking and philosophic mind were asked what the League has done, I am of opinion that his answer would include many other points and many other things beyond the repeal of a particular statute (hear, hear). We have taught the people of this country the value of a great principle (hear, hear). They have learned that there is nothing that can be held out to the intelligent people of this kingdom so calculated to stimulate them to action, and to great and persevering action, as a great and sacred principle like that which the League espoused (hear, hear). They have learned that there is in public opinion a power much greater than that which resides in any particular form of Government; that although you have in this kingdom a system of government which is called "popular" and called "representative," a system which is somewhat clumsily contrived, and which works with many jars and joltings, that still, with a great principle, and with great labour, and with great sacrifices, all those obstacles are overcome, and out of a machine specially contrived for the contrary, justice and freedom at length is achieved for the nation; and the people have learned something beyond this, that is, that the way to freedom lies forward is not through violence and bloodshed (hear, hear, hear, and loud cheers). Why, there can be no power on earth with which we can ever be again called to contend more powerful than that which we have overthrown on this question (hear, hear)—for we have had the particular privileged class banded together, many of them strong in prejudices, many of them believing that their personal and class interests depended upon the views which they then held being maintained; and we have had also mighty prejudices and ignorances among the people to contend with, and yet all these have been dispelled; and there is nothing in the whole United Kingdom at present to oppose us, except the miserable remnant of the ignorance which once prevailed (hear, hear, and cheers). I take it that there is no better lesson for the people to learn from it than this,—that by persevering effort,—that by no infraction of moral law,—by strict obedience to the principles which we believe to be enjoined by the Christian code, they can obtain so great and signal victories, and victories which are not tarnished in the gaining, and victories which can never be lost—more great and more glorious than any other nation ever achieved by force of arms (hear, hear, and cheers). But this Anti-Corn-Law League will stand before the world as a sign of a new order of things (hear, hear). Until now this country has been ruled principally by the class of great proprietors of the soil. Every one must have foreseen that as trade and manufactures extended the balance of power would, at some day or other, be thrown into another scale. Well, that time has come (hear, hear)—and the rising of this League seven years ago was sufficient to have pointed out to any statesman that the power of the landed aristocracy had reached its height, and that henceforth it would find a rival and an opponent to which eventually it must become subjected (hear, hear, and cheers). Now we have been living through a revolution without knowing it. In 1832 the House of Lords deemed itself a power in the state irresponsible except to heaven, and able of itself to say that a law should or should not pass. The House of Lords now makes no such pretensions. Lord Stanley declared, "God forbid that your lordships should set yourselves against the clearly expressed will of the people" (hear, hear); and I heard (for I listened to most of their debates on this question)—I heard several other members of the House of Peers make use of very similar expressions (hear, hear). They therefore understand their position now that they sit there not directly representing certain constituencies, or elected by them, but still that they are supposed to represent the people to some extent, and that they are responsible to public opinion for the exercise of the power which the constitution has entrusted them with (hear, hear, and cheers). But it is this and a neighbouring county that the great element of power in this country is henceforth to be found. Lancashire, the cotton district, and the West Riding of Yorkshire, must govern England (hear, hear). I don't mean that they must of themselves assert a superiority over other parts of the kingdom, like that which the rural and agricultural counties have asserted over us in times past; but I say that the vast population of those counties, with their interests, their morality, their union, that all these must exercise an immense influence upon all future legislation in this kingdom, and that the direction of legislation must be in accordance with the prevailing sentiments of the population of those two counties,—(hear, hear). And there is not a man in the kingdom knows it better than Sir Robert Peel (hear). There is no man more likely to know it, for he was born amongst us, and I confess that in looking at the course he has taken during the last session, I have felt some satisfaction that the man who in the last place came forward to give the finishing stroke to that gigantic monopoly to which we have been opposed, should have been a man born amongst us, sprung from the trade of this district, of a family who have done much to create and extend the industry of this district, and the wealth of whose family has to be traced entirely to that industry (hear, hear). Two years ago, Col. Thompson, at a meeting at Bristol, prophesying of Sir R. Peel—for the Colonel undoubtedly is a prophet,—(cheers and laughter)—he said Sir R. Peel began in cotton spinning, and in plenty of cotton spinning he would end (laughter). But at the commencement of the present session Sir Robert Peel showed that he knew what was the power of this kingdom. When the address was to be moved, which was an address almost pledging the House of Commons to sanction some great measure of commercial reform, the members chosen to move and second the address were the members for the West-Riding of Yorkshire, and for the constituency of South Lancashire—(hear, hear, hear)—and I am certain that henceforth a representative from these districts will have a large influence in the House of Commons, and that as the spirit which is now originated extends and becomes perpetual we shall have a much better representation for these districts than we ever had before; and that in the House of Commons, as well as in the country, they will take the position which their constituencies take out of doors (hear, hear). I said we have been living in a revolution, and I am prepared to maintain it. Not such a revolution as that which we were charged with. We all recollect the seditions, the conspiracies, and the ulterior objects, and the democracy, and the revolution, and the destruction of property, and all other things, which were laid to the charge of this National Anti-Corn-Law League. Now, I am prepared to maintain, that the result of this agitation has been of the very best character, not only as respects the great mass of the population who live by labour, but as respects the holders, the owners, and the enjoyers of the great mass of property in this kingdom (hear, hear). Now, I put it to the meeting,—is it to be believed at this moment that the Crown is less popular than it was seven years ago? (Cries of "No," and cheers.) Is not the Queen as much in the occupation of her throne without any aspirant—without any one to envy or to slander her, as she was at any time (hear, hear)? Even the House of Lords itself, I believe, at this moment stands infinitely better in the respect of the affections of the people than it has for many years possessed (cheers). Why, we don't look at the House of Lords now as a body in the state which either ignorantly or wickedly is maintaining a law which we believe to be unjust to millions (hear, hear). We look upon it as a house tending, unfortunately sometimes too much—(hear, hear)—to moderate the legislation of another house, which nobody, I think, will contend goes on too fast for us; but I must confess that I have a greater respect for the House of Lords, from watching their passing of this bill, and the manner in which they have passed it, than I have ever had at any former period (hear, hear, and cheers). And of the House of Commons also we may have a better opinion, for notwithstanding we had so few votes before the Peel conversion, yet there can be no doubt that a very large number, almost every one of the men who have come round with him, had been before partially or wholly convinced of the necessity of the measures which he has introduced, and were only prevented from helping us because they were bound in by those fetters of party by which so much good is often prevented, and I must say also by which so much good is often accomplished. I believe this country also is in a much better position now than it was when our agitation commenced, because I believe the effect of all our writing and speaking has been to create a greater reverence for law—not for bad law, but for justice; for we have taught that justice between man and man is really the principle on which legislation ought to take place (cheers). I look upon the effort which has given the great strength to this League with more interest than ever; but although we have accomplished this object, and the Corn Law is as good as dead, I would just speak one word of consolation to the men and capitalists of this district, that there are many more things to do; and I speak not of political or constitutional changes, but I believe at this moment there is a feeling among the great mass of the operatives of this district that there has been a persevering and determined effort on the part of the middle classes here to obtain for themselves and for the operatives a great measure of justice from the Government (hear). There is prevailing now (I speak of the working classes) a very great degree of harmony in Yorkshire and Lancashire. I am most anxious that this harmony should be fostered and rendered permanent. The duties by which that can be done are duties which do not devolve entirely upon workmen, but are duties to the performance of which capitalists and employers are also called—(hear, hear)—and I am persuaded if the capitalists and employers of these districts would, with an increasing kindness and sympathy of feeling, unite themselves with the operative classes, do all they can to instruct them, do all they can to add to their enjoyments, treat them always with sympathy and always with justice (cheers)—I am perfectly satisfied that should our million and a half become three millions within this already densely crowded district, that all those visions of danger which men love to paint as the result of manufacturing enterprise and manufacturing employment, will remain only visions and will never be realised (hear, hear, and cheers). I will not pretend, in conclusion, to add anything to what has been said before with respect to the dissolution of this League. I wish it only to be remembered as being the example of the intelligent middle and working classes of the community rising up, banding themselves together, without violence, in obedience to every just law, strengthening year by year, until at length the greatest and the most odious tyranny from which any so-called free country ever suffered has been entirely overthrown (loud cheers). We need not raise monuments of stone, or of brass, or of any such durable material, to the honour of this League (hear, hear). If we have not been mistaken in the seven years we have worked, if we are not mistaken now—and I think I may say for all that have been working in this cause, that we not only do not believe we are mistaken, but we are confirmed in our conviction, that we shall find the result of this measure will be extended freedom to all classes of this country (hear), with extended freedom, increased security, not only for property, but increased security for labour, and for the rewards and for the enjoyments which are procured by labour; and I trust and believe—I speak conscientiously, I speak it after years of consideration—I believe that we have cleared away the greatest obstacle that stood in the path of the people, that we now stand on the threshold of a new career, and that if the spirit, and the energy, and the intelligence, of the great and noble qualities of which we boast ourselves, and which to some extent have been exhibited in the working of this League,—if those qualities we still possess, and we still bring into action, I know not that there is any height to which this nation may not aspire; and I know not but that in all good things, as we have often in all bad things, we may not lead forward other nations in the same career (great and prolonged cheering).

This resolution was then put, and carried unanimously, amidst loud cheers.

R. H. GAGE, Esq., was next called upon, and said,—The following resolution has been put into my hands, which I shall have great pleasure in moving:

"That after payment of the first instalment the subscribers of the £250,000 League Fund be released from all further liabilities."

I suppose, Mr. Chairman, this resolution has been placed in my hands because I was chairman of that meeting some six months ago, at which we called for the subscription of £250,000. (loud cheers), in the hope thereby of securing the repeal of the Corn Laws (renewed cheers). Now, gentlemen, if you subscribed with pleasure to that fund in the hope of obtaining that great boon, I have no doubt you will receive with great pleasure that you will not be called upon for any future instalment—the end having been obtained for which it was entered into (hear, hear). It is to be hoped, however, that those who have not paid their first instalment will lose no time in doing so (hear, hear). You see the release is conditional (hear, hear, and laughter), because there are many debts to pay, which I am sure everybody will wish to be discharged with honour and punctuality (hear, hear). And unless we have this money we cannot discharge those debts with that justice and liberality with which I am sure every friend of the League would wish them to be discharged. Before sitting down, I should like to add one or two words to this "last dying speech," as I suppose I may call it, of our body (hear, hear, and laughter). There are only two great public objects for which I ever felt intensely interested—the reform in Parliament and the abolition of the Corn Laws (hear, hear). Gentlemen, I esteem myself happy to have lived until the time when both these objects have been accomplished (cheers). There may be different opinions as to the value of these measures, and it may be asked, "Are you not somewhat disappointed in the result of the Reform Bill, and may you not be equally disappointed in the advantage you expect to derive from the repeal of the Corn Laws" (hear)? Now, gentlemen, up to this time, after the passing of the Reform Bill, I think it has not sufficiently been appreciated—I think its value has not been duly appreciated and acknowledged; and I think with Mr. Cobden, we have never made a full and proper use of it (hear). But this I will say, that the carrying of a reform in Parliament has had the effect of saving us from a revolution, and of more firmly attaching the middle classes to the constitution of the country (hear, hear, hear). In this point of view it is perhaps worth all the trouble and risks we ran in pursuit of it (hear, hear, hear). With respect to the passing of the measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws, I will mention my views, and you may judge from them whether the opinions I have formed are extravagant. I think we may expect to see the average price of corn and provisions somewhat lower than they have been (hear, hear). I expect the range of prices will be much less than we have hitherto witnessed, and this, both to the benefit of the producer and consumer (hear, hear). I think the general value of the produce of the necessities of life will be increased beyond the decline in prices, by the better development of the resources of the country, by a fair interchange of the great staple articles of consumption which every country possesses (hear, hear). I believe we shall not have the extreme glut in manufactures and commerce which we have hitherto seen (hear, hear, and applause). I am far from being so sanguine as to say, we shall be entirely free from them. I am glad to see one thing, that the Government and landed aristocracy have learnt to appreciate the power and influence of the middle classes; and I believe they will regard us in future as brothers and equals, and not as dependants and inferiors (loud cheers). I am also induced to believe, that those results mentioned by Mr. Cobden will be realised through the world, from the example we have set of freely exchanging the products of the industry of one country with those of another (hear, hear). With respect to agriculture, I believe it has received a greater stimulus from the repeal of the Corn Laws than from all the agricultural societies that ever have been established (applause and laughter). I am confident the produce of the land will be greatly augmented, and that the landowner, instead of viewing mischief, will derive great advantages. With respect to the tenant farmer, I believe it will secure to him a better tenure of his farm, and tend to increase the wealth and comfort of the whole body of farmers (loud cheers). With respect to the League, though I am one of that body, I must give it credit for the uniform energy and wisdom with which it has carried out all its proceedings; and most of all I have admired the unanimity and single-mindedness which have distinguished it through the whole of the long period of the seven years of its existence (cheers). I must say that I am most of all satisfied with our present act of suicide, (hear, hear, and a laugh)—that our death is as worthy as our life has been; and that in dissolving as we now do, we give an effectual answer to those insinuations of our enemies, that we should use our power for ulterior purposes (hear, hear, and cheers). Gentlemen, I have felt that the existence of such a body as the Anti-Corn-Law League would be intolerable in any country, were not its powers limited, and its dissolution provided for, when it has accomplished the purpose for which it was established (cheers).

HENRY ASHWORTH, Esq.: Mr. Chairman, I have great pleasure in seconding the resolution. It has been my duty more than my pleasure on former occasions to address you, and on the last occasion it was for the purpose of proposing that the sum of £250,000, should be raised with a view to obtaining the abolition of the Corn Law. I now congratulate you that the work has been accomplished for one-fifth of the sum (hear, and loud applause). Gentlemen, I have greater pleasure in rising to take part in these proceedings than in any former ones, because I believe it may be the last one on which I may have occasion to appeal to the public. I shall be thankful to take leave of public life if I may be permitted to do so; and I am thankful that the residue of my life may be spent in domestic life, instead of being as it has been for some years, in political agitation (hear, hear, and applause). In conclusion, I would briefly advert to the period when we became banded together. For several years previous to 1837 we had abundant harvests, good trade, prosperity, and comfort; and for several years after we had the reverse of that position (hear, hear). We found merchants and manufacturers engaged in trade, who, without any cause or sensible reason, so far as they were concerned, found their property wasted, their business consumed, and themselves turned into the Gazette, without any charge of dishonesty; and in this way a wreck of property took place which it was painful to behold (hear, hear, hear). And we saw also that the working classes were brought into want and suffering. In fact, those were the years when it was said, "human food was very dear, and flesh and blood were very cheap (hear, hear). In the time we became associated together for the purpose of repealing those laws, which, we believe, brought these injuries upon us. It may appear a long time that we should have been engaged for seven or eight years in a controversy to bring about that which is merely an act of justice (hear, hear); but if we consider that, let us also consider the elements we had at our command to effect our object (hear, hear). We were an association composed mostly of commercial people, unlearned in agitation and unskilled in logic or rhetoric, and lacking the knowledge of those arts which our opponents were possessed of, and therefore it was hardly to be expected that we should be prepared for the accomplishment of a result such as that we have now achieved (applause). Gentlemen, it has now been seen that business industry, with a good cause, can beat tilted power with a bad one (cheers). We know our strength,—it becomes us not to use it heedlessly and improperly, but not to hesitate to use it on all proper occasions. The League has now finished its work, and in taking leave of you I may adopt the language of one of our distinguished disciples on a recent occasion—namely, that the name of the League will live in the execution of monopolists, but that it will be gratefully remembered in the homes of toiling labour (hear, hear); and that when the workman comes to refresh his strength with food, it may be all the sweeter that it has not been leavened with taxation (cheers).

The resolution was carried with applause.

EDWARD BAINE, Esq., jun., of Leeds: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen,—It is not my intention to detain you with any general remarks on this occasion; but inasmuch as I am a member of the League who does not belong to the county of Lancaster, I feel that I should not do my duty if I did not take the opportunity of saying for the West Riding of Yorkshire, that we feel, and that the country feels—(hear, hear)—the liveliest gratitude to the men of Manchester for the wise, the admirable, the persevering manner in which they have conducted this great constitutional struggle to a triumphant issue (cheers). And now, sir, I will not make another general observation, but come to the matter which seems to me to be clearly the duty of this day (loud applause). There is a duty I think to the members of the League, and to the Free Traders throughout the country, which we ought to discharge, which is to give them advice; and that advice I think they ought to accept and act upon. You, sir, in the course of the excellent observations with which you opened this meeting, told us that the last and greatest movement of the League was the registration movement (hear, hear). You told us, sir, and most truly, that it was by means of the registration movement that those manifestations of public feeling and opinion were brought about throughout the country which have ended in this glorious result we are met to congratulate ourselves upon; but I think after the League has ploughed the ground, and sowed the seed of registration for Free Trade throughout the country, that, seeing we are just on the eve of another registration, and that that registration is to determine the character of the next Parliament—probably for six or seven years—I think, I say, that under these circumstances, it is incumbent throughout the country to reap at least the crop of which you have sown so plentifully the seed (hear, hear). We must not forget, notwithstanding the delightful assurances which have been given us by my honourable friend (to whom I feel a personal gratitude for his invaluable labours in this cause)—Mr. Cobden—we must not forget, notwithstanding those assurances he has given us so strongly, and in which, on one condition, I agree that the Corn Laws will never be revived,—we must not forget two or three things on which we have cast our eyes in the course of the scenes through which we have passed. We must not forget that Lord Stanley and the Duke of Richmond—the leading protectionists—have given a distinct and solemn pledge, that they intend at the next election to fight this battle of protection and Free Trade over again (hear, hear). Now when we recollect that the Corn Laws have existed in England for centuries, in one form or another, that the principles of protection are deeply-rooted in the selfishness of human nature,—when we recollect that in the last election a majority of 90 was returned in favour of protection,—when we consider that the converts in the House of Lords, have not been the most sincere,—when we consider these things, and the pledge given by the leading protectionists, it would not be expedient that we, throughout the country, should be indifferent to it (hear, hear). You are well aware that the new registration will almost immediately commence, and, under these circumstances, I say it becomes the duty of the League to offer this advice to the various Parliamentary constituencies,—that inasmuch as it has become desirable that the League should dissolve, in consequence of Free Trade having become the law of the land, they recommend that the Free Traders shall so attend to the registration as to secure a Free Trade majority at the next election to uphold that law (hear, hear). With these views, I have great pleasure in submitting the following resolution:

"That the Council of the League, whilst discontinuing its active efforts, cannot be insensible to the information given by the leading protectionists in both Houses of Parliament, of a determination to contest the ensuing general election with a view to obtain the repeal of the Corn Importation Bill; and, under these circumstances, the Council of their earnest recommendation to the Free Traders in the Parliamentary constituencies to continue their diligent attention to the registration, so as to be able to return a decided Free Trade majority to the next House of Commons."

Mr. P. Taylor, of London, seconded the resolution. He had served his apprenticeship to the League in Manchester, and he rejoiced that he was at last out of his time (hear, hear, and applause). He assured the meeting that the gratitude felt in London towards Mr. Cobden was not exceeded by any part of the Kingdom. If there had ever been a slight feeling of jealousy, the amiable conduct of the League itself, and the great efforts they had made, had rendered that body as popular in London as anywhere. He was gratified at the resolution of the League to dissolve itself, for this was national dissolution, for it was good that it should expire in its full strength (hear, hear), and that it should exhibit no signs of weakness and decay (hear, hear). It had succeeded in its object, and it was good that it should now expire, and leaving behind a monument of great and noble exertions in a great and noble cause (cheers). He had great pleasure in seconding the resolution.

WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., Liverpool, rose amidst loud and prolonged cheering, which was repeatedly revived, and said: Gentlemen, I may well rise with hesitation to address a few words to you. For the speeches I have heard of surpassing eloquence and feeling; but I cannot let the opportunity pass without congratulating you all upon the great fact we have heard, that we are released from the Corn Law (cheers).

That bill, which will, at no distant period remove restrictions which have so long trammelled the energies of the country, and kept up scarcity, has at length received the Royal assent; and gentlemen, it is not only here this happy effect will follow, but I am convinced that it is the best measure that has been adopted, or ever can be adopted, to keep us at peace with all mankind (cheers). And I must say that I do attribute the pleasant news we have recently received from the United States to a knowledge of the fact, that those Free Trade measures had passed (hear, hear, and cheers). It is exceedingly gratifying, gentlemen, that we have it in our power, and that we are this day met to redeem that pledge given to the world,—that the Anti-Corn-Law League should only co-exist with the Corn Laws. As has been said, we have been called an unconstitutional body—a body having ulterior and revolutionary views; this day will prove to mankind the singleness and honesty of our purpose (hear, hear, cheers). It is quite true, gentlemen, that the Anti-Corn-Law League have made a great revolution in our commercial policy, and one which I believe will have a more happy effect in keeping the peace of the world than the most brilliant victories ever achieved by arms created (cries of "hear, hear," and loud applause). We must feel, gentlemen, a deep debt of gratitude to the early members of the League, who undertook the Herculean task of teaching a whole nation the folly of protective laws. When they had to encounter the scoffs and sneers of those with whom they had to contend, they never once forsook their course, but took a plan which has made truth triumph over error, and by that they have now brought us together in this hall to celebrate the victory (cheers). All honour to such men! If it had not been for their zeal, their single-mindedness, their willingness to submit to great personal sacrifices of time and convenience, I fear we should be here—or rather not here, but in the country deploring a defeat instead of celebrating a victory (hear, hear). I fear, also, these labours have not only interfered with the time, but with the health of our distinguished leaders (hear, hear); and the country owes them, I am sure, a debt of gratitude which it can never repay; but as there is another meeting in connection with that subject, at which I shall be happy to be present (hear, hear, and cheers), I shall not further refer to the matter now. I think the chairman has placed in my hands a resolution, which he ought not, because that it is a protective resolution (a laugh); but I hope we shall never be called upon to carry it into effect. I have great pleasure in moving it.

"That in case any serious attempts be made by the protectionist party to induce the Legislature to retrace its steps, or prevent the final extinction of the Corn Law in February, 1849, the gentlemen who have hitherto so ably fulfilled the duties of the Executive Council be hereby authorised to call the League into renewed existence."

JOHN CHEETHAM, Esq. (Stalybridge): I rise, Sir, with great pleasure to second the resolution moved by Mr. Brown, whose presence on this occasion, standing in his public, and I might almost say, official position, (loud and protracted cheering) is an example of the no small results which have sprung from the organisation of this League (cheers). The resolution he has proposed, and which I have been called to second, asks you to leave in the hands of the Executive Council of the League the duty of carefully and zealously watching the progress of the events, so that if it be required you shall be once more summoned to the field. I admit that it is a large power to leave in the hands of these gentlemen, but I am sure the best guarantee you have for its proper exercise is the care and wisdom and discretion, which have characterised their past actions (loud cheers and applause). In alluding to the past proceedings of the League, almost all the speakers have seized upon some point of interest in those proceedings to remind you more particularly of; and there is one which, as it comes to my mind associated with many pleasing recollections of the room in which we are now assembled, I would also mention. It is to that gathering which you, Sir, called together in this room of these 700 ministers of the gospel from different parts of the country (hear, hear, and cheers). Now, I am sure—for my worthy chairman himself has acknowledged it—that he who looks back to the history of the last seven years must regard that as an event of no ordinary consequence in producing the results at which we have now arrived. You had gone, before this, with your facts, and arguments, and reasons, to Parliament; but when you gathered these men together here, you threw these things aside, and left them to decide, "Are these laws just?" And when they solemnly declared before the country, and of Him in whose presence they were assembled, that these laws—be their object what it might—were (they necessary to one interest or another,—were essentially unjust, (hear, hear, hear)—I say, when this declaration was made, when the never-dying feeling went forth that these laws were unjust and unrighteous, your work was half done (hear, hear, and applause)!—Mr. Cheetham went on to say that there was great encouragement in their past proceedings to struggle for other rights; for it taught this lesson, which ought ever to be inscribed on the banners of men banded together in pursuit of the public good, that "great is the truth, and it must prevail (applause)."

F. R. ATKINSON, Esq., said, he would remind the meeting, now that they were about to suspend proceedings, of the remark of Oliver Cromwell, when he said, "Gentlemen, let us go to pray, but keep your powder dry (applause and laughter). Now he had not much confidence in the promises of the protectionists, unless they (the Free Traders) kept their powder dry, and kept a sharp look-out; for he feared there would be some treachery (hear). All he had to say was, that he hoped the Council would exercise great vigilance, and be ready at the slightest alarm to call together that powerful and active body the League, which had accomplished so much (loud applause).

GEORGE THOMAS, Esq., of Bristol, said, he thought the League was bound to dissolve, but still he thought this resolution was the safety valve (hear, hear). It was a gratifying thing to him to meet so many noble spirits on this occasion, and that they owed a debt of gratitude to the men of Lancashire especially, which they could never repay. He thought they could hardly calculate the results of this measure to the world: it was beginning a new era, and what we had known of prosperity in his opinion would be far exceeded by that which was to come (cheers).

The Chairman put the resolution, and it was carried with much applause.

JOHN WHITTEKER, Esq., of Harist, here rose and moved, that the Chairman do leave the chair, and that Mr. Robert Hyde Greg be called thereon.—Mr. Greg took the vacant chair amidst loud cheers.

RICHARD GORDON, Esq., presented himself, and was received with renewed cheering. He said Mr. Chairman and gentlemen: When we were discussing the proceedings of this meeting, we did think of proposing a number of resolutions of thanks to individuals—we found, however, that the field was so very wide, and that it would be likely to lead to some invidious exceptions or omissions, so that we thought it would be best to avoid any compliments (hear, hear). It must not be supposed, therefore, that we forgot any one (hear, hear); especially do we bear in mind, I am sure, the services of our friend Mr. Villiers (hear, and loud cheers). I have always considered it, gentlemen, one of the most fortunate accidents of this agitation—a providential incident, I should almost call it—that our question fell into the hands of Mr. Villiers; for there is not a man in the kingdom, in the hot bed of the League itself, that has more undimly held the principles of repeal, nor who, during the last six months that we have been on the tenter-hooks of anxiety on this question, has had his mind more absorbed in the result, than Mr. Villiers (hear, hear, and cheers). I am sure that my friend Mr. Bright, and every one who has been in London, can bear testimony to the deep anxiety of our friend—"hear, hear," from Mr. Bright, and cheers)—and also to the exertions which he was constantly making to help forward our question, by encouraging those who were disposed to support it; while he discouraged others who had hopes that they might be able to compromise the principles of that measure. Well, gentlemen, there were other parties to whom I might with propriety allude; and amongst others I might mention the quiet members of the League—the silent members, I might call them (hear, hear, and cheers). There are a number of gentlemen who, during the last seven years and a half have been almost daily in attendance at the League rooms in Newall's Buildings; and bear in mind for the first two or three years of our agitation it was a very hopeless matter,—there was no esprit, no applause, the result of the power we now enjoy (hear, hear);—we sat in a small room, the same we now have, and we had a dingy red curtain drawn across the room, that we might not feel chilled by the paucity of our numbers (cheers and laughter). Two or three were all that were there on one occasion, and I recollect smiling and saying to my friend Prentice, "What a lucky thing it is the monopolists cannot draw aside that curtain, and see how many of us there are, for if they could, they would not be much frightened" (cheers and laughter). Now it would give you an idea of the almost unheard-of labours of these men if I gave you the number of times half-a-dozen of them have attended meetings of the League, and had their names recorded on the minutes of proceedings (hear, hear, hear). There is our friend George Wilson, the chairman, 1361 times—(loud cheers);—Mr. Prentice, who stands next, 1127 times—(loud cheers);—Mr. Samuel Lees 863 times—(loud cheers);—Mr. Rawson 601 times—(loud cheers);—Mr. T. Woolley 485 times—(loud cheers);—Mr. W. Bickham 474 times—(loud cheers);—Mr. W. Evans 444 times—(loud cheers);—and Mr. Henry Rawson 358 times—(loud cheers). I have given you here the names of those gentlemen who have attended most frequently there, and others have also given their attendance for 100 and 150 times. Now these gentlemen have also been most assiduous workers in private, in conducting the correspondence and others labours of the Council: and some of them have never been heard of before, and never would have been heard of, if I had allowed their modesty to have prevailed (cheers and loud laughter). Now I think it is a matter to be referred,—not to the Executive Council, because they are the parties themselves—but to members of the Council from a distance.—I think it should be recommended to them to consider some mode of giving a testimonial, something which should be durable and remain in the families of these gentlemen (loud cheers). I am sure it is less the value of the thing than it is desirable that a tribute so honourable to them and to you should be presented to them, to hand down their names to their children and to posterity, as having contributed to this great event (loud cheers). I leave that in the hands of others; but now, gentlemen, I come to a question of an important kind. We have moved our friend Mr. Wilson out of the chair; it was because I have a few words to say which it would not be agreeable to his modesty to listen to. Gentlemen, these proceedings cannot be allowed to determine without taking into consideration the best mode of testifying to Mr. Wilson the opinions we entertain of the unparalleled services he has rendered to this cause (loud and prolonged cheering). Mr. Wilson, Mr. Prentice, myself, and another or two, were at the outset the members who most frequently attended these meetings. There are only a few gentlemen who can touch, as I hope they will, for the labours of Mr. Wilson. Now, some of you may have thought that he was remunerated for his services to the League. I know that there has been such an opinion abroad, and when you have heard it you will no doubt have said that nothing could be more fair and just than that he should have been remunerated (hear, hear). But, gentlemen, from the first, Mr. Wilson has refused to receive one farthing of compensation for his services (loud and prolonged cheering). Seven years ago I pressed it upon Mr. Wilson to allow us to give him with his office as chairman of the Council of the League a stipend; and although we were then poor and hardly knew where to raise funds for our humble agitation, I proposed to him to receive 500*l.* a year, to abstract himself from business, and give his attention almost exclusively to the League. He declined the offer, but stated his willingness to bear all the weight of business we could lay upon his shoulders. Well, gentlemen, as our friends increased, we pressed upon him to accept 1000*l.* a year; but this he declined. He probably thought—what none of us did—that if he sat in the chair as a stipendiary chairman, he would not preserve that independence and usefulness which he has done. Gentlemen, the services of Mr. Wilson have not been on the surface like those of some of us. My friend Mr. Bright and myself have been rewarded with the applause and encouragement of public meetings,—one of us far beyond his deserts—(no, no, and cheers)—but the labours of Mr. Wilson have been the labours of the counting house and the closet (cheers). He has had the labours of this body entirely under his control—and the practical details of the business of the League have been entirely under the care of Mr. Wilson; and I will say, after seeing many public men, and knowing something of public business, that I never met with a man who possesses such instinctive sagacity in ascertaining the principles and motives which actuate men, and such a comprehensive power of dealing with matters of business as my friend Mr. Wilson (cheers). Organisation—the organisation of men is, with our friend Mr. Wilson, an instinct; the management of details of the largest possible extent are with him practicable, and he manages them with ease at the same time that he grasps a thing in its whole extent. There is not a thing, whether it has come in the shape of a bazaar or a public movement, but Mr. Wilson has taken charge of the whole details from the first advertisement that there was to be a bazaar, as in the case of that in London, down to the superintendence of painting the interior of the theatre; he has taken the whole of the details under his care so as no other man could do it. It has been one of the most gratifying features, indeed, of this movement, that we have found men fitted to fill every department; men have fallen into their places instinctively, but of all the talent, the labour we have had at our command, I do not know of any human means by which we could have reached the point we have, if we had not had the services of Mr. George Wilson (hear, hear, and loud cheers). And now, gentlemen, after saying that, I beg to propose that we pass to some fitting mode of seeing how we can in some measure reward—for we cannot adequately reward him, I am sure (hear, hear hear). Gentlemen, on the receipt of the whole of the first instalment of our last fund, we shall have such a sum as I believe will enable us to wind up the affairs of the League—though there are many things which we may not have yet taken into account, and there are many points that come as a sort of backwater, after so much agitation,—but I believe we shall have in our power, after meeting all our engagements, the means of pressing upon his acceptance the receipt of a sum of not less than 10,000*l.* (loud and repeated shouts of applause). I have not said a word to him as to his feelings in this matter, but my friend Wilson possesses sound common sense, and is not a churlish man (laughter), and therefore I hope he will not refuse us the satisfaction of paying this tribute to his worth (loud cheers). I therefore move:

"That this meeting views with feelings of unfeigned admiration and gratitude the long, arduous, and invaluable services rendered to the League by the Chairman of its Council, George Wilson, Esq., and hereby authorises the Executive Council to present to him, and to accept of a sum of not less than 10,000*l.*, to be paid out of the funds of the League."

Mr. SMITH: The unanimity which pervades the meeting on this resolution is what I anticipated, therefore I shall not trespass further upon your time to say I give my cordial assent to that motion.

Mr. BROTHERTON, M.P., said that, like his friend, Mr. Cobden, he had been always extremely reluctant to present himself before a public meeting; but he really could not deny himself the pleasure of supporting the motion which had just been put from the chair. He had been a witness of Mr. Wilson's conduct during the last seven years, and he had no hesitation in saying that whatever might have been the exertions of the others of the League, he did consider that the success of this great measure was as much attributable to the unexampled assiduity, and wisdom he might say, and the conduct generally, and the influence of Mr. Wilson in the League, as to any other member of it, however distinguished. Therefore he (Mr. Brotherton) could not sit still without offering his tribute of praise to that gentleman, and expressing his extreme gratification that such a vote had been proposed. And whilst he was on his legs, perhaps they would allow him, as that was the last morning that ever would be held on the subject, to congratulate that great community on what he believed to be the virtual repeal of the Corn Laws. He must say that he felt it to be a great honour and privilege that he had the opportunity of aiding, in a humble degree, in the promotion of this great cause. It had been beautifully expressed by Mr. Cobden, that "no man, however sanguine, could have expected the result so soon, and that it could be only attributable to an all-wise and overruling Providence" (hear, hear, hear). He considered that the present Parliament might be considered a Whig Parliament, because it was called by the Whigs to carry out the wishes of their beloved Sovereign to put down the monopoly in corn, in timber, and in sugar; but when the election took place they found that instead of those members being elected who would carry out these principles, a great majority of monarchists was elected. It appeared to the nation at large that it was impossible that this measure could ever be carried; but, in spite of all the combination of circumstances they had seen during the last five years, there had been that homage paid to truth and justice that the League was triumphant (cheers). He could not but see in that great measure a proof of the power of public opinion. In every other great agitation there had been, to a certain extent, intimidation or an appearance of physical force; but with regard to the agitation in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws, they found that it had been entirely accomplished by enlightening the public mind (cheers). And they saw how great measures might be accomplished when founded on truth and justice, however appearances might be against them (cheers). It only required the thought and disposition to be implanted in the heart of their beloved Queen to carry out this measure, for which she had dissolved Parliament, and to put that thought into the mind of a powerful man to aid in carrying it out, and the measure was accomplished (cheers). He (Mr. Brotherton) congratulated that community on the great benefits which were likely to arise from the measures that had passed, and the measures which he trusted would yet be passed before this Parliament was dissolved. They might see agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, all flourishing simultaneously, and they probably would not then experience those alternations of prosperity and adversity which had been seen during the last twenty or twenty-five years, or at least, since the Corn Laws were passed (hear, hear). It had been proved that those measures would not tend to the injury of agriculture, but that all classes in the community would be benefited by them. They would see the important results of those measures in the improved state of society in general, they should see increased comfort and industry, and the commercial energies of the country extended and prospering—they should see less crime, less poverty, and a better state of society (hear). He (Mr. Brotherton) was delighted to hear that there might be a cordial union between the operative and manufacturer (hear, hear). They knew that property had its duties as well as its rights, and if all classes had combined together in wise measures to promote the general benefit of the community, a degree of prosperity would be enjoyed in this country of which, perhaps, the most sanguine mind in the room could scarcely form an idea (hear, hear). In many respects this measure would be advantageous. It would be advantageous both in a physical and commercial point of view (hear, hear). Let them only consider what the state of that country was when he told them that the repeal of the Corn Laws took off a tax of one million a year which was levied on the people of Lancashire (hear, hear). Such benefits as those were worthy of great exertions, and he had been accomplished in the most striking manner, and he trusted they should all unite together in making the best use of that which had now been placed within the reach of that great commercial community (hear, hear). He (Mr. Brotherton) again tendered the tribute of his thanks to Mr. Wilson and the other gentlemen who had displayed so much attention in carrying out this great and peaceful agitation, and he trusted they should have no occasion whatever to renew their exertions (hear, hear). He could not say he agreed in the sentiment that had been expressed by Mr. Atkinson with regard to distrusting the aristocracy or anybody in the carrying out of this measure. It had been accomplished by truth and justice, and if there was an attempted breach of faith, there was energy enough in the nation to induce them to rise up as one man to resist such an attempt (cheers). He did not wish to be distinctly understood, and he believed that now the measure was carried, and the nation convinced of its advantages, no power on earth could repeat that law (cheers).

A. PATTERSON, Esq., I did not intend to address you; after having sat for 30 years, and spoken for 30 years against the Corn Laws, you were meeting that I came rather to listen than to talk. But I cannot help rising when the subject is the cause of Mr. Wilson to your gratitude (loud cheers and applause). Mr. Cobden has told you that Mr. Wilson's attendance at the meetings amounted to 1360 times; but that is no half of the amount of his attention to this cause. Why, there is not contained in this list of attendances any notion of his journeys to London on the business of the League for weeks together, after occupying night and day; there is no notice of his journeys to other parts of the country on the business of the League. I think that if we take 7½ years and multiply it by 300 working days, and count all those days as fully employed in this cause, you would have a notion of his services. Gentlemen, it is nothing but the dictate of gratitude that we should offer him this testimonial. I do not think any money will repay his services, and I think that 10,000*l.* has not been fixed upon because it was in any way conceived to be the measure of the value of his services, but the thought that dictated the sum was rather that that was the amount which remains in our hands as a surplus. Then there is the subject of attendances: Mr. Woolley, Mr. Lees, and others have attended upon sub-committees. I do not take much credit for having attended more general meetings, because these gentlemen have often attended meetings of committees which have occupied much more time, and often till a late hour of night, when I have not.

Mr. Broes expressed his gratification at being present at that meeting, and coming as he did from a midland county, he could not, with justice to himself, or those from whom he came, refrain from expressing the deepest sense of gratitude for the services of the Council of the League (cheers). He regretted that the distance of his place of residence had prevented him from rendering the effectual assistance which his inclination would prompt to render; but he was glad the management of their affairs was in the hands of gentlemen so patriotic and energetic, and who had accomplished such great social results (applause). He conceived the passing of the measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws was not only one of the greatest events of modern times, but would confer more advantages on the people of this and other countries than any measure that had passed for centuries. The work in which they had been engaged had conferred benefits on humanity at large; and they felt that the services of those gentlemen who had been occupied in carrying out the details of that work had been invaluable. He entirely agreed in the vote to Mr. Wilson (cheers), and suggested that some token should be paid to those gentlemen whose names had been read over by Mr. Cobden (cheers). On behalf of the midland counties, he wished to say how entirely they approved of the conduct and how deeply grateful they were for the services of the Council of the League.

The resolution was then put and carried by acclamation in the most enthusiastic manner, all the members of the Council and of the general body standing up, and cheering vociferously.

Mr. KATHBONE, of Liverpool, briefly proposed the next resolution which was as follows:

"That the members of the Executive Council of the League are entitled to the warmest gratitude of the League and of the country for their high-principled, laborious, and most successful exertions during the seven years of our constitutional agitation; and that a committee be appointed, consisting of Joseph Brotherton, Esq., M.P., and such gentlemen as he may associate with himself, to determine on some suitable testimonial to be presented to those gentlemen out of the funds of the League." It was not necessary to say one word as to the propriety of giving some token of gratitude to those who had worked so laboriously without any reward but the approbation of their own consciences (cheers). He hoped, now their efforts had been successful, that a moral regeneration would take place among the people, without which cheap bread would be of little value indeed (hear, hear).

Mr. Broes briefly seconded the resolution, which passed with applause.

The CHAIRMAN: As no other gentleman has anything to address to this meeting, it is now my duty to say that the Anti-Corn Law League stands conditionally dissolved.

A deep silence followed this announcement for a few seconds, when some one called out for "three cheers," and

Mr. COBDEN, rising, said, "I don't think we can get up a cheer (hear, hear, and laughter), for, as I have just been observing to my friends on my right and left, I never felt so 'flat' in all my life (laughter). I never heard speeches that fell so flat, and never saw an audience that looked so flat as to-day (a laugh). It is right it should be so, for we have been celebrating the obsequies of the League. We began in solemnity, and we end in solemnity (hear, hear). The world will see, at all events, that whatever else they may be, they are earnest men who have engaged in this work (hear, hear). If you would like to have a cheer, let us try if we can't get up a few sepulchral ones (loud cries of 'hear, hear,' and laughter). Come, I'll be your friar."

The honourable gentleman then led off, and was followed with right and will by the meeting, in very loud, prolonged, and effective cheering.

"The Queen" was then named, and the mention of her Majesty was received with a long and hearty burst of applause, and the meeting then separated.

AGRICULTURE.

THE EMANCIPATION OF INDUSTRY.

A FEW LAST WORDS TO THE TENANT FARMERS.

The work of the League is accomplished. Absolute freedom of trade in corn, within three years, is provided for by Act of Parliament; and in the mean time a modified and moderate scale of duties will be in operation. We believe that this period of transition will be mischievous to farmers; first, by preventing them from gaining at once the full advantage of freely importing grain for cattle food; and next, by inducing an exaggerated expectation on the part of foreign growers of the ultimate capacity of our market. Moreover, it will postpone arrangements with the landlords. However, whatever be the effects of one or all of these causes, they will be only temporary, and ought not seriously to derange the plans of any intelligent and calculating farmer. Virtually the trade in corn is free. A legislature of landowners no longer metes out to the people the quantity of their food. Parliament has given up the hopeless, impossible task of "regulating" the price of grain. Henceforth that must depend upon the seasons, the enterprise of our agricultural capitalists, and of our merchants. The prices of corn, be they high or be they low, will be natural prices, the result of natural causes. Artificial scarcity will no longer be brought in aid of the landlord's rental. Like the rest of the community, he is to come into fair competition in the world's market. Wheat grown on ducal and squirearchical acres will not again be sold at a price beyond its real value, because the duke or the squire who owns the acres is "heavily mortgaged," or has large portions and family jointures to provide for. Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, London, and the hundreds of other places in which the toiling artisan gives indirectly an enormous value to the land of this country will no more be taxed, to uphold the "station" or satisfy the greed of a landed aristocracy. The combination of trading energy and educated knowledge, which constituted the power of the League, has emancipated the trading and commercial industry of the nation from the last bond of feudalism.

Would that we could say that rural industry is emancipated also. The blight of feudalism still rests on agriculture. Customs, which have no better source than landlord prejudices, and regulations, which result from the capricious exercise of landlords' will, still prevent the development of the art of husbandry. That business, which of all others is most congenial to the human mind, which affords a wide sphere of usefulness, and requires for complete success the exercise of many and varied talents, is the only one from which educated, high-minded, and independent men, are excluded; and excluded by that system of managing landed property, which renders the tenant farmer—the agricultural capitalist—in point of position and security, but one degree removed from the condition of the landlords' bailiff. And is this state of things to continue? We firmly believe that it cannot for any great length of time; measuring time by the period of national existence. But the problem is, how to emancipate the present generation of farmers?

We have laboured earnestly during the last three years, to draw the attention of tenants to their true position. We have shown them, not only the direct losses and injuries they have sustained from the system of "protection," but still more the bar it has presented to their emancipation from a state of real and practical vassalage. We have exposed the delusions which have been fostered amongst them by their only political leaders, the landowners; who, for their own party or class objects, have operated upon the hopes or fears of the tenantry, deluding them alike whether promising an Act of Parliament price for wheat, or threatening an "inundation" of foreign corn, at next to no price at all. We have steadily argued the question of Free Trade upon agricultural grounds; we have left to others the wider field of the injustice and public wrong inflicted by the Corn Laws upon the community, in order to demonstrate that, passing the more general question, the Corn Laws inflicted, directly and indirectly, the deepest injury upon the capitalists engaged in husbandry.

But while seeking to induce the industrious agriculturists to join with the other industrious classes in the demand for Free Trade, we have not flattered the prejudices of farmers. On the contrary, we have told them that there is no royal road to success in farming. We have shown, from every chapter in the history of British husbandry of the last thirty years, that legislative protection is a mere illusion, a mirage, mocking the distressed agriculturist with false hopes of special dispensation in his favour; we have told the farmers that upon their own exertions they must rely, and that so relying success is certain.

We have stated facts to illustrate the capacity of our soil for improvements almost indefinite, and for an increase of production incredible to the farmer, who has relied upon protection and high prices for profit. We have pointed to successful farmers, and their methods of cultivation, as evidence that success in agriculture was to be obtained only by disregarding the promises of the Corn Laws, that is, by looking to quantity without reference to price. Nor have we hesitated to show the nearly universal deficiency of capital with which the business of farming is carried on, or to trace that deficiency to its source, the absence of permanent holdings and the existence of landlord imposed burdens, which prevent the secure application of capital to the culture of the soil. And we have reason to believe that the course of remark into which our advocacy of Free Trade has led us, has not been without effect upon both tenants and landlords. Both may have been occasionally offended by direct or implied rebukes, but they have been led to examine and consider the points upon which observation has been made. And we have ever maintained that the tenants as a body are, in all that relates to agriculture, far in advance of the landlords as a class; that, in spite of the greater advantages of leisure and education of the latter, the sharpening effects of self-interest have brought the tenant farmers to more correct views of the wants and impediments of agriculture than the landowners, with a few eminent exceptions, entertain. But what the farmers most require is independence—mental independence—to demand that fair consideration, that equal share in contracts with their landlords, which is essential in the main to their mutual benefit. There is, however, an immense mass of prejudice to be overcome, before the business of a farmer can become what it ought to be—the simple occupation of land at a money rent. This can only be accomplished by vigorous action on the part of farmers. They must resolutely resist the continuance of semi-feudal practices, such as the reservation of game, and yearly tenancies. They should insist upon long leases, free from obsolete covenants and restrictions, while they ought to be prepared to offer a full equivalent in the shape of rent, founded upon a careful calculation of the fluctuations of seasons, and which they must expect to pay under all circumstances. There is nothing so adverse to the farmer's independence as eleemosynary abatements of rent; and with the introduction of well-considered leases, that abatement system will cease. This will probably be our last opportunity of addressing the tenant farmers, and we use it to urge upon them the necessity of trusting to themselves.

Henceforth the object of farmers must be to attain independence, social and political independence. They must think for themselves, and they must act for themselves. Above all, they must avoid "farmers' friends." The landowners can never be true representatives of the farmers.

In most questions of material interest, the two classes, the landlords and the tenant farmers, are directly opposed to each other; and the prejudices and recollections of the past will long induce the landowners to desire the depression rather than the elevation of the social position of the tenant farmers.

The means by which alone the farmers will attain independence will be SELF-RELIANCE.

They must do as the trading classes have done before them, select for their representatives in the House of Commons men of their own class, or men who sympathise with their class. Now no one can do so less than a landlord. That must be a standing rule; and every landowner who, as a public man, seeks the confidence of the farmers, should establish affirmatively his right to be considered an exception.

The farmer should always remember, that as a capitalist his interest is identified with that of the trading classes, that their well-doing is his well-doing, and that the kind of patron and client relation which has hitherto subsisted between landlord and tenant in England is utterly inconsistent with the successful prosecution of farming as a business. Let the farmers learn from the success of the League, and of the classes who have supplied the energy of the League in emancipating their own industry, that fortune helps those only who will help themselves.

REVIEW.

THE HISTORY OF COMMERCE. By W. Cooke Taylor, Esq., LL.D. of Trin. Coll., Dublin.

The above work is intended to set forth the history of commerce in connection with the science of political economy, as its principles were gradually developed by the progress of exchange, to show the connection between the increase of commercial intercourse and the spread of civilisation; to show how commercial enterprise prompted to maritime and inland discovery, and to exhibit how commercial credit becomes the bond of brotherhood between nations. The "History of Commerce" must, in fact, to some extent, be an exposure of pernicious errors and perverted truths; but in a still greater degree it will be a record of honourable exertions in the cause of humanity, and brilliant discoveries for the moral advancement of mankind. It will show that truth, justice, and freedom, are the great elements of commercial prosperity; and that no individual, and no nation, can violate their principles with impunity. We have witnessed the dawn of a system, rising on the world as a sun of righteousness, with healing in its wings; and at such a time it would be ungrateful to neglect the memory of those who toiled and struggled through the long night that is now gone down the sky.

The literary and personal connection between Doctor Cooke Taylor and Archbishop Whately will no doubt be continued through the proposed work, and will, of course, ensure both its scientific accuracy and its moral value. It will elucidate many points, both in ancient and modern history, which have received but little attention from English writers; as, for instance, the Carthaginian system of banking; the Greek plan of colonisation; the state of the trading municipalities under the Romans; the effect produced on commerce by the invasion of the barbarians in the west, and the conquests of the Saracens in the east; the rise and growth of commerce among the Lombards, the Albigenses, the Moors, and other communities in the Western Mediterranean; the formation of the Hanseatic and Rhenish Leagues, and a succinct view of the commercial history of the principal European nations since the discoveries of Vasco di Gama and Columbus.

We have merely to announce these works; there is no need of dwelling upon their importance; and it would be rather premature to speculate on the style of their future execution.

Bentley's Modern Literature. Part I. Walpole's Letters. London. Bentley.

We have seen no more acceptable series of cheap literature than that which Mr. Bentley has commenced, for it gives us cheapness, without any sacrifice of convenience or comfort. The works appear with such elegance of paper and print as to fit them for the most luxurious library, and at a price which places them within the range of persons of moderate fortune. The eye is not wearied by small print and crowded pages. Instead of imperfect woodcuts, we have steel plates, executed in the best style of art. We are glad that the publisher has commenced the series with the inimitable letters of Horace Walpole, a correspondence which, for lively wit, shrewd appreciation of character, and thorough knowledge of English parties at an important period of history, has no rival in the whole range of the world's literature. To criticise a work which is known and esteemed wherever our language is spoken would be superfluous, but we shall extract some of the passages relating to the expulsion of Sir Robert Walpole from office, which have the greater interest at a crisis when a still greater Sir Robert has been forced to abandon the reins of power.

The opposition to Sir Robert Walpole was conducted with a personal ferocity to which modern times can afford no parallel. It was known that the session of 1742 would decide the issue; and though there was no division on the address, there were significant indications of a desperate struggle, which Horace thus describes:

"We had no division, but a very warm battle between Sir R. and Pultney. The latter made a fine speech, very personal, on the state of affairs. Sir R. with as much health, as much spirits, as much force and command as ever, answered him for an hour; said, 'He had long been taxed with all our misfortunes; but did he raise the war in Germany? or advise the war with Spain? did he kill the late Emperor or King of Prussia? did he counsel this king? or was he first minister to the King of Poland? did he kindle the war betwixt Muscovy and Sweden?' For our troubles at home, he said, 'all the grievances of this nation were owing to the Patriots.' They laughed much at this; but does he want proofs of it? He said, 'They talked much of an equilibrium in this Parliament, and of what they designed against him; if it was so, the sooner he knew it the better; and therefore if any man would move for a day to examine the state of the nation, he would second it.' Mr. Pultney did move for it; Sir R. did second it, and it is fixed for the 21st of January. Sir R. repeated some words of Lord Chesterfield's, in the House of Lords, that this was a time for truth, for plain truth, for English truth, and hinted at the reception his lordship had met in France. After these speeches of such consequence, and from such men, Mr. Lyttleton got up to justify, or rather to flatter Lord Chesterfield, though everybody then had forgot that he had been mentioned. Danvers, who is a rough, rude beast, but now and then mouths out some humour, said, 'that Mr. P. and Sir R. were like two old bawds, debauching young members.'

"That day was a day of triumph, but yesterday (Wednesday) the streamers of victory did not fly so gallantly. It was the day of receiving petitions; Mr. Pultney presented an immense piece of parchment, which he said he could not just lift; it was the Westminster petition, and is to be heard next Tuesday, when we shall all have our brains knocked out by the mob; so if you don't hear from me next post, you will conclude my head was a little out of order. After this we went upon a Cornish petition, presented by Sir William Yonge, which drew on a debate and a division, when lo! we were but 222 to 215—how do you like a majority of seven? The Opposition triumphs highly, and with reason; one or two such victories, as Pyrrhus, the member for Macedonia, said, will be the ruin of us. I look upon it now, that the question is, Downing Street or the Tower; will you come and see a body, if one should happen to lodge at the latter? There are a thousand pretty things to amuse you; the lions, the armoury, the crown, and the axe that beheaded Anna Bullen. I design to make interest for the room where the two princes were smothered; in long winter evenings, when one wants company, (for I don't suppose that many people will frequent me then,) one may sit and scribble verses against Crouchback's Richard, and dirges on the sweet babes. If I die there, and have my body thrown into a wood, I am too old to be buried by robin redbreasts, am I not?"

"Boote, the prince's chancellor, made a most long and stupid speech; afterwards, Sir R. called to him, 'Brother Boote, take care you don't get my old name.' 'What's that?' 'Blunderer.'

"You can't conceive how I was pleased with the vast and deserved applause that Mr. Chute's brother, the lawyer, got; I never heard a clearer or a finer speech. When I went home, 'Dear Sir,' said I to Sir R. 'I hope Mr. Chute will carry his election for Heydon; he would be a great loss to you.' He replied, 'We will not lose him.' I, who meddle with nothing, especially elections, and go to no committees, interest myself extremely for Mr. Chute.

"Old Marlborough is dying but who can tell! last year she had lain a great while ill, without speaking; her physicians said, 'She must be blistered, or she will die.' She called out, 'I won't be blistered, and I won't die.' If she takes the same resolution now, I don't believe she will."

The Duchess of Marlborough kept her word; she lived more than three years after the date of this letter, and she urged on the opposition to their first great victory on the Westminster petition. The letter, describing this part of the contest, furnishes more than one curious illustration of the morality of party:

"Monday and Tuesday we went on the Westminster election. Murray spoke divinely; he was their counsel. Lloyd answered him extremely well; but on summing up the evidence on both sides, and in his reply, Murray was—in short, beyond what was ever heard at the bar. That day (Tuesday) we went on the merits of the cause, and at ten at night divided, and lost it. They had 220, we 216; so the election was declared void. You see four is a fortunate number to them. We had forty-one more members in town, who would not, or could not come down. The time is a touchstone for wavering consciences. All the arts, money, promises, threats, all the arts of the former year, 41, are applied; and self-interest, in the shape of Scotch members—nay, and of English ones, operates to the aid of their party, and to the defeat of ours. Lord Doneraile, a young Irishman, brought in by the Court, was petitioned against, though his competitor had but one vote. This young man spoke as well as ever any one spoke in his own defence; insisted on the petition being heard, and concluded with declaring, that 'his cause was his defence, and impartiality must be his support.' Do you know that, after this, he went and engaged, if they would withdraw the petition, to vote with them in the Westminster affair! His friends reproached him so strongly with his meanness, that he was shocked, and went to Mr. Pultney to get off; Mr. P. told him, he had given him his honour, and he would not release him, though Lord Doneraile declared it was against his conscience; but he voted with them and lost us the next question which they put (for censuring the High Bailiff) by his single vote; for in that the numbers were 217 against 215: the alteration of his vote would have made it even; and then the Speaker, I suppose, would have chosen the merciful side, and decided for us. After this, Mr. Pultney, with an affected humanity, agreed to commit the High Bailiff only to the serjeant-at-arms. Then, by a majority of six, they voted that the soldiers, who had been sent for, after the poll was closed, to save Lord Sundon's life, had come in a military and illegal manner, and influenced the election. In short, they determined, as Mr. Murray had dictated to them, that no civil magistrate, on any pretence whatsoever, though he may not be able to suppress even a riot by the assistance of the militia and constables, may call in the aid of the army. Is not this doing the work of the Jacobites? Have they any other view than to render the riot act useless? and then they may rise for the Pre-emptor whenever they please. Then they moved to punish Justice Blackerby for calling in the soldiers; and when it was desired that he might be heard in his own defence, they said he had already confessed his crime. Do but think on it! without being accused, without knowing, or being told it was a crime, a man gives evidence in another cause, not his own, and then they call it his own accusation of himself, and would condemn him for it. You see what justice we may expect if they actually get the majority." But this was too strong a pill for one of their own leaders to swallow: Sir John Barnard did propose and persuade them to give him a day to be heard. In short, we sat till half an hour after four in the morning; the longest day that ever was known. I say nothing of myself, for I could but just speak when I came away; but Sir Robert was as well as ever, and spoke with as much spirit as ever, at four o'clock. This way they will not kill him; I will not answer for any other. As he came out, Whitehead, the author of Manners, and agent, with one Carey, a surgeon, for the Opposition, said, 'D—n him, how well he looks! Immediately after their success, Lord Gage, went forth, and begged there might be no mobbing; but last night we had bonfires all over the town, and I suppose shall have notable mobbing at the new election; though I do not believe there will be any opposition to their Mr. Edwin and Lord Perceval. Thank God! we are now adjourned for three weeks. I shall go to Swallowfield for a few days: so for one week you will miss hearing from me. We have escaped the Prince's affair hitherto, but we shall have it after the holidays. All depends upon the practices of both sides in securing or getting new votes during this recess. Sir Robert is very sanguine: I hope, for his sake and his honour, and for the nation's peace, that he will get the better; but the moment he has the majority secure, I shall be very earnest with him to resign. He has a constitution to last some years, and enjoy some repose; and for my own part (and both my brothers agree with me in it), we wish most heartily to see an end of his ministry. If I can judge of them by myself, those who want to be in our situation, do not wish to see it brought about more than we do. Is it fatiguing to bear so much envy and ill-will undeservedly.—Otiūm Divos rogo; but adieu, politics, for three weeks."

The next struggle was on the appointment of a secret committee, and it occasioned a scene without a parallel in the history of the House of Commons:

"It was a most shocking sight to see the sick and dead brought in on both sides! Men on crutches, and Sir William Gordon from his bed, with a blister on his head, and flannel hanging out from under his wig. I could scarce pity him for his ingratitude. The day before the Westminster petition, Sir Charles Wager gave his son a ship, and the next day the father came down and voted against him. The son has since been cast away; but they concealed it from the father, that he might not absent himself. However, as we have our good-natured men too on our side, one of his own countrymen went and told him of it in the House. The old man, who looked like Lazarus at his resuscitation, bore it with great resolution, and said, he knew why he was told of it, but when he thought his country in danger, he would not go away. As he is so near death, that it is indifferent to him whether he died two thousand years ago or to-morrow, it is unlikely for him not to have lived when such insensibility would have been a Roman virtue.

"There are no arts, no menaces, which the Opposition do not practise. They have threatened one gentleman to have a reversion cut off from his son, unless he will vote with them. To Totness there came a letter to the mayor from the Prince, and signed by two of his lords, to recommend a candidate in opposition to the Solicitor-general. The mayor sent the letter to Sir Robert. They have turned the Scotch to the best account. There is a young Oswald, who had engaged to Sir R. but has voted against us. Sir R. sent a friend to reproach him: the moment the gentleman who had engaged for him came into the room, Oswald said, 'You had like to have led me into a fine error! did you not tell me that Sir R. would have the majority?'"

"When the debate was over, Mr. Pultney owned that he had never heard so fine a debate on our side; and said to Sir Robert, 'Well, nobody can do what you can!' 'Yes,' replied Sir R., 'Yonge did better.' Mr. P. answered, 'It was fine, but not of that weight with what you said.' 'They all allow it; and now their plan is to persuade Sir Robert to retire with honour. All that evening there was a report about the town, that he and my uncle were to be sent to the Tower, and people hired windows in the city to see them pass by—but for this time I believe we shall not exhibit so historical a parade."

The night of the committee, my brother Walpole had got two or three invalids at his house, designing to carry them into the House through his door, as they were too ill to go round by Westminster Hall; the patriots, who have rather more contrivances than their predecessors of Grecian and Roman memory, had taken the precaution of stopping the keyhole with sand. How Livy's eloquence would have been hampered, if there had been back-doors and keyholes to the Temple of Concord!"

We have a less lively, but still a graphic account of the catastrophe:

"I am miserable that I have not more time to write to you especially as you will want to know so much of what I have to tell you; but for a week or fortnight I shall be so hurried, that I shall scarce know what I say. I sit here writing to you, and receiving all the town, who flock to this house; Sir Robert has already had three levees this morning, and the rooms still overflowing—they overflow up to me. You will think this the prelude to some victory! On the contrary, when you receive this, there will be no longer a Sir Robert Walpole; you must know him for the future by the title of Earl of Orford. That other envied name expires next week with his ministry!"

Preparatory to this change, I should tell you, that last week we heard in the House of Commons the Chippendale election, when Jack Frederick and his brother-in-law, Mr. Hume, on our side petitioned against Sir Edmund Thomas and Mr. Baynton Rolt. Both sides made it the decisive question—but our people were not all equally true; and upon the previous question we had but 235 against 236, so lost it by one. From that time my brothers, my uncle, I, and some of his particular friends, persuaded Sir R. to resign. He was undetermined till Sunday night. Tuesday we were to finish the election, when we lost it by 16; upon which, Sir Robert declared to some particular persons in the House his resolution to retire, and had that morning sent the Prince of Wales notice of it. It is understood from the heads of the party, that nothing more is to be pursued against him. Yesterday (Wednesday) the King adjourned both Houses for a fortnight, for time to settle things. Next week Sir Robert resigns, and goes into the House of Lords. The only change yet fixed, is, that Lord Wilmington is to be at the head of the Treasury—but numberless other alterations and confusions must follow. The Prince will be reconciled, and the Whig-patriots will come in. There were a few bonfires last night, but they are very unfashionable, for never was fallen minister so followed. When he kissed the King's hand to take his first leave, the King fell on his neck, wept and kissed him, and begged to see him frequently. He will continue in town, and assist the ministry in the Lords. Mr. Pelham has declared that he will accept nothing that was Sir Robert's; and this moment the Duke of Richmond has been here from court to tell Sir R. that he had resigned the mastership of the horse, having received it from him, unasked, and that he would not keep it beyond his ministry. This is the greater honour, as it was so unexpected, and as he had no personal friendship with the duke.

For myself, I am quite happy to be free from all the fatigue, envy, and uncertainty of our late situation. I go everywhere; indeed, to have the stare over, and to use myself to neglect, but I meet nothing but civilities. Here have been Lord Hartington, Coke, and poor Fitzwilliam, and others crying: here has been Lord Desford and numbers to wish me joy; in short, it is a most extraordinary and various scene.

There are three people whom I pity much; the King, Lord Wilmington, and my own sister; the first, for the affront, to be forced to part with his minister, and to be forced to forgive his son; the second, as he is too old, and (even when he was young,) unfit for the burthen: and the poor girl, who must be created an earl's daughter, as her birth would deprive her of the rank. She must kiss hands, and bear the flirts of impertinent real quality."

It is not necessary to compare the fate of the two Sir Roberts; the scene we have extracted terminated Walpole's public life, but with Sir Robert Peel we fondly hope and believe that the "the end is not yet."

REPRESENTATION OF WINDSOR.—Colonel Reil, one of the representatives of Windsor, was in the town on Saturday and Monday, and made several calls upon those voters who supported him at the election in November last. Mr. Neville, the other member for the borough, was expected to arrive yesterday. A rumour was in circulation, that there was a probability of a son of Colonel Vyse, of Stoke, and a brother of the member for the southern division of the county of Northampton, offering himself on the protectionist interest at the next general election. It is not expected that Sir John de Beaufort will again contest the representation of the borough.—Morning Post.

FRUITS OF THE CORN LAWS.—Many cargoes of the oats that have arrived at Shields this week, are in a very bad condition with insects, owing to the lengthened time they have been in bond.—Newcastle Guardian.

THE ECONOMIST.

The extensive and increasing support which this Journal is receiving from the leading Mercantile, Banking, and Manufacturing Classes, without reference to political party, has induced a constantly increasing care to render the Commercial Department of the paper as complete and accurate as possible. The Editors are enabled to do this by the assistance of a Practical career usefulness, and work of future reference.

THE ECONOMIST.

WEEKLY COMMERCIAL TIMES, BANKERS' GAZETTE, AND RAILWAY MONITOR.

First—Leading articles on Political, Economical, Financial, Commercial, and general subjects, discussed in strict economical and Free Trade principles.

Second—A careful digest of the Proceedings and Debates in Parliament.

Third—A careful Abridgement of the News of the Week, with a notice of the Proceedings of the Public Assemblies.

Fourth—Literary Notices, and particularly of all Works on Economical, Financial, and Commercial Subjects.

Fifth—Correspondence and Answers to Queries on subjects of Statistical and Commercial Interest.

The Bankers' Gazette contains a careful account of the Money and Discount Market, a Review of the Foreign Exchanges, of the Returns of the Bank of England, and the general state of the Circulation of the whole Kingdom; Notice of Banks on Currency and Banking, and Leading Articles on all new and important questions connected therewith.

COMMERCIAL TIMES.

BOARD OF TRADE OFFICIAL MONTHLY ACCOUNTS
Of the Imports and Exports of the whole Kingdom, are given every month for the current year and the two preceding years. These accounts are published only in the Economist.

The Economist contains an accurate Price Current, the prices of each article in which are carefully revised on the evening of every Friday by an eminent House in each Department. The same of Railway Shares, Public Funds, Foreign Securities, and Banking Companies.

A List compiled of all the Ships which arrive at and sail from the Port of London, engaged in the American (North and South), the Colonial, African, East India, China, and South Sea Islands Trade, and Foreign Shipping generally.

THE RAILWAY MONITOR.

Contains a careful digest of all the Railway News of the week, of Public Meetings, and Parliamentary proceedings, with full Tables of the Prices of Shares of British and Foreign Lines, and a carefully kept Table of Traffic, and care is taken to furnish the fullest and most accurate statistics of all Central Railways, in which so much British Capital is now invested, and for that purpose Direct and Special Correspondents have been established at Paris, in Belgium, Holland, and Germany.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

NEW FEATURES OF THE ECONOMIST.

London, June 26th, 1846.

Such has been the Economist hitherto. It is not for us to say how far these numerous departments have been efficiently managed. The general approbation of our readers is the only evidence we have to refer to on that point. But we have now gained one great object for which this paper was established.

THE CORN LAWS ARE THIS DAY PRACTICALLY REPEALED.

The first and most important aim of Free Trade has been accomplished; but the great and practical fruits of that Freedom are yet to be secured; the danger of many doubtful doctrines is yet to be avoided; and numerous evils of the present system are yet to be swept from our institutions and our commerce.

The same principles on which the truth and advantages of Free Trade are based, will be found equally applicable to all other political and social improvements. It is the foundation of all moral and intellectual improvement, and it is to consist in the same great and noble principles on which the truth of Free Trade depends. Self-respect, a consciousness of individual responsibility, a healthy reliance on independent exertion, and a high sense of that justice which, while it demands what is due to itself, bids the possessor of power regard to the rights of others, constitute the basis of free men of industry, and of all the great social virtues and duties of life. Our principles are therefore closely associated with the great questions of Education, the Physical Improvement of the People, and the general advancement of Civil and Religious Liberty.

From this day the real practical value of the Economist begins.—Our principles are all consistent; their practical application is now of the first consequence. Relations of an entirely new character will in future exist between this and other countries, with which an intimacy must spring out of free intercourse, and facilities of communication as close as now exists between different parts of the United Kingdom.—our new country wants will be supplied from new sources; the want of new communities must be supplied by this country. To meet these new necessities, we have already established efficient Correspondents, intimate with the Trade and Agriculture of each Country, in Germany, Belgium, France, Holland, and Austria; and we are now sending similar agents for the United States, that everything important to the interests of this country may be communicated through our columns.

Not the least important consequences of Free Trade will be improvements of our own internal industry, under the influence of competition. And this will apply especially to

AGRICULTURE.

To which we shall in future devote an entire department of the paper, under the immediate and able guidance of the experienced and able agriculturist who has hitherto so efficiently conducted that department in the Economist. We shall send a select and experienced body of improvers will be carefully noticed, and the relation between landlord and tenant will receive careful attention.

In order to render the Economist suitable to the general reader, more space will be occupied in General News and in Literary Reviews than hitherto, so as to render it

A PERFECT FAMILY NEWSPAPER.
In addition, therefore, to the important departments which have been embraced in the Economist, and which will all be retained as perfect as hitherto, these new features will be placed upon an efficient and ample basis, conducted with the same care and uniformity of principle, as the articles characterised this Journal. It will consist of 32 pages, and will be the largest size admitted under the Stamp Act.
Published at the NEW VOLUNTARY PRESS, NEXT WEEK.
Published at the Office of 349, Strand, London; and to be had by order of all News-men.

CHEAPEST FAMILY NEWSPAPER.—"THE UNIVERSAL."

The Proprietors have decided the price to FOURPENCE. It contains as much matter, original and selected, as the "ECONOMIST" (double Number). It is issued as a continuation of literary general interest. It is free, honest, and independent. It is designed to be a newspaper of the first class, and is adapted for the family circle. Ministers of all denominations receive it at the reduced price of 6s. 6d. for six months. Office, 1, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street.

TO BE SOLD.—Two Copies of "THE ANTI-BREAD-TAX CIRCULAR," 2 vols., complete; and Two Copies of "THE LEAGUE," complete. Apply to J. Gadsby, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London.

LEAGUE PREMISES TO LET.—Those first-rate business premises, situate No. 67, Fleet-street, of fire-proof construction, occupied during the last three years as the offices of the Anti-Corn Law League, to let, on lease. Extensive suite of Chambers adjoining, also to let, together or separately. Apply to Mr. George Luxford, East Temple Chambers, 2, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street.

The following Numbers of THE LEAGUE are wanted: 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100. Six of each of these are wanted. A liberal price will be paid for them on their being forwarded to J. Gadsby, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Evening, July 4, 1846.

The usual events for the vacancies caused by the formation of a new Ministry have been moved for, and Lord John Russell has published his address to the citizens of London. A new era in English history has commenced, and not the least significant novelty is the fact that the Premier will be the representative of the metropolis. Another remarkable novelty will be the return of a merchant, Mr. Brown, as member for South Lancashire. No more striking proofs could be given of the recognition of the dignity of commerce in the empire, when the Prime Minister is the representative of the largest commercial constituency, and when one of the largest county constituencies selects a commercial gentleman for its member. It is also gratifying to observe the almost perfect identity of sentiment between Lord John Russell's address, and the speech with which Sir Robert Peel closed his Ministerial career. Both have emphatically pledged themselves to consummate the great work of Free Trade; and both have declared themselves ready to adopt such measures as will ensure for Ireland equal participation in the rights and privileges of the British constitution.

In another part of this paper we have taken our farewell of our readers; and we have now only to add that our pride in the past is not greater than our hope in the future. The speech of the out-going, and the address of the in-coming Premier, are equally manifestos of a course of policy suited to the circumstances, the position, and the dignity of the British Empire. Whatever men may hold power, the measures propounded by those whom we can no longer regard as rival statesmen, will be, and must be, the basis of every future administration. Henceforth monopoly is no longer practicable:

"Prone in the dust Protection shall be hurld,
Its name, its nature banished from the world."

Already its power has been shaken in France and smitten in America: Russia has begun to remodel her tariff, and the voice of Free Trade is heard in the Zollverein. The mutual interests of commerce are felt to be the very bonds of peace, and the mutual exchange of benefits is found to be the only alliance deserving the name of Holy. We have a new era opening before us; the dawn of a brighter day than ever yet shone upon England is already sending its rays above the horizon, cheering, illuminating, and inspiring. Grateful to Providence that has bestowed upon us such blessings, we call upon our country to accept her high mission, and fulfil her great destiny: "Arise, shine, for thy light is come; and the glory of the Lord hath risen upon thee!"

The above articles are the inventions of RUSS and SONG, 110 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, London, and being protected, any one imitating them will be proceeded against.

ANNALS OF THE LEAGUE.

In Two Volumes.

By A. W. PAULTON, Esq.

COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE.

The accomplishment of Free Trade will be one of the most remarkable events, not only in the history of the British Empire, but of the civilised world. No movement so important, so effective, and so successful, has ever been before witnessed by mankind. Those to whose zeal, integrity, prudence, and ability this great triumph is due, will be recognised as the benefactors of mankind to remote generations.

It is a duty, then, which we owe to the world and to posterity, to preserve some

that deliberative and executive body, which has achieved more by moral force, than has been accomplished by associations that included physical strength and political power. For this purpose arrangements have been made with Mr. HEIBERT, R.A., to paint a including Accurate Portraits, not only of the Principal Leaders, but of those less prominent Members, whose indefatigable labours during the whole course of the movement have entitled them to public gratitude. It is proposed that this shall be engraved by a first-rate artist, on a large scale 78 1/2 by 22 inches, and that the copies shall be sold at such a price as to place within the reach of persons of moderate fortune, a monument of the mighty movement by which monopoly was overthrown, and the cause of justice established, without any remembrance of outrage or violence to lessen the enjoyment of so glorious a victory. The principles of universal peace have been established by their own practical development in peaceful agitation.

In order to accomplish this great work of Art, on a scale and in a style worthy of the subject it is designed to commemorate, those who are interested in its production, are requested to communicate to Mr. AGNEW, Printseller and Publisher, Manchester, the Class of Engraving for which they wish to subscribe.

There will be three Classes of Engravings from this great Historical Picture, at the following prices:—
First Class Proofs, Ten Guinea Second Class Proofs, Seven Guinea. Third Class Prints, Three Guinea.

With the natural desire that what is here set down shall be read, we shall be brief. Indeed, we could wish that the laconic notice of a finger-post were sufficient for our object: merely pointing the way to the printer's, with no verbal flourish of what awaits those we hope to send there. Custom, however, will not be so satisfied. The prospective editor of every gravest determination must, like the pedlar, after some sort vaunt the character and variety of his wares. Whilst we yield to the practice, we hope to carry out the similitude, and—like the pedlar—bear our weekly pack of NEWS, and POLITICS, and LITERATURE, to the remotest nook and corner of the land.

NEWS.

Were it possible for a man to realise a recent forlorn idea of Lord Brougham's, and live seven days "in an air-pump," it is our hope that our proposed New Paper, would, on his deliverance, salve him with the fullest History of the World for his last week: its greater and lesser events—its hourly gossip. To achieve this, we shall imitate the chemical doings of certain purveyors: who to make food portable, condense the essence of whole bodies into packets. After this fashion shall we deal with the penny-a-liner. Let one instance suffice for our general plan.—Hanging being still continuing as an aid to public morale, we shall not circumspectly say, "the unfortunate man, or woman (children are not hanged now) was launched into eternity." No; we shall give the stark fact without flourish. We shall say—"the man was publicly killed." Now this simplicity yields a two-fold advantage—it gives us brevity; and more, in a clearer light, it sets forth truth.

POLITICS.

We shall deal with Politics as men deal with melons: accept a slice from any side, if the slice be good. And the simile holds out. For whereas, in the good old times, and times not so good or old, laws, like exotics, were cultivated for the few, so are they now, equally desirable by the many. And more; they will be had: peacefully—but determinedly—had. And in this inevitable adjustment, far be it from us to wish "to set class against class." No: let us have justice and not tumult to back us. And for this good reason; Justice must at some time conquer, if tumult do not betray her. In a word, our Politics will be the Politics of Progress. And for the wisdom of our ancestors, we shall not, like antiquarian meddlers, desire to preserve it for the rust and verdigris of the past, but solely for its current value and utility to the present and the future.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

It was recently said (and well said, too), by the Bishop of Oxford, "that it was a good thing the people would not now be kept quiet by a low standard of education." In plain words, "Dance School" Education; administered like laudanum, not to promote intellectual health, but all "for peace and quietness." The people are no longer to be thus drugged. They will assert their rightful condition in the State. Let the State, then, be their conscientious teacher; nor leave the task to demagogues by trade and patriots for ready money. Therefore, NATIONAL EDUCATION, as the handmaid of UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE, will have our unceasing advocacy.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Unless Heaven could be mapped out by Government Survey, we are for no government way to immortality. We say with Hood—"Our heart ferments not with the bigot's heaven, / All men we view with toleration thorough, / And have a horror of regarding heaven / As any Prince or Prelate's rotten borough." Hence, the vessel of the Bishop's Church—a very different vessel, by the way, from the boat of Simon Peter—would not, we think, inevitably founder, were her golden tow-ropes cast off from the State, and the rest of her voyage worked by volunteers.

FREE TRADE.

As was the design of Providence, in its great bounty, is made manifest. For surely, every land would have contained everything within itself, had not the Giver of the Good intended its free exchange among the family of man.

PEACE WITH ALL THE WORLD.

The First Lord of the Admiralty has recently avowed his preference of "the man who serves his country upon seas, to the man who serves it on land." Thus, in the Ellonborough mind, Private Smith in a shower of bullets is nobler, than Shakespeare in his study;—than Newton, Copernicus, Watt. We would not underrate the courage and endurance of Private Smith; but we shall do our best to do without them; to show that we have glory sufficient; and that the noblest and most humanising truths are written not in laurel leaves, but in life.

Enough of profession. We have briefly indicated our principles. We will no further dwell upon the weekly CONTENTS OF OUR NEWSPAPER, than to state that they will comprise more than the usual subjects of INFORMATION and AMUSEMENT, animated, it is hoped, with a spirit of novelty. WE WRITE FOR THE MASSES. We shall endeavour to write not down, but UP TO THEM. Assuredly, we shall not imitate a too common practice; thinking, that like certain yeomanry of indelible memory, the surest way to hit the crowd is—to aim low.

THE MANCHESTER TIMES.
Edited by Mr. PRENTICE, one of the seven originators of the Manchester Anti-Government Association, in September, 1834, and Member of the Executive Council of the League, from its appointment in March, 1836. The Manchester Times, commenced in 1835, was established as a business speculation than as a means of promoting civil, religious, and commercial liberty; and every great political, moral, and social reform, a period of unusual excitement and conflict of opinion, has received its zealous assistance. It was the first paper in this part of the country which removed from what was then called the ultra-liberal press the imputation of infidelity; and by its reports of meetings which had previously been utterly neglected by the Manchester papers, was at first shown that Lancashire possessed a religious public. It supported Catholic Emancipation, not from indifference to the value of Protestantism, but on the ground that men should not be excluded from civil rights on account of their religious opinions. Its expositions of the inequality and deficiency of the old representative system previous to the proposal of the Reform Bill were of acknowledged utility; and, since the passing of that great but still imperfect measure, it has not ceased to advocate a fuller and more complete representation of the people, with full protection to the voter from the exercise of undue influence. It was the only paper in Manchester which devoted its space to the proceedings of the Anti-Slavery Society; and the editorial articles which appeared from time to time to show that man could not justly hold property in his fellow-men, were not unavailing in forming that public opinion which effected the emancipation of the negroes in our colonies. It took the lead of all the provincial papers in opposition to Church Rates, either as a direct impost, or as the Whig administration proposed, a permanent charge on the Consolidated Fund; and it is now the only paper in Manchester which asserts that the religion of the people is not a proper subject for statute legislation. Recognising the advantages of Education, in the establishment of new and the reform of old Educational Institutions, it has been eminently useful; and it was the only paper published in Manchester which opposed the transfer of Church aggression brought forward by Sir James Graham, under the guise of a "Factory Education Bill." It was the only provincial paper in the Kingdom which exposed that iniquitous monopoly of the King's Printer and the Universities which made the Word of God double, and, in some instances, treble the price at which, in consequence of the destruction of the monopoly in Scotland, it is now published. It has unceasingly been the earnest advocate of perfect freedom of trade, not only for its direct benefits, but as a means of promoting Universal Peace; and it is not too much to affirm, that the lead which Manchester has taken in the present great movement against the landowners' monopoly may, in a considerable degree, be attributed to the effect produced upon the public mind by its constantly-repeated expositions of the mischiefs inflicted by the Corn Laws. Such was the course pursued when the proprietors were in advance of public opinion, and when they had to struggle with difficulties which would have overwhelmed men of less attachment to principle and less determination to carry out the views which they were pledged to maintain. That such a course has been pursued, under such circumstances, is no slight guarantee, that notwithstanding the temptations to expediency offered by the example of public men hitherto enjoying much of the public confidence, Civil, Religious, and Commercial Liberty will continue to be promoted with unabated zeal and energy.
